CHLORIS OF THE ISLAND, by H. B. Marriott Watson (Harper's, 6s.), has a fine, warm-blooded heroine, who is torn in two between her sympathies with her lawless kinsfolk and her passion for her lover who is their enemy. The fighting and the love-making are vivid and true, as might have been expected. For Mr. Marriott Watson has two manners, the "decadent" and the manly; and the latter is always everything that is virile and alive.

Do readers of fiction still remember the excellent novels of Jewish life that Miss Amy Levy wrote? If so they will know the sort of book Miss Lily H. Montagu attempts in NAOMI'S EXODUS (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.). There is the same knowledge of Hebrew life in West London, but there is a lack of the literary touch and quiet humour that made us hope to see Miss Levy do lasting work. Naomi Saul is not a very interesting person, but the story shows earnestness and sincerity, and to those who are interested in Jewish life "Naomi's Exodus" will make an especial appeal.

Lucas Cleeve's hero in AS THE TWIG IS BENT (Digby, 6s.) is a commercial sharp, and his doings reveal in the author no small knowledge of the shady ways of the Rialto. But the wooing of the heroine, Angela Browne, does not excite us, and the hero himself is a very depressing person. The style of the book is artificial and ineffective, and the humour almost painful.

"Our fortunes to our shoes are close allied. Pinched in the straight, we stumble in the wide," quotes Mr. or Miss G. G. Chatterton in the fore-front of STRAIGHT SHOES (Long, 6s.) and proceeds to tell us—alas, rather dully!—a story which demonstrates the correctness of the Dutch saying. Like the author's previous novels, "The Spirit of Circumstance" and "The Angel of Chance," this book is well written, well constructed, and well meaning, but it remains somewhat obvious, and is at the best a mediocre essay in the art of fiction.

The latest cry of the novel-reading public is for a new milieu into which they can be deported, where new experiences, new forms of life, can be encountered. Perhaps Mr. Arthur Henry in A PRINCESS OF ARCADY (Murray, 6s.) is not quite able to give all this, but he gives us a fairly fresh environment for the beginning of his book, and an American Arcadia suggests new possibilities. The story itself if not strikingly original is well-knit and cleverly written. It will delight many readers who are tired of stronger pabulum and seek after sweetness and light.

TALES OF INDIAN CHIVALRY, by Michael Macmillan (Blackie, 2s. 6d.), is a collection of ten short stories for boys dealing with the brave deeds of the Rajputs and the Moguls. The stories are sufficiently sensational, and there are plenty of pictures of the sort that one expects in books of the kind. Whether boys will accept them as adequate substitutes for tales of the Mutiny and the days of Clive is another question; the unfamiliarity and unpronounceable names will certainly not be a passport to their favour.

"We Three and Troddles" is now, we believe, in its seventieth thousand and may be therefore taken to have pleased a million or two of readers. TRODDLES AND US—AND OTHERS (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.), by Mr. R. Andom, offers to these admiring millions the same opportunity for Homeric laughter at its rough, quite commonplace, cockney fun.

THE LONDON LIBRARY.

A NEW DEPARTURE IN THE ART OF CATALOGUING.

The irritability sometimes said to be found in authors and scholars may partly be ascribed to defective library catalogues and to inadequate indexes. Libraries without catalogues and books without indexes, those sources of misery to all engaged in research, we may pass over in silence. The London Library has always possessed a catalogue which its members could consult, but since the last edition was published in 1888 the library has grown by leaps and bounds, and thus the catalogue has necessarily become most inadequate and the cause of no little vexation of spirit to the serious student. It will therefore bring gladness to his heart to learn that an entirely new catalogue has been prepared and will shortly be sent to press.

Before describing this important addition to our bibliographical literature we may remind our readers of the special functions of the London Library. Although it possesses a handsome and commodious reading room, the walls of which are lined with every conceivable book of reference, and the tables covered with a cosmopolitan array of periodicals, it is essentially a lending library. It is thus invaluable to those who prefer to do their work at home rather than in public, just as most of us prefer to live in houses of our own rather than in hotels or clubs. Every sort of book can be obtained, from books on sundials to books on the ancient Sabæans. So far as we know, from no other library in the world can such rare works as the 1557 edition of Sir Thomas More's English works, Migne's "Patrologia," the rare County Histories, Bouquet's "Recueil des Historiens de la Gaule et de la France," and original authorities in English history too numerous to mention, be carried home, and kept, if need be, for a couple of months. Even persons so happily circumstanced as to be able to buy all the books they desire find such a library useful, for a man may not care to commit himself to the purchase of a costly volume until he has made sure that it contains the material he wants. Another vast advantage of the library is that the books are so arranged that every member can, without either loss of time, or painful climbing of ladders, or undue straining of eyesight, consult at the shelves the group of books on the subject he is interested in at the moment, carrying off in triumph those he deems likely to prove most useful. Every author has experienced the joy of prowling round his own bookshelves, and alighting by a mere chance on some passage or reference pertinent to the work in hand; and if his own books are scant in number, he can enjoy this privilege to the full in St. James's-square. The excellence of the collection of foreign works is one of the distinguishing features of the library. Almost every work of note published during the last ten years in France, Germany, and Italy is there. This side of the London Library will surely grow in importance since England seems at last to be waking up to the necessity of knowing what is going on in other lands.

The first catalogue of the London Library, published in 1842, consisted of 142 pages, and the fifth edition of that catalogue, issued in 1888, of 1,600 pages. The new catalogue will contain about 2,250 quarto pages. Every one of the 215,000 volumes in the library at the end of 1900 has been catalogued from the book itself. The method employed is notable for some original features designed to assist the inquirer and clear away the confusion so often felt even by intelligent persons when consulting a catalogue. We can only name a few of these aids to the speedy identification of the most elusive book or author. The name chosen for the principal heading is invariably that in common use, that to which most persons would turn. For instance, Cavour is put under Cavour, not under Benso di Cavour, and Horace Walpole under Walpole, and not under Orford, while references from all the other and less usual forms are clearly recorded. Such forethought will certainly be highly appreciated; we all know the sonnets of Michael Angelo, but we are scarcely familiar with those of Buonarroti. Much trouble has been taken to identify the authors of anonymous publications, as well as the adopters of pseudonyms, while references are always given from the titles of the books and the pseudonyms, an asterisk being prefixed to all works known to have been published anonymously. This has involved direct application to authors, publishers, and others, and thus the new catalogue will contain first-hand information not to be found in any other printed catalogue or book of reference. Readers again may want to refer from the London Library catalogue to the British Museum catalogue, and accordingly, where the entry in the latter differs from the name in general use, it is printed after the more familiar heading in square brackets. The original feature, however, most calculated to appeal to the hearts of readers is that when a work is in several volumes the contents of each are printed in the catalogue, and thus the volume wanted can be seen at a glance. We have only mentioned a few of the innovations, but enough to show that the London Library catalogue will be a unique compilation of its kind, useful alike to the student and to the general reader, and as a bibliographical work, valuable to the public, to librarians, and to book collectors. A subject catalogue will, it is hoped, be issued as quickly as possible.

The work of cataloguing has brought to light many defects in the library which generous patrons of letters might, if they knew of them, be glad to remedy. Certain sets of periodicals like the Romania and the Quarterly Journal of Economics are incomplete; so are the publications of the Roxburghe Club, of the "Bibliothèque de l'école des hautes études," and of many other societies. Some of the "Voyage of the Challenger" official reports are wanting, and so are two volumes of Aglio's "Antiquities of Mexico." We are in the habit, in such cases, of consoling ourselves with the conviction that the realization of the ideal is an impossibility. But it is not necessarily so with a library. Expenditure of money and of time, and the employment of expert knowledge, can render a collection of books perfect, and thus it rests with the subscribers and well-wishers of the London Library to make it the most useful and satisfactory institution of the kind. In a world where, unhappily, more things are ill done than well done, they should not lose an opportunity, so rare of occurrence, of helping to establish a library that may claim to be called perfect.

Correspondence.

"CANADA IN ENGLISH FICTION."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Although I read Mr. Machray's survey under the above heading with deep interest, and found it both indulgent and discriminating, I venture to think it might be bettered by the inclusion of the three names which, after Messrs. Gilbert Parker and C. G. D. Roberts, one would most have expected to find there:—Mr. Clive Phillips Wolley, Mr. W. A. Fraser, and Miss Lily Dougall. In not referring to the brilliant work of the first-named of this trio, Mr. Machray, like many others whose residence in Canada is more recent than his own, had probably forgotten that British Columbia is part of the Dominion.

And Sir John Bourinot, by-the-by, in spite of his name, is not, as your contributor supposes, a French Canadian, but of British descent on both sides of the house.

I am, Sir, faithfully yours,
London, March 19. BECKLES WILLSON.

DECADENTS AND ANTI-BYRONISTS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The interesting discussion on "Decadent Metres," recently appearing in your columns, plainly shows the antagonism between two schools of poetry. The writer of the second letter is evidently a zealous partisan of the new school. Among certain critics, there is a systematic and relentless opposition to the poets who flourished in the first half of the nineteenth century. This has always been considered an exceptionally brilliant poetical era, but the New Criticism reverses this judgment, and, while favouring Shelley and Keats—who, it must be admitted, were underrated in their own day—and giving a condescending toleration to Wordsworth, it consigns the other poets of the period to scorn and oblivion.

Byron, as the most prominent and influential among them, is always a special object of attack, and no words are considered too strong to denounce and depreciate a writer who was the literary idol of his own time, who has become a classic with us, and is still held in the highest esteem on the Continent. To serve him, figuratively, as the Royalists served Cromwell, to dig up and mutilate his remains, and erase his name from Britain's muster roll of great ones, is mere vain spite, and cannot undo the past. Byron lived and reigned. He was indisputably—

The grand Napoleon of the realms of rhyme.

His influence continued active for more than a generation after his death, and is even now by no means extinct. No poet ever caused a greater sensation; had more imitators, followers, and worshippers (who far outnumbered his detractors), or called forth such a flood of able and exhaustive criticism on his life and works. Such a man could not have been the mere literary impostor his enemies try to make him out. It is high time that a combined stand should be made against this persistent belittling of a great name. A Byron Defence Association has become a necessity.

Even his supporters are not always loyal. One of them, lately, while defending him against a more than usually violent Swinburnian onslaught, says, "Byron, no doubt, wrote a great deal of intolerable rubbish." All writers are unequal, but such expressions are unpardonable. What "intolerable rubbish" did Byron write? His earliest poems had the faults of juvenility, which his critics pointed out in no measured terms, and these he afterwards admitted, and did not repeat. He had great versatility, and seldom failed in any new style he attempted. His series of short poetical romances, "The Giaour," "Bride of Abydos," "Mazeppa," "Siege of Corinth," &c., have never been excelled in vivid picturesqueness, dash, and glow, and the spirit of rapid action and wild adventure; and they contain also touches of pathos and tenderness, as well as passages of the purest poetic beauty. Byron wrote only when the fit was on him and the task thoroughly congenial, and then he wrote with great rapidity. His aim was truth and directness; he painted in primary colours, and did not stop to seek those mystic meanings and expressions now so much insisted upon. Hence his poems have the tone of true inspiration, of open-air freedom and freshness. He has been called an improvisatore. We picture the modern æsthete seated in his luxurious study, carefully weaving profound problems into elaborately high-flown verse. Byron, of the two, approaches much nearer to the typical bard of old, who roamed the world with lyre or harp and sang the deeds of heroes.

But his maturer and more sustained works show careful composition and severe correction. He could dive deep as well as soar high, and frequently reached a pinnacle where he could look down upon all rivals. Besides, he had the gifts of humour and keen satire, with marvellous powers of description—qualities not always combined with the loftier attributes of great poets. On momentous issues he could speak with a force to stir men's blood all over Europe.

He touch'd his harp, and nations heard, entranced.

Even as a metrist and melodist, his shortcomings have been unfairly exaggerated. His blank verse is often defective, though less so than many assert, but it abounds in lines and passages which have long been quoted as among the finest in English poetry. In rhyme, his natural element, he was musical as well as forcible, strong as well as tender, and many of his separate lyrics rank high among the standard songs of the nation.

On the other hand, the idolized Shelley, in spite of his genius, was often careless in his style, given to redundancy and the reiteration of favourite expressions, and so far from being always melodious that comparatively few of his numerous lyrics have been set to music. One of them is described by Samuel Lover—(himself an eminent lyricist)—as "impossible for singing, as every word shuts the mouth instead of opening it." Keats is by no means free from the "fantastic extravagance" with which his contemporaries charged him. Mrs. Browning sometimes lapses into execrable rhymes, while Robert Browning's jerky lines and Carlylean ruggedness are too well-known to need pointing out. Yet these were all great poets, and their failings did not make them little. It is only with Byron that we are asked to be rigidly exacting in matters of form.

The Tennysonian School, which succeeded the Byronic, had special qualities of its own, so distinct from the former that it is idle to compare them. Concerning the prevailing school of poetry, which seems inspired mainly by Keats, Shelley, and Swinburne (with a diversion towards the harsh realism of Kipling), we can only wish that its votaries would refrain from judging the poets of three generations ago by the peculiar standard they have set up for themselves.

But in spite of these conflicting influences, Byron, I am convinced, is a poet who will live—live when the New Euphuists have passed into oblivion, when the "Rudyard" have "ceased from Kipling" for ever, and when, perhaps, even Swinburne may be regarded rather as a master of poetical rhetoric than a divinely-inspired singer.

Yours faithfully,

WALTER PARKE.

THE SPLIT INFINITIVE. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your last number I suggested that German scholars might throw some light upon this subject, and by a happy coincidence the same number brings a letter from Mr. P. G. Wilson, Sub-Director of the Berlitz School of Languages, Elberfeld, which answers my question by implication.

Since Mr. Wilson adduces the German "zu übersetzen" as a parallel to the English "to quickly go," it is probably a fair inference that no nearer parallel occurred to him.

Now, I cannot see the analogy between the two. Does Mr. Wilson wish us to resolve "übersetzen" into two words, or to fuse "quickly go" into one?

A truer English parallel to his pair of German phrases would be "to upset an applecart" and "to set up an applecart," and I cannot see that the one is a split infinitive any more than the other.

Yours faithfully,

E. D. L.

"THE IVORY BRIDE." TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your reviewer, in noticing the above, asks, "What is aseity?" This is a word you may find in any dictionary. It is derived from the Latin—a, by; and se, oneself.

That is what I meant when I used it.

Yours faithfully,

Bangor, Wales.

THOMAS PINKERTON.

[ We do not find the word in Webster, nor in Chambers; though it appears in the larger works—the Century Dictionary and the Oxford English Dictionary.]

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

A third book about the last Ashanti campaign will be ready shortly, by Lieutenant-Colonel A. F. Montanaro, R.A., and Captain Armitage, D.S.O., who were both with the Relief Force. It is entitled "The Siege and Relief of Kumassi." Colonel Montanaro has also written a little book called "Hints on Bush-Fighting"—after the style of General Baden-Powell's "Hints on Scouting"—which will be ready next week.

Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack announce an edition of the Waverley Novels in forty-eight volumes—uniform with "The Edinburgh Stevenson"—to be printed by Messrs. T. and A. Constable. The text of "The Edinburgh Waverley" will be that of the last edition revised by Scott with his notes and introductions, and there will be a glossary of Scots words at the end of each volume. The portraits for the frontispieces will comprise authentic portraits of Scott, some of them reproduced for the first time, of the prototypes of some of the best known characters, and of some of the historical personages. The book will be bound in buckram, with red morocco label, and two volumes will be issued every month, beginning in April. There will be only 1,000 copies for sale.

The Jewish Chronicle announces the first of twelve volumes of an exhaustive Jewish Encyclopedia. Brought out under the auspices of the Chronicle, it is to be published by Messrs. Funk and Wagnalls. There are 300 editors from all parts of the world. The managing editor is Mr. Isidore Singer and the literary editor Mr. Joseph Jacobs.

All gourmets—especially habitués of Pagni's—will be interested in Mrs. W. G. Waters' book on Italian cookery, which is to be published by Mr. Heinemann. "The Cook's Decameron" is divided, like its great prototype, into the story of ten days, giving complete menus for each day, and 200 "recipes," including all ingredients to be procured in England.

Mr. Benjamin Swift's new book which Mr. Heinemann announces, written under the novelist's own name, W. R. Paterson, is not a novel, but a survey of modern knowledge with reference to conduct, and an attempt to re-state the old problems in an unconventional way. Its title will be "The Eternal Conflict." From the same house we may expect the English edition of "The Love-Letters of Prince Bismarck," to which we referred in a German letter on December 22nd.

The Cambridge University Press announce "Lord Macaulay," the Members' Prize Essay for 1900, by D. H. Macgregor, Scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge; the first volume of "The Cambridge Modern History," which Lord Acton is editing; "The Teaching of History," also edited by Lord Acton; and Professor Woodward's "Outlines of the History of the Expansion of the British Empire, 1500-1870," and "A History of Education from the Beginning of the Renaissance" (Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges). One of the many important items in the classical list is to be the "History of Classical Scholarship," by Dr. Sandys.

Besides Professor Lewis Campbell's book "On the Nationalisation of the Old English Universities," Messrs. Chapman and Hall will shortly publish a new novel by Mr. George Gissing entitled "Our Friend the Charlatan"; "Solveny or Salvation: A Book for Millionaires," by P. E. Bodington; and Sir Robert Hart's new book on China, entitled "These from the Land of Sinai." Sir Robert includes a Tsung-li-Yamen circular to Chinese Ministers abroad, and the Inspector-General's Memorandum on commercial relations.

Messrs. Bell have "A Life of Napoleon Bonaparte" in the press, by Mr. J. H. Rose, who wrote "The Revolutionary and Napoleonic Era" in the Cambridge Historical Series. Mr. Rose had his biography in hand before Lord Rosebery's book appeared last autumn, but he has included a criticism of it. The new life will be in two volumes, with illustrations, maps, and plans. The eighth and last volume of Mrs. Hamilton's translation of Gregorovius' "History of the City of Rome in the Middle Ages" is in the press, and from the same publishers we learn that the first volume is almost ready of the new edition of Dr. Dyer's "History of Modern Europe," revised and brought up to date by Mr. Arthur Hassall. The long-promised fifth volume of the new edition of Swift's works ("Historical and Political Tracts—English") edited by Temple Scott, may be expected towards the end of April. For their series of Handbooks of English literature Messrs. Bell have in the press "The Age of Shakespeare," by Thomas Seccombe and J. W. Allen; "The Age of Chaucer," by F. J. Snell, with an introduction by Professor Hales, and "The Works of Charles Stuart Calverley," with a memoir by Sir Walter J. Sendall, Governor of British Guiana.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton announce "The Church, the Churches, and the Mysteries, or, Revelation and Corruption," by Mr. G. H. Pember, a book complete in itself, but designed also as an introduction to the third volume of the series to which it belongs—"The Great Prophecies of the Centuries Concerning the Church," now in its fourth edition. Two other theological works will be ready shortly:—"Evangelical Doctrine—Bible Truth," by the Rev. C. Anderson Scott, M.A., and "The Living Lord and the Opened Grave," by the Rev. T. A. Gurney; while the third volume, sixth series, of "The Expositor," edited by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, will be ready in June. In fiction Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton will publish next month Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler's "Sirius and other Stories"; William Le Queux's "Her Majesty's Minister; or, The Shadow of a Throne"; Morice Gerard's "Queen's Mate"; and A. St. Laurence's "My Heart and My Lute."

Mr. Brimley Johnson has arranged a novel series of "Carpet Plays" under the editorship of Mr. Lucian Oldershaw (at one time stage manager to the Oxford University Dramatic Society), providing selected pieces. There will be new original comedies, adaptations from novels, duologues, scenes without men, scenes without women, plays for children, &c., while diagrams and directions take the place of stage manager where necessary. The first volume will be Cranford at Home, a play for ladies, the second In the Italian Quarter by Rosina Fillipi, as performed at the Vaudeville. The "Complete Library" edition of Charles Lamb (prepared by Messrs. Gowans and Gray, of Glasgow, and published in London and elsewhere by Mr. Brimley Johnson) was announced in our supplement last week, but, owing to the illness of Mr. Thomas Hutchinson, the editor, its publication has now been postponed, and the new edition of Cervantes (in twelve volumes, including his letters), under the editorship of Mr. James Fitzmaurice-Kelly, is announced in its stead. In the same library the fifth volume of Keats will be ready on April 1st. Among other books to be published by Mr. Johnson are "Master and Slave," by Mr. A. T. Story, who wrote some of the articles in the Daily News on "No Room to Live in the Villages"; and "A Wanderer: From the Papers of the late H. Ogram Matuce," by Mr. C. F. Keary.

Among books not previously mentioned which are to come from Messrs. Putnam are "The Goodness of God," by Professor John Bascom, based upon two lectures delivered at New Haven; and "Logic: Or, the Analytic of Explicit Reasoning," by Mr. George H. Smith (author of "A Critical History of Modern English Jurisprudence," and "Elements of Right and the Law,") designed to prove the practical utility of logic.

Mr. George Allen will publish Mr. Maurice Maeterlinck's new work "The Life of the Bee," a chapter from which is at present appearing in the Fortnightly Review. The book is a characteristic comparison of the life and economy of the bee with the lives of men. It will be published in May.

The following list of announcements from Mr. Henry J. Drane reached us at the end of last week, after our supplement devoted to "Spring Publications" had gone to press:—"Cowper and Mary Unwin," by Caroline Gearey (6s.); "Lord Culmore's Error," by Mary Albert (6s.); "Horace Morrell," by Cecil Haselwood (6s.); "Cash is King," by Arrowhead (6s.); "Real Life," by C. S. Marshall (6s.); "Must Yield to Win," by Adelina (3s. 6d.); "Friend or Foe?" by E. S. Thompson (3s. 6d.); "One Frail Woman and Three Queer Men," by Edgcombe Staley (3s. 6d.); "The Separation of the Beresfords," by Catherine Adams (3s. 6d.); "Puffs of Wind," by Helen Dickens (3s. 6d.); "An Old Woman's Tragedy," by E. S. Thompson (3s. 6d.), and "My Silver Spoons" (3s. 6d.).

"The Helmet of Navarre," the historical story by Miss Bertha Runkle now running in the Century, is to be issued in book form in this country by Messrs. Macmillan.

Mr. Hugh Macmillan's "The Highland Tay," which has been coming out in the Art Journal, with Mr. Scott Rankin's drawings, is to appear in book form. The publishers, Messrs. Virtue, also announce a study in the topography of the Pilgrim's Progress, entitled "Bunyan's Country," by Mr. A. J. Foster, Vicar of Wootton.

Mr. Elliot Stock announces the following volumes of verse:—"Collaborators and other Poems," by A. W. Webster; "Fire-side Poems," by J. Stratton; and "Dead Victors, a Poem of the South African War."

Mr. F. H. Groome will be the editor of George Borrow's "Lavengro" in Messrs. Methuen's "Little Library."

NOTES ON THE PROBLEMS.—A. C. W. writes:—"In regard to my criticism of 122, I think that, although a problem may be very good without being very difficult, an obvious key is a defect. The key in this case would be a commonplace move in a game over the board. The marvel is that with practically the whole of the White forces on the board, and with the B K held in a vice, and every Black piece in some helpless position, yet there is only one solution in two moves—and herein I fully admit the composer's ingenuity—but it is all the blindest prose. Not so Nos. 130-139." We can only say that we greatly value such free criticism as Mr. Waters offers, and it would be interesting if other correspondents would also express their opinions freely. It is worthy of repetition, re No. 122, that some problems have been composed with one purpose only. Some, for example, show a large number of variations, others are intended to show elegant mating positions; others, again, present the one feature difficulty. Find the leading idea and you see that it is confined to one variation and nothing else is there. A fair example is the clever problem in the margin. We only wish to emphasize the statement that to judge all problems purely from one standpoint is to do the authors great injustice.

WHITE. 9 pieces.

AN ORIGINAL CHARMING NOVEL

ENTITLED

HIS LORDSHIP'S WHIM

By GORDON CUMING WHADCOAT.

PRESS OPINIONS.

"It is a beautiful romance and will probably be one of the best discussed books of the season."—Sunday Special.

"We are not going to spoil the reader's enjoyment by summarizing the story. It is a fantastic enough notion which Mr. Whadcoat has evolved; this method of dealing with it is refreshingly original. That part of the story in which the meeting of the girl with the man is related is exceptionally well done. If this is his first attempt at fiction he is to be congratulated upon a very promising debut."—St. James's Budget.

"An extraordinary work."—Liverpool Mercury.

"The story is pleasantly written, and we congratulate Mr. Effingham Wilson upon so auspiciously breaking a ground untrodden by him for a quarter of a century."—Bookseller.

"There is an air of dainty romance and inexpressible optimism about this novel . . . a really delightful idyll. The author's lightness of touch and general cheerfulness are quite welcome adjuncts to a modern story and from them the reader will benefit as much as from the interest in the Arcadian pair of lovers and the Adelphi villain."—North British Daily Mail.

"Lively reading."—Spectator.

"A clever story. . . The reader will find in this vigorous story exciting entertainment."—Lloyd's.

"Continues to yield amusement to the end."—Stotsman.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The library on board the Ophir is said to contain books supplying the whole story of our colonies and of the men who have made them. This sounds as if this section alone would constitute a considerable library; and the list of books contained in it might make a convenient bibliography of colonial literature.

M. Méline's paper, the République, contains this curious piece of information—or of gossip:—

It is well known that Mlle. Lucie Faure, the daughter of the ex-President of the Republic, has prepared the memoirs of her father. The work, it appears, is ready, yet the author is not yet to publish it. The secret of this hesitation is to-day apparently revealed. The work contains certain autograph letters of various Sovereigns, notably of Queen Victoria; and Edward VII., her son, apprised of the intended publication, has, it is said, manifested his dissatisfaction at seeing these letters revealed to the public. Consequently Felix Faure's memoirs remain until further notice unpublished. Such, at all events, is the report.

A notable gathering of actor-managers were present last Friday at the Comedy Theatre at a matinée given by the Sunday Special newspaper, when Mr. Zangwill's The Revolted Daughter was performed. Whether Mr. Alexander found in it a satisfaction of that "felt want" to which he has given expression may be doubted. "1899," which is the date of the events portrayed, is not quite modern enough or quite ancient enough. The new woman who wants to experience life and who thinks she can live on a platonic friendship is a little too familiar a figure, though she was played to admiration by Miss Nina Boucicault. There is good material in the way of characterization in the play, and the dialogue, though its witticisms were a little too much worked up to, held the attention. So did the play; but it seldom did more. The audience listened with interest, but were hardly ever really moved, because there were very few situations capable of moving them, while the sudden transformations of character towards the end of the piece marred its dramatic unity.

In Cornhill appears a "Fragment of a Greek Tragedy" by A. E. Housman. We are delighted, after many years, to discover the author of this masterpiece, which must have been written at least twelve years ago. A considerable portion of it we quoted, in ignorance of its origin, in an article on Parodies which appeared in Literature of June 24, 1899. As a sample of its quality, and to give the correct text, we may quote the concluding lines:—

Eriphyle (within). O, I am smitten with a hatchet's jaw;
And that in deed and not in word alone.
Cho. I thought I heard a sound within the house
Unlike the voice of one that jumps for joy.
Eri. He splits my skull, not in a friendly way,
Once more: he purposes to kill me dead.
Cho. I would not be reputed rash, but yet
I doubt if all be gay within the house.
Eri. O! O! another stroke! that makes the third.
He stabs me to the heart against my wish.
Cho. If that be so, thy state of health is poor;
But thine arithmetic is quite correct.

For the last two lines, our version ran—

Indeed, if that be so, ill-fated one,
I fear we scarce can hope thou wilt survive.

This is not quite so happy; it is not often that the question of a disputed reading can be settled by reference to the author.

Mr. Murray promises a new impression of his edition of Crabbe, moved thereto it is said by demands from several quarters, and Messrs. Ward Lock also announce a new Edition of his works. "Crabbe is my great gun," wrote Edward FitzGerald, "and will outlive—, —, and Co." Perhaps even the popular homage now accorded to himself would not have rejoiced FitzGerald's heart so much as to see such a demand for the poetry of his old favourite. He himself did not venture to tempt the public with more than a slim selection from Crabbe. And we fancy even now that Mr. Murray's enterprise is prompted not so much by the public, as by the legitimate succession of sound critics and true readers, who have maintained the cult of Crabbe and of the true realism of his poetry, so different from the popular "realism" which is but the seamy side of romance.

We do not, it will be seen, go so far as Mr. Clement Shorter did in his address to the East Anglian Society on Monday. He said, "It may be frankly admitted that no one reads Crabbe to-day." We have faith enough in the literary public to believe that it is dangerous to make this assertion about any real English classic. We cordially subscribe to another remark of Mr. Shorter's—viz., that Cowper and Crabbe are "the two most natural and the two most human poets in the English literature of two centuries, only excepting the favourite poet of Scotland—Robert Burns." The address was a singularly careful and exhaustive summary of a very big subject—the literary association of East Anglia, a district which, so far from meriting the charge of rustic simplicity sometimes imputed to it, is really (as Mr. Havelock Ellis is able to show in the new Monthly Review) the most important centre of literary genius in England. In the report of the address before us, by the way, Robert Bloomfield's name is spelt Blomfield—no doubt a printer's error. We only mention it because, though the "Dictionary of National Biography" is silent on the subject, we believe the author of "The Farmer's Boy" was of the same family as Bishop Blomfield, who was born at Bury St. Edmunds. Tradition says that the poet's father quarrelled with his relatives and annexed another "o" to assert his independence of them.

Another book of reminiscences "by an Old Resident" about Malaya—"Play and Politics" (Gardner, Darton)—has just appeared, and Mr. Manville Fenn's last book, "Running Amok," takes us to the same country. It is a country popular nowadays with both traveller and novelist; but if there were a map wherein countries were coloured according to literary conquest, the Malay peninsula would no doubt be assigned to Sir Frank Swettenham and Mr. Hugh Clifford. Between them they have compiled a Dictionary of the Malay tongue, and separately they have given the modern English reader the most vivid sketches and idylls of life in the country which, in the world of fiction, Mr. Joseph Conrad has turned to such good account. Théophile Gautier was fond of reading the dictionary, but with his taste for "local colour" he would have preferred the other books even to the dictionary. Readers of "In Court and Kampong," "Studies in Brown Humanity," and "In a Corner of Asia" have heard with regret that Mr. Hugh Clifford has left his post in Borneo. Mr. Bret Harte evoked his magical scenes of California after he left the country, as Mr. Kipling has done in the case of India; and, until the Colonial Office finds fresh work for his able hands, we hope that Blackwood's may still reap the harvest of Mr. Clifford's leisure.

A shop-window in the Strand reveals a new and quite modern development of the art of criticism. A considerate bookseller there saves the public both time and trouble by reviewing his own books. His window bristles with notices stuck in the leaves of the books. This is a simplification of criticism suitable to the times. The reviewer who wishes for a quiet life may now escape the strictures of Mr. Churton Collins and exacting editors, to say nothing of the demands and the menaces of revengeful authors, and simply take his seat behind the counter as the bookseller's typewriter.

* * * *

Mr. F. G. Kitton, of St. Albans, has reprinted (for the first time) the very scarce pamphlet by Mrs. Robert Seymour, entitled "An Account of the Origin of the 'Pickwick Papers,'" only two copies of which are extant. Dickens collectors should be glad of the opportunity thus afforded them of securing the reproduction, the original work not being obtainable. Fifty copies have been printed, for subscribers only, and the interest of the subject is enhanced by Mr. Kitton's introduction, where will be found the history of the absurd claim made by the widow of the artist who designed the first seven illustrations for "Pickwick," with Dickens' refutation thereof. The little volume is an interesting Pickwickian curio.

Lord Rosebery was quite right in saying, in his speech at the Mansion House on Commercial Education, that we want something more than pluck and pushfulness in the systematized competition of the present time. English commerce has never lacked its merchant adventurers, but, as a French observer has remarked, the "go-ahead" is all very well in business, what is wanted to-day is more trained intelligence. The need will not be met, as some people think, by the wholesale introduction of bookkeeping and shorthand into primary, and of modern languages into secondary, schools. Our success in commerce depends as much as our success in war on the capacity of our chiefs. The leaders require training not in the routine but in the principles of business. We do not want any "Toy Bureau" where the pupils play at commerce, but a mercantile Sandhurst. Such an institution already exists in the shape of the London School of Economics where the "would-be" banker, accountant, railway official, broker, or merchant may find suitable courses of lectures in which the principles of his art are scientifically explained and presented. The school has justified its existence, having in five years received no less than 1,500 pupils. It now seeks to enlarge its borders, and an appeal for funds has been made to City merchants. Mr. Passmore Edwards has already subscribed £10,000 to the building fund. Lord Rothschild's firm has given £5,000 and agreed to act as bankers. With such sponsors the school should easily gather together the endowment necessary to allow it to take its proper place in the new London University.

THE FAIRIES' DAY.

("In Celtic lore, the night is the fairies' day.")

—W. B. YEATS.)

Through groves of immemorial oak
The moonlight filters flake on flake;
And all the tribes of fairy folk

Awake:

The glittering eyes of elf and sprite
Quick-twinkling, prick the thick of night;
Through folded blossom gleams the fay;—
—The night is fairies' day.

Too fast the silver hours flow,
But when the frolic night is done
They mock with moons of mistletoe

The sun:

Where shadows float in thickest flight
They make of noon a mimic night
Through which these fruited moonbeams play:
—The night is fairies' day.

So in the sombre forest-belt
That rounds our academic glades,
The tender moonlight of the Celt

Pervades;

And lends the magic of its light
To our profounder depths of night,
And tempers with ascetic ray
The glare of Saxon day.

The sale a month or two ago for £120 of a slightly damaged copy of Browning's "Pauline" in first edition, uncut, raises the perplexing question as to the average proportion that may be expected to survive of the issue-number of a work like this. Collectors will be interested to know, and we have it from an authentic source, that eighty copies of the "Pauline" were printed in 1833. Of these no more than 13 can now be traced, although for years enthusiasts have been in eager quest of the rarity. This proportion is large when compared with Tennyson's Jubilee Ode of 1887. A thousand copies were printed; four only are known—one of these having realized £31 in November, 1899. Undeniably the "Pauline" is one of the gems of the nineteenth century from the standpoint of the bibliophile. Ten copies were sent, we believe, to the Rev. W. J. Fox, who reviewed the poem sympathetically in the Monthly Repository. In the eighties the poet himself lent to Mr. T. J.

Wise a copy from which the facsimile reprint of 1886 was made. The most attractive example existing is in the collection of a well-known Browning admirer. The flyleaves are full of notes in the poet's autograph, and on the title-page is the inscription "To Catherine from her affectionate Edward FitzGerald," which alone suffices to mark the little booklet out from its fellows.

We publish in another column an appreciation, by Miss Christabel Coleridge, of Miss Charlotte Yonge's life and work.

Miss Yonge lived long, and did a great deal of work ; Girls' and it ought certainly to be possible to draw some Books. moral from her widespread and enduring popularity.

Perhaps the most obvious moral is that literary success does not, any more than social success, depend exclusively upon intellectual endowments, and that, in the one case as in the other, an attractive personality will cover a multitude of intellectual shortcomings. There probably never was a trained critic who ranked Miss Yonge's work very high, or derived acute pleasure from its perusal. Her contributions to history were hardly superior to Mrs. Markham's, and even in the case of her fiction there were faults as apparent. But even the critic could seldom find it in his heart to be disrespectful to Miss Yonge. He could not escape the pervading sense of her amiability ; and he was quite satisfied that girls, who could not meet her allurements with his own front of brass, should prefer her novels to any others. It was almost an article of faith with him that the girls who liked Miss Yonge's books were good girls, and that the tendency of Miss Yonge's books was to make them better. Whether this conventional criticism should be allowed to stand as the final verdict is, perhaps, another question. Indications of a revolt against it are not wanting among the girls themselves. Miss Yonge was what is generally called an "old-fashioned" writer ; and the ideals which she held up to her young readers are "old-fashioned" too. To say that is not, of course, necessarily to condemn them ; for there are some departments of life in which the old-fashioned ideals are the best. But some critics would, not without some show of justification, go further, and maintain that these particular old-fashioned ideals are, if not exactly false, at all events inadequate. The criticism, in fact, is applicable not only to the works of Miss Yonge but to those of the great majority of writers for girls. In almost all such works one discerns a tendency to narrow a girl's outlook upon life, and to teach her to see things in an untrue proportion. Sometimes it is her vanity that is flattered ; and she is encouraged in the notion that she has only to do her hair prettily, and be passively and negatively good, in order to be worthy of the devotion of a lifetime. In other cases she is nurtured on the principle of "be good and let who will be clever"—a theory which has probably done something to counteract the good accomplished by the rest of its originator's writings. For that theory as worked out in girls' books is apt, perhaps, to impress upon them too strongly the conviction that they are better than their neighbours if they are regular church goers and work industriously for bazaars ; and they are not taught that to continue empty-headed when they have the opportunity of cultivating their intelligences, and to be the patrons of the most foolish books on the shelves of the circulating libraries, are things to be ashamed of. In so far as literature influences life, these characteristics of the books put into the hands of school-girls must be held responsible for the "cult of the curate" and for the fact that novels like those of Miss Yonge find no favour among the girl students of the day. Miss Yonge, however, we hasten to add, avoided the worst faults of writers of this class ; she had no inconsiderable gifts as a story-teller ; she certainly, as Miss Coleridge shows, exerted, in many ways, a wide and wholesome influence. The criticism which may fairly be made on her writings is that she shared the prejudices of the class for which she wrote far too intimately to be an ideal writer for them. With a little less Hebraism and a little more Hellenism, she would, perhaps, have exercised a yet more salutary influence, even if her works had been less popular.

Personal Views.

TRADUTTORE, TRADITORE.

Traduttore, traditore, says the Italian proverb ; translator spells traitor. Yet the treason is often truly well-intentioned. Few, except those who have essayed the task, know how difficult, how tormenting, the work of translation is ; and the many failures, even of high scholars and great writers, which strew the path, if they do not deter the subsequent pilgrim, perhaps may actually hearten him. Where so many have failed, his own failure may pass almost unnoticed ; he will be in good company. And so translation proceeds apace ; this treason is ever on foot. It is sometimes of a mild and, so to say, inoffensive kind. Expansion, to wit, is a besetting sin of almost all translators, a venial sin, which will give qualms only to the most delicately adjusted conscience. It is so easy, so natural, to seek periphrasis when one comes upon a compressed, compact phrase ! Mr. Dent's edition of Balzac, admirably translated as it is, is marred too often by this ineffectual enlargement. In an early chapter of "Eugénie Grandet" occurs the sentence Un coup de soleil l'enrichit, un temps de pluie le ruine, a perfectly simple and rhythmical sentence, which is rendered by the translator, "A few scorching days and his fortune is made ; a rainy summer is a ruinous thing for him." The first clause will pass muster, though even there Balzac's designed antithesis between large effect and apparently slight cause is lost sight of ; but the second clause, with its futile length and its jejune employment of that drudging word thing, is not to be excused. Such expansion, however, is sometimes inevitable, due solely, or in great measure, to essential differences between the languages. Our Saxon monosyllables are a constant stumbling-block to French translators. M. Boutmy has recently pointed out that the French verb regarder, modified by various adverbs, has to do duty for a number of English words, such as look, stare, glance, gaze, glare, gloat, wink, peep. The psychological problem involved is an interesting one, still awaiting full treatment by a competent hand ; the practical result is that French is incapable of adequately transmuting the colour of English style. The accomplished translators of Mr. Kipling's "Jungle Book," for example, have nothing better for "Sing them home" than Chantez-leur une petite chanson pour les reconduire. "Trudge" appears variously as monter pesamment and cheminer péniblement, and "homesick" is wholly disguised in en proie à la nostalgie. In another translation, "for money or love" is conjured into soit par l'effet de telles sympathies, soit moyennant finances. Even M. Henry Davray, as accomplished in translating as he is industrious, transforms "wobbled" into s'agitait en un mouvement irrégulier. This suggests the question whether the French do after all possess vigorous colloquialisms answering to ours ; certainly they keep them for the most part out of their books : it is a common remark that, in French novels, the diction of your ragpicker is as choice as that of your duchess. M. Davray, to quote him again, renders "booing" (of a crowd) by protestations, and "horseplay" by brutalités ; while, for all his knowledge of England and the English, he is surely too optimistic when he names the "loafers" about a railway station commissionnaires occasionels.

Another question is, how far a translator is entitled to alter or adapt his original—whether he may do so at all without incurring the charge of treason, whether in any case he should do so silently. One would think not ; yet it is done. M. de Wyzewa, excellent critic and translator, was last year the target for innumerable shafts of reproach for thus editing Tolstoi. He was deeply hurt. He told a friend of mine that Tolstoi is sujet à de fortes distractions ; "When, for instance, I see speaking and acting a character of Tolstoi's whom he has previously declared dead, ought I not arranger un peu les choses ? In his last romance, there is a very pathetic scene where the hero, after innumerable misfortunes, finds the woman he loves in prison ; and in what a situation ! The following night he cannot sleep ; why ? Through emotion ? No ; because, says Tolstoi, the horrid smell from the fosses d'aisances remained in his nostrils ! That is all very well, but Tolstoi ought at least to have remembered the violent emotions of the day, and to have told his reader that the objectionable smell was able to overpower those other impressions." And so M. de Wyzewa touches up his original, and is vehemently reproached. "It is all so very funny," says my friend. Strictly, M. de Wyzewa must, I think, be adjudged in the wrong ; his business is to portray, to interpret, not to correct ; though perhaps he is not seriously to blame for refusing Tolstoi the right of resuscitating a defunct character—in his book "Resurrection," withal.

Translators, in the main, treat their texts with respect, and their treason is at least not wilful. The same cannot be said of M. Firmin Roz. His travesty of "Jude the Obscure," which has appeared in the Revue hebdomadaire, is really a striking illustration of the dangers pointed out by M. Henry Davray in these columns six months ago. With every wish to treat him tenderly, it must be said that he is very ignorant of English, and very bold to lop and chip at Mr. Hardy's work as he has done ; the story is defaced beyond recognition. At least one third of it is gone altogether, without a word to show the French reader that the version is incomplete. If the abridgment had even been discreetly managed and decently confessed, one's indignation might have been tempered ; but M. Firmin Roz has gone about his work with an imperfect notion of his responsibility. Sentences are snapped off in the middle, paragraphs turned topsy-turvy ; details vital to Mr. Hardy's patient synthesis are ruthlessly nipped away, and the tragedy is thereby inevitably debased and vulgarized. To give an instance or two. Writing of that fatal Sunday afternoon when Jude is torn between his intellectual ambitions and his physical attraction for Arabella, Mr. Hardy devotes a couple of pages to the minute analysis and poise of his antagonistic motives, preparing thus for the predestinate conclusion, and awakening a tragic pity for the youth. In the translation these two pages are curtailed to half a page ; all analysis is gone ; and one is left with the impression that Jude has donned his best clothes for a premeditated seduction. Again, the fine chapter describing Jude's migration to Christminster—the emotions that stirred in him as he desecrated from the hill-top the twinkling lights of the city of his dreams, the thoughts that brooded in his mind as he stood in the shadow of her ancient towers, the voices that spoke to him out of her past as he lay awaiting sleep—almost all this is clean obliterated ; in the translation Jude is just an ordinary stonemason seeking work, and roused from his study of a local map by the voice of a suspicious policeman. May we not see in M. Roz's method a commentary on the difference between the naturalism of Mr. Hardy and the naturalism of M. Zola ? The former, however much one may disagree sometimes with its methods, is fundamentally that of a poet, whose vision pierces the husk of mortality ; is not the latter that of a fingering slave,

One that would peep and botanize

Upon his mother's grave —

an animated microscope, magnifying every wrinkle and flaw on the face of Nature ? I do not mean that M. Roz has Zolaized Mr. Hardy ; that would be unjust ; but I do think that, unconsciously, he has subdued his translation to the taste that cherishes M. Zola.

And this translator's ignorance of English is—I am afraid to say how wonderful. His pages teem with the most ridiculous blunders—blunders not merely laughable, but fatal to the sense. For instance, Jude's precious copies of the classics, bought second-hand with money painfully saved, are transformed into "old copy-books" ; and the street lamp by which he scans his new map of Christminster is diminished to a lampe portative—as though the British workman carried a bicycle-lamp at his watch-chain. Poor giggling Anny's encouraging remark to Arabella, "Lots of girls do it," is converted into "It is the fate of girls," at one stroke turning English maidens into demi-vierges. Arabella, accounting to Jude for the partial loss of her art of dimpling her cheeks at will, says to him reproachfully, "I was fatter then," which the translator perversely renders "I have got too fat." When Sue, turned schoolma'am, is nervously dreading the approaching annual examination, M. Roz, no doubt to heighten the effect, talks of "His Majesty the Inspector," a view of His Majesty's inspectors held nowhere out of the infant-room. The "By y'r leave" of a luggage-trundling porter is elevated into the "Show your tickets" of the collector ; while the phrase "She will have it hot" becomes Elle sera moins fière, and "redeeming characteristic" makes pure nonsense as le caractéristique besoin de compensation. The applausive "Hear ! hear !" that greets the Latin declamation of poor drunken Jude in the pot-house appears as "Ecoutez ! écoutez !" and the "decayed church iron-monger" among the company, "who appeared to have been of a religious turn in earlier years," is said "to have lately felt impelled to seek holy orders."

What can we call this but treason of the deepest dye ? Luckily it is rare ; yet the mere existence and possibility of it shows that the warning given by M. Davray to English authors to investigate the credentials of offering translators was not untimely, and may well be taken to heart.

CELTIC SONG AND FOLKLORE.*

"Merlin, Merlin, be converted ; there is no divinity save that of God." This sacred sweet appeal of the Cymric popular voice, in ancient lay, re-echoes across the Irish Channel and among the Highland hills. sensibility, living by its imagination and its senses, delighting in the joys of life and in the deeper joys that are still but dreamt of, ever desirous of going out upon all sides, often destined to go out on none, finds its deepest joy in preserving its unity of spirit in memory. Our past is never past for us until it is forgotten. No race has had a longer poetic childhood than the Celtic; few have shown such early promise, fewer have so long continued it. It gave birth to the Cuchulain Saga and to a still earlier Mythologic Cycle. While these were almost closed it gave us the Ossianic Lays and Legends, which almost before our eyes we have seen passing into an epic. No race is more naively Christian. It produced scarcely any martyrs, yet it imbibed the new Christian ways though its own old faiths were not forgotten.

The Celt, perhaps, has never become entirely Christian, or, rather, putting aside the extravagances of the absorbed non-Celtic races, he has become so as far as to him was possible. Disturb as little as may be the existing pagan practices; cleanse the temples with holy water; abolish not too rudely the heathen feasts but adapt them to the celebration of the saints' festivals. You cannot cut off everything at once from rude natures. He who would climb a height must ascend step by step, and not by leaps and bounds. Such, we learn from Bede, was the Pope's advice to the Celtic missions. Of the language of the Highlands, said Johnson, "as I understand nothing I cannot say more than I have been told." He never, he owns, was in any house of the islands where he did not find books in more languages than one; literature was not neglected by the higher ranks of the Hebrideans. Had he known the language he would have found it was not neglected by the lower, nor would he have spoken of a rude speech of a barbarous people "who had few thoughts to express, and were content, as they conceived grossly, to be grossly understood." Misunderstood he should have said. Their language was that of St. Columcille; and the cult he taught at Iona and propagated through the whole of Caledonia was as sincere and pure as that at Derry, at Bangor, Clonard, or Landisfarne. In song, too, in lore and cult, the Gaelic race, spite varieties of manifestation, kept the unity of the spirit—would it were always in the bonds of peace! "The Wooing of Emer," a Gaelic tale of over a thousand years ago, speaks of the heroine as having the gifts of beauty, voice, sweet-speech, needle-work, wisdom, chastity. In Carmina Gadelica we find that when the "nine pure graces" were invoked on a girl about to wed, they were those of form, voice, fortune; goodness, wisdom, charity; choice-maidenliness, whole-souled loveliness, and goodly speech.

Were Johnson now alive he could much more fully gratify his curiosity in the volumes before us than by perusing Martin's Description of the Western Isles. Though the mountains were then unpenetrated, Martin did, in a measure, delight his readers with strange customs falling into disuse, and opinions that no longer prevail. Johnson thought him to be probably lacking in that knowledge which would qualify one for judging what would deserve or gain the attention of the world. The mode of life familiar to ourselves we too often take to be familiar to others. What Martin (so Johnson thought) has neglected cannot now be performed. "In nations where there is hardly the use of letters what is once out of sight is lost for ever. They think but little, and of their few thoughts none are wasted on the past, in which they are neither interested by fear nor hope." He knew not that the Celts know also of faith and love; where there is love there is a good memory.

A collection of Ossianic and other poems was made by Dean Macgregor of Lismore, who died in 1550 as the storm of the Reformation was about to break. This, as well as the collection of Macrae of Kintail (1680), not to speak of the medieval manuscripts in Major MacLauchlan of Kilbride's collection, was unknown to the English lexicographer. He knew only of Macpherson's Ossian, which, we all now allow, has, at least, drawn attention to a forgotten field. Other collectors there were, such as MacNieol of Lismore, but he and Johnson never met. Songs of every species, invaluable for a true history of the Highlands, there are in books; but of the folk-lays, save some specimens in Gillies' collection and some in works connected with the Ossianic controversy, there was nothing generally accessible in English until Campbell of Islay published his West Highland Tales (1862). That was a work of abiding international influence. Campbell died leaving many volumes of unpublished material behind him. Lord Archibald Campbell's Argyllshire series of Celtic Waifs and Strays and tales like Carmichael's Deirdire, the best folk-tale ever found in Scotland, should be added. And now, 350 years after the death of the Dean of Lismore, another native of that island, a life-long friend and helper of Islay's, prints the first portion of his own collection in a way which shows that he has largely fulfilled what Martin failed in, and has added the crown to the cairn which Campbell was the first to raise. "Carmina Gadelica" is a delight to the senses, a joy to the sight and soul. The author has lived leisurely, if not in leisure, among what Johnson called the "Popish islands," in places favourable to the preservation of curious ceremonies which are often the only preservatives of tradition.

He does not merely ask us to listen to the first cry "Merlin, be converted"; he tempts us with spells, hunting charms, and love runes; he lures us on with milking-croons, smooching-blessings, weaving, and sea-runes and sleep songs. But he lets us hear that there is "no divinity save that of God," and gives old invocations to the moon, to the elements, and to their triune King. The shrubs are holy, the waters healing, the fairy-mouse paralyses cattle, the shrew-mouse presages death; the Fairy Queen distributes wisdom on the knoll, the golden butterfly bears to Heaven the souls of the dead. Water-nymphs, mermaids, and fairies "who are not allowed to appear on Fridays," disport themselves in the notes, along with disquisitions on the Highland ancestry of Burns, Ruskin, and Dr. Livingstone—lore gathered from people who have not read books and who were still what their fathers were. Blood is quaffed in token of affection; the serpent is associated with old ancestral cult; on the first Monday of the quarter, the sacred cake (strüan) is baked.

The strüan was partaken of sacramentally as the body of the corn-spirit. The closest parallel to it is found in the Lithuanian Sabarion—i.e., "the mixing or throwing together" (Frazer's Golden Bough I., 319-320) of each kind of crop; loaves were baked, beer drunk, the farmer saying "O fruitful earth, make rye and barley and all kinds of corn to flourish," a cock and hen being offered as a free-will offering, the fowls boiled in a pot never used before. None of the food should be left over nor a bad word spoken that day. In Lithuania 300 years ago this ceremony was observed at the beginning of December; in Scotland it was observed on 29th September, the eve of bringing in the carrots, of killing the lamb, of stealing the horses. The cake was made of all the cereals of the year, and baked on a lamb's skin, the meal moistened with sheep's milk, by the eldest daughter; the cake was fired on sacred fagots, the batter of three layers of cream, eggs, and butter being put on with three tail-feathers of a cockerel of the year. If a friend of the family be absent or dead, a cake is made in his or her name. The form was irregular, some being three, some five, some seven cornered. After mass the father cut the cake into sections and the lamb into pieces; the family then raised a shout in praise of Michael and of God, and having partaken of their communal meal, they share the rest with such as have none of their own. When partaking of the cake baked on the first day of each quarter, a piece was thrown over each shoulder alternately, as one said:—"Here to thee, wolf, spare my sheep; here to thee, fox, spare my lambs"; the rite being evidently propitiatory. Curious, too, is the caisean-uchd, a strip of skin from the breast of a sheep killed at sacred festivals. No knife was used in removing it from the flesh. Lit by the head of the house to which it was brought by the carollers, it was given to each person to smell, going sunwise. The inhaling of the fumes was a talisman. On entering a house the carollers took possession of a child if there was one and carried him; or else they put a symbolic Christ on the skin of a white male lamb, the skin seemingly being that from the breast. Carmichael thinks the Calluinn A Bhuilg (Hogmany of the Sack) rhyme was symbolic of laying an evil spirit. "One of the carollers is enveloped in the hard hide of a bull, with the horns and hoofs still attached. When the men come to a house they ascend the wall and run round sunwise, the man in the hide shaking the horns and hoofs and the other men striking the hard hide with the sticks." In some places the man was dashed after, and pieces of the hide were detached. The practice I take to symbolize the killing of a dead victim, which was carried from house to house. To eat the body of the divine victim was to enter into communion with the Divinity. The strüan cake seems, I think, to combine both the ideal elements of communal sacrament and thanksgiving. The practice of making Bride's bed lingered till recently in Arisaig. An ikon of a choice sheaf of corn, sometimes from the Harvest Maiden, or last sheaf of the harvest, was made into the form of a woman; the house wife went to the door and called "Let Bride come in, Bride is welcome." A wand of sacred wood was placed by the ikon; the ashes on the hearth were levelled on retiring to bed, and scanned for the footprints of Bride in the morning. The oblation to her "is a cockerel or pullet buried alive, near the junction of three streams, and the incense is burned on the hearth when the family retire for the night." The revival of verdure or of the spring sunshine was here typified, perhaps both. The Gaelic proverb says, "Supper and daylight on St. Bride's Eve"; and Carmichael says her figure was dressed "with shining shells, sparkling crystals, primroses, snow-drops, and any greenery they may obtain. . . . They visit every house and every person is expected to give a gift to Bride." Bride is the Goddess of the returning gladness of the spring.

To have saved so many precious, suggestive, and fascinating relics of Celtic folklore and fancy is a thing indeed to feel proud of; to be thankful for. Carmina Gadelica is in its way the Veda of the Gael. For a new edition one should expunge some too tentative etymologies. Rhys' work is to be placed beside the most thorough helps in its own department. For Welsh folklore it is indispensable for us all. Wales has but too hastily responded to the cry "Merlin, Merlin, be converted; there is no divinity save that of God." "The school-masters of my early days," says Rhys, "took very little trouble to teach their pupils to keep their eyes open or take notice of what they heard around them; so I grew up without the habit of observing anything, except the Sabbath." Though long stories like Campbell's tales are not now to be got in the Principality, with characteristic force Rhys has amassed a surprising amount of material on lake and fairy legends, on fairy folklore and the folklore of wells; on the water-horse, cave-legends, and place-name stories. Much of the material can be paralleled on Gaelic ground and elsewhere. The collection is most painstaking, and there are full biographical references and indexes. The chapters on Folklore Philosophy and on Race in Folklore and Myth are exceedingly fresh and ingenious, and abound in theoretic reasonings and speculations which will make his work a treasure-house for many a day. The Druids, he thinks, represent a profession probably not of Aryan origin. He submits that we have evidence of a people in the West of Europe who at one time only counted as far as five. He would recognize a pre-Celtic race of mound-folk in the short swarthy people variously caricatured in our fairy tales. As he points out, the presence of such dwarfs has been established with regard to Switzerland in neolithic times. He states again a theory elsewhere propounded in the book on the Welsh People. "It is the widely-spread race of the Picts, conquered by the Celts of the Celtic or Goidelic branch, and amalgamating with their conquerors in the course of time, that has left its non-Aryan impress on the syntax of the Celtic languages of the British Isles." The leading axiom in magic, he thinks, is this—the part is quite equal to the whole. "Now the name, as part of the man, was one probably identified with the breath of life, or with the soul . . . and the latter must have been regarded as a kind of matter. . . . When a person was dying in a house it was the custom about Ponterwyd, in North Cardiganshire, to open the windows. . . . This was doubtless originally meant to facilitate the escape of the soul." That was current, too, in Inverness-shire, where locks on boxes and on doors had to be opened on occasions of birth and of death. Primitive psychology is a large matter; readers may be left to make comparisons of their own. As to the "bedlamite custom of the courade" (p. 653), a form of adoption which has led to simulation of birth on the principle of make believe, one might ask if there are any Welsh sayings like the Gaelic, "It is friendship through the mother which is closest"; "I shall not say brother but to the son my mother bore." Is there any folk-rite in Wales like the "man-midwife" of the parish of Abernethy; anything like what Pennant (1712) refers to, the belief that the midwife had the power of transferring part of the primeval curse from the good wife to her husband?

GEORGE HENDERSON.

THE POET OF BEAUTY AND OF PAIN.

[The illustrations are reproduced by permission of Messrs. George Bell and Son.]

Among the multitude of delectable illustrated books published during the winter we have found none more completely attractive than the new illustrated edition of Poe's POEMS (Bell and Sons, 5s. n.), which we briefly noticed some time back.

"THE BELLS."

Pictures have been drawn for the poems many times before; the company of artists includes Doré, Manet, Paton, Birket Foster, and Tenniel, but we much doubt whether any one has so fully entered into the spirit of Poe's work as Mr. Heath Robinson. One is almost surprised to note how easily the poems themselves have resisted the destroying action of time; the beauty and music, the subtle sentiment, remain as fresh as ever. This new volume, edited by Mr. Noel Williams, is well arranged, and contains the interesting introduction to the poems of 1831—the letter to Mr. B. . . .—and also the delightful satiric essays on "The Poetic Principle" and "The Philosophy of Composition." Mr. Williams' own introduction is a clear and satisfying account of the poet's life and work, a résumé of the information previously published, and an interesting if not illuminative criticism of some of the poems. But there are points on which we are inclined to join issue with Mr. Williams. We cannot believe with him that any reading man looks upon Poe as a single poem poet; yet he feels it necessary to demolish the hypothetical individual who is supposed to consider "The Raven" the only valuable work in verse by its author. If there lives a man with soul dead to the beauty of "The Haunted Palace," "Annabel Lee," "Ulalume," "To Helen" (written in youth), and half a dozen other poems, Mr. Williams' edition will attract him by the grace of its decorations to read the collection through and form other views. Of "Ulalume," that seductive, elusive piece of music, the artist appears to have grasped to the full the beauty and the exquisite charm. This poem is pre-eminently an example of Poe's dictum that "poetry has only collateral relations with the intellect and the conscience, and, unless incidentally, no concern whatever with either duty or truth." Such music as the following stanzas is hardly transmutable into black and white line, but let them be read, and then turn to the illustrations, and see how fully Mr. Robinson has captured their essence :—

The skies they were ashen and sober ;
The leaves they were crisped and sere—
The leaves they were withering and sere ;
It was night in the lonesome October
Of my most immemorial year ;
It was hard by the dim lake of Auber,
In the misty mid region of Weir—
It was down by the dark tarn of Auber,
In the ghoulish-woodland of Weir.

"In terror she spoke, letting sink her Wings till they trailed in the dust."

—"Ulalume."

Here once, through an alley Titanic,
Of cypress, I roamed with my Soul—
Of cypress, with Psyche, my Soul.
These were days when my heart was volcanic
As the scoriac rivers that roll—
As the lavas that restlessly roll
Their sulphurous currents down Yaanek
In the ultimate climes of the pole—
That groan as they roll down Mount Yaanek
In the realms of the boreal pole.

On page 25 the artist depicts the situation which follows the lines :—

But Psyche, uplifting her finger,
Said, "Sadly this star I mistrust—
Her pallor I strangely mistrust—
Oh, hasten !—Oh, let us not linger !
Oh, fly !—let us fly !—for we must."
In terror she spoke, letting sink her
Wings till they trailed in the dust—
In agony sobbed, letting sink her
Plumes till they trailed in the dust—
Till they sorrowfully trailed in the dust.

with perfect effect.

While in many ways "Ulalume" expresses Edgar Allan Poe at his highest, its very beauty and lordly indifference to the effect on common ears brings it perilously near the point where, as Mr. Williams quotes, "sense swoons into nonsense." But we owe to Poe a debt for this. His verses maintain their hold over us for themselves, and they have stimulated the wit of others. Poe's countryman, Bret Harte, caught the manner while dexterously inverting the matter. His verses form a real criticism on the poem they parody. In "The Willows" he sings :—

The skies they were ashen and sober,
The streets they were dirty and drear ;
It was night in the month of October,
Of my most immemorial year ;
Like the skies I was perfectly sober,
As I stopped at the mansion of Shear,—
At the Nightingale,—perfectly sober,
And the willowy woodland, down here.

Here once in an alley Titanic
Of ten-pins,—I roamed with my soul,—
Of ten-pins,—with Mary, my soul ;
They were days when my heart was volcanic,
And impelled me to frequently roll,
And made me resistlessly roll
Till my ten-strikes created a panic
In the realms of the Boreal pole,
Till my ten-strikes created a panic
With the monkey atop of his pole.

I repeat I was perfectly sober,
But my thoughts they were palsied and sear,
My thoughts were decidedly queer ;
For I knew not the month was October,
And I marked not the night of the year ;
I forgot that sweet morceau of Auber
That the band oft performed down here ;
And I mixed the sweet music of Auber
With the Nightingale's music by Shear.

But Mary, uplifting her finger,
Said, "Sadly this bar I mistrust,—
I fear that this bar does not trust.
Oh, hasten ! Oh, let us not linger !
Oh, fly !—let us fly,—ere we must !"
In terror she cried, letting sink her
Parasol till it trailed in the dust,—
In agony sobbed, letting sink her
Parasol till it trailed in the dust,—
Till it sorrowfully trailed in the dust.

For a poem such as "Ulalume" to have outlived so successful a parody, to be even heightened in its effect by means of the contrast, is no small claim upon fame.

But the greatest cannot be laughed away ! To revert to the illustrations which follow "Ulalume," one notes that that rather tedious poem "The Bells," at one time the most popular of Poe's poetical pyrotechnics, is admirably "decorated." The full-page picture for the verses "To One in Paradise" is a failure because of its heavy shadows and uninteresting composition, but the "Lenore" is an almost perfect piece of work of its kind, illustrative—in the most complete meaning of the word—of the best technical qualities of black and white art. Mr. Heath Robinson is original, but he has assimilated some of the good qualities of his contemporaries. His method of outlining drapery reminds one of Mr. Anning Bell, his composition often suggests Mr. Ricketts, his technique in dealing with foliage in middle distance hints at Mr. Housman, and his mastery of blacks in masses shows that Aubrey Beardsley did not draw in vain. Still if he be reminiscent he reminds us of pleasant things; if he be a little mannered, well, so was Poe, and the manner is a very good one. The tail piece to "The Conqueror Worm," illustrating the lines:—

Out—out are the lights—out all !
And, over each quivering form,
The curtain, a funeral pall,
Comes down with the rush of a storm,
And the angels, all pallid and wan,
Uprising, unveiling, affirm
That the play is the tragedy "Man"
And its hero "The Conqueror Worm."

shows a parted curtain of rich design and an exquisitely decorative drawing of a satyr with a bowl. The full-page picture to "Lenore" is, perhaps, Mr. Heath Robinson's most dexterous piece of work, but the frontispiece and title-page to the preface of 1845, with several others, are nearly as good.

"The life upon her yellow hair, but not within her eyes;
The life still there upon her hair—the death upon her eyes."

The pictures which illustrate the beautiful lines from "The Haunted Palace"—

But evil things in robes of sorrow,
Assailed the monarch's high estate, are hardly worthy of the subject, the architecture is trivial and the massed blacks of the trees forced and artificial. Mr. Robinson appears to us, also, to have missed an opportunity in his "decoration" of the poem "To Helen." It has lines in it that call for a beautiful picture such as he could give us of, say, Psyche, statue-like, the Agate lamp within her hand, or others that one pictures in reading again the following lines:—

Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicean barks of yore,
That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,
The weary, wayworn wanderer bore
To his own native shore.

On desperate seas long wont to roam,
Thy hyacinth hair, thy classic face,
Thy Naiad airs have brought me home
To the glory that was Greece,
To the grandeur that was Rome.

Lo! in yon brilliant window niche,
How statue-like I see thee stand,
The Agate lamp within thy hand!
Ah, Psyche, from the regions which Are Holy Land!

Here Poe is at his simplest and best, and it would have been pleasant to find his illustrator in the same humour. "To Helen" is our favourite poem in the collection. There are few more delightful verses in the English tongue than this early lyric of Poe; it should preserve his fame for posterity long after "The Raven" has ceased to charm and "The Bells" have gushed to welcoming ears their last voluminous euphony.

MEDIÆVAL POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY.

POLITICAL THEORIES OF THE MIDDLE AGE. By Dr. OTTO GIERKE. Translated by F. W. MAITLAND, LL.D., D.C.L. (Cambridge University Press. 10s.)

Professor Maitland deserves warm thanks from English students for introducing them to a portion of a German work, which in its entirety was only likely to be familiar to specialists in his own department. We say "students" advisedly, for this is by no means "an armchair book"; it will only appeal to those who are really striving to master the philosophy of jurisprudence or the general history of political ideas. It is a section of the third volume of a large and as yet unfinished work entitled "Das deutsche Genossenschaftsrecht" or "German Fellowship Law (Right)." For this term Professor Maitland finds it difficult to supply an exact equivalent in English; and the purpose of his Introduction is to explain the general scope of Dr. Gierke's work, and the reason why, though of a somewhat technical character, it may contain valuable lessons for English thinkers.

His enthusiasm for the book as a whole has led him further afield than was, perhaps, strictly necessary; for the main interest of the section here translated has little to do with the speculations of German jurists, or the criticisms which they might pass upon English Law. It lies rather in the compendious summary which Dr. Gierke gives of the political philosophy of the Middle Age. "The outlines," says Professor Maitland, "are large, the strokes are firm, and mediæval appears as an introduction to modern thought." No description could be more just; yet quite as striking as the luminous generalization is the amazing erudition displayed in the notes. Dr. Gierke appears as much at home with the glossators, the legists, and the canonists as he is with the publicists, great and small, political, and ecclesiastical; and one can understand that these hundred pages of brief and lucid exposition must have been preceded, as he says, by "long years of fatiguing toil." It is surely no light achievement to compress within so short a space the essence of so many forgotten volumes; but this very brevity, though doubtless inseparable from the plan of Dr. Gierke's complete work, is not without its disadvantages. It has been said of Carlyle's "French Revolution" that it can scarcely be understood by those who know little beforehand of the subject. In the same way, though for a different reason, Dr. Gierke's work cannot be fully appreciated without a careful study of the four centuries from which his authorities are drawn. A summary of political thought from the controversy about Investitures to the eve of the Reformation presupposes in the reader a considerable knowledge of European history. A student of Dante's "De Monarchiâ" and of the circumstances which produced it will, of course, pass easily to the "Defensor Pacis" of Marsiglio; but it is a much further cry from Peter Damian to Torquemada or Patricius of Siena. In a sense, and within limits, Dr. Gierke's remark is true that "the Mediæval Doctrine of State and Society flowed along one single bed." But the metaphor sounds strange and even fanciful, when it has to be added that "within that bed were commotions which shook the world." In writers of this generalizing type—especially German writers—there is always a tendency to lay a greater stress upon the order of ideas than upon the order of time and of fact. An English writer would go to work in a somewhat different fashion. He would deal less with the abstract and more with the concrete, utilizing in the text much of what is here reserved for the notes; he would keep the various theories in a more distinct chronological sequence; and he would feel bound to give some account of the controversies which occasioned them. This method might be less suggestive to the learned few; but it would be more attractive because more informing, and far more helpful to the memory. A treatment so strictly historical would, perhaps, have been foreign to Dr. Gierke's purpose, and might have required so much space as to destroy the symmetry of his work. The exact title of the book is "the 'publicistic' theories of the Middle Age." Professor Maitland has decided to substitute for the unfamiliar adjective the by no means equivalent word "political," and we think that, in issuing the section as a separate work, he might have done well to alter the plural, and style his book "Political Theory in the Middle Age." We do not forget that the notes are crammed with references to individual theories and theorists; and that there is a full list of the latter with dates and a useful index. But the title, as it stands at present, suggests a more individual and disparate treatment than Dr. Gierke has found possible.

However, the author's object is not to write a history of political thought, but to construct a theory of Corporations philosophically true, legally defensible, and practically convenient. This section of his work, if we understand its position aright, is a sort of historical digression with a view to show how closely connected are theories of the State and theories of the Corporation. Starting from the thought of the Universal Community under the double rule of the World-Empire and the World-Church, he summarizes the leading ideas of his authorities on such subjects as "Sovereignty, the Sovereign Ruler, the Sovereign People, the Representation of the People, the Social Contract, the Natural Rights of Man, the Divine Right of Kings, the Positive Law that stands below the State, the Natural Law that stands above it—" subjects which even in their mode of treatment have sometimes a surprisingly modern flavour. We meet with one publicist of the thirteenth century insisting that only a monarchy is able to unite wide territories and great masses of men; we find others of later date with Aristotle counting it tyranny in the ruler to suppress "unions and federations among his subjects." In speaking of what he is pleased to call "Antique-Modern" Thought—that is, ideas which, proceeding from Classical Antiquity, become modern in their transit through the Middle Ages—Dr. Gierke lays proper stress upon the solvent power which such ideas possessed over more strictly mediæval notions.

Indeed he compares the latter to a shell, from which an "antique-modern" kernel, always waxing, is constantly drawing nutriment, until at last the shell is broken. What he chiefly has in mind is the sharp contrast between the antique idea of the State, and the mediæval notion of a World-Community. Of the latter he says:—

We may see theory trying to hold fast the mere shadow of this stately idea, even when what should have corresponded to it in the world of fact, the Mediæval Empire, had long lain in ruins. And so also we may see in theory the new edifice of the Modern State being roofed and tiled, when in the world of fact just the first courses of this new edifice are beginning to arise amidst the ruins of the old.

Dr. Gierke's early publicists are nothing if not inconsistent in their divergent attempts to reconcile these two ideas. In one passage he seems to regard Humanism as the force which finally "broke the shell"; we think it could be proved from his own authorities that the prime agent of destruction was the rising spirit of nationality. Even before the birth of Humanism, Frenchmen, like John of Paris, utterly deny the imperium mundi; even amid the dire disasters of the fourteenth century France was still regarded as the most powerful of monarchies: while in England, as Professor Maitland shows, the claims of the Empire took scarcely any root; to English writers their own king "either is an Emperor, or will do instead of an Emperor."

THE YOUTH OF MAX MÜLLER.

Professor Max Müller clearly realized the distinction, often ignored, between reminiscences and autobiography. Many distinguished men recount their experiences of the world they have lived in, but they do not give us a real autobiography, and it would very likely not be highly interesting if they attempted it. The Professor has essayed both tasks—the one in "Auld Lang Syne" and "Musical Recollections," and the other the true history of his life in MY AUTOBIOGRAPHY (Longman, 12s. 6d.), now edited, with a preface written in admirable taste, by his son. Unfortunately it is only a fragment; it only starts him on his Oxford career. But it covers just that part of his life in which what one may call the human interest is concentrated. Readers who want something more than stories about men and things, but something less than a treatise on the Professor's researches in comparative philology or Indian religion, will certainly welcome this volume, which has so much that is distinctive about it as an autobiography of the best kind. There are, one must confess, passages where the autobiographer delays his progress to record his speculations, not always strikingly suggestive, on etymology, or atavism, or theology; and the class of reader we have mentioned will turn over these pages a trifle quickly. On "environment," for instance, the Professor is a little prolix; it is his own environment—not his reflections on environment in general—that makes the book worth reading.

First we have his childhood at the little town of Dessau, with its narrow yet busy and happy life, where social manners at the beginning of the century were "I really believe, blameless." Then come the school and college days at Leipzig—a delightful picture of life at a German University, where Max had his experience of duelling—a practice of which he approves—and where he was imprisoned for belonging to a suspected club. His arrest did not lose him his scholarship; for the kindly Rector, when Müller called upon him to explain, remarked, "I have heard nothing about this; and if I do, how am I to know that it refers to you; there are many Müllers in the University?" A strange contrast this to Oxford; where also, we fancy, some pardonable excitement would be caused among the undergraduates if (as happened to Neander) a Professor's sister were to send to the Lecture Room to ask if he had his trousers on? She had found a pair in his bedroom and did not know that they were a new pair just purchased! But there are more serious contrasts between the German and English professors on which Max Müller has much that is instructive to say—such as the encyclopædic Lecture system of the former, and their deficiency in private tuition. Then we have the laborious days of struggle at Paris, the migration to England under the patronage of Bunsen, and, more interesting than all, the first contact of this retiring student, knowing nothing of English ways or English Universities, with the life of Oxford. And throughout we have the really moving picture of the earnest young scholar tended and supported at first by a devoted mother, with an ideal before him which enabled him to refuse a brilliant diplomatic career and adoption into the family of a Prince; which supported him through years of privation when he could only make a scanty living by copying the Rig-veda; and which eventually made him, to his own quite sincere and undisguised amazement, an Oxford Professor and a Privy Councillor. On the subject of Oxford Max Müller is, of course, full of memories and reflections—the more racy because of his entire aloofness from Oxford traditions. He was probably never quite so innocent as Blucher, who, when he was made a Doctor at Oxford, asked that General Gneisenau, his right-hand man, might at least be made a chemist; but he knew nothing of Oxford ways, and it is a high testimony to the excellence of his heart that he caused no offence and became so universally popular. Another charm of his book is that he never writes as a pedant, but as a man of the world and, when he does give us an excursion into personalia, as a humorist. Here is a sample, on the subject of Hawkins, Provost of Oriel:—

He had a very peculiar habit; when he had to shake hands with people whom he considered his inferiors he stretched out two fingers, and if some of them, who knew this peculiarity of his, tendered him two fingers in return, the shaking of hands became rather awkward. One of the Fellows of his college told me that as long as he was only a Fellow, he never received more than two fingers; when, however, he became Head Master of a school, he was rewarded with three fingers, or even with the whole hand, but as soon as he gave up this place, and returned to live in College, he was at once reduced to the statutable two fingers. I don't recollect exactly how many fingers I was treated to, and I may have shaken them with my whole hand.

The theological temper of Oxford, at about the time of the Tractarian movement, naturally struck the young German, trained to think of religion as a matter of history and of philosophy, with astonishment. If he is a little inclined to say "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as this Pharisee," his influence, so far as it extended, must have worked for good in distinguishing between what was real and what was superficial, and his comments on Newman, Pusey, and their followers, as he knew them, are full of interest. His autobiography is, in fact, the mirror of a simple-hearted, genial, reflective man, whose life was devoted to the single-hearted pursuit of learning; and whose environment was such as to give the story of his early life an exceptional interest.

DANTE AND HIS CIRCLE.

THE HISTORY OF EARLY ITALIAN LITERATURE TO THE DEATH OF DANTE. By A. GASPARY. Translated by H. OELSNER, Ph.D. (Bell. 3s. 6d.)

"Italian studies," says Dr. Oelsner in his preface—"Dante always excepted—are at a very low ebb in this country." If this be admitted, and we fear it is undeniable, the publishers deserve all the more praise for their enterprise in adding to Bohn's Standard Library a translation of this very useful work. We only hope its reception may encourage them to give us the remainder without delay. Dr. Oelsner attributes the neglect of Italian literature partly to the "stepmotherly" treatment which it has recently experienced from our educational bodies, but chiefly to the fact that "its great importance, quite apart from its intrinsic beauty, is not recognized as it should be." He thinks that Symonds' "Renaissance in Italy" has been widely read without arousing much interest in the works with which it deals. We doubt if Symonds' book, at least in its more expensive form, was very widely read. It has lately transpired that for some years after its publication the author's profits were infinitesimal. This neglect of Italian literature is perhaps partly due to the neglect of the Italian language in higher female education. Our mothers and grandmothers passed on at once from French to Italian, and spent their "finishing" years in studying the masterpieces in both languages; our daughters have either substituted German for Italian, or have given such energies as they could spare from athletics to science classes, "extension" lectures, or the toilsome acquisition of a smattering of Latin. Anyhow Dr. Oelsner's complaint is only too well founded. Perhaps "extension" lecturers might do more in the way of choosing subjects which would encourage the study of modern languages.

Gaspary's work was published in Germany in 1884. It has the rare merit of combining great erudition with a pleasing and popular style. To lovers of Dante this volume should be especially welcome, for about a third of it is exclusively concerned with him. We do not remember to have seen in English a more complete account of his minor works or a more masterly analysis of his magnificent epic of the soul. Few would echo nowadays Voltaire's remark that one reason why Dante has been so little understood is to be found in the multitude of his commentators. No student of the "Commedia" can dispense either with an introduction or a commentary; and in Gaspary's summary there is a kind of luminous sanity which makes him an admirable guide. He is fully abreast of modern criticism; yet he impresses his readers with a strong confidence in his independent judgment. To take a single instance, most people would prefer, with Symonds, to accept Frate Ilario's letter as genuine, but they will feel that Gaspary's leaning the other way is almost decisive. His arguments against the heresy that Beatrice was not a real person are very convincing, and reveal the same sturdy common sense. His conclusion is:—"Beatrice became for Dante a symbol, and in the 'Commedia' she signifies heavenly light, revelation, and theology. But the symbol is, according to Dante's allegorical method, attached to a concrete person and springs from it." That method, which is not free from difficulties, is here explained with the utmost clearness; and the way for it is prepared by a chapter on the didactic and philosophical poetry of the Florentine School. Dante's "circle," as Rossetti calls them—Fra Guittone, Brunetto Latini, and the two Guidos—with his contemporaries Folgore and Jacopone, are rather unfamiliar to Englishmen; but they deserve to be studied if only as specimens of the linguistic instrument which Dante wielded with such marvellous skill. The rapid development of Italian as a literary language in the thirteenth century is an astonishing phenomenon—the grandest testimony to Dante's original genius. Gaspary thinks that no specimen of it can with certainty be placed before the year 1200; yet little more than a century later the literature attained a height which it was never to reach again.

Of the translation we need only say that it is both readable and faithful. The bibliographical appendix is very valuable to students; but it would be more so if there were references to it in the body of the work. We may add that the translator would make future volumes more useful to English readers if he compiled a fuller index and provided a table of contents to each chapter.

BYRON.

The fifth volume of Byron's LETTERS AND JOURNALS (Murray, 6s.) provide as delightful reading as any of the preceding ones. The period extends from April, 1820, to December, 1821, and deals with the remainder of his stay in the Palazzo Guiccioli in Ravenna, and the commencement of his residence in the Villa

Lanfranchi. Within these dates the Italian revolution broke out; Byron placed his house, his wealth, and himself at the disposition of the patriots, to no purpose; Count and Countess Guiccioli were separated by Papal decree, "in despite of all I said and did to prevent it," writes Byron in his journal; and finally the Gambas, implicated in the abortive insurrection, were exiled from Ravenna, and Byron followed their fortunes. Among the minor vexations of the year, he enumerates "overturns in carriages, the murder of people before one's doors and dying in one's beds, the cramp in swimming, colics, indigestions, and bilious attacks"; but excitement seems only to have stimulated him, and he produced an amazing amount of good matter in these eighteen months, writing the Fifth Canto of "Don Juan," "Marino Faliero," "Sardanapalus," "The Two Foscari," "Cani," "Heaven and Earth," and "The Blues," although the latter cannot be counted good, nor did Byron so count it. He kept up and increased a large correspondence, for a time kept a diary, filled a paper-book with detached thoughts, and flung himself ardently into a controversy with Bowles, who had dared to disparage Byron's literary idol Pope. Under the form of two open letters to Murray he bombarded Bowles with a couple of lengthy pamphlets, which show all his customary vigour and power of hitting, although all they ultimately serve for, strangely enough, is to give Bowles' name an immortality it would never otherwise have achieved.

Meantime life in the Villa Lanfranchi must have been a curious experience, for Byron kept here a regular menagerie of strange birds and beasts which lived principally upon the stairs. As you crossed the hall you might come upon an Egyptian crane standing upon one leg, pass three monkeys as you went up the first flight, and find the landing occupied by several peacocks and five cats. Then there was a crow, a falcon, and an eagle, eight enormous dogs, and two guinea hens, all roaming about at their own sweet will, and Byron must have had to lay down his pen a thousand times to go and settle the constant disputes that arose between them. Ten horses—although these at least lived in the stables—five Italian banditti in the guise of servants, and "the learned Fletcher," as Byron loved to call his English valet, added to his cares, Fletcher, like all English servants, showing his superiority to foreign ways by incessant grumbling. We are inclined to think that it was during Byron's residence in Pisa that the prevalent Italian idea that all Englishmen are hopelessly mad took root; it has never been eradicated since.

The chief point to be noticed in the Letters after their strength and sincerity is their happy phraseology and freshness of style. The ink on them might have been wet yesterday. You have constantly to look at the date to remind yourself that they were written eighty years ago. They are entirely free from the social and literary mannerisms of the time, and to write thus is to write a great style. The illustrations include a pen-and-ink drawing of Byron by d'Orsay, very d'Orsayish—he always put more of himself than of his sitter into his feebly-graceful drawings; and a silhouette of Byron as he appeared after his daily ride, cut out in paper by Mrs. Leigh Hunt, which gives us the impression of being far more characteristic.

LORD MONBODDO.

LORD MONBODDO AND SOME OF HIS CONTEMPORARIES, by Dr. William Knight (Murray, 10s. 6d.), hardly fulfils our expectations. It is not very well planned, and it has been badly revised. Who is "Madame Rocamier"? Why should Scott's inimitable Pleydell appear both in the body of the book and in the index as "Mr. Pleydall"? What has Sir William Jones done that he should figure as "Sir William Junes"? How comes it that Ramsay of Ochertyre is transformed into "Mr. Ramsay of Ochiltree"? Four-fifths of the volume are devoted to the letters Monboddo wrote to and received from some of his scientific and scholarly contemporaries. They do not contain matters of great personal interest, but chiefly serve to revive old controversies about the relative merits of ancient and modern writers. Professor Knight's object might surely have been gained by extracts. And if it was worth while to give biographies of these "contemporaries" at all we should certainly have had something better than scrappy notes.

Yet James Burnet, Lord Monboddo, whose long life covered nearly the whole of the eighteenth century, extending from 1714 to 1799, merited a better fate.

Though Darwin now proclaims the law
And spreads it far abroad, O,
The man that first the secret saw
Was honest old Monboddo.

So sang Lord Neaves, by way of indicating that the eccentric old Judge and philosopher had a glimmering of the doctrine of evolution because he harboured a theory that men were descended from monkeys whose tails had been rubbed off. Burnet was on terms of friendship with some of the greatest of his coevals. Burns was entertained by him, greatly admired his daughter Eliza, and celebrated her beauty in such verse as in "Fair Burnet strikes the adoring eye" and such prose as "There has not been anything nearly like her in all the combinations of beauty, grace, and goodness the great Creator has formed since Milton's Eve on the first day of her existence." Scott thought Monboddo's philosophy of "a fanciful and somewhat fantastic character," but wrote of his suppers:—

Enthusiastically partial to classical habits, his entertainments were always given in the evening, when there was a circulation of excellent Bordeaux in flasks garlanded with roses, which were also strewed on the table after the manner of Horace. The conversation of the excellent old man, his high gentleman-like chivalrous spirit, the learning and wit with which he defended his fanciful paradoxes, the kind and liberal spirit of his hospitality, must render these noctes cœpæque dear to all who like the author (though then young) had the honour of sitting at his board.

Boswell said "His lordship is distinguished not only for his "Ancient Metaphysics," but for his ancient politesse," but Monboddo said of Boswell's hero, "I do not lose my time in reading such works as Dr. Johnson." Even Burnet, says Professor Knight, "was one of the most outstanding figures in the metropolis of Scotland, during the later years of the eighteenth century, a patron of letters, an enthusiastic friend, a host of rare geniality, an eminent and just Judge."

The career of such a man might have furnished a picture of the very remarkable intellectual movement which gave distinction to Edinburgh and Scotland during the eighteenth century, a movement which was an indirect protest against the dominant Calvinism of the day. Judicious extracts from Monboddo's somewhat tiresome treatises and from the letters which form such a disproportionately large section of this book, would have shown how "advanced" and, at the same time, how conservative Monboddo was, how he anticipated modern thought, and how, nevertheless, his passionate classicism blinded him to the value of the true masterpieces of English literature. There is, however, no doubt as to the soundness of such a summing-up as this, which shows the author at his best.

It was noble and much needed service that he rendered in directing the attention of his time to the ancient Masters of wisdom, urging his contemporaries to become familiar with Plato and Aristotle; but to despise all philosophy not based on their teaching is utterly unhistorical. The spirit, the tendency, and the results of modern philosophy had proved that the European mind was at last disenthralled; that if the dead-weight of medieval tradition was not removed, the fetters of antiquity had at least been broken. Monboddo virtually said "No return to the Ancients. They are our Masters still." This contention of his had two sides; one of them being extremely foolish, the other essentially wise. To ignore the progress and "increasing purpose" of the ages is to be untrue to historical fact; but in that progress and as a consequence of it the insight of the ancients is sometimes forgotten, and the wisdom of the fathers occasionally overlooked. Monboddo's assertion that the race had degenerated—mentally, morally and physically—was, however, curiously illogical, when taken in connexion with his admission of the animal ancestry of man. The ascent, and not the descent, of man was the natural corollary of the conclusion he had reached in his anthropological studies. If our race has emerged from lower forms, its continued progress after the human stage was reached—and not its subsequent degeneracy—was the logical sequel to which his position led up.

BOOKS FOR THE SOCIOLOGIST.

The Labour Question in France.

In LA VIE OUVRIÈRE EN FRANCE (Paris: Schleicher Frères, 5fr.) M. Fernand Pelloutier, whose connexion with the Bureau du Travail gives him exceptional advantages for investigation, has, in conjunction with M. Maurice Pelloutier, produced a book which contains much valuable information, and which, moreover, emphatically donne à penser. They have made careful inquiries into the various aspects of the French workman's life, and it must be confessed that the result of their labours is most depressing. We cannot but hope that there is another side of the picture. According to MM. Pelloutier, the position of the French workman—that is, the town factory hand or artisan—is not only difficult, but impossible. In the chapter entitled "How the Working Classes Live" a number of workmen's budgets are given; in almost all of these the expenses exceed the receipts, and the deficit has to be made up by the sweated piecework of the wife—unless she is already working in a factory herself—or by that unfailing resource of the poor, the lodger. If the housing problem is becoming more and more acute in England, it seems to be even worse in Paris. The descriptions here given of some of the workmen's quarters are most painful. But it is a pity that here, as elsewhere, we are only given the darkest side, and that our authors make no reference to the housing experiments which are being made in France. Perhaps the most depressing chapters are those which deal with the labour of women and children. Cheap feminine labour is underselling masculine work, and it is the underpaid woman-worker, the mother of the next generation of workers, who is consequently underfed and badly housed. The most startling of MM. Pelloutiers' revelations are perhaps their description of the traffic in putrid fish. The section is too long, and perhaps too unpleasant, for quotation, but the light it throws upon the food supplies, not only of the poorer classes but of the barracks, is certainly bewildering. It is impossible to read MM. Pelloutiers' work without being moved to serious reflection upon the great question of the relation of capital and labour. There can be no doubt that the present system is not entirely satisfactory; that an enormous amount of preventable misery is engendered by existing conditions; that there is a very grave danger of national deterioration, both in physique and in morals, if a large proportion of the next generation are the children of underfed, overworked, atrociously housed men and women. In London the results of the system occasionally surprise us in an ebullition of what we term "Hooliganism," in the revelations of a Royal Commission, in the publication of criminal or drinking statistics. Yet no satisfactory solution of the problem has yet been arrived at, and much probably remains to be done before a solution is even remotely possible. Work like that of MM. Pelloutier can do nothing but good. It is true that there is another side—a side seen, for instance, both in England and France in the increasing amount of savings bank deposits and in the growth of Friendly Societies. But it is the other which needs emphasizing, for little can be done without genuine knowledge and understanding, and such knowledge is not at present widely disseminated.

Productive and Unproductive.

THE INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION, by Charles Beard (Sonnenschein, 1s. n.), is a history of the development of English industries leading up to an exposition of the weak points in our existing social organization and a statement of the problems that confront us. It is an attack on the laissez faire doctrines, which few people, indeed, hold nowadays without considerable qualification, and it has a firm grip upon the truth that a main cause of poverty lies in the fact that so many of our hardest workers are engaged in producing commodities which are of no earthly use to any one when produced.

Those workers engaged in producing and shipping celluloid cuffs to African negroes for ankle wear, and receiving in return diamonds to glitter in the tiaras of fashionable women, are as surely non-producers as the idle rich who while away their hours with charity balls and roulette. The manufacture of useless luxuries is socially—hence morally—wrong as long as millions suffer from improper food, clothing, dwellings, and long hours of labour.

This, of course, is the answer to the fallacy that senseless extravagance is good for the world because it gives employment for labour. Such extravagance really causes labour to be wasted, and so diminishes the real wealth of the world. If women could realize that a passion for jewels is not a passion for beauty but a passion for ostentation, an immense amount of unproductive labour might become productive, and a certain number of poor people might have more to eat. Whether many women will be able to follow the argument is another question. The book has a preface by Professor York Powell, which, of course, adds to its value, though it is too good to require to be floated into public favour by such authoritative commendation.

Ethical Propaganda.

ETHICAL DEMOCRACY (Grant Richards, 6s.) is a series of essays by different writers expressing the views, now more or less familiar, of the Society of Ethical Propagandists. In politics, commerce, education, family life, literature, in all departments of life, ethical standards, so think the essayists, must be enforced. They are not wholly in accord on one question—Imperialism; but, speaking generally, the book presents a body of doctrine, and one which cannot be neglected by the politician, if only for this very important and interesting feature—that the old Liberal plan of giving the people responsibility first, and so making them worthy of it, is discredited by the new Radicals. Mr. Stanton Coit (the editor) and Mr. J. R. Macdonald particularly urge that it is no good to tinker at the machinery of government; the first and only important thing is to educate the people in the civic virtues and make them capable of government. Some of the essays are less directly practical than others. The long and somewhat vaguely Emersonian essay on Literature and Life is, to our thinking, the least satisfactory. Mr. Ritchie, on the other hand, is very suggestive in his analysis of the difficulties in applying a biological evolutionary doctrine to the development of society. But all the papers are of interest, and written in a readable, popular style.

At Secondhand.

Perhaps the best excuse for the flood of small books which make no pretence to originality is that little books are more likely to be read than big ones. Dr. Simonson, the author of the latest little book about Socialism—A PLAIN EXAMINATION OF SOCIALISM (Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.)—has had the good sense to avail himself of this excuse. "There is only one safeguard against economic dangers," he writes, "and that safeguard is the diffusion of sound economic education." Unfortunately, too many popular handbooks are not the vehicle one would choose for the encouragement of exact thinking or for the spread of the elementary economic truths. Much of the loose thinking and talking about the State which is so prevalent to-day would cease if the elements of economic science were more generally understood. Dr. Simonson's aim is excellent, but we fear that his methods are likely to defeat it. His arguments are in the main sound, but his language is so unmeasured—"such a theory, I say, must be pretty rotten" is hardly a sentence one expects in a book which "aims at the spread of sound economic knowledge"—his intolerance so marked, his methods of discussion so irritating, his reasoning so indistinguishable from mere invective, that his work cannot be recommended as a prophylactic against economic ignorance.

Mr. L. L. Price's SHORT HISTORY OF ENGLISH HISTORY AND COMMERCE (Arnold, 3s. 6d.) is, on the other hand, all that a short history should be. Mr. Price is admirably fitted to produce a good student's manual, for he has a considerable experience of teaching. His little work on economic theory is one of the very best short books for a beginner, and his economic history will no doubt stand beside it. He lays no claim to originality, but is content to use the researches of Dr. Cunningham, Professor Ashley, and others. He sums up their work clearly and impartially, and has also done all that he can to produce that best of all small works—the text-book which encourages the student to go further.

It would be a sad misnomer to describe Dr. Willoughby's stout volume SOCIAL JUSTICE (Macmillan, 12s. 6d. n.) as a "little book." But, despite some 400 large octavo pages, the book has all the characteristics of the student's manual, and was, indeed, originally delivered in the form of lectures. About five-eighths of it, on a rough estimate, consists of quotations, often lengthy, from a number of writers who have previously dealt with Dr. Willoughby's subject, from Plato and Aristotle, Kant and Hegel, down to reviewers of Dr. Willoughby's own previous works. The book cannot be described as original or in any way remarkable, but it will no doubt prove a useful text-book for students of political science.

A STUDY OF SOCIAL MORALITY, by W. A. Watt (T. and T. Clark, 6s.), is an academic, rather professorial, statement of the various points of view which "have to be noted" or which "cannot be ignored" in connexion with the social virtues and social organization. Mr. Watt is not free from a certain pomposity of manner, and does not expound any very definite philosophy; but he shows ability in throwing together considerations which a thinker on social subjects must bear in mind in forming his opinions.

SOME RECENT ORIENTAL BOOKS.

"The Semitic Series" has as its object to present "the results of recent scientific research in popularly scientific form, and THE SOCIAL LIFE OF THE HEBREWS, by the Rev. Edward Day (Nimmo) may be said to be a good example of the method. From the fact that Mr. Day uses "back of" instead of "behind" we may presume that he is an American—the series is edited by an American Professor—and his handling of the Old Testament documents savours of the extreme school of criticism which finds so much favour across the Atlantic. The historical study of Hebrew social life depends very largely on this question of criticism. We have always to determine how far the picture of manners given us in the earlier books is coloured by the notions of writers and editors of a very much later date. Mr. Day is extremely cautious in admitting any contemporary evidence for the earlier period of Hebrew History; and he shows a similar scientific reserve in utilizing such material as he considers trustworthy. He does not attempt any vividly coloured description, but he marshals with care and ability the facts which seem to disentangle themselves from the sacred narrative, tracing Hebrew life through the clan to the family; from the pastoral to the agricultural stage and the life of cities; and so to the rise of a national spirit and the detachment and purification of the worship of Jehovah. It is an interesting and successful attempt to formulate, on ground as yet comparatively unbroken, the results of recent critical research.

No Orientalist should omit to notice the recent scholarly work of the learned wife of our leading Buddhist authority, A BUDDHIST MANUAL OF PSYCHOLOGICAL ETHICS OF THE FOURTH CENTURY, B.C., being a Translation from the Pali of the Dhamma-Sangani, with introductory essay and notes, by Caroline A. F. Rhys Davids, M.A., Fellow of University College, London. (Oriental Translation Fund. 10s.) Mrs. Rhys Davids has followed her husband's devotion to Pali studies, and the present translation shows—like the two Biblical ladies of Cambridge—that women may be Orientalists as well as anything they please. It also shows, and here again it is supported by the labours of Mrs. Lewis and her sister, that, in spite of masculine presuppositions, the feminine mind does not necessarily turn to what is romantic or poetical in ancient literature. Mrs. Rhys Davids could scarcely have chosen a more tedious task than translating the first book of the Abidhamma Pitaka, which the careless reader will describe as a catechism of philosophy, abounding in vain repetitions, and nobody but a student of psychology will ever get through it to the bitter end. Yet it has its value and its interest, though no one has hitherto taken the trouble to explain it. Mrs. Rhys Davids is apparently the first to come under its spell.

I was at once attracted [she writes] by the amount of psychological material embedded [it is a good term; the material is dug down to a double spit] in its pages. Buddhist philosophy is ethical first and last. This is beyond dispute. But among ethical systems there is a world of difference in the degree of importance attached to the psychological prolegomena of ethics. . . . There is no exact equivalent in Pali, any more than there is in Aristotle, for the relatively modern term "consciousness," yet is the psychological standpoint of the Buddhist philosophy virtually as thorough going in its perceptual basis as that of Berkeley. . . . And just as Berkeley, approaching philosophical questions through psychology, "was the first man to begin a perfectly scientific doctrine of sense-perception as a psychologist," so Buddhism, from a quite early stage of its development, set itself to analyse and classify mental processes with remarkable insight and sagacity. And on the results of that psychological analysis it sought to base the whole rationale of its practical doctrine and discipline.

How this was worked out may be read in this very elaborate manual, the difficulties of which are to a large extent smoothed away by the editor's ample notes and introductory essays, though nothing can reconcile Western students to its cumbrous reiterations. On the general ethical result Mrs. Rhys Davids makes some acute remarks. The question whether Buddhism is Intuitionist or Utilitarian is somewhat of an anachronism; such distinctions did not trouble Buddhism, whether early or late, though "we can almost imagine the Buddhist well content with the relative or dependent good of Utilitarianism, so closely is his ethics bound up with cause and effect. Good, for him, is good with respect to Karma, that is, to pleasurable effect, or eudæmonia. He was, in fact, a Hedonist; "happiness" was for him "good enough to cover the whole ground of desirability," from sense-satisfaction to the sublime "content" of Nirvana. The more we understand Buddhism, the greater must be our admiration for what is truly admirable therein. It has been accused of fostering egoistic morality, but the reply here advanced is just:—"On the ruins of the animistic view, Buddhism had to reconstruct a new personality, wholly phenomenal, impermanent, law-determined, yet not the less able, and alone able, by indomitable faith and will, to work out a personal salvation, a personal perfection. Bearing this in mind, and surveying the history of its altruistic missionary labours, we cannot rashly cast egoistic morality at it to much effect." This manual is no mere Oriental curiosity; it deals with the greatest of all possible subjects of thought, and it deals with it in a profound and scientific manner, subject to Eastern peculiarities of form. We cannot speak too highly of Mrs. Rhys Davids' suggestive and acute analysis of its bearing upon psychological problems.

In vivid contrast to the work just noticed stands BUDDHA AND BUDDHISM ("The World's Epoch-makers"), by Arthur Lillie (T. and T. Clark, 3s.). It is the old story over again. Mr. Lillie's fantastic notions about Buddhism have been so often detailed that they would suffer from excessive mustiness but for their vivacity. Some one said of this lively writer many years ago that he possesses "a suicidal gift of imagination which he lets loose upon every department of learning with a recklessness almost as amusing as it is astounding." We have not forgotten his "Early Buddhism" of 1881, and the present little book has all the wild eccentricity, the want of logic, the irrelevance of the former work. We know exactly when to expect the gnostics on the scene, and how Asoka's inscriptions will be treated, and when it is time to bring out the Essenes. Poor Professor Rhys Davids—who (with the late Sir M. Monier-Williams and Dr. Crozier, a strange triad) is the special mark for attack—will be crushed by this ambiguous judgment:—"It is plain that Dr. Rhys Davids' biography is the work either of a pious knave giving the sanction of Buddha to large donations for convents, processions, &c., or of a pious fool too dull to draw any picture except that of the late and corrupt Buddhism that was under his nose." On the whole, we decidedly prefer what was under Dr. Rhys Davids' nose to what is far above Mr. Lillie's head. The general object of the book, as far as finite minds can grasp it, seems to be to prove that Buddhism (meaning thereby only the northern variety) is the source of Christianity—"at least the Alexandrian portion of it"—of Roman Catholic ritual, of Norwegian cults, and Mexican rites; in short of everything that has the smallest resemblance to it, real or imaginary. In a chapter of coincidence he cites parallels between what he takes to be early Buddhism and the apocryphal Gospels, as if these proved anything to the point. At every moment he rushes off on some tangential wild-goose chase, and his master principle is post hoc ergo propter hoc. Mr. Lillie is a monumental example of wide reading and quick intellect led astray by a lurid fancy. The book is not only useless; it is misleading. We do not, however, deny that it is sometimes clever and amusing. There is a pleasant story of a hasty tempered English magistrate in India, who died; and the natives, who had deeply feared him in life, assiduously strove to appease his spirit by constantly supplying the grave with pegs of strong brandy and water and large cheroots. The cemetery doubtless became a favourite place of pilgrimage for thirsty Khidmatgurs, and such a pious shobeen would be welcome of a Sunday to poor but thirsty gentlemen who are not bona fide travellers.

VOICES OF THE PAST FROM ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA, by Henry S. Robertson (Bell, 6s.), is a clever little book. It makes no pretension to original research, and we are informed how far the author has been able to use the original inscriptions. That, however, is of little moment; for Mr. Robertson uses the best and latest authorities, down to Mr. King's last volume, and such authorities are better than any amateur decipherments. The book only aims at bringing home to the average reader some of the main results of Babylonian and Assyrian discovery, "to make a few difficult things easy, to peptonize, as it were, for ready assimilation certain valuable pabulum which is apt to appear hard of digestion," as the author puts it in the phraseology of a B.Sc. It has the air of a series of lectures, and it would certainly form an admirable text for reading to an ordinary audience. Its great merit is perfect clearness. Mr. Robertson has the gift of seeing exactly how and where things appear difficult to his readers, and explaining the difficulties in a singularly lucid manner. There are many popular books on Assyriology; Professor Sayce's are models of their kind; but none that we have seen is so admirably suited to open the wonders of Assyrian discovery to the ordinary reader, eager "to hear some new thing," as this clever, brightly-written, and suggestive little volume. Mr. Robertson is at home in the latest researches and controversies; he is acquainted with the Higher Criticism as well as the data of the archaeologists; he draws upon classical analogies as well as Biblical records. We do not mean to endorse everything he says; for there are moot-points which he takes to be decided when they are not. But even then he is following some authority worthy of respectful attention, and in the vast majority of his statements he is indubitably accurate. The titles of the chapters sufficiently indicate the scope of the book—"The Royal Library of Nineveh," "The Chaldean Genesis," "Abraham's Early Home," "Asshur and Israel." The account of cuneiform writing and its development is particularly good, and the treatment of Biblical tradition and history, wholly apart from theology, strikes us as just and moderate. The illustrations, which are very well executed, really explain the text. Mr. Robertson's unpretentious book should be widely read. We can imagine few subjects more interesting and no guide more intelligible for those country audiences which some of the more enlightened clergy seek to inform by the influence of elementary lectures.

Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Gibson, who have already done much useful work in editing Biblical manuscripts, discovered or copied by themselves, have published, under the title of PALESTINIAN SYRIAC TEXTS FROM PALIMPSEST FRAGMENTS IN THE TAYLOR-SCHUCHTER COLLECTION (Clay, 10s. 6d. n.), some interesting fragments of an early Syriac version of both the Old and the New Testament, which were found written in palimpsest beneath the Hebrew manuscripts rescued in 1897 by Dr. Schuchter from the Genizah or lumber-room of the Synagogue at Old Cairo. They are very fragmentary and "scrappy," but every piece of evidence concerning the early history of the Palestinian form of Syriac and its version or versions of the Bible is valuable, and the learned editors assert with confidence that some of these texts are the oldest known specimens of the language for Jeremiah, Joel, Hosea, Corinthians, Thessalonians, Timothy, and Titus. The fragments are well reproduced in facsimile; the Syriac text is printed with the corresponding Greek text, and necessary notes, and the whole has been revised by both editors and by Dr. Nestle and Dr. Rendel Harris. It is a scholarly piece of work which Syriac students will appreciate.

A LIST OF THE PHOTOGRAPHIC NEGATIVES OF INDIAN ANTIQUITIES IN THE COLLECTION OF THE INDIAN MUSEUM AND INDIA OFFICE (Calcutta, Government of India, four rupees) is a useful work of reference on Indian monuments and inscriptions. It includes no less than 2,651 negatives preserved in the Indian Museum at Calcutta, and 2,605 preserved in the India Office at London, and the two are combined in a full index. It would have been better, no doubt, if the two lists had been united in one by a single hand. The subject of each negative is described, the size stated, and reference is made to the volume or plate in Cunningham's "Reports" or in other works where the monument is described or engraved. Prints of these negatives may be obtained at a very moderate price from the Superintendent of the Indian Museum in the one case, or from Mr. Griggs in the other. The value of such lists to collectors of photographs, students of Indian art, epigraphers, and illustrators of books on India is obvious.

M. Victor Chauvin's fourth instalment of his BIBLIOGRAPHIE DES OUVRAGES ARABES OU RELATIFS AUX ARABES, 1810-1885 (Liège, Vaillant-Carmanne, seven francs), deals with the bibliography of the "Thousand and One Nights." The version of Galland, with its adaptations into almost all the languages of the world, runs to nearly three hundred separate publications, of which about a quarter are English or American editions. Then come the translations of Beloe, Burton, Caisse, Cardonne, Caussin de Perceval, &c., including sixteen editions of Laue's, and many that no one probably ever sees or hears of. References are given to the principal reviews and criticisms. A section on analogous collections of tales is appended, such as "Les Cent Nuits," "The Thousand and One Days," the "Contes du Cheykel-el-Mohdy," &c., and the whole ends with useful tables of contents and indexes. The book will be interesting to collectors, and is executed with M. Chauvin's well-known accuracy.

Dr. Martin Hartmann, whose "Arabie Press of Egypt" we noticed some time ago, has published an interesting study of modern Bedouin poetry in his LIEDER DER LIBYSCHEN WÜSTE (Leipzig, Brockhaus, 8s.). He was attracted by the songs of some Arab vocalists at Berlin in 1896, and went to Egypt to prosecute the study thus begun. He found his best materials on the western border of the Delta, and the collection of Volkslieder he there took down from the lips of the people is exceedingly curious. The Arabic poems are given in Roman characters with translations and elaborate notes. A great many of them are fragmentary, scarcely intelligible; but such first-hand notes of living poetry are always valuable, and it will interest students to compare these voices of the decadence with the early masculine verse of the pre-Islamic poets. The work is important philologically, and many of Mr. Hartmann's observations deserve the attention of Arabic critics.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The War.

As a counterblast to Mr. J. M. Robertson's book, reviewed by us last week, we can recommend PRETORIA FROM WITHIN DURING THE WAR, by H. J. Batts (Shaw). Mr. Batts is a Baptist minister, and one of the few Englishmen permitted to remain in the Transvaal at the time of the great exodus of the Uitlanders. He is very outspoken about the character of Mr. Kruger, and the miscarriages of Boer military justice; and he is able to show on what flimsy evidence statements as to the misconduct of British troops and British prisoners of war have been accepted and circulated. Mr. Batts' relations with the prisoners of war was naturally somewhat intimate. His great achievement was to preach a sermon to them in which he managed to incorporate all the news that they were pining to hear. As this was at a time when Lord Roberts was close to Pretoria, the popularity of the sermon can be imagined. Perhaps, however, the most interesting chapter in a book which is interesting throughout is the interview with Mr. Michael Davitt. The author took the opportunity of ascertaining this Irish politician's opinion of the Boers just after he had had his horses stolen by them. It was an unfavourable opinion:—

I came to this country at my own expense, it cost me some £300. I was full of enthusiasm then for these people. They know me, they know my feelings, but they have never trusted me. . . . All along the line I have been refused their confidences, and have been thoroughly deceived. I wrote all this rubbish about the intended brave stand they were going to make to my papers, speaking through them to Europe. I would give £100 to withdraw what I have written.

It is a quick transformation; and one cannot help wondering what would have happened if Mr. Robertson's horses had been commandeered by the farmers.

The author of "An Absent-Minded War," whose anonymity we respect, formulates in A COMMON-SENSE ARMY (Milne, 2s. 6d.) his proposals for military reform. As he is not one of the reformers who insist upon conscription, the interest of his pamphlet centres upon his answer to the question; How to get men of the right sort in sufficient numbers? He thinks that this should be done not by increasing the pay of soldiers, but by guaranteeing their prospective advantages.

Legislation should be taken in hand to compel all large employers of unskilled labour to give employment, at the standard rate of wages, to a certain percentage of men in each of the classes of the army reserve. For instance, suppose we consider the case of a brewery employing one hundred hands, five per cent. of these should be reservists in class A of the first class; five per cent. more should belong to the first-class reserve, class B; ten per cent. should belong to the second-class reserve, class A; and another ten per cent. to the second class, class B. Thus this brewery would employ in all thirty men belonging to the army reserve, the liability to service of fifteen of these men being exceedingly small.

It is a good enough idea, but the argument would have gained if the writer had taken the trouble to work it out statistically, showing how many reservists will annually require employment, and what are the situations annually falling vacant which reservists would be competent to fill. He could find no better subject for a magazine article, or even for another pamphlet.

THE BRITON'S FIRST DUTY, by George F. Shee (Grant Richards, 6s.), is a plea for the introduction of universal and compulsory military service throughout the Empire. As in most books of the kind the case is overstated, and the flowers of rhetoric bloom too luxuriantly. Conscription may or may not be a necessity, immediate or eventual, but when Mr. Shee sets out to represent it as a boon and a blessing there is a good deal more wind than substance in his arguments. "The fact," he says, "that every man would go through a military training, and might be called upon to serve his country in arms, would give us a patriotism of the truest and most splendid kind." We know exactly what sort of patriotism it has given France. "By rescuing" we read elsewhere, "our physical and moral degenerates from the slums of our great cities and letting them feel that they, too, could be of use to their country we should turn them from 'hooligans' into men." The experiment has been tried in France for thirty years, and the hooligans of Paris are now far more numerous than those of London. And so forth. It would not be difficult to take such statements seriatim, and refute them in the light of the experience of our neighbours. Nevertheless, the case for the concrete necessity of conscription as apart from its abstract desirability is stated by Mr. Shee well and clearly. Even those who do not agree with his arguments will find them well thought out.

Queen Victoria.

A prettily got up volume of elegiac verse on the late Queen—THE PASSING OF VICTORIA (3s. 6d.)—reaches us from Messrs. Horace Marshall. Most of the pieces are reprinted by the editor, Mr. J. A. Hammerton, from the poems which appeared in the Press. In seventy-six effusions on the same subject there must be some repetition, but Mr. Hammerton has ingeniously circumvented the necessary monotony of these seventy-six poems by grouping his selections under three heads—"Osborne," "The Last Pageant," and "In Memoriam." Some of the better-known authors scarcely do themselves justice. Mr. Henley spoils a spirited poem by an affected use of words—

She seemed a piece of England; spirit and blood And function England's self, and Mr. A. C. Benson's imagination somewhat carries him away—

Peace, come away! Thou sleep'st beside
The rugged immemorial sea

Where year by year thy navies glide. . . .

There are no navies within leagues of Frogmore. Mr. W. A. Mackenzie's "Victoria" is far more successful and Mr. Robert Dennis accomplishes a difficult task in writing well in the metre of Milton's "Ode to the Nativity." The majority of pieces reach a fair standard for occasional verse, and it should be well worth any one's while to pick the book up and look into it.

A Greek Critic.

Two years ago we reviewed Professor Roberts' excellent edition of "Longinus on the Sublime," and after a thorough examination of his DIONYSIUS OF HALICARNASSUS: THE THREE LITERARY LETTERS (Cambridge University Press, 9s. n.), we can testify that it is worthy to rank with its predecessor as far as the editor's work is concerned. The text has been carefully edited, after a new collation of the Paris MS., and Professor Roberts' minute knowledge of the language of this and kindred works has enabled him to make what is probably a better recension than any of his predecessors. The glossary deals with many words most difficult to render or even to understand exactly, and the illustrative passages there collected will be found highly useful by the student of rhetorical Greek. Let the reader examine, for instance, what is said of ἀθρόατος, δυνάμης, ἐνθουσιασμός, περίεργος, πῖνος. Such studies are most useful in view of the complete Greek Lexicon which some day we may hope to see. We note that Modern Greek is occasionally cited in illustration; and it is strange that scholars so generally neglect this promising field. The translation is lucid and idiomatic, and we think even better than the Longinus. But the introductory essay, which takes into account the other critical works of Dionysius, is the most original part of the book. It is true that Dionysius is not a writer so genial and inspiring as Longinus (to use the traditional name for the author of the work "On the Sublime"), that he is concerned rather with the form than the spirit of literature, that he shows some lack of humour which makes him take Plato's mock-heroics in sober earnest. Yet he is a critic of real discernment, with courage to point out faults even in popular idols; and to him we owe the preservation of two incomparable lyrics, the "Danae" of Simonides, and Sappho's "Hymn to Aphrodite." This book is the second of a series of Greek critical works which are meant to prelude a comprehensive "History of Greek Literary Criticism." The value of this attempt to make us see the Greek writers through Greek eyes can hardly be overrated; and Professor Roberts has again earned the gratitude not only of scholars but of all who are interested in fine literature.

Goodness.

Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson has written an able dissertation on the MEANING OF GOOD (Maclehose and Sons, 3s. 6d.). Not wishing to hamper himself by expressing tentative opinions in the form of a treatise, he has cast it into the form of a dialogue, a course amply justified by success. The group of old college friends who meet at a house in an upland Swiss valley, with their sincere and well-bred intellectuality, might have come straight from the pages of Plato. They are men of different types—a barrister, a journalist, a biologist, a man of business, and so on; and their points of view are naturally dissimilar. The argument may be described roughly as an impartial inquiry into that belief in a General Good which constitutes for most men the main value of life. In the first book the idea that we have any simple criteria of Good is rejected, and the suggestion is made that our experience is, or may be made, a progressive discovery of Good. The second book points out that the experience of any person, or set of persons, is limited and imperfect, and that for that reason the idea of absolute Good can be arrived at only approximately. The question of the Good of future generations is left unsolved, and our several activities are examined with a view to the discovery of a Good which, being free from defects, may be regarded as the Good. Ultimately it is maintained that the highest love we are capable of comes nearer than anything else to the absolutely Good. The question whether the Good is attainable depends on a belief in personal immortality, and on this no dogmatic solution is offered. The dialogue certainly represents many modern views. It reaches no very definite conclusion, and does not reconcile divergent opinions except by a somewhat wide compromise. We should have been still more grateful to the author than we are if he had been a little less diffident. His modesty approaches timidity, and we rather resent the cold comfort offered us at the end of the book in the shape of a dream. There is one other remark that occurs to us. There were, of course, very obvious advantages in conducting his dialogue on purely secular lines. But the book is so much a work of art that it seems inartistic to leave Christianity altogether out of account, as though it had no relation to modern thought. And, to put the matter on a lower ground, it is most unlikely that of six or eight educated men, casually assembled, not one would have asserted a religious basis for his philosophy of life. The author's skill would not have been overtaxed if one such person had been included among the disputants. He might have remained mostly in the background, but there are passages in which the debate would have been rendered more plausible and more lifelike by his intervention.

"Goodness" on its religious side is the subject of Dr. A. T. Schofield's THE SPRINGS OF CHARACTER (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.). It might be described as a manual of experimental psychology for those who see in the Apostles' Creed a literally-accurate recapitulation of essential theological beliefs. It would make an excellent present for a "superior" Sunday school teacher, or even for a young "popular preacher." Dr. Schofield has read widely and well, as his honest references and quotation marks show, so that "The Springs of Character" is almost a summary of some of the best ethical teaching of our age. Any one who wishes to contrast the "do not's" of early Victorian Puritanism with the "thou shalt's" of the orthodox Evangelical and Nonconformist leaders of to-day will find here an excellent collection of samples of the latter. Nor could the educationalist dip into "The Springs of Character" without deriving profit, for Dr. Schofield is a judicious student of Herbart, Preyer, and Dr. Bernard Bosanquet. All his chapters of this book are wholesome, intellectual food, which no reader has the right to reject on the ground of its theological flavouring, but the section headed "Character and Habit" is perhaps the best. There is an unreasoning prejudice felt by the ordinary Englishman against reading such a book as this. Professional and commercial people suffer more from the want of thinking about mental processes and ethical principles than those who are devoted to intellectual ideals seem ever to understand. As Dr. Schofield says:—"The same event to one man is an evil he deplores, and to another a blessing in which he rejoices, solely on account of the different minds through which it passes. A mind can . . . be formed to which 'all things work together for good.'" It would be unfair to lay down this wise physician's book without commending its exhaustive index and useful "list of books" on ethical education.

The eighteenth century offers excellent scope for the kind of study attempted by Mr. Charles Whittuck in "THE GOOD MAN" OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY (Allen, 6s.). It was then the fashion for literature to be didactic, and in tracing the current ideals of goodness Mr. Whittuck does not confine himself to English literature. Side by side with "The Spectator," "The Citizen of the World," and the novels of Fielding and "Rasselas," he opens "Candide," the "Lettres Persanes" of Montesquieu, Lessing's "Nathan," and Rousseau's "Emile." As an analysis of the moral principles underlying some too little-read masterpieces of the eighteenth century his book deserves high praise. But Mr. Whittuck has not culled the fruit of his labour. It is strange that a writer, after taking so much trouble, should have resisted the temptation of writing a brilliant chapter "off his own bat," summing up the results of his analysis, showing how far the different writers coincide in their views of the "good man," and how far their "good man" differs from the corresponding ideal of other centuries. The fascination of the subject surely lies in the comparisons which it suggests between the serene lucidity of moralists like Law or Addison and the impetuous fervour of writers of another century, such as Sir Thomas Browne or Jeremy Taylor. And there are other fascinating vistas of inquiry suggested by these matériaux pour servir. Are not we who have imbibed the teaching of Darwin, after all, at once more credulous and more spiritual in our outlook than the most orthodox thinkers of the eighteenth century? Perhaps some more venturesome writer will take up Mr. Whittuck's work. We only fear he will not finish it so well as it has been begun.

The Literary Year Book.

THE LITERARY YEAR BOOK (George Allen, 3s. 6d. n.), the features of which are familiar to our readers, continues to improve under the editorship of Mr. Herbert Morrah. The chapter on "agreements" is perhaps not quite satisfactory. The writer is too anxious to insist that the author's and publisher's interests coincide. So, no doubt, they often do; but the function of the agreement is to provide for the contingency of their divergence. We think, too, that, in these days of illustrated magazines, a directory of photographers would be a widely-appreciated addition to the "year book." Exigencies of space would, no doubt, prevent the inclusion of a complete directory of the kind; but, provided that it were international, it might be very useful even if incomplete. Possibly the extracts from reviews of notable books of the year might be sacrificed to make room for such a feature—a suggestion which we feel the less diffidence in making in view of the fact that the compliment is paid to us of extensive quotation from our columns. On the whole, however, the "year book" becomes more businesslike and more useful as the years roll by and experience is garnered.

THE LIVING RACES OF MANKIND, Vol. I. (Hutchinson, 7s. 6d. n.), by W. N. Hutchinson, J. W. Gregory, and R. Lydekker, is a book of ethnology made easy for the multitude. The text is a popular exposition; the illustrations are a wonderful collection of photographs on which unquestionably a vast amount of trouble has been expended. The format is luxurious, and the price certainly low in consideration of the value given for it.

Mr. Clement E. Stretton has written THE HISTORY OF THE MIDLAND RAILWAY (Methuen, 12s. 6d.) with the same painstaking thoroughness with which Mommsen wrote the history of Rome, tracing it from its small beginnings in a publichouse at Eastwood to its present greatness. He also describes in detail the management and administration of the line. He includes some interesting old pictures as well as plenty of modern photographs of stations, hotels, and heads of departments.

LORD ROSEBERY : IMPERIALIST, by J. A. Hammerton (Part-ridge, 1s. 6d. n.), is the first of a "New Century Leaders Series." It is a book compiled from the files of newspapers and from works of reference, and adds nothing of importance to the two recent lives of Lord Rosebery, but it is a handy little book which many people may like to run through.

In BRITISH POWER AND THOUGHT (Smith Elder, 6s.) the Hon. Albert S. G. Canning gives free rein to his passion for the obvious, and explains what he thinks on various subjects from the art of Shakespeare to the religion of Mahomed, and from Roman methods of government to the "exemplary conduct and character" of Queen Victoria.

HOW TO READ THE MONEY ARTICLE, by Charles Duguid (Effingham Wilson, 2s. 6d. n.), is not merely a guide to the technical terms used by financial journalists, but also shows how to read such things as Company meeting reports between the lines. It is better than any other book of the kind that we have seen.

No one interested in Architecture should fail to notice that there is now an abridged edition of Mr. Reginald Blomfield's HISTORY OF RENAISSANCE ARCHITECTURE IN ENGLAND (7s. 6d.), which will be welcome to many who have not the opportunity of studying this admirable book in its larger form.

FICTION.

A Successful Departure.

Mr. David Christie Murray has written many books in divers ways, but for depth of feeling and sincerity we do not think he has previously approached his latest novel, THE CHURCH OF HUMANITY (Chatto, 6s.). Since 1880 he has produced something like forty books, many—"Aunt Rachael," "Joseph's Coat," "The Way of the World," "A Life's Atonement," and others—easily reaching a high standard of merit. But in this history of the material and psychic adventures of John Manger he gives us the garnered philosophy of a keen student of mankind. From the quiet biographical introductory chapter until one reaches the documentary confession which makes the tragic close, Mr. Murray holds his reader with what seems a satin glove and is really a grip of steel. The very uncommon hero of this curious romance is an uneducated child of a city slum, the victim of hereditary alcoholism, the owner of strange spiritual gifts. We meet him in middle life when, after a career as clown in a small circus, he has "listed with the Lord, and is going to march with His army." He forms his church of Humanity, but his dipsomania causes him many a disaster, and other qualities of his nature harass him. He has great natural gifts and beauty of character, but he is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward. His release from suffering is the motif of the book, and his spiritual changes are given with an insight which is convincing. But the action of the scientist and hypnotist, De Fleury, who saves Manger from the passion for drink, seems rather mechanical. Manger has always been a Gladstone of the bar-parlour, a Savonarola of the Little Bethel and the booth. Freed of his mania, he becomes a power for good, although his ranting methods appeal only to the uncultured. At the zenith of his power, a sense of Christian pity causes him to love an unworthy woman. Their married life is, for Manger, a tragedy—with interludes of passionate joy. The picture of his wife Rosy is one of the most unsparing and dexterous portraits of a bad woman that recent fiction can show. But all the characters, many of which will not be greatly approved by the Primitive Methodists, a body which is handled a little severely, are remarkably life-like. "The Church of Humanity" is not for the young person. As Mr. Murray says:—"There are phases in human nature which are best avoided by the worker in fiction. They may be handled righteously and with profit by the man of science, by the man of medicine, or by the philosopher who works hand in hand with both. For the purposes of the popular observer of character they are rather worse than worthless, for the reason that those who know them do not need instruction concerning them, and those who do not know them are happier without the knowledge. Yet they may be indicated with reticence and clearness. . . ." With this attitude many will agree; and in his latest novel Mr. Murray shows how so delicate a matter may be conducted. In this book he gives us of his best, and, if one may be permitted a touch of hyperbole, gives it with both hands.

Dr. William Barry.

Dr. William Barry's command of language is a thing to marvel at. He seems capable of changing his nationality at will, of dotting his books, as the humour takes him, with fragments of Irish or Italian. Last year, in "Arden Massiter," we were regaled with little turns and tricks of Italian speech; to-day in THE WIZARD'S KNOT (Fisher Unwin, 6s.) he is Irish to the finger-tips. Indeed, the whole spirit of the tale is Celtic; it is full of Celtic imagery, and mysticism—of the sunlight and shadow that seem inextricably intermingled in the lives of the peasantry—of May-day dancing, and Irish songs, and famine, and love, and hatred. Lady Liscarroll, still young and beautiful, comes back to her son's castle of Renmore in the first chapter, and her presence there lies across the whole history like a black stain, presaging disaster. Yet it is not her ladyship—the Beautiful Witch—whose picture lingers in our memory longest. Cathal O'Dwyer, the hedge-schoolmaster, and his daughter Joan, and Lisaveta—that curious blend of all that is best in two nationalities—upon these three Dr. Barry may be content to let his reputation rest. "The Wizard's Knot" is a good book—not so long as "Arden Massiter," but possibly none the worse on that account. It goes with a swing; it has life and movement; the characters are real, and it is admirably written. The author has the gift of style; there is melody in the flow of his language. He has invention too, and a power of pathos, and many other good things none too common with the modern novelist. In fine, this is as good a novel as we have read for some time; on the whole, it is probably the best book Dr. Barry has yet given us.

"The Column."

"We all belong somewhere, you know, and keep a sort of dummy to knock about and pretend." In these words of Cathcart, the blunt-spoken, keen-sighted sculptor in THE COLUMN (Lanc, 6s.), Mr. Marriott furnishes us with the text of a provocative and not wholly satisfying book. Daphne Hastings is the child of a Greek mother and of a father steeped in the thought of the ancient world; she "belongs" to an earlier day as truly as any priestess or sybil dedicate to Apollo; she fails to keep faith with her unspoken vows of consecration; she fails still more completely to adjust herself to modern demands and standards—and that is the problem and tragedy of the novel. Her husband, Basil Waring, a weak-willed poseur, a dabbler in philanthropy and an epicure in sentiment, is merely the instrument by which she is tested. As Waring's wife, virgin in spirit, responsive to all mystic influences of the Divine in nature, she finds in motherhood reconciliation with life. It is her old love the sea through which she gains ultimate release—a fine conception from an artistic standpoint; but it does not really solve the problem presented by the author. Mr. Marriott does not disentangle his thread; he snaps it. We are conscious throughout the story of the same stimulating and inconclusive quality. As a study of social forces the book falls short, for Christianity has champions much too weak in Herbert Waring, the self-repressive priest, and the quaint and arbitrary Miss Williams. The eternal commonplace is more convincingly represented by Mr. and Mrs. Bargister, who supply a chorus to the play, irritating yet irresistibly droll. There are fine studies in the book, apart from Daphne herself—Cathcart, a dominant personality, and Johnnie Bargister, a boy artist, whose ideals have been finely moulded by Daphne. The characters do incontrovertibly live, though Mr. Marriott has done his best to obscure that fact by a Meredithian style of intolerably conscious cleverness. When we have recovered from the admiring exasperation induced by the author's tropes and epigrams, we are left with a very clear impression of Daphne. The Doric column set up by her father between his laurels and the sea stands throughout as fitting type of her beauty and the worship which claimed it. If "The Column" is Mr. Marriott's first work, we shall be curious to see what his completed building may be.

War Novels.

Between "A Son of Empire" and Mr. Morley Roberts' new novel TAKEN BY ASSAULT (Sands, 6s.) there is as much difference as between a hand-sewn and a machine-made pair of boots. The story made its first appearance serially in a provincial newspaper and we rather suspect that the editor of that journal asked for something about the Boer war with a "rampageous" girl in it. Very likely he also demanded that the girl should be modelled on Madge Gretton. The result is a novel which, though it is far better than any of the other up-to-date Transvaal war novels that we have seen, and may easily attain a considerable popularity, will not satisfy those of the author's admirers who admire his work intelligently. It is not the easiest thing in the world to draw a girl who is at once "rampageous" and adorable. Mr. Morley Roberts did it in "A Son of Empire"; but he does not do it in the present book. One understands why Madge Gretton was loved; one does not understand why Gordon Hardy was so anxious to go through fire and water for Gwen Middleton. The adventure part of the book, however, is done as well as Mr. Morley Roberts always does that sort of thing. When once he gets his men out on the veldt, hiding in spruits, and mixed up by mistake with Cronje's laagered army, there are plenty of stirring scenes and fine bits of description. No novelist, or war correspondent, has described Cronje's wild flight so well as this:—

For right in front of them upon the road was a flying army and all its baggage. Oxen groaned as the whip fell and flayed them. Wagons creaked in dolorous, ceaseless complaint; hot axles groaned for oil; and the mutter of five thousand men ascended into the air just as smoke ascends upon a windless day. They saw men on horseback, with their hats slouched over their tired eyes; other men walked, and both went by in ceaseless streams. One wagon was succeeded by another, and then again another, until an axle broke and there was a block. Then the column stayed, as orders ran from the vanguard to the rear, and the broken wagon was hurled on one side, a wreck, to whiten as a skeleton whitens on the burning veldt. The hoarse voices of men rose and fell like the sound of breakers, and only sometimes was the voice of one whose courage failed not.

Even a machine-made plot will not destroy the reader's pleasure in such graphic passages.

Mr. Ernest Glanville knows his veld, and gives us one more story of adventure in South Africa. MAX THORNTON (Chatto, 6s.) is written for boys of any age who love simple, impossible stories of courage and blunt manners. Mr. Glanville's creation, Abe Pike, the narrator of "Tale from the Veld," appears again and assists the hero, Max, in a thousand breathless but rather unnecessary adventures. We have rarely met a less entertaining collection of people even in a romance of the Boer campaign. But then there are vigour and "go" in all Mr. Glanville's work, and the reader will be much too absorbed to ask if these be real men, or if the picture of life be anywhere near the truth.

"The Redemption of David Corson."

The Quaker quietist and mystic-turned sceptic by the force of circumstances is the chief theme in Mr. C. F. Goss' THE REDEMPTION OF DAVID CORSON (Methuen, 6s.). In its biting satire and remorseless spiritual analysis it recalls "The Story of an African Farm," though Mr. Goss' book has elements of sympathy and tenderness and real understanding of the basis of Christianity which are not to be found in Miss Schreiner's. The interest is first and foremost religious. There are but three principal characters, and they stand out clearly with firm-drawn outlines. The gradual spiritual declension of David Corson from a simple-minded faith-filled ploughman to a murderer and a gambler, the parallel ascent of Pepita, the gipsy girl, from no faith at all to the sublimest heights of self-sacrifice, the relentlessly sought vengeance of the quack doctor, are portrayed with power, insight, and a saving touch of humour. Imagine a John Ridd turned villain and some idea may be gleaned of the depths to which the hero sinks. Yet we are never allowed to lose faith in his redemption, and in the end this comes through the intensest tribulation. A happy descriptive gift is wedded to Mr. Goss' capability for character-drawing, the result being that we have in this story of American life a novel worthy to stand high in the ranks of modern fiction.

Canadian Stories.

In A DAUGHTER OF PATRICIANS, by F. Clifford Smith (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), the heroine is a young French-Canadian lady of good family who falls in love with an Italian of mean birth who is a musical genius. In the mind of the girl's father, however, musical genius does not outweigh a low origin, and without his consent the pair cannot get a French priest to marry them. They elope, but when the ceremony is performed by a Protestant minister, the Roman Catholic Church of Quebec steps in and excommunicates them, with the result that the girl, who is a devoted daughter of the Church, will live no longer with her husband; she is spirited away; her intellect becomes affected, but in the end she is restored to her husband, who brings back her reason by his wonderful music. It is a possible story, and Mr. Clifford Smith goes some way to make it a probable one. But the whole atmosphere of the book strikes us as full of exaggeration. From the politico-religious point of view "A Daughter of Patricians" is, perhaps, not likely to interest English readers very deeply, and this point of view so overrides every other that the story is lost in the tract. At the same time the book is not badly written, and it certainly presents with fidelity some phases of the life of the French-Canadian habitant.

When a book opens with the statement that "a crisis had arrived in the history of the Parish of Slowford-on-the Sluggard" it is not surprising that the reviewer's heart should sink within him. When, later on, he comes across a variation of the eternal Mrs. Malaprop, who talks of Wordsworth's "Imitations of Morality," and corrects herself to "Intimations of Immorality"—"now that I come to think of it, maybe it was Invitations!"—he comes near to losing hope. And yet COMMITTED TO HIS CHARGE (Greening, 6s.), produced by the united efforts of R. and K. M. Lizars, survives this melancholy commencement, and blossoms out into something more than a readable story. At first the authors do not seem to get a grip of their characters. Later on they discover that after all it is not necessary to rely upon their memory for their wit, and the dialogue gains in consequence, while the actors grow more life-like. Mr. and Mrs. Forby, Miss Dulcissima Sweeting—for our authors cannot resist a touch of the farcical in their nomenclature—old Kippan, the North of Ireland Orangeman, and, not least, the rector himself and his wife, are all drawn with a happy eye for character. As a story, the book suffers from faulty construction; as a study of various types in a Canadian market town it deserves consideration. But it is a pity it begins so badly.

The fact that CANADIAN CAMP LIFE, by Frances E. Herring (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), concludes with preparations for a double wedding is perhaps sufficient to warrant us in classing it as fiction. But it is certainly not a novel in the ordinary sense of the word; it is fact slightly tinted with romance, and the picture it gives of a camping-out holiday on the shores of Boundary Bay is probably true enough in all essentials. The book is not uninteresting to those who like to learn how our cousins live on the other side; it is brightly written, illustrated from photographs, and has a very effective cover. But it is, naturally, a chronicle of very unimportant events, and the absence of excitement in the narrative is not compensated by any remarkable ability in the telling.

Mr. Edgar Hewitt, the author of THE PRETTINESS OF FOOLS (Greening, 6s.), does not wear that toga virilis which we consider a necessary garment for a novelist of either sex. The story of the prettiness of the fools who go to make up the half-drawn characters of the book is not clever, the characters do not attract, the author's attempt at wit and buoyancy leave one blank with astonishment or cold with resentment. His picture of the humour of the heroine and her young brother is one of the most depressing in modern novels. But Mr. Hewitt appears to have observation and an unusual candour, qualities which may perhaps be used to advantage in a future volume.

All who are familiar with Miss J. L. Weston's past work in the domain of mediæval romance will welcome another delightful little volume from her pen. THE SOUL OF THE COUNTESS (David Nutt, 3s. 6d. n.) is a collection of legends and allegories culled from many fields, but all illustrative of the power of Christian faith. "The Last Valkyr," the most ambitious of the series, goes back to the early days of Scandinavian history, and depicts the despairing struggles of paganism and witchcraft with the new beliefs. The shorter stories are reminiscent of Hans Andersen, but are written with such charming simplicity of style that they hardly suffer from the comparison. The verse preludes which introduce the several tales are happy and graceful.

THE GOBLIN, by Catherine and Florence Foster (Wells Gardner, 6s.), is an unequal piece of work. The writers have a keen eye for the moods and vagaries of child-life. Describing the boyhood of the Goblin and his brother they show both humour and pathos. But when the lads reach years of discretion there is a falling-off. The Goblin remains a hobbledohoy, and the shipwreck that he makes of his life leaves us indifferent. Lord Calliard, his successor in the heroine's affections, cuts a sorry figure as lover, and the device by which his wife's coldness is changed to love is quite unconvincing. But the dialogue is fresh and racy, and despite defects of construction the book is worth reading.

In the far-spreading desert of fiction, one of the few oases was that refreshing history of a London larrikin given us in "The Hooligan Nights." Turning with avidity to Mr. Clarence Rook's new book A LESSON FOR LIFE (Ward, Lock, 1s.), one finds, as other travellers have done, mirage and disappointment. It is in the "novelette" style, and Grace is a heroine with that sort of novelette hair which the sun "touches to gold" at important crises of her life. The hero is called Eric, and he talks and acts like an "Eric" is bound to do. The rather naughty manager of companies, theatrical and otherwise, is named Bergstein, and all novel readers will at once be able to place him. Mr. Rook has not given us so amusing and interesting a book as we are entitled to expect from him. But judged by other novels of its class "A Lesson for Life" is really an agreeable piece of fiction, and will please readers on whom the skill of "The Hooligan Nights" was lost. Perhaps Mr. Rook means to make the best of both worlds, and we can congratulate him on having mastered the conventions of a genre evidently foreign to his talent.

THE MAN WHO FORGOT (Jarrold, 6s.) is a rather attractive story of the rough and tumble, débonnaire kind which is always popular. Sir Philip Landers loses his memory and is mistaken for a notorious dynamitard. But although Sir Philip forgets he is not forgotten, and a very delightful young lady looks after him and shares, in part, the adventures which make up an engrossing if not profound piece of fiction. Mr. John Mackie, the author already of many other widely-read books, vouches for the description of the eruption of Krakatoa in 1883 which has much to do with the plot. We shall certainly not contradict Mr. Mackie, whose portrait, in the regimentals of Brabant's Horse, decorates the first page and warns us that he is a first-rate fighting man.

Walking along the river wall at Bolzeñ, Edmund Dawney said to Alois Harz :—

"There's a family at Villa Rubein, that pink house—would you care to know them?"

The other answered with a smile :—

"I like to know everybody, to see what they are like."

So opens Mr. John Sinjohn's book VILLA RUBEIN (Duckworth, 6s.). It will appeal to those who are of the same opinion as Harz. The complications of the tale and the development of the affairs of Christian and the artist Alois Harz, and the others, are clearly, but not particularly ably, told; the people are real; the outcome of the story, and of the book, as a work of art, is given in the last phrase of the excellent Mr. Tramper. "Well," he muttered, "I guess it's all kind of a compromise, anyway!"

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.—I.

The Anglo-Saxon Review, which appears clad in a binding of arabesque design, copied from the cover of a work printed in Venice in 1560—"Della Institutione Morale libri xii," by Alessandro Piccolomini—has an imposing table and contents. To us the most interesting item is Mr. Edmund Gosse's well-written protest against "The Custom of Biography"—the essentially English habit of burying our dead "under the monstrous catafalque of two volumes (crown octavo)." The modern conventional biography lineally descends from Middleton's "Life of Cicero," but the modern custom Mr. Gosse dates from 1830.

Of the untrained persons who step in, or are brought in, to perform this inevitable and perfunctory task, the worst is the Widow. This may be taken as a generic term for the class of life-writers whose only claim is that they are "on the spot," that arrogate to themselves the duty of biography merely because they are in possession of the documents. The Widow is the worst of all the diseases of biography. She is the triumph of the unfittest. Others may have little art, little experience, little sense of proportion; but she exceeds them, for she has none at all. Her object is to present to the world an image of the deceased which shall be deliberately, although unconsciously, false. The man had his humour, his eccentricities; he had a rough side to his tongue; he had frailties; he was a picturesque and human being. It is the determination of the Widow to hide all this. She desires to show that he was perfect, with that waxy absence of all salient feature which she takes for perfection. She paints him quite smooth and plump, with a high light on his forehead, and a sanctimonious droop of his eyelid. She expatiates on his having been humble in spirit, when it was his special function to be ambitious and keen. She dwells on instances in which he was "a help to others," and a "wonderful example to the young." Above all, she carefully suppresses all evidence of his being unlike other men, or having any oddities, because to admit these would be to lower him from his pedestal, to scratch the flawless pinkness of his wax. It is to the Widow that we owe the fact that a very large section of recent biography might pass for an annex to Madame Tussaud's gallery. For, it must be remarked, the Widow does not always boldly appear on the title-page; she often lurks behind the apparently unprejudiced name of some docile author. Her function, however, always is to stultify and misrepresent the life and character of the deceased; and the more devotion she thinks she is paying to his memory, the more completely she carries this out. I know of only one instance in modern biography where the influence of the Widow has not been disastrous.

This is really a protest (though Mr. Gosse does not use the expression) against the "authorized biography," a subject on which we have once or twice said our say. There is truth in this remark of Mr. Gosse's :—"There is much to be said, of course, in favour of decency and reticence; but from the point of view of the general reader, these are matters which are now far too sedulously cultivated." Next in interest we should put Mr. Mallock's article on "A Georgian Squire's Household," founded on an unpublished diary, and giving a picture which contains little of the coarse and rustic ignorance often ascribed to the squirearchy of the age. Mr. J. C. Bailey discusses in an academic spirit the defects of French poetry, which, he says, "is occupied with saying what it has to say and saying it with unequalled point and precision." But he seems to know little of the new school of "Symbolists"—a name he does not mention—whose ideal is the opposite of this. Mr. Frederick Greenwood on "Monarchy and the King," Mr. Winston Churchill on "Cavalry," Judge O'Connor Morris on "Moltke" are, more or less, of the nature of "cuts off the joint." Among other articles we should select as of less usual interest the last years spent in retirement in France of Louise de Kéroualle, Duchess of Portsmouth.

Readers of the Cornhill will turn again with pleasure to "A Londoner's Log-book" and Mrs. Richmond Ritchie's "Blackstick Papers." Number four of the latter introduces us to Joachim. Mrs. Ritchie tells a pathetic story of the violinist using music to alleviate suffering:—

In a dim, curtained back room . . . the dying mistress of the house sat propped up with cushions in a chair. Joachim stood with his back to the window holding his violin, and we sat in silence by the doorway. He played gravely and with exquisite beauty, and the sad, silent room was full of the blessing of Bach, coming like a gospel to people in need of rest.

Mr. Arthur Morrison has hit upon a capital idea in "Family Budgets." "A Workman's Budget" is the first of the series, showing how various classes spend their incomes. Readers of Scott and Stevenson will be well pleased with Alex. Innes Shand's "Monbodo and the Old Scottish Judges" (which will supplement Professor Knight's book reviewed in another column). Braxfield cuts much the same grim figure as he does in "The Weir of Hermiston." The convivial scene in which Guy Mannering made the acquaintance of Pleydell also has its counterpart in a lively picture of the Judges at supper. Mr. Harold Begbie makes an appearance as a short story writer. "Fate the Finger Post" is amusing and fanciful, and quite different in spirit to the writer's Kiplingesque verses. We hope that the Duke of York's visit to Australia will leave his Royal Highness with as pleasant reminiscences as Mr. F. G. Affalo gives us in "Australian Memories."

Mr. H. Cooke Trench gathers together some curious lore on "Ancient Herbs" in Longman's, which also continues its serial stories by Mr. H. C. Bailey and "M. E. Francis" and its studies of the Women of the Salons by Mr. S. G. Tallentyre, who writes this month on Madame Necker. There are also poems by Mrs. Clement Shorter and A. Foster, while Mr. Andrew Lang gives us a change, by discoursing in his pleasant causerie on beauty and marriage. The finest and most intellectual head he ever saw "was that of a girl of fourteen looking over a gate in the country."

The Pall Mall Magazine gives us a very good collection of reproductions of Millet's pictures—not including "The Angelus," but others less familiar—to illustrate an article by the late Mr. C. Yriarte; and by a rather happy contrast we turn over a page or two to find some telling photographs of the effect of London smoke, a subject very near to the heart of Sir William Richmond, who here pleads the cause of the Coal-smoke Abatement Society. We confess we did not find the "Real Conversation" between Mr. Thomas Hardy and Mr. William Archer, reported by the latter, wildly exciting; but it is interesting to note that Mr. Hardy knows of women at the present day who "will make an image of some enemy and either melt it before the fire or stick pins into it." And we like Mr. Hardy's reminiscence illustrating what Mr. Archer believes to be the increased conscientiousness of reviewing:—

Mr. Hardy.—I remember a case in which a critic seemed to me to carry conscientiousness to an inconvenient pitch. Writing of my "Wessex Poems" this gentleman said that when he first read the book he thought it rather good, but, being determined not to be taken in, and to be conscientious at all hazards, he made a point of getting up to re-read it on a wet morning before breakfast, and then found that it was worth very little. That seemed to me an excessive devotion to critical duty.

Mr. Lecky in this number has what seems to us the best appreciation of Queen Victoria we have seen.

OBITUARY.

CHARLOTTE YONGE.

[By Miss CHRISTABEL COLERIDGE.]

Nearly fifty years ago "The Heir of Redclyffe" made its appearance in two small red volumes, with no adventitious aids to popularity, few advertisements, and no puffs. It took the reading world by storm, and practically started, at least made widely known, a new kind of tale and a new type of character. Few people of this day believe what a long procession of "good heroes" have walked after Sir Guy Morville to the islands of the Blest; how young enthusiasts like William Morris and Dante Gabriel Rossetti took him for a guide in life; how scholarly gentlemen wept over his early death, and sorrowful women, left widowed like the heroine, wrote grateful letters of thanks for the help and comfort given them by "Amy's" story.

It is not too much to say that the book made religion seem the very romance of life to young people; and that, in quite a new way, it made the interest of a novel turn, not on plot, not merely on the depiction of character, but on the struggles of young souls to attain goodness. It was, although the author would not so have expressed herself, intended truly for "The Story of a Penitent Soul." It spoke the language, not only of its own day, but of a certain phase of thought of its own day; and, while this limitation made it strike more home at the time, it has, perhaps, tended to let it slip out of fashion in a day the thoughts of which are so different. But it has done its work.

"The Heir of Redclyffe" was by no means the first work of its author. She had already written many tales for girls of which "Abbey Church" and "Scenes and Characters" were the first two. These stories showed in germ the chief characteristics of her maturer work. She always took for granted—her writing was rarely controversial, but she always assumed the acceptance of—the opinions then known as "High Church"; her characters mostly belonged to the same class of society and lived under somewhat similar conditions; they might all have belonged to a dozen or so of refined and well-bred families. But within these limits each individual is as distinct, as clearly marked, as separate, as real individuals are in the actual world; also, granting the conditions, which are not universally familiar, they are extraordinarily natural and true to life. It is hardly too much to say that she never used the same person twice over under another name. Moreover, she never, as the saying goes, "put real people into her books," and none of her contemporaries and companions have ever recognized themselves, or their friends in the flesh, among those friends in print who are almost equally real to them.

The books for girls culminated in "The Daisy Chain," a most influential book. Numbers of women now well-known in the philanthropic world owe their inspiration to Ethel May, and numbers of eager, high-minded, awkward girl heroines owe their very existence to her. "The Pillars of the House" was the other chief work of the same limit; it was interesting but hardly so great a success as "The Daisy Chain." The latter tales in which the old characters are reproduced are hardly meant for the general public. They were, to old readers, like visits to old friends, and she received many letters begging for their continuance. "The Heir of Redclyffe" had more romance and poetry about it than her other novels. It was the work of an inexperienced girl, the plot is not well constructed, the occasions for Guy's conscientious struggles not always adequate or well conceived; but, nevertheless, there was dynamite in it, and it changed the face of a whole school of fiction. "Heartsease," "Dynevor Terrace," and "Hopes and Fears" were the chief of the novels. All have great merit and contain character painting which may challenge Mrs. Gaskell, or even Miss Austen. It appeals, however, to a more limited public, and can hardly be fully appreciated except by those brought up in the same school. Many know from old letters and family traditions, if not from their old recollection, that the "Oxford Movement" produced some few young men as spiritually romantic and as conscientious as Guy Morville, and it can hardly be denied that it also produced specimens like his cousin Philip.

The historical tales beginning with "The Little Duke or Richard the Fearless" have held their own better in this generation. They paint the Middle Ages certainly in rather a rose-coloured light, but vividly, delightfully, and with great truth of local colour. Such characters as Hal the Jester in "The Armourer's Prentices," Peregrine in "The Reputed Changeling," and many others are creations of great power and originality; and the presentments given in "The Dove in the Eagle's Nest" of the Emperor Maximilian, in "Unknown to History" of the shrewish Countess of Shrewsbury, and of Elizabeth and Mary Queen of Scots, and of other historical personages, are of the best kind, full of humour and vigour.

There are also a number of tales beginning in 1840 with Langley School and ending last year with "Forget-Me-Not," a serial contributed to Friendly Leaves, which though little known outside the philanthropic world are of much greater literary merit than, I think, has ever been recognized, and which contain numerous life-like pictures of the more favourable side of village life in the Victorian era. No one could draw better the good upper servant, the promising boy or girl, the worthy old-world peasant, the refined and respectable village mother of the better sort than she could. She entered into their life and wrote from their point of view, and the realism is as real as that of any tale of mean streets. Her many historical and educational works can only be referred to here. She edited the Magazine for the Young, a little twopenny periodical for children, remarkable among children's magazines for its cultivated yet simple tone, and for its entire absence of folly. The Monthly Packet, in which many of her tales came out, though never exactly widely popular, was loved, read, and re-read by its own public as few magazines are or have been, and she finally edited Mothers in Council, one of the organs of the Mothers' Union.

This is a slight sketch of her writings. Her life was all and more than all her books indicated. What she described, that she herself was; what she recommended, that she herself did; her books reflected her life, and her life was better than any of them. She had an immense correspondence, a great number of duties and interests, and until quite recently an extraordinary power of hard work. Her parish and her school children were more to her than her books, and she taught in the Sunday school a fortnight before she died. She began to teach in the same Sunday school before she was ten years old. She taught brilliantly, and to hear her give a lesson was delightful. Her literary work so expressed her personal self that these few personal words at the end seem inevitable. I have said that she made religion seem romantic to young people. She did so, but she also bound up romance and religion with the absolute obligation of doing right, and for this great lesson all those who have come under her influence may well rise up and call her blessed.

It would scarcely be safe, perhaps, to say that Miss Charlotte Yonge's works have had a larger circulation than those of any other modern English writer, for the exact figures are not available; but the number of her books, and their consistent success through more than half a century, make it extremely probable that she held the lead in this respect. "East Lynne," with its circulation of 500,000 copies, is generally supposed to have had the largest sale among English novels, but it is quite possible that "The Heir of Redclyffe" has exceeded this number. No fewer than thirty-one editions of it have appeared since Messrs. Macmillan took the book over from Mr. Parker, its original publisher, in 1804, and it had had a steady sale for a good many years previously. Even these records may have to yield to that of another of Messrs. Macmillan's books—Winston Churchill's "Richard Carvel," which has now reached its 400th thousand; but this includes the American as well as the English sales, and the American sales are by far the more important. "Daisy Chain" and "Dynevot Terrace" have also had enormous sales. It is true, we believe, that Miss Yonge gave £2,000 out of the profits of "The Daisy Chain" for the building of a missionary college at Auckland, New Zealand, just as she fitted out Bishop Selwyn's missionary steamer Southern Cross out of the proceeds of "The Heir of Redclyffe." Of Selwyn's successor, Patteson, she wrote a life in two volumes. Of her children's books, "Lances of Lynwood" and "The Little Duke" are the most popular. Her last novel, "Modern Broods," published only a few months ago, was wonderfully successful, considering the writer's age, and was rapidly sent to a second edition. All her best-known novels still have a steady sale in the uniform edition (3s. 6d.), and their prize editions are in constant demand. Miss Yonge's volume of "Scripture Readings for Schools and Families" and her "Cameos from English History"—published in the Monthly Packet and collected in nine volumes down to the eighteenth century—have also been very popular. Miss Yonge's tales are so long that Messrs. Macmillan have so far only tried her in one sixpenny edition ("Dove in the Eagle's Nest," which went out of print immediately), but we understand that a sixpenny edition of "The Heir of Redclyffe" is forthcoming.

The Monthly Packet which Miss Yonge edited for thirty years, used to be the backbone of the business carried on by Walter Smith (Mozley's successor), and afterwards—until within the last few years—was published by Messrs. Innes, who succeeded Walter Smith. It is now issued by Messrs. Parker and Co. at 30, Bedford-street, Strand, and is edited by Miss Christabel Coleridge, who collaborated with Miss Yonge in "Strolling Players." Miss Yonge's life of Prince Consort ("The Statesmen Series," 1889) and her life of Hannah More ("Eminent Women Series," 1888) were both issued by Messrs. W. H. Allen and Co.; Messrs. Hurst and Blackett are the publishers of her "Catherine of Aragon and the Sources of the English Reformation" (1881), and Messrs. Deacon of her "Book of Dates, with an Outline of Universal History" (1888).

RICHARD II.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I doubt whether Mr. Walkley's theory of Richard the Second will meet with much support. Take the case of Polonius so triumphantly cited by Mr. Walkley—surely we see there not the fool made to talk sense, but the sensible man driven by most unusual circumstances to act foolishly. We have an old man, in a high position, used to being treated with great respect, and possessing a good share of that kind of wisdom so easily gathered by the "lookers-on at life." Suddenly this man is thrust into personal contact with a strange, half unstrung nature, treated disrespectfully, jeered and mocked at. Is it singular that in so unusual a position he should become helpless, having no experience to guide him?

Again, in Richard the Second, surely we see a not uncommon type, a sort of coarser Hamlet, so taken up with morbid introspection as to be incapable of effective action in the affairs of life.

And, I think, this view has some historical support. Prof. Prothero writes:—"His (Richard's) character, a strange mixture of strength and weakness, courage and irresolution, indolence and energy, remains an enigma to the historian." Would not this stand well enough for the Richard of Shakespeare's play?

I am your obedient servant,

M. GREENWOOD, JUN.

SIR JOHN PETER GRANT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Will you let me point out that the article in the "Dictionary of National Biography" on Sir John Peter Grant (1774-1848), one of the most famous Judges of the Supreme Court in Bombay, and later Chief Justice of Bengal, is very inadequate? It dismisses his career in India extending over twenty-one years in less than as many words in three lines! But the most astonishing thing about this unsatisfactory article is that it does not even mention, however briefly, the most important act of his life, his protracted and brave though in the end unsuccessful struggle with the Bombay Government for the maintenance of the independence of the Supreme Court of Justice in this Presidency of Bombay. This act of his was an important episode, not only in his life, but in Anglo-Indian history; and the dispute that he carried on so vigorously helped to settle definitely the long-pending question of the relative position of the Government and the Supreme Court.

Ever since the establishment of the Supreme Court in Bombay in 1873 by Act of Parliament there was collision between it and the Government of the Company. Mountstuart Elphinstone, who was Governor of Bombay at that time, had differences with the Chief Justice, Sir Edward West, which lasted throughout his régime. His successor, Sir John Malcolm, inherited them from him. Within a short time of his taking up the Governorship the dispute came to a head in what is famous as the case of Moroo Ragonath. The Supreme Court sent a writ of habeas corpus to Poona, the capital of the Peishwas, a hundred miles from Bombay, to be executed by the Company's authorities there in obedience to the Court's orders. The Bombay Government ordered its officers not to return the writ, and not only not to help the Court's officer, but to oppose him if he attempted to execute it. While this dispute was going on Sir Edward West, the Chief Justice, and Sir Charles Chambers, one of the Puisne Judges, died within a couple of months of each other. Sir John Peter Grant was the only Judge left on the Bombay Bench; and he continued the struggle singlehanded with Malcolm and his Government. When the latter would not yield, Grant, on April 7, 1829, closed the Supreme Court, a step which created great sensation throughout the Presidency. Both sides referred the matter to England with their arguments. The President of the Board of Control, Lord Ellenborough, finally decided in Malcolm's favour, and Grant had to give in. In Ellenborough's Diary, published by Lord Colchester in 1881, there are some references to Grant and this dispute which are worth looking up, Vol. II., pp. 82, 144-5, 174-5.

The whole dispute is clearly and at length narrated in Sir John Kay's "Life of Malcolm" in a pretty fair manner, though with a distinct and natural bias towards the side of Malcolm. Grant's side may be now read in the diary of his daughter, published two years ago by Lady Strachey in that very interesting volume called "Memoirs of a Highland Lady" (pp. 417-22, 434-37, &c.). Malcolm's own statement of his case will be found in his "Government of India" (1833), pp. 59-61, and appendix, 115-151. In this dispute the native inhabitants of Bombay sympathized entirely and heartily with Grant. And when the latter retired there was a great demonstration in support of him. The native public subscribed for a portrait of him to be hung in the Supreme Court-house. When this portrait arrived some years later the Chief Justice of the day refused to let it be hung in his Court. It lay unnoticed consequently for more than half a century at the house of the late Jijibhoy Dadabhoy, a leading Parsee merchant, who took a leading part in the subscription movement, till a few years ago a more liberal-minded and sympathetic Chief Justice of Bombay, the late Sir Charles Sargent, allowed it to be hung in Court, where it now may be seen. After the settlement of the dispute by Ellenborough, Sir John Grant resigned, as he would not submit to what he thought a wrong decision, and though in a very needy and impècunious state, gave up a large income voluntarily. He subsequently went to Calcutta and practised there at the Bar. In his early days at the Calcutta Bar Grant made a living by writing for the Englishman newspaper then just founded by Stoequeler, who mentions this fact in his "Memoirs of a Journalist," p. 93 (Bombay, 1873).

All these facts in Sir John Grant's career deserve to be noted, and as the "Dictionary of National Biography" has in his case departed from its high standard of thoroughness, I have thought fit to supply the deficiency by this note.

Yours truly, R. P. KARKARIA.

THE EMU'S HEAD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With your permission I should like to state that my novel "The Emu's Head," which was noticed in your last issue, is by no means the new book which my critics seem to imagine. On the contrary, it was first published as far back as 1893, and was one of my earliest essays in fiction. Perhaps, for my own sake, I ought to add that this new edition has been reprinted from the original plates, and has, therefore, been subjected to no revision of any kind.

Very truly yours,

CARLTON DAWE.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Mr. E. B. Iwan-Müller, whose "Alfred Milner and his Work" will shortly be published by Mr. William Heinemann, was a contemporary of Sir Alfred's at Oxford, and was also, like him, assistant editor of the Pall Mall Gazette. Mr. Iwan-Müller was also "Special Commissioner" in Cape Town for the Daily Telegraph from July to December, 1900.

Dr. Osmund Airy's life of Charles II., in the Goupil Illustrated Series, may be expected towards the end of May or the beginning of June. The next volume, Mr. A. Pollard's "Henry VIII.," will be ready about the same time next year.

Mr. Savage Landor was one of the few unofficial persons who rode into Peking with the international forces. His knowledge of the Russian, Chinese, and Japanese languages helped him to obtain information at first hand. He will publish, through Mr. Heinemann, "The Chinese Campaign," which, it is stated, "will contain the only account of the Chinese war in which nothing will be concealed or palliated." There will be nearly a thousand photographs.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. have in preparation a "History of Education" by S. Levinstein adapted and partly translated from the "Lehrbuch der Paedagogik" by Dr. J. Ch. G. Schumann and Prof. Voigt. The work has been thoroughly revised with a view to the requirements of the English student, while the history of Education in England is treated more fully. The book gives selected quotations from the great educational writers instead of mere summaries or criticisms. There is a bibliographical appendix. The book has passed through eleven editions in Germany.

The Charing-cross Hospital is to issue a "May Book" of a remarkable character and with a striking list of contributors. Here are some of them:—George Meredith, Thomas Hardy, Henry James, Israel Zangwill, Robert Hichens, Frankfort Moore, Egerton Castle, Austin Dobson, Sarah Grand, Percy White, Gertrude Atherton, Mrs. F. A. Steel, John Davidson, H. B. Irving, Elizabeth Robins, Barry Pain; and there are many others. Artists join the goodly company; and sketches will appear from the hands of Professor Herkomer, Solomon J. Solomon, Byam Shaw, Arthur Hacker, Alfred Parsons, C. L. Wyllie, Seymour Lucas, Hamilton Maclure, J. J. Shannon, Henriette Ronner, Nettleship, Onslow Ford, W. Nicholson, and a dozen others. The ordinary edition will cost 10s., but there will probably be an édition de luxe.

Mr. R. B. Cunningham Graham in "A Vanished Arcadia," to be published shortly by Mr. Heinemann, gives a history of the work done by the Society of Jesus in South America, and more particularly in Paraguay. He deals with the Jesuit policy in regard to savage nations, and shows the development of their efforts up to the time of their expulsion at the close of the eighteenth century.

Sir Richard Newdegate, upon whose private papers and diary Lady Anne Emily Newdigate-Newdegate has based her book, entitled "Cavalier and Puritan in the Days of the Stuarts," which Messrs. Smith, Elder have in the press, was the grandfather of Sir Roger Newdigate, the founder of the Newdigate Prize. Sir Richard's father, the first baronet—created by Charles II.—was the justice who was removed from the Upper Bench in 1655 for refusing to sit on the commission appointed for the trial of the Yorkshire defendants, arguing that to levy war against the Protector was not within the statute of treason. He regained his seat by attending the reinvestiture of Cromwell at Westminster, and during Richard Cromwell's Protectorate he was made Chief Justice; but the return of Charles found him again on the safe side as a member of the Convention Parliament. Lady Newdigate-Newdegate's book includes extracts from MS. news-letters addressed between 1675 and 1689 to the second baronet, who succeeded his father in 1678.

Mr. J. Alfred Gatch's new book on "Early Renaissance Architecture in England," which Mr. Batsford will publish about the end of next month, is different from his larger work on "The Architecture of the Renaissance in England" both as regards text and illustrations. He takes up the story of the textbooks of Rickman, Sharpe, and Parker, and carries it on to the days of Elizabeth and James I., stopping short of Inigo Jones. Another architectural work which Mr. Batsford is publishing this spring—uniform with Mr. Gatch's larger work—is a series of examples of the domestic buildings erected after the Elizabethan period, entitled "Later Renaissance Architecture in England," in two volumes, edited, with notes and descriptive text, by John Belcher, A.R.A., and Mervyn E. Macartney.

Mr. Heinemann announces for early publication a new novel entitled "Jack Raymond," by Mrs. E. L. Voynich, the author of "The Gadfly."

The Corporation of Leicester is issuing a second volume of municipal records (1327-1509). The first volume, edited by Miss Bateson, and containing a preface by the late Dr. Creighton, was published in 1899. Volume II. has also been placed in Miss Bateson's hands, and the proofs of the work are again being revised by Mr. W. H. Stevenson and the Archdeacon of Leicester. The volume will be published next month by the Cambridge University Press, which also announces as nearly ready the supplementary volume of Cooper's Annals of Cambridge, edited by Dr. Cooper.

One item in Messrs. Sampson Low's list of spring announcements comes from the head of the house—"The Amateur Angler"—the author of "An Old Man's Holidays" and of "Frank's Rancho; or, My Holidays in the Rockies, 1885," which went through five editions. Mr. Marston has written seven or eight books altogether, and he is the author of the interesting series of "Sketches of Booksellers of Other Days," now appearing in "The Publishers' Circular."

Messrs. Sampson Low announce two new books by Mr. Eugene Schuyler—sometime U.S. Minister to Greece, Rumania, and Servia, Diplomatic Agent and Consul-General at Cairo, and author of "Turkestan" and the "Life of Peter the Great" (Sampson Low). One of the new volumes, entitled "Italian Influences," contains essays on art and literature in Italy. The other volume of essays includes a life of the author by Mrs. Evelyn Schuyler Schaeffer.

A second edition of Canon Rawnsley's "Ballads of the War" will shortly be published by Messrs. Dent, with forty new ballads and portraits. The same publishers announce a volume entitled "Romantic Essex," a series of "pedestrian impressions," by Mr. Reginald A. Beckett, illustrated with three "painter-etchings"—the first occasion on which Professor Herkomer's process has been made use of for book-illustration.

The new volume of the Ex-Libris Series, "German Book-Plates," by Karl Emich, Count zu Leiningen-Westerburg, translated by G. Ravenscroft Dennis, will be published by Messrs. Bell early next month. It is supplementary to the handbooks already published on English, French, American, and Ladies' Book-plates, and has been specially written for the series. The author has the largest collection of book-plates on the Continent, and the pictures, which illustrate the best examples of German and Austrian ex-libris from the fifteenth century, have been taken chiefly from plates in his collection. The German edition will be published simultaneously by Herr Julius Hoffmann, of Stuttgart.

Mr. Henry Frowde writes to say that the names of sixteen American subscribers ought to have been added to the list of those who joined in presenting "An English Miscellany" to Dr. Furnivall in honour of his seventy-sixth birthday. The Modern Language Association of America figures in the additional list.

Some weeks after Mr. J. Stalling's "Through Siberia" was published it was found that Dr. Henry Lansdell some twenty years ago published two volumes under the same title. Messrs. Archibald Constable will therefore, in future editions of Mr. Stalling's book, alter its title.

Paul Adam, one of the leaders of the younger French school, begins a serial entitled "The Child of Austerlitz" in the April number of the Revue de Paris, of which Mr. Fisher Unwin has just taken up the English publication.

Mr. W. G. Paulson Townsend (Government Examiner for Art) has completed a book of plant and floral studies for designers, art students, and craftsmen, which will be published in April by Messrs. Truslove, Hanson, and Combs.

Mr. F. James Gant, author of "The Mystery of Suffering," will publish shortly with Mr. Elliot Stock "Modern Natural Theology with the Testimony of Christian Evidences."

The Examiner, the weekly organ of the Congregational denomination, will be published by Mr. H. R. Allenson, at 2, Ivy-lane, Paternoster-row, E.C., beginning with the first issue in April. The Examiner is the successor to the Independent, and is the property of the Congregational Publishing Company, Limited.

We understand that Mr. Jaakoff Prelooker's "Under the Czar and Queen Victoria; The Experience of a Russian Reformer," published by Messrs. Nisbet at 7s. 6d., can now be had from the author only (21, Paternoster-square, E.C.) for 2s. 6d.

White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 150. by A. Troitzky.—White (2 pieces)—K at Q R 4; B at K 4. Black (3 pieces)—K at Q R 7; R at K Kt 8; pawn at K Kt 7. White to play and draw.

NOTES.—The cable match England v. America is due at the Café Monaco, Regent-street, April 19-20. It is stated that whilst America will be well represented, Blackburne will now be unable to play. He has been, and is, very unwell. The veteran player, H. E. Bird, is permanently laid aside, and a fund producing £72 per annum is invested for his benefit.—At Leeds, on Saturday, Yorkshire and Lancashire met in a great contest (Northern Counties Chess Union), twenty-five a side. Lancashire won by 16½ to 8½.—The University match Oxford v. Cambridge was due yesterday.

HYPOTHETICAL MOVES.—The Brooklyn Eagle remarks re correspondence play, when a long series of moves are suggested, that the player, who thus looks into the future does so at his peril, inasmuch as he can retract nothing after he has once sent it off. If the ramifications that he has followed out happen to be particularly long and complicated, there is every likelihood, unless he has done his work with the greatest care and precision, that the receiver will pick a flaw, either analytical or clerical in nature, and will consequently profit thereby. There are several cases on record, where a player has announced a mate in a certain number of moves, in which the intended victim has found some such flaw and as a result has actually scored the game.

GAMES Nos. LXXI-LXXII.—The Scandinavians are taking a foremost place among chess players of the world. The following brief games afford plenty of scope for analytical study, and we shall be glad to receive any notes relating thereto. We translate the scores from the new number of Tidsskrift for Skak (Copenhagen):—

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week a "Personal View" by Mr. F. T. Bullen on "The Poetry of the Sea."

Lovers of that gay Secretary to the Admiralty, Samuel Pepys—and who that has read even fragments of the Diary is not to be reckoned among the number?—will be glad to learn that there is a prospect of more matter relating to the later years of the diarist being brought to light. We believe that Mr. H. B. Wheatley, who edited the new edition of this work in 1894, and published a volume of "Pepysiana" two years ago, is engaged upon piecing together some new fragments dealing with the times hitherto untouched in the published volumes. Some of these years are, of course, covered by Evelyn's records, but it will be none the less interesting to hear the more personal views of Samuel Pepys upon the same period.

The late Mr. D'Oyly Carte did not make any literary pretensions himself, but all lovers of true comedy owe him a debt as a brilliant impresario. He saw, probably before the rest of the world, what a brilliant combination that of the librettist and the composer of Trial by Jury would be, and encouraged Sullivan to stick to what turned out to be his most successful medium and Gilbert to seek fame as a librettist rather than a playwright. No one knew a good libretto better than Mr. D'Oyly Carte, and we believe that he amused himself in his younger days in composing operas, though these were never published. His devotion to the musical stage was shown by his enterprising scheme to establish an English Opera-house. And here, though he failed, it was in attempting to realize what all lovers of music desire.

Mr. William Lethbridge, J.P., D.L., who died last week, was the late Right Hon. W. H. Smith's junior partner in his news agency business after the retirement of the founder of the firm in the fifties, when the labours involved by a constantly increasing trade became more than one man could transact. During Mr. W. H. Smith's term at Tavistock School he had been a schoolmate of Lethbridge's. Mr. Lethbridge undoubtedly by his business capacity helped Mr. Smith to devote more and more time to his public career. During their partnership Smith and Son's circulating library was founded. They also launched a heavy publishing venture to keep up the supply of cheap and sound literature for the railway bookstalls, and the copyright of Lever's novels was first acquired. But they only wanted to supply a particular class of customer, and as they did not wish to compete with established firms the novels were published by arrangement with Messrs. Chapman and Hall. The venture succeeded only too well; "yellow-backs" flooded the bookstalls, and drove other works away. This was not the originators' idea, and when other publishers entered the field of enterprise, the Strand firm, feeling that their mission had been accomplished, stopped their scheme and sold their copyrights for £10,000.

Mr. Voynich's discovery of rare typographical fragments in the linings of old bindings recalls the account of a more remarkable find made by Blades in the library of the St. Albans Grammar School. Blades was examining some volumes in connexion with his "Life of Caxton," and pulled out one book which was lying flat upon the top of others. "It was in a most deplorable state, covered thickly with a damp, sticky dust, and with a considerable portion of the back rotted away with dust. The white decay fell in lumps on the floor as the unappreciated volume was opened. It proved to be Geoffrey Chaucer's English translation of 'Boecius de consolatione Philosophiæ,' printed by Caxton, in the original binding as issued from Caxton's workshop, and uncut! . . . On dissecting the covers they were found to be composed entirely of waste sheets from Caxton's press, two or three being printed on one side only. The two covers yielded no less than fifty-six half-sheets of printed paper, proving the existence of three works from Caxton's press quite unknown before."

The late Henry Bradshaw tried very hard for many years to draw the attention of librarians and others to the importance of the evidence to be gleaned from a careful study of the fragments to be found in old bindings. Valuable manuscripts are sometimes found in the same way; the binding of Edward VI.'s copy of Stephen's Greek Testament, for instance, contains large fragments of an early manuscript of Horace and Persius. Any one may indulge in the pursuit of these hidden treasures. Mr. Gordon Duff, in his "Early Printed Books," describes how, for a couple of shillings, he bought off a stall in Booksellers'-row an imperfect printed folio of about 1510 in an original stamped binding, lined at each end with printed leaves. "From one end came the title-page and another leaf of an unknown English 'Donatus' printed by Guillam Faques; from the other end two leaves, one having the mark and colophon of a hitherto unknown book printed by Richard Faques, and which is at present the earliest book known to have been printed from his press. The finding of these fragments is of interest as showing a connexion between the two printers called Faques."

Although Sir John Stainer's work as a composer of music cast his literary work into the shade he was the author of a number of excellent books upon his art. His two little manuals on harmony and the organ have become the text-books upon the subjects with which they deal. Most of his books were published by Novello, of whose series of primers he was joint editor with Sir Hubert Parry. Messrs. Novello also publish an excellent treatise by one of his sons on old violin-makers. Sir John was joint editor with the late Mr. W. A. Barrett of their "Dictionary of Musical Terms," now in a second and improved edition. One of the last things he did in the way of books was to edit the "Church Hymnary," prepared by the joint committee appointed by the Presbyterian and other churches of Scotland, and published by Mr. Frowde.

The French have so far never succeeded in producing a monthly illustrated magazine like the great periodicals of England and the United States. The publisher, M. Felix Juven, is trying to fill this gap. The first number of a new illustrated review, La Contemporaine, modelled upon the Century or Scribner's, has just appeared in Paris, only, instead of appearing once a month, it is to be a bi-monthly.

The animosity of the Russian Government against Count Tolstoy is so bitter that M. Isergejenko has been refused permission to found a Tolstoy scholarship at the University with the proceeds of "How Count Tolstoy Lives and Works."

The judgment delivered in the curious copyright case of Messrs. Moffat and Paige against the Rev. F. Marshall and Messrs. Gill and Sons on Monday seems to make the matter more complicated than ever. Mr. Marshall as author and Messrs. Gill as publisher were responsible for an edition of As You Like It, which was alleged to have been founded on an edition published by Messrs. Moffat and Paige and written by Mr. T. Page. The book has now run to a second edition. When it was first published a similar action was taken. Mr. Marshall allowed that he was much indebted to Mr. Page, and in some cases copied it; and a "consent judgment" was obtained. In the present case, the Judge, Sir Arthur Kekewich, had to confine himself to the second edition; and he decided that no vital part had been extracted by Mr. Marshall from the book of Mr. Page. Mr. Marshall, however, did not get his costs, though Messrs. Gill and Sons, his publishers, who had already been mulcted in damages over the first edition, are to have their costs paid by the plaintiffs. One point in Mr. Justice Kekewich's speech is worth noting:—"If I thought," he said, "that he (Mr. Marshall) had in fact copied Mr. Page I should have no difficulty in holding him to have infringed the latter's copyright, notwithstanding that his remarks are distributed on a different plan." This seems to make it clear that an editor's notes may not be stolen with impunity. But the Judge went on to say that "the main question which one has to put to oneself is whether there is evidence of animus furandi." Here is an awkward stumbling-block. Any one can plead that in helping himself to the fruits of other men's labours he did not intend to steal, but only considered the good of the public.

The failure of the play based on Gabriele d'Annunzio's Citta Morta has been so complete that Signora Duse, who had intended to tour with it through all the principal cities of Italy, has changed her plans and decided to break up her company.

The verbatim report of the case of "White v. Archibald Constable and Company" shows that Mr. Justice Darling by no means lives up to old traditions in the matter of judicial ignorance of the things that other people know. His lordship stopped Mr. T. A. Cook's evidence on "the system of sending out books for review" in the St. James's Gazette office on the ground that he "was there." He had an idea that "there is some technical meaning attached to the word 'curious' in the book trade"; and he showed acquaintance with the literary sensation of the hour. The question was, What novels had been published by Mr. Murray; and the report runs:—

Counsel.—"The Love Letters of an Englishwoman?" (Laughter.)

Mr. Hammon-Chambers.—That, my Lord, is stated to be fact.

The Judge.—Then it is very strange fact.

VENICE,

YESTERDAY.

Queen-mistress of fair seas, unsullied bride,
Recline I stately, grand, serene, at rest—
E'en as a woman—on my groom's smooth breast;
Empress of many streams whereon soft glide
Such rare and sensuous pleasures as preside
At Intellect's own prow; north, south, east, west
My argosies are flung, and bring the best
To deck my pageants, palaces and pride!
So t'wards my wealth, my beauty and my pow'r,
My gathered brain-force from surrounding states,
The world casts envious looks each passing hour;
I have its loves—for what are mine: it hates
Me that I Venice am—the whole world's flow'r
Of cities with the blue seas at my gates.

TO-DAY.

Forlorn I sit amongst my stilled lagoons—
Stagnant, gone by, forgotten to the world,
Decayed; my mistress-flag of commerce furl'd,
I dream despondent 'neath recurring moons:
Beggared, I droop, a slattern in the noons
Of changed days; old, crabbed, my glories 'pearled
On History's scroll; myself neglected, whirled
By cosmic force to where my grandeur swoons!
E'en so shall you, proud cities of to-day;
Where Memphis, Troy, Tyre, Carthage, Athens, Rome
Have crumbling gone Oblivion's dust-strewn way
I go, and you shall follow—flocks of foam
On Time's great sea, now seen, then gone for aye,
To be but stars on Legend's misty dome.

J. E. PATTERSON.

Some rare books were sold by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson at the end of last week. The following were the most important:—Hakluyt, "The Principal Navigations," &c., 1598, £15; Williams, E., "Virginia," 1650, £11; "The Discoveries of John Lederer," 1672, £55; Mather, I., "A Brief History of the War with the Indians," 1676, £19; Mather, C., "The Wonders of the Invisible World," 1693, £9 15s.; Mather, I., "A Further Account of the Tryals of the New England Witches," 1693, £11 15s.; Aretino, "Historia Fiorentina," Florence, 1492, a beautiful copy, £3 3s.; Cornelius Nepos "Vitæ Virorum Exellentium," Jenson's fine print of 1471, £8; Intrationum excellentissimus Liber," printed by Pynson, 1510, £14 10s.; "Roberti Wakfeldi Sacrarum Literarum," printed by de Worde, a remarkably fine and clean copy, £62; "The British Poets," Chiswick Press edition, 1822, £29 10s.; "The British Poets," Pickering's edition, 1830, £21 5s.; Drayton, "Poems," printed by Stansby, a stained and cut down copy, £5 2s. 6d.; Swift, "Gulliver's Travels," first edition, imperfect, two vols., 1726, £9 5s.; Rowlandson, "The English Dance of Death," 1814, £14; and a good copy of the original edition of Beaumarchais, "Le Mariage de Figaro," 1785, only fetched £1 4s.

It has been stated in print that Mr. George Moore has gone, or is going, to Dublin to learn Erse ; and it is not to be denied that there are some passages in some of Mr.

Language and Provincialism. George Moore's work which might well be consigned to the decent obscurity of that mysterious tongue. It should be added that the action of the man who learns Erse himself is noble and heroic compared with the action of men who merely clamour for laws to force the study of the subject upon reluctant school children. One is reminded of the aged clergyman who was discovered at length on the hearth rug, wrestling with the intricacies of the Italian subjunctive in order that he might the better understand Macaulay's comparison of Milton to Dante in the pages of the Edinburgh Review. Not every Irish scholar, however, has been carried away by the great Pan-Celtic wave. Professor Mahaffy, at all events, stands high and dry like a bold rock defying it ; and his article, in the Empire Review, on "The Ebb and Flow in National Literature" is like the slogan of a man who is summoned at once by duty and inclination to tread on the tails of the Pan-Celtic coats. In the matter of dialect, the Professor admits, the literary tendency is towards decentralization ; and he sees in the tendency an example of the romantic revolt against the classical traditions of the Eighteenth Century. It is partly that, and partly an example of the revolt of naturalism against romanticism. Nature is obviously served no less than romance—and generally more—when a Devonian peasant in a novel is represented as saying "thickey" for "this," and a Provençal as saying "té" for "tiens." But the main thing is that this literary recrudescence of dialect is a very limited phenomenon of a very special kind ; and the very limitations of its use show the impropriety of the attempts to bring about a corresponding revival of the languages which are lapsing into obscurity. For dialect, it will be observed, is only used by the writer who wishes to produce a particular artistic effect ; never by the writer who has something to say for which he wants a hearing. For this more solemn and important purpose, the unalloyed purity of classical diction is found preferable even by writers who are masters of the provincial dialects. Mr. Moore does not write "Begorra," and "Bejabers," and "Holy Moses" in his contributions to the high-class magazines ; we do not find "hoot mon" in the theological essays of "Ian Maclaren" ; nor does Mr. Quiller Couch substitute "to" for "at" in his literary causeries ; nor do Cockneyisms colour Mr. Arthur Morrison's discourses on the condition of the East End poor. But if dialect is rejected as "provincial" when grave matters are under discussion, in spite of the fact that its obscurity is only relative, what chance is there that provincial languages will ever be used for such purposes, or that the march of civilization can be quickened by artificially galvanizing them into life ? There are plenty of such languages to be found within the confines of our own and other Empires—some recognized and some unrecognized by the central Government. They do not often produce anything that counts even in the way of imaginative literature ; they hardly ever produce literature of any other sort ; and Professor Mahaffy adds that politically they are, as a rule, a nuisance :—

The real significance of these outbursts of half-subdued languages in many empires does not lie in mere sentimental affection, it lies in the feelings of dislike and insubordination to the central authority which they stimulate. They are usually the index of disloyalty. As such they may, of course, be praiseworthy or the reverse. If the dominant language represents an immoral or tyrannical ascendancy, patriotism in the provinces expresses itself by supporting the speech of the subdued factors of the population. But there may also be cases where this particularism is exceedingly mischievous, and imperils the unity of sentiment, which is the true strength of any empire.

Austria, of course, is the country which furnishes the great example of this sort of thing ; and Austrian experiences are hardly such as to encourage experiment in the same direction.

Personal Views.

THE POINT OF VIEW.

It seems to me that all literature resolves itself into description, except when the business in hand is argumentative (and impassioned argument includes description). A writer must, I think, be describing either feelings, objects, or events, though his method may, of course, be narrative or dramatic. An action, that is, may be explicitly described, or left to the imagination, which fulfils the place of stage representation ; a feeling may be expounded, or made to display itself directly in words from which it can be inferred. But in either case description is the object, and in this business an essential consideration is the adoption of a point of view.

It stands to reason that the writer is limited by the circle of his own experience—including, first, all that has come to him through his sensations ; and, secondly, the much larger, but less vivid, mass of experience which he has acquired imaginatively through communication from records and from speech. But there is a second limit, which bounds his range of possibilities—the limitation of experience in his audience. All literature implies an audience ; the current affectation of saying that the truly great writer only writes for himself means, if it means anything, that he addresses his descriptions to an ideal listener—that is, to one whose sphere of experience answers nearly to his own. But in any or every case, description, if it is to attain its purpose, presupposes more than a formal basis of common experience. Every little helps. The man who has been on the Continent is in a better position to identify himself with the adventures and emotions of an African traveller than one who has never heard any tongue but English spoken around him. Or, to take quite a different instance, it is hard to see what a man with the intellectual training of an Athenian in the days of Pericles would make of a poem describing the Christian ecstasy of devotion. His experience would offer few links along which comprehension might travel. Conjecture must have something to work on ; thus, we can guess at the state of the blind, for we have ourselves all walked in the dark, but not so easily at the condition in which the deaf live ; while the experiences of one born blind, deaf, and dumb could hardly be translated into terms of our emotion any more than the sensations of one who perceives in four dimensions. We cannot conceive the state of mind of a person so limited ; it is not intelligible to us. And, conversely, a corresponding superiority, if it could be supposed to exist, would result in a similar bar to comprehension.

The writer has to decide instinctively what range of shared experience he shall concede to or exact from the presumed auditor. What is to be the method of attack ? Shall he describe as a stranger, ab extra, or as one intimately familiar, from the standpoint of a citizen ? The method ab extra has certain obvious advantages. The unaccustomed eye receives a crisper, sharper image at the first impact. Suppose, for example, you have never been in Normandy—how should literature describe it to you ? If the object be to give you an impression closely akin to that which you would form for yourself, then literature ought to lay stress precisely on those things which half-a-dozen English writers have emphasized. On landing at Dieppe you will hear a tongue spoken that is quicker, more distinct, more vivacious than the English ; you will see people wearing blouses and sabots instead of coats and boots, driving along the roads in curious, covered wagons, taking their meals in the open air and not in decorous semi-seclusion ; and so on. If the writer is skilful, he calls up vividly a number of images superficially seen, and he does it by dwelling on a number of facts which a Frenchman in describing Normandy would have taken for granted, just as he assumes a man to have two legs. The Englishman's description would have got the "local colour" in a sense more strongly than the Frenchman's, by insisting on the points of difference from a purely English experience. Or, again, for the "local colour" of Normandy, as it presents itself to a Parisian, you can read that very disagreeable book of "Gyp's," "Ces Bons Normands," where the Norman patois and the Norman vices (indeecency, meanness, and the rest) are hit off with the savage skill of a caricaturist. But for Normandy itself one turns presumably to Maupassant—no flattering portrayer. Yet there you acquire, beyond a perception of the shortcomings which "Gyp" stigmatizes and which the Norman sets forth with even more brutal frankness, a sense of the stubborn stuff, the rugged vitality, the gross kindness that keeps the race fresh and vigorous. Take, for example, "Une Vie," that picture of a Norman interior, a home-life, with all its roots and ramifications, gloomy and grimy enough, Heaven knows: there you have the very atmosphere of Normandy. Its people, its houses, its trees, and its shores are shown, not indeed to advantage, but like a landscape on the rainiest of days; yet the thing shown is the real thing—life itself, life described by one who is at the heart of it, not indicated with imperfect and partial vision from outside. But to understand Maupassant one must have, I think, at least some sympathetic knowledge of France. To the entire stranger he will not be so successful in conveying the "local colour" as a clever American or English tourist would probably prove to be.

In point of fact, what we call "local colour" is mostly exaggeration, the impression of strangeness derived from a first view which tends to disappear with growing familiarity. The best work must always be done in the description of what is fully known both to writer and reader; the appeal of strangeness is only an appeal to curiosity, while the best work proceeds by dwelling on the essential human interests, and delicately indicating slight divergencies from the normal. That is the strength of pure classicism, the art which, as Mr. Pater said, "universalizes"; its appeal is universal and perpetual. The romantic, which depends largely on the unfamiliar, on pictures of Scotch caterans in torchlit caverns and such like, travels too far from the limits of common experience and the writer's own knowledge. Scott is great by his Lowland folk, not his Highlanders, much less by his Quentin Durwards and Ivanhoes, excellent though they are. And just at present there is a vogue in fiction for subjects drawn from the South Seas, the North-West frontier, the back of beyond. There is nothing to be said against a story like Stevenson's "Beach of Falesà" or Mr. Conrad's "Lord Jim," because they show familiar human nature under an imaginable modification—the white man in contact with a coloured race. The books that we distrust are those that make an elaborate parade of depicting the mind of the native. Irresistible in such a case is the tendency to stress the contrast, to insist that "East is East and West is West," and to point the moral that the two can never meet. With Mr. Conrad we can follow the working of a man's mind under the haunting consciousness that he has disgraced, before an inferior race, his own breed and his own craft of the sea; we can check the account that is rendered us; we can relate the emotions to our own. But the adventures of Mowgli, or of Purun Dass, appeal to another faculty in us. We must accept passively whatever data are given us; the appeal is to our wonder, not to our intelligence. Mr. Kipling in such stories is describing professedly ab intra what we can only judge ab extra, and the result has a lesser intellectual value for us than what is described frankly from our own standpoint of partial comprehension—as, for example, the Oriental life and thoughts are described by Kinglake in "Eothen."

But there is one use to which the deliberate adoption of an outsider's point of view has often been put, a very delicate literary artifice, used by Goldsmith for example, or in another modification by Swift. The true function of literature is to develop for us the content of our consciousness, to elicit the knowledge which, as Socrates argued, must come from within; and by the trick of making familiar things look strange, writers have achieved the success of a satirist who restores activity to the jaded sense of proportion or sense of decency. The contests of the courtiers in Lilliput for pieces of coloured string or ribbon throw a new illumination on what has always been before our eyes and never been looked at. Now it is looked at for the first time from a new point of view. Such cases are, however, by their nature exceptional; the question which every writer has to put to himself, once he has settled what to describe, is the question: To whom am I describing it? And the answer to that question implies throughout the adoption of a point of view, which is one of the regulating unities of literature.

STEPHEN GWYNN.

MISQUOTATION.

"With just enough of learning to misquote."

English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

Quotation is an accomplishment, roughly speaking, of the educated classes, and misquotation might be said to be one of their failings. The illiterate do not quote, at any rate, consciously, and with a full sense of responsibility; though in the use of proverbs they often excel. The definition of a proverb may serve to remind us of the need of accuracy in quotation. Lord John Russell is universally quoted as having defined a proverb as "the wisdom of many and the wit of one." What he really said was, "One man's wit and all men's wisdom" (cited by Bartlett, Familiar Quotations, p. 861, from Memoirs of Mackintosh, vol. II., p. 473). The sense, no doubt, is the same, but it is not accurate to attribute the mot in its improved form to the great statesman. If there is a moral in the matter it is that, as there is no duty incumbent on any one to quote, whoever does should do it properly. If George Eliot had ever said, as she is popularly supposed to have said, "Prophecy is the most gratuitous form of error," we should adapt the observation by putting "quotation" in the place of "prophecy." What she really wrote was, "Among all forms of mistake, prophecy is the most gratuitous" (Middlemarch, I., 10).

It is naturally the more scholarly who quote the classics, and one hardly looks for slips here. The only instance of habitual misquotation I can think of is "cacoethes scribendi," but that has become a mere tag—i.e., used by people who do not pretend to borrow from the original and, perhaps, do not know it. The words should be in the reverse order.

"Tenet insanabile multos Scribendi cacoethes." (Juvenal VII., 51.)

There are more instances in post-classical Latin, but still they are few; respect for the dead extends to the dead languages. The epitaph over the doorway of Wren's tomb in St. Paul's is sometimes said to be "Si monumentum quaeris, circumspice"; it is "Si monumentum requiris," &c. Perhaps the most persistent misquotation of any is in Latin. Who, gentle or simple, hesitates to say, "Tempora mutantur"? Yet there is no authority for the phrase, except that of the first person who used it, and he undoubtedly made a mistake and meant to quote the lines—

"Omnia mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis; Illa vices quasdam res habet, illa vices."

In Harbottle's Dictionary of Quotations this is attributed to Lothair I. of Germany (on the authority of Matthias Borbonius, Deliciae Poetarum Germanorum, Vol. I., p. 685). The Dictionary translates the lines thus :—

"All things are changed, and with them we, too, change;
Now this way and now that turns fortune's wheel."

Another common miscarriage of foreign words is the hackneyed "Tu l'as voulu, George Dandin." The hero of Molière's play says to himself, "Vous l'avez voulu, George Dandin, vous l'avez voulu" (Act I., Sc. 9).

The Bible is familiar to the people and, therefore, on the whole, is accurately quoted; but, for the same reason, vast numbers use it, and as mistakes are certain to creep in among so many, some are perpetuated. Owing, no doubt, to their frequent application to the individual, the words of Numbers xxxii., 23, are often quoted "be sure thy sin will find thee out"; the pronouns should be in the plural. There is no textual warrant for the aspiration, "Would that mine enemy had written a book!" but Job (xxxii., 35) says, ". . . behold, my desire is . . . that mine adversary had written a book" (Authorized Version). The forcible phrase "hoping against hope" is, I believe, a faulty reminiscence of the Epistle to the Romans (iv., 18), "Who (sc. Abraham) against hope believed in hope." The most frequent of such Biblical mistakes is probably "The tongue is an unruly member." It looks like an amalgamation of two neighbouring passages in the Epistle of James—viz., "But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil," and "so is the tongue among our members." (C. iii., vv. 8 and 6, A.V.). One sentence from the Apocrypha is rarely quoted quite correctly—"He that toucheth pitch shall be defiled therewith" (Ecclesiasticus xiii., 1, A.V.).

There is, perhaps, more excuse for "Magna est veritas et praevaleret" as it is Latin, but it should be "praevaleret" (3 Esdras iv., 41). Among Prayer-book mistakes a universal one is "just cause or impediment" for "cause or just impediment" in the Marriage Service. It is almost incredible, but Lord Londonderry is reported (by the Westminster Gazette of September 14, 1899) to have quoted a well-known hymn thus :—

"I thank the goodness and the grace
That on my birth did smile
And make me in these blessed days
A happy English child."

Miss Jane Taylor (the authoress of "Twinkle, twinkle, little star") wrote "Christian days" and "Christian child," and the rhyme might have shown that there was something wrong with the second line. It should be "Which on my birth have smiled."

Shakespeare's works, of course, are a storehouse of quotations; only a few of those which suffer for their popularity can be here recorded. The virtuous folk who are conscious of their own innocence in particular instances must take it on trust that others are not so correct; it is believed that in each of the following passages many people habitually make some mistake :—

"Thus the whirligig of time brings in his revenges."

(Twelfth Night, v., 1.)

"This is the short and the long of it."

(The Merry Wives of Windsor, ii., 2.)

"I'll make assurance double sure."—(Macbeth, iv., 1.)

"Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased?"—(Ibid., v., 3.)

"This was the most unkindest cut of all."

"Fie, foh, and fum,

I smell the blood of a British man."—(King Lear, iii., 4.)

"While you live tell truth and shame the devil."

(King Henry IV. I., iii., 1.)

"I could have better spared a better man."—(Ibid., v., 4.)

"The better part of valour is discretion."—(Ibid., v., 4.)

"The smallest worm will turn, being trodden on."

(King Henry VI., III., ii, 2.)

"I shall not look upon his like again."—(Hamlet, i., 2.)

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,

Than are dreamt of in your philosophy."—(Ibid., i., 5.)

"Alas, poor Yorick! I knew him, Horatio."—(Ibid., v., 1.)

Milton generally fares well in the mouth of the quoter, but supplies one bad case. The last words of "Lycidas," if you believe the cheap tripper into literature, are "To-morrow to fresh fields and pastures new." Milton wrote "fresh woods." "Thick as leaves in Vallombrosa" often does duty for "Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks in Vallombrosa" (Paradise Lost, i., 302). The order of the first two words is often changed in "Awake, arise, or be for ever fallen!" (Ibid., 330.). Nothing probably can shake the position in the popular mind of the formula, "When Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war." The original, however, is "When Greeks joined Greeks then was the tug of war" (Lee, Alexander the Great, iv., 2).

Butler's "Hudibras" is more often quoted than read, and the current (per)versions of the following passages, especially of the last, will readily occur :—

"For those that fly may fight again

Which he can never do that's slain."—(III., iii., 243.)

"He that complies against his will

Is of his own opinion still."—(Ibid., 547.)

Few speakers or writers dealing with the subject of corporations hesitate to lighten it, not only by referring to their soullessness, —for which there is authority—but by proceeding to deplore a want of body which prevents them being kicked, for which there is none. This time-honoured jocularity is founded upon the following passage about corporations aggregate :—"They cannot commit treason, nor be outlawed, nor excommunicate, for they have no souls, neither can they appear in person, but by attorney. . . it is not subject to imbecilities, death of the natural body, and divers other cases" (Sir E. Coke's Reports, "The Case of Sutton's Hospital." Part X., 32 b.; Vol. v., p. 303, edition of 1826).

Shakespeare is not the only poet who suffers from small leakage. Here are a few others, and there must be many more in the same plight. One often reads "The day that sees a man a slave takes away half his virtue." I believe this is a corruption of a couplet in Pope's Odyssey :—

"Jove fix'd it certain that whatever day Makes man a slave, takes half his worth away."—(xvii., 392.)

And here, perhaps, the village preacher of the Deserted Village may be dissociated from an insufferable modern vulgarism which always makes him "passing rich on forty pounds a year" (line 141). Goldsmith, of course, wrote with. Similarly, a trifling inaccuracy seems to me to deteriorate a well-known passage of Byron—

"Fare thee well! And if for ever, Still for ever, fare thee well."

The vulgar "Then, for ever" is certainly no improvement. I should apologize for referring to tea as "the cup that cheers but not inebriates" if that was a correct quotation. What Cowper wrote was—

"The cups

That cheer but not inebriate."—(The Task, Book IV.)

Lines from Byron's poems which are frequently misquoted are—

"All went merry as a marriage bell."

(Childe Harold, III., 21.)

"And whispering 'I will ne'er consent,'—consented."

(Don Juan, I., 117.)

"Sweet is revenge—especially to women."—(Ibid., 124.)

Tennyson wrote—

"For men may come and men may go,

But I go on for ever" [not roll].—(The Brook.)

and

"Wearing all that weight

Of learning lightly like a flower" [not bearing].

(In Memoriam, Conclusion.)

A few instances from prose in conclusion. Gibbon seems to be chiefly known to some people as the author of the brilliant epigram, "The virtues of the clergy are even more injurious than their vices." What he actually wrote was "to a philosophic eye, the vices of the clergy are far less dangerous than their virtues," apropos of Pope John XII. (Decline and Fall, c. 49). Even Professor Huxley misquoted Gibbon when he wrote "the monks of Oxford sunk in prejudice and port" (Science and Culture, p. 27). The passage in the Memoirs (Lord Sheffield's Edition, 1796, vol. I., p. 76) is "steeped in port and prejudice among the monks of Oxford." The exigencies of life provoke frequent references to the infirmities of others, and the sacred name of Carlyle is conscientiously believed to confer literary sanction on the theory that there are (or were) "thirty millions of people in England—mostly fools." The sentiment could not enjoy greater vogue even if the philosopher had put it in this happy form. He missed it thus: "The practice of modern Parliaments, with reporters sitting among them, and twenty-seven millions, mostly fools, listening to them, fills me with amazement" (Latter-Day Pamphlets, 1850. V. Stump Orator). It is, perhaps, worth noting that the Canon in "Don Quixote" remarks, "from the consideration of what a great majority of fools there is in the world." Carlyle, however, could hardly have intended to quote Cervantes. But I think there may be genuine misquotations, so to say, of the Spaniard in English. One often hears nowadays of somebody's division of Society—the only practical one, we are assured—into the Haves and the Have-nots. This looks—I cannot put it higher—like a reminiscence of an immortal observation of Sancho's: "There are but two lineages in the world, as my grandmother used to say, 'the Haves' and 'the Have-nots,' and she stuck to the Haves." (I., c. 46). I have less doubt that the eulogists who exclaim "Blessed be the man who invented sleep! it wraps you round like a cloak," intend to recall Sancho's panegyric, "Blessings light on him who first invented sleep!—it covers a man all over, body and mind, like a cloak" (II., c. 67). Again, the same work is, I think, laid under contribution to express the impartiality of physical nature, when "the sun of Heaven" is said "to shine on the just and the unjust." This sounds like an echo of Don Quixote's dictum, "He maketh His sun to shine upon the good and the bad and causeth the rain to fall upon the just and the unjust." Of course, the coincidence may be—and the remark is of general application—the result of independent intellectual effort. In prose, as in poetry, a little blemish may cause much literary damage. More than once I have seen or heard a memorable sentence of John Bright's quoted thus:—"The Angel of Death is abroad in the land; you may almost hear the flapping of his wings." The orator said "the beating of his wings," but it is singular that "In walking away from the House after the speech was over, Bright confided to a friend that he very nearly said 'the flapping of his wings,' and that had he done so he would have been ruined" (the Saturday Review, September 9, 1899, p. 314). According to Hansard, by the way, the passage began "The angel of death has been abroad throughout the land" (Feb. 23, 1855).

This may, however, be an instance of the lapsus lingue or calami, and, if so, it is rather to be compared—for the cheap conversion of a fine passage into nonsense or "bathos"—with the mistake of a public-school boy who, declaiming one of Macaulay's lays on speech-day, made Appius Claudius say—

"Stop him alive or dead,

Ten thousand pounds in coppers to the man that brings his head." It occasionally happens, not only with proverbs, but other popular phrases, that there are two versions both sometimes from the same source. Thus "men of light and leading" has been a favourite formula since Mr. Disraeli used the words in a letter to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (The Times, March 9, 1880). As far back as June 15, 1846, Mr. Disraeli had used the words "men of great light and leading" in the House of Commons, and, it may be added, Burke had written "The men of England, the men, I mean, of light and leading in England" (French Revolution, edition of 1852, vol. iv., p. 233). Was Disraeli quoting himself or Burke, and which of the two is generally quoted by others?

There is a limit even to the variations of proverbs. "It is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous" seems to be nothing but a translation of Napoleon's "Du sublime au ridicule il n'y a qu'un pas" (teste Bartlett, Familiar Quotations, edition 9, p. 431). If so, the order of the words is misquoted. In "neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring," the fowl, so far as I can discover, is wasted (attributed ibid., p. 13, to Heywood).

There is a minor or negative form of the peccadillo. The quotation may be verbally correct, but the omission of the preceding or succeeding words of the context alone secures it from being inapt or incongruous with the subject to which it is applied. This is not of much importance in such instances as "England, with all thy faults, I love thee still."

or

"A sadder and a wiser man
He rose the morrow morn."

(Coleridge, The Ancient Mariner.)

But I feel sure that some of the gallants who boastfully observe

"My only books Were woman's looks," are unaware that the poet adds

"And folly's all they've taught me."

(Moore, The Time I've Lost in Wooing.)

Glancing back it will perhaps appear that on the whole we are fairly accurate in our quotations, and that we prefer to draw them from poetry rather than prose. It is quite possible that in some of the examples given above I have labelled the British public by attributing to it habitual deviation from the truth due only to the misfortunes of my own reading or the obliquities of my literary memory; at any rate, there must be many other examples of chronic inaccuracy. At least I hope that in dealing with a particular class of error I have not myself fallen into it.

HERMAN COHEN.

ROUSSEAU IN EXILE.

[By FRANCIS GRIBBLE.]

It is a matter of common knowledge that Rousseau, at a time when he was the most fashionable writer of the period, fled from Paris to avoid arrest on the charge of publishing books "equally opposed to sound faith and good morals," and found a haven at Môtiers in the Val de Travers—the valley into which the Rocher de la Clusette is now expected to fall—where Frederick the Great protected him, and a lady who admired his genius lent him a furnished house. Some of the details of his sojourn in that remote village of the Jura are also tolerably familiar. Every one knows, for instance, that he rambled about the hills in the flowing robes of an Armenian, that he used to sit at the door of his chalet making boot-laces, and that he ultimately fled because he had made the place too hot to hold him. On the whole, however, the story told in the "Confessions" is inadequate and misleading. For the true picture we have to go to other sources. It is not at all the picture of a hunted and miserable man, but of a self-conscious seer, thoroughly well aware that the eyes of Europe were upon him, and exceedingly pleased with his importance. Though he was poor, he was made welcome in the best society. Sentimental pilgrims—James Boswell among them—went to see him in the same reverent spirit in which religious pilgrims went to see the Pope. In the "Confessions" he tells us that he regarded them as an intolerable nuisance; but we know from his correspondence that he did not. In the former work, for instance, he tells us that a certain M. d'Ivernois "had the audacity" to spend some days with him at Goumains, and that he "tried to drive him away" by making it clear that he was bored. It appears from the letters that he actually invited M. d'Ivernois to Goumains, saying, "I await with anxiety the pleasure of embracing you. It would be one good thing the more in my life if I could enjoy that pleasure more frequently."

It was, however, not only by visitors but also by correspondents that homage was paid to the illustrious Pope of Sentimentalism. He received immense numbers of letters, took them all in in spite of the fact that he had to pay the postage, and spent most of his time in answering them. Many of his replies are preserved in the MS. department of the Neuchâtel Library. They remind one of those "Answers to Correspondents" which are a feature of certain weekly newspapers. A Swiss writer, who has examined them, sums up their contents as follows:—

A very young man who has just married consults him as to the duties of a husband and a father; an abbé of noble family and inclinations towards scepticism does not know how to reconcile his family pride, his doubts, and his career, and appeals to Rousseau to extricate him from his embarrassment. An officer whom Jean Jacques' books have disgusted with the trade of war wishes to turn author, and asks for an opinion on his pastoral poems. A husband begs him to explain to his wife, who loves him too much for his peace of mind, that she must resign herself to a separation necessitated by the claims of his business. A prodigal son demands his good offices in obtaining his father's forgiveness; a dancing-master reproaches him for having spoken too lightly of this serious art.

And so forth; letter writing and walking tours taking up most of the time during which Jean Jacques is popularly supposed to have been a miserable and persecuted man.

This serene life, however, was to end in turbulence and tribulation—for reasons which are still, to a certain extent, wrapped in mystery. The usual theory is that M. Montmollin, pastor of Môtiers, taking offence because he was not invited to become a shareholder in a company projected for the purpose of publishing a uniform revised edition of the philosopher's works, resolved to avenge himself by preaching the philosopher out of the parish, and with that idea delivered a course of sermons which induced his parishioners to break the philosopher's windows. It is at any rate established that Rousseau was denounced from the pulpit, and that his windows were subsequently broken. Post hoc propter hoc sounds plausible enough in such a case; but there is an alternative version of the final episode, resting on the authority of an "oldest inhabitant," which represents the window-breaking as a piece of comedy arranged, for purposes of her own, by the philosopher's mistress, Thérèse. Thérèse, we are told, was bored at Môtiers; she thought it was time to move somewhere else; she could not influence her philosopher by argument, so she decided to bring stronger pressure to bear; she felt sure he would go if his windows were broken, so she persuaded the small children of the village to break them. This is how the oldest inhabitant related the incident to Pastor Gaberel, somewhere about the year 1830:—

Ah! we were naughty children to tease the good M. Rousseau. He was said to be a little cracked; he always had the idea that his enemies were after him, and the boys and girls used to frighten him by hiding behind the trees and calling out to him, "Be careful, M. Rousseau, they're coming to take you to-morrow!" . . . As for the affair of the stones, it was Thérèse who made us carry them up into the gallery in our aprons, and it was we who threw two or three stones at the windows. How we laughed the next day when we saw the magistrate measuring the big stones in the gallery, under the belief that the windows had been broken by them—as if stones the size of your fist could pass through holes the size of walnuts. And M. Rousseau looked so scared that we nearly died with laughing.

The story is not conspicuous for its probability; but none of the stories between which one has to choose are very probable. What is quite certain is that the attitude of the philosopher towards the annoyances inflicted upon him was by no means characterized by philosophic calm. On the contrary, among his unpublished writings are included certain jottings on odd scraps of paper in which he expressed the emotions which they caused him in language that was not only unphilosophical but even undignified. "Send along your idiotic priests with their excommunication," he wrote; "I'll undertake to ram it down their throats and stop their cackle for a long time." And he wrote a good deal more to the same effect, though the utterance quoted suffices as an example.

THE DRAMA.

"THE BENNETS."

A few afternoons ago the Court Theatre was the scene of an experiment which I for one trust never to see repeated. Under the title of The Bennets a patchwork of dialogues from "Pride and Prejudice," made by Miss Rosina Filippi, was presented by a "scratch" company of players mainly recruited from the Benson troupe; and although the miscellaneous audience gave signs of being amused—a miscellaneous audience is capable, like Voltaire's Habakkuk, de tout—all faithful lovers of Jane Austen were, I feel sure, acutely distressed. I can speak, at any rate, for myself. But before entering into the details of this particular experiment, it may be worth while to make some general observations. . . . There is an anecdote of Mrs. Clive standing at the wings to watch Garrick playing, and exclaiming "D—n him!" (Kitty, I am afraid, did say "D—n him!") "He could act a gridiron." Now there is a very considerable body of people in this world who cannot see a gridiron without immediately yearning to act it. (If any one here chooses to echo Kitty's expletive I shall not protest.) They form the tribe of the stage-struck, a tribe which includes audience as well as performers, not only the people who want to act everything, but the people who want to see everything acted. The Cosmos exists for them only in so far as it can be dramatized. The quiet, cloistered arts of the studio, the library, and the music-room are naught for them; reflective and imaginative meditation is naught; they must get their sensations through the eye and the ear; everything must be expressed in external action by flesh-and-blood people; faces (duly painted) must be seen, voices (duly raised) must be heard, and there must be real coats, scarves, wigs, hats, and umbrellas. It was for these people that the music-halls, a few years ago, produced their "living pictures." It was for these people that last season a young lady from the United States danced some of the Preludes of Chopin. It is for the country-cousins of these people that games of chess with "living pieces" are played on vicarage lawns. Extraordinary race of beings! They seem to be congenitally incapable of believing in anything, enjoying anything, unless they are sitting, wedged in a crowd of their fellows, watching actual men and women doing something! If they could, they would dramatize the money article in The Times and act the stocks and shares.

It is for these people that novels are dramatized. Speaking generally, one may say that a dramatized novel is necessarily a mistake. The exception is in the case of the dramatic novel—that is to say, the novel which is only a novel in name, but which is really conceived as drama. A true novel is one which creates effect not attainable through any other medium than the novel. The various artistic media—the sculptor's block, the painter's canvas, the musician's score, the printed page—have their appropriate subjects, and you cannot transfer any subject from one medium to another at will. If you want to get the greenness of the apple expressed in art you must go to the painter and not to the musician. That is an obvious, elementary case. There are less obvious cases. Literary effects can to some extent (to a very slight extent, I should say, but opinions differ) be obtained from "programme music." As Lessing will show you, the same subject can be treated both by Virgil and by the sculptor of the Laocöon—though treated of necessity with a difference. Some effects of painting can be obtained—by a miracle—in literature. This, for instance, was what Gautier (a writer who was a painter spoiled) was perpetually aiming at.

"Laisse-moi," he says to Titian, "tremper ma phrase dans l'or de tes glacis ambrés"—

Laisse-moi faire, ô grand vieillard,
Changeant mon luth pour ta palette,
Une transposition d'art.

But these "transpositions of art" very rarely "come off." In general, the lute cannot do the work of the palette. Of course the novel is much nearer to the drama than the lute is to the palette, and that is why this particular "transposition of art" is so often attempted. (I leave out the—very powerful—commercial reasons; we are talking of art.) To a mind which has not perceived the essential difference of artistic media, it seems quite a natural thing to turn a novel into a play. You have only to call your players by the names of the characters, dress them in the clothes of the period, share out the dialogue among them, suppress the descriptive passages, turn the reflections into soliloquies or "asides"—and there you are! But there, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, you are not. For in the process of transposition you will almost inevitably have sacrificed the "atmosphere," the harmony and unity, of the whole work, and you will have altered, in the painter's phrase, all the "values." This is really at the bottom of Charles Lamb's objection to the acting of Shakespeare's tragedies. Consider his remarks on the blackamoor Othello. Desdemona "sees Othello's colour in his mind. But upon the stage, when the imagination is no longer the ruling faculty, but we are left to our poor, unassisted senses, I appeal to every one that has seen Othello played whether he did not, on the contrary, sink Othello's mind in his colour; whether he did not find something extremely revolting in the courtship and wedded caresses of Othello and Desdemona; and whether the actual sight of the thing did not overweigh all that beautiful compromise which we make in reading. And the reason it should do so is obvious, because there is just so much reality presented to our senses as to give a perception of disagreement, with not enough of belief in the internal motives—all that which is unseen—to overpower and reconcile the first and obvious prejudices. What we see upon a stage is body and bodily actions; what we are conscious of in reading is almost exclusively the mind and its movements." This, I admit, was pushing the argument too far. Lamb was considering Shakespeare's tragedies as novels, whereas they were plays, and conceived as plays. But against the dramatized novel his objection would hold firm. There we do lose "the beautiful compromise which we make in reading."

And now for Jane Austen on the stage. If the dramatized novel in general is a mistake, the dramatized novel of Jane Austen in particular is a ghastly crime—and will be, until we realize that impossible dream of Maeterlinck's, the "Static Theatre." She has no sudden, concentrated effects. The gradual changes in her characters steal on us imperceptibly. Hers is the patient, minutely laborious art of the miniaturist. The reflections of her people are generally more important than their utterances. All the advantage that the stage has over print is the advantage of vividness, the instant shock of reality. But these are just the qualities that the cool, grey, shy art of Jane Austen refrains from seeking. "Mr. Darcy sat down for a few moments, and then getting up, walked about the room. Elizabeth was surprised, but said not a word. After a silence of several minutes, he came towards her in an agitated manner, and thus began:—'In vain have I struggled. It will not do. My feelings will not be repressed. You must allow me to tell you how ardently I admire and love you.'" (Ch. xxxiv.). Well, put this on the stage and I can see an actor in a blue coat and silk breeches sitting down and getting up; I can see the surprised expression of a lady who in the programme is called Elizabeth. But what have I gained thereby? And Ch. xxxv., which consists wholly of Elizabeth's subsequent reflections, you cannot put on the stage at all. But Ch. xxxvi. is just as necessary to my enjoyment as Ch. xxxiv. Further, my own private pleasure in the book is marred by associations with the real and contemporary. I have, like all readers, my own ideas of Darcy and Elizabeth; I have lived with them for years, and return to them year by year. Henceforth I shall always be bothered by recollections of Mr. So-and-So at the Court Theatre, representing Mr. Darcy as though he were Mr. Martin Harvey, and of Miss Thingamy, whose Elizabeth is not a patch upon the Elizabeth of my dreams. Again, the weaknesses of the book—e.g., the unreal elopement of Lydia and Wickham, a subject impossible to be studied sur le vif by a respectable maiden lady, and the entirely pasteboard character of Wickham himself—weaknesses which in the book are smoothed over by "the beautiful compromise" of reading—on the stage stand forth exposed and shivering. By the glare of the footlights I see holes all over Wickham, and the sawdust escaping from Lydia. This is too bad. I shall never again be able to read "Pride and Prejudice" with the old pleasure. And all because of the mania for acting gridirons!

THE PASTON LETTERS.

It has long been felt that a new edition of THE PASTON LETTERS was desirable, and at length we have it. Since the book was first published by Mr. Gairdner, the originals of nearly all the letters, many of which were long lost sight of, have been discovered, and a certain number of new ones not known before have turned up in other collections. It is now possible for the first time to make a complete collation of the printed text with the MS., and to arrange the whole correspondence in its proper order. Mr. Gairdner, in the new edition in four volumes now published by Messrs. Constable, has not done this. He has reprinted the text from the stereotype plates of his earlier edition, with a few corrections; and the new matter he has arranged in a supplement. The omissions which Fenn made have not been supplied. To do all this would be a task of much labour and expense, and we cannot think hardly of Mr. Gairdner for not doing it; he has deserved well of his public, and his years and occupations left him no choice between what he has done and nothing. Yet we cannot but feel disappointed that no "younger and less occupied man" could be found among his colleagues in the Record Office to edit the Paston Letters once and for all. Fenn as an editor was extraordinarily careful, as Mr. Gairdner shows by a literal collation of No. 364 and by the evidence of other letters; but it is true that the knowledge of handwriting has progressed since Fenn's day, and we can never feel sure that he has not omitted something of real interest. It is awkward, moreover, to turn from one volume to another in search of letters which belong to the same period.

Here, however, our criticism stops. The new edition, or the introductory volume at least, will be indispensable to students. The preface and the historical introduction includes and replaces the separate introductions to the three earlier volumes; parts of them have been re-written, and the story is now told as a whole with the necessary corrections (e.g., p. lxxxi.). It is now printed in a fair legible type, in place of the minute type of the first issue. We wish to add, that it is one of the most interesting of historical essays, written in a graceful and telling style, and perfectly clear. No one can read it without a new understanding how the Wars of the Roses came about. There are more than a hundred new letters, never before printed in full, although an abstract has been published of some of them. If these do not contain historical matter of such interest as those of the earlier volumes, they do still throw light on the political and social history of the times. We have, for example, a description of the funeral of Lady Katherine Howard; Sir John Howard's gifts to his wife, a very interesting list; allusions to customs such as the taking up of earth in token that a man took possession of his inheritance, a practice which reminds us of the Roman mancipium; and a good deal more which elucidates the fortunes of the Pastons and their relation to Sir John Fastolf. It would be only fair, we think, that the volume with introduction and supplement should be issued alone to purchasers of the earlier edition. The rest of the world are not likely to let the Paston Letters remain on the publisher's hands.

Reviews.

EAST LONDON.

East London !—it is a name significant enough. Yet it is one which, save as a topographical area, has gained its meaning almost entirely in our own generation. To-day it is full of associations ; it suggests housing problems, mean streets, fashionable philanthropy, unfashionable Salvationism, University settlements, Whitechapel murders, water famines, and a host of miscellaneous ideas which cleave to the word and endow it with a new and distinctive meaning just as the exhalations of its own chimneys have settled on the dome of St. Paul's and given it a character unique among the churches of the world. To the minds of earlier writers, even of those who saw in the metropolis much more than a city of business or of fashion, the name conveyed little to strike the imagination. East London did not mean much to Lamb or even to Dickens. But in the last thirty years it has grown to be a great city of two million souls ; its fame has reached us, explorers have discovered it, some, like Sir Walter Besant, the author of EAST LONDON (Chatto and Windus, 18s.), have travelled from end to end of it ; missionaries have gone there to civilize the people, supported by almost as much sympathy as attends their efforts in Africa and Polynesia ; permanent colonists have even settled there and made a home. For, after all, to thousands—nay, millions—of Londoners East London is a foreign country, and they are only just beginning to realize what an extraordinary place it is. There is no district of equal area in the world like it. It has many positive characteristics which are remarkable, but they are not so remarkable as its negative ones ; and if any one wants to know what East London is not, he had better read the first chapter in Sir Walter Besant's book called "What East London is." We have spoken of it as an entity distinct in itself ; so it is to the imagination, but in no other respect. It is not a city, it is only a vast congeries of human beings ; it has no centre, no unity, no organization, no public buildings of its own, no corporate government. It has no cathedral, no college or university. There is no fashionable quarter ; there are no hotels. No soldiers are quartered in East London, no private carriages or gentlefolk are to be met with in the streets. It is a city, not of slums, but of unvarying meanness and dead monotony. And as for its intellectual life, let us hear what Sir Walter Besant reports :—

There are no newspapers, but then their newspapers are published in Fleet Street, only two or three miles away. But their books—where do they get their books ? There are no bookshops. Here is a city of two millions of people, and not a single bookseller's shop. True there are one or two second-hand bookshops ; there are also a few shops which display, among other goods, a shelf or two of books, mostly of the goody kind—the girls' Sunday School prize and the like. But not a single place in which the new books of the day, the better literature, the books of which the world is talking, are displayed and offered for sale. I do not think that publishers' travellers ever think it necessary to visit East London at all. Considering the population, I submit that this is a very remarkable omission, and one that can be observed in no other city in the world a tenth part so thickly populated.

Such is the district to the consideration of which Sir Walter Besant, who has already dealt with "London," "Westminster," and "South London," now addresses himself. He showed in those books that he is steeped in London lore ; but in East London it is the present, not the past, that provides food for thought. There are curious memories of old suburban times which a student may still recover—the Puritan and Evangelical memories of Stoke Newington, for example, where Fleetwood-street recalls the name of Cromwell's son-in-law, and where Isaac Watts, Daniel Defoe, Mrs. Barbauld, and Thomas Day, the author of "Sandford and Merton," created a tradition of staid nonconformity, which was, in 1805, rudely broken by the birth in Church-street, Stoke Newington, of Benjamin Disraeli. Sir Walter's purpose, however, is not antiquarian, and his account of the relics of the past does not pretend, we fancy, to be exhaustive. The merits of his new volume are of a quite different order from those of his previous ones. His object is to present a careful and complete picture of East London life, its sorrows and its joys, its evils and their remedies. For this his style is well suited ; if it errs at all, it errs on the side of an exaggerated lucidity. He reminds one of the criticism passed on Macaulay—viz., that he would never say "Mr. and Mrs. Smith drove to Brighton in a postchaise" ; but "Mr. Smith drove to Brighton in a postchaise ; Mrs. Smith drove to Brighton in a postchaise." Possibly the reader may tire here and there of the effusive kindliness with which Sir Walter takes him in hand in the manner of a popular lecturer before an audience which can only understand simple sentences. But in the general treatment of the subject there is probably no writer who could have done so well. It is the picture of an observer, not of a physician or a reformer ; it is conceived in the broad spirit of a man whose business it is simply to record what he sees. He does not always dive very deeply ; on the subject of the East London Jews, for example, and the way in which their amalgamation with the English population is affected by their race feeling on the one hand and their religion on the other, there is much more to be said than is to be found in the six or seven pages devoted to them. But it is not his business to discuss problems, only to state them ; and it is noticeable that he deliberately refrains from making any rhetorical appeal for sympathy and from painting any highly coloured scenes of distress. He writes, indeed, rather in the manner of a genial man of the world who accepts facts but refuses to be tempted by them from a healthy optimism. He sees, indeed, in this great drab city of the poor

The weariness, the fever, and the fret

Here, where men sit and hear each other groan, but his vision also takes a wider sweep. The life of Liz, the respectable factory girl, as traced by the hand of a practised storyteller, is seen to be one limited enough, but happy by reason of its limitations. For all its mean streets, its Hooligans, its houseless and starving outcasts, "there is no city," Sir Walter Besant asserts, "more cheerful and more addicted to enjoyment than East London." He has nothing to say for those who criticize the influence of the Board school. Foreign immigration, he thinks, will be checked by the advance made by industrial Germany. As for Hooliganism, it is mainly due to the abuse of liberty, and "it will probably disappear before long." It springs from the life of the streets, the only place where the hobbledehoy can get his amusements for nothing—and fighting is one of them. Another favourite amusement is acting.

"I have seen" writes the visitor to Ratcliff and Shadwell, "with my own eyes, boys and girls, quite young boys and girls, reeling about drunk—actually drunk, hopelessly drunk—the girls, poor creatures, worse than the boys." I spoke to one. She was no more than thirteen or so—a pretty child, but helplessly intoxicated. When I spoke to her she tried to reply, but became inarticulate; she gasped, she laughed—the awful laugh of a drunkard! She made a gesture of helplessness, she fell sideways on the pavement, and would not rise. Her companions, as far gone as herself, only laughed. A sad sight, truly, in a civilized country!"

A very sad sight indeed! This observer, however, did not understand that the personation of drunken people is one of the favourite amusements of the boys and girls in the evening streets. They have every day opportunities of studying their subject. A life school exists in every street, and is thrown open every night, and the fidelity with which every stage of drunkenness is represented by these young actors would be remarkable even on the boards of Drury Lane.

Sir Walter's spectacles, in fact, are rose-coloured. He finds in East London an "amount of philanthropic endeavour which it would be impossible to equal elsewhere." There is much indeed, but there might be much more; and the statement leaves it a little doubtful whether the comparison includes Continental cities. If so, it would certainly not stand. But the chapter on "The Helping Hand" gives an admirable account of the agencies at work, among which Sir Walter waxes enthusiastic, and rightly so, over the "Settlements" and over the Salvation Army. The whole chapter is a graphic and comprehensive sketch of all the activities for good in the East-end.

The illustrations to this book, which, in accordance with a growing fashion, are by more than one artist, add enormously to its attraction. Mr. Pennell has seldom done better work than in these wonderful little drawings of London scenes, so artistically conceived, so replete with facts, so suggestive of space and atmosphere, so interpretative of character. The studies of life by Mr. Phil May need no praise, for that artist always maintains his high level; but—and this by itself would interest the art critic in this book—they reveal his essential limitations when they stand side by side with drawings by Mr. Raven Hill, an artist who, at his best, shows far greater gifts of insight and sympathy. The book, as a whole, raises the "East London problem" out of the region of dry statistics on the one hand, and of uninstructed or partisan sentiment on the other, and does far more than has as yet been attempted in the way of interesting Londoners in the metropolis as a whole. The public of London should certainly be grateful to Sir Walter Besant for having undertaken the difficult task of explaining to them the vast city in which they live, and for the wide knowledge, the persevering labour, and the sane and sympathetic judgment with which he is accomplishing it.

SOME ANTHOLOGIES.

Mr. Laurie Magnus and Mr. Cecil Headlam exhibit the same taste and judgment in their new anthology, THE FLOWERS OF THE CAVE (Blackwood, 5s.), that they showed in their selection of "Prayers from the Poets." The cave is "the cave of Machpelah before Mamre," where Abraham buried Sarah, and all the pieces in the volume are in some way related to the idea of Death. In a few cases the connexion is somewhat far to seek. "The Ode on Intimations of Immortality," which touches the mystery of birth rather than the mystery of death, "All the World's a Stage," and "Swiftly Walk over the Western Wave" are not primarily "flowers of the cave."

A small portion of the book is taken up by some well-chosen selections from the Old Testament and the Classics, as well as from the French, and there are one or two translations from Dante. But the bulk of the volume is devoted to English verse and prose. It says much for the national genius that the effect is not at all a gloomy one. As a rule it is the life beyond the grave and not the grave itself that fills the poet's mind—

If a star were confined in a tomb

Her captive flames must needs burn there,

But when the hand that locked her up gives room

She'll shine through all the sphere.

We are, indeed, given two splendid examples, from two utterly different writers, in which the fear of death is the dominant note—the terror-stricken words of Claudio in Measure for Measure, and Carlyle's description of the death of "Louis le bien aimé." Then there is the sadness that so often characterizes the treatment of death by Keats and Tennyson, and the grimness of Montaigne's curious method of preparing the mind for the end—"Neither is there anything of which I am so inquisitive and delight to inform myself, as the manner of men's deaths, their words, looks, and gestures." But Death, the companion of Montaigne, or the "Arch Fear" of Browning's "Prospice," is to Jeremy Taylor "a haven," an "act of Mercy," to Young "the crown of life," to Pope "the great teacher," to Blake a better state, to Emerson the "beautiful necessity," to Shakespeare "the necessary end," to Wordsworth a victory, and to Thackeray the roll call at the gate of eternity. Walt Whitman sings Death a "Chant of Welcome," and Donne treats him with magnificent scorn:—"Death thou shalt die," or, again, "Why swell'st thou then?"

But more popular with most Elizabethans is the philosophical disdain for life. In spite of the exuberant life of the Renaissance the poet never tired of emphasizing the vanity of things. Their glitter only made him feel more keenly how perishable they were:—

Say to the court, it glows

And shines like rotten wood, cries Raleigh; and Ford, Webster, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Shakespeare sometimes, and Shirley re-echo the sentiment

Sceptre and crown

Must tumble down,

And in the dust be equal made

With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Spenser's stanzas on "Mutability" are in the same strain. As a contrast to this prevailing note, the last speech of Faustus, with its frantic clinging to life, might have been included. Very little, if any, purely descriptive verse is here quoted, the editors apparently confining themselves to reflections on Death. Otherwise Milton's descriptions of the first murder and of the lazar-house would probably be here. This may also partially account for the omission of Chaucer in an anthology which goes back as far as Dunbar. Nevertheless "The Good Counsel" of Chaucer or some selection from the Pardoner's Tale would have added interest to the anthology. And Theseus' requiem speech after the death of Arcite in the Knight's Tale ranks high among classic passages on Death. But the editors warn us that they have not repeated any poem included in their "Prayers from the Poets," and we have not this volume by us. The introduction of prose adds to the impossibility of making the selection complete. It is, however, representative of the best literature on the subject of which it treats, and is admirable for its variety and the interest of the central idea.

The old Scotch poet had a fine scorn for the proprieties. His theory of art and morals was up to the most exacting Bohemian standard, and, unfortunately for his editors, he is often most improper where he is most poetical. To put him into an anthology, such as Mr. T. E. Henderson's LITTLE BOOK OF SCOTTISH VERSE (1s. 6d. n.) in Messrs. Methuen's "Little Library," we must catch him with the twinkle in his eye before the smile grows too broad. It is no longer necessary to name the century in which Dunbar flourished. Thanks to anthologies he is now so far popular that everybody must admire him, if few people read him. Mr. Henderson gives us a good dose of Dunbar, of Henryson, the great Scottish fabulist, and of Alexander Scott, whose witty love poetry the editor compares to Surrey's. "Anon" plays a large part—a greater one, we are glad to say, than Gavain Douglas or Sir David Lyndsay. Then comes a great blank, not in Mr. Henderson's pages, but in Scottish poetry. The Reformation ushered in to the sound of the English Madrigals silenced the bagpipe. Alexander Montgomerie sang a little to himself, but the Scotch poetry to which others will listen may be roughly divided into that of the old "makaris" and of the School of Burns. What there is, however, is a feast of song, all the more delightful for being so different to our own. There is an enchanting lack of civilization about it. The Scottish poet does not mistake a shepherdess for a nymph, and he prefers a homely kettle to a storied urn. He is the best of friends and the most readable of enemies. He has not much high seriousness in his constitution, but he swears divinely—

Begone, you hallanshaker !
Jog on your gate, you bletherskyte !
My name is Maggie Lauder—

Though a poet he is always a man "for a' that and a' that."

A more familiar path—worn by the feet of many anthologists—is trodden by the anonymous editor of A LITTLE BOOK OF ENGLISH LYRICS (from Surrey to Poe) in the same series. But the editor is not more conventional in his selections than he must needs be. He is evidently acquainted with some of the bypaths, and has visited the fields watched by old Thomas Dowland and the Passionate Pilgrim. He even gives Colley Cibber a helping hand. Pope may have turned in his grave, but the verses are harmless enough. Then there are eight poems by Thomas Campion, and Drummond's translations from Marino and Sonazzaro. We doubt if the ode by Cowley and Wordsworth's "Ruth" can be called lyrics.

THE TROUBADOUR (Cassell, 1s. 6d.), Mr. Philip Gibbs' anthology, is—to use the polite phrase of Cardinal Wolsey—a frost. We open an anthology called "The Troubadour" hoping to find some well-chosen selections from the old trouvères, with an erudite introduction. Had we done so, we might no doubt have been profoundly bored, but Mr. Gibbs would have deserved our applause. Instead of this we are presented with a selection of English verse, so admirable that the average schoolboy knows a good deal of it by heart. And this is Mr. Gibbs' pretty idea—

As the troubadour of old went from castle to manor, from farmhouse to cottage, so it is hoped this book will find its way from home to home, from school to school, into playroom and study.

Then the book is divided up into several moods. Now "The Troubadour" is "In Fancy's Realm," and now he is "The Devout Singer." Anon he holds up "Nature's Mirror," wherefrom "shines out the glorious wisdom of Shakespeare" (sic). Then "'The Troubadour' has light moments." "Even poets," we are assured, "are playful sometimes." Lastly, "'The Troubadour' tunes his lyre for the little ones." This is all vastly entertaining on the part of "The Troubadour," but surely hardly in character. Had the old troubadour ventured such a variety entertainment, he would, we fear, have passed more swiftly than he expected "from castle to manor, from farmhouse to cottage." His patrons liked to know what they were going to hear next; and he seems to have avoided exciting them by too great originality. Nor are we sure as to the peaceful nature of the new troubadour's transit "from home to home, from school to school, into playroom and study."

It would be difficult to find better proof of how far an Englishman's appreciation of French poetry differs from a Frenchman's than in Dean Carrington's ANTHOLOGY OF FRENCH POETRY (Frowde, 2s. 6d.). The great classical seventeenth century poets are dismissed in three pages; Racine is not mentioned. What remains—some 300 pages—is a very choice selection of lyrical, as opposed to dramatic, poetry; and this shows, once more, how misleading is the current notion, supported by the French Conservative critics with M. Brunetière at their head, that the essence of French literature is comprised within the reign of Louis XIV. The translations are careful and true to the metre of the originals. The rendering of some of Ronsard's sonnets is a veritable tour de force. The disadvantage of "Anthologies" in general is not to include the reader's favourite poet or verses. While Vacquerie and Mülfger, two very indifferent versifiers, have the honour of a translation or two, Leconte de Lisle is left out! Ronsard's sonnet "Sur la Mort d'une Jeune Fille" is daintily pathetic enough to be read next to those that are translated here. Pontus de Tyard and Maurice Buchor, of course, are misprints.

BOOKS ON TOPOGRAPHY.

Records of Bristol.

THE LITTLE RED BOOK OF BRISTOL (Sotheran, 2 vols.), as edited by Mr. Francis B. Bickley, of the British Museum, for the Bristol City Council, becomes a very big and luxurious red book. It is printed on hand-made paper with rough edges and generous margins, and contains some good reproductions of the Charters and other documents. Bristol is rich in early records, to a great extent because they were copied into the "Little Red Book"—and the importance of its contents as material for the history of mediæval municipalities cannot well be overrated. The Corporation has taken a public-spirited course in printing them in this handsome manner at its own expense. Under the system adopted by Mr. Bickley every entry in the "Little Red Book" is dealt with, either by printing the Latin or French original with a translation, by giving an abstract, or by referring the reader to already printed sources. The entries range from 1344 to 1574, and the book owes its existence to William de Colford, once Recorder of the City, who thereby gained the gratitude of historians of Early English town-life. The volume contains practically nothing about the relations of Bristol with foreign countries, despite the trade which the town exchanged with the Continent; its interest is confined almost entirely to the corporate life of the town itself, which was made a county as long ago as 1373, and its relations to its numerous trade guilds. Every student of such matters will be attracted by the list of Ordinances of the Common Council, some of which, notwithstanding their origin in the fourteenth century or earlier, have a very modern flavour. Adulteration, stray dogs, the status of strangers, even sanitary matters all come under consideration. Irishmen could not serve upon the Common Council, nor would the craft of Hoopers permit of their employment—an early version of the once familiar "No Irish need apply." Of trade Guilds seventeen are here enumerated, although we know there were at one time at least half as many again. At Bristol, as, somewhat later, in other towns, both masters and men became very early in the fifteenth century impatient of the burden of the Guilds, and a good deal less inclined to contribute to the cost of the processions and pageants which the English are supposed, not always with good warrant, to have cherished passionately at that date. Mr. Bickley draws attention to a treatise entitled "Lex Mercatoria" which, he thinks, may be imputed, as he has been unable to find any printed trace of it. This is the more remarkable since it is of obvious value and importance; it is here set out in full, although it does not directly affect Bristol. Beautifully printed and excellently edited these portly volumes are a very valuable contribution to local history.

Alfred's Abbeys.

The coming millenary of the founder of the British monarchy will, no doubt, produce a good deal of literature, and we have an early example in ALFRED THE GREAT: HIS ABBEYS OF HYDE, ATHELNEY, AND SHAFTESBURY, by J. Charles Wall (Elliot Stock, 5s.). It is a capital little book, attractive alike to those who are interested in Alfred and to students of our old monastic institutions. All three houses were founded by the great King, but the nunnery of Shaftesbury was the only one that achieved success. The "New Minster" of Winchester, known after it was removed to a fresh site beyond the city walls, as Hyde Abbey, famous though it became, was the constant seat of strife and dissension. Athelney was poverty-stricken from the beginning and at the Dissolution was hopelessly in debt. Shaftesbury, on the other hand, grew so great and powerful that Fuller recalls an old saying that "if the Abbess of St. Edward's might wed the Abbot of Glastonbury their heir would have more land than the King of England." Mr. Wall's little book gives a full and exceedingly interesting account of the three foundations, all of which perished out of the land at the Dissolution with such rapidity that they might have been swallowed by an earthquake. Within twelve months of the surrender of Hyde to the King nothing was left of it but a few stones, the tomb of Alfred himself being destroyed ruthlessly. The volume is accurate enough throughout, but Mr. Wall's account of the relations of William I. to the New Minster is contradicted by the result of Mr. J. H. Round's researches, as detailed by him in the first volume of the Victorian County History of Hampshire. It was at Hyde that the relics of the immortal St. Valentine were enshrined. The later history of this great Abbey, which so entirely failed to fulfil the intentions of its founder, is a miserable record of venality and intrigue. The original monastic church of Athelney was remarkable for its curious ground plan, which resembled a quatrefoil with the altar in the chord of one apse. The place had an inglorious career, and the marshy site, added to the worries of chronic bankruptcy, killed off many of the Abbots. Now not a vestige of it remains, the whole of the site being under tillage. Shaftesbury, which had a very different history, has vanished almost as completely. The book is very fairly illustrated, some of the embellishments being reproductions of the manuscripts which are the chief memories left to us of the Abbey of the New Minster. We suppose it is hopeless to protest against the fashion here adopted of writing the letter "S." instead of "St." before the name of a saint. To the average carnal man "S. Valentine" suggests the omission of "Esq." at the end.

St. John's, Cambridge.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, by James Bass Mullinger (Robinson, 5s.), is a correct, colourless College history—the sort of book that a Don writes when he has before his eyes the fear of some other Don, cleverer than himself, going through his work as if it were a Latin prose, and making sarcastic remarks in the margin. There are plenty of unemotional statements of facts, ascertained, no doubt, with difficulty; but it cannot be said that eminent Johnians live again in Mr. Bass Mullinger's pages. We cannot expect him, of course, to print other people's jokes at their expense; we do not complain of the omission of the story of Isaac Todhunter and the Bottle of Sherry (or was it a Quart of Cider?) But there must be other good stories of other eminent Johnians that might have been told—the story, for instance, of how that dark horse, Parkinson of John's, beat the favourite, Thompson of Trinity (Lord Kelvin), in the Tripos. In fact the only eminent Johnian about whom Mr. Bass Mullinger enlarges with really expansive sympathy is Bishop Colenso. So hot was the hostility against the Bishop that the Master implored him not to attend the opening of the New Chapel, to which he had subscribed £25; and when the Chapel was opened, the Bishop of Lichfield denounced him. "I suppose," Colenso wrote to his son, then entering St. John's as an undergraduate, "that either Mr. Reyner or Bishop Browne, or Bishop Ellicott, or others of the same class, had expressed their determination not to attend if I did, or that they dreaded some scene at the Holy Communion. If Mr. Reyner helped to administer, probably he would have openly refused it to me." After this it is satisfactory to learn that, though Colenso was preached at in chapel in the morning, his health was drunk in hall at night.

TEIGNMOUTH: ITS HISTORY AND SURROUNDINGS (The Homeland Association, 5s. n.), by Beatrix F. Cresswell, will be useful to visitors at this popular seaside resort. The chief attractions of the place lie in leaving it—to fish in the river Teign, to cross the river to Haccombe, Shaldon, or Stoke, with their interesting churches, or to play cricket at Teignbridge. The authoress does not mention the Teignbridge Cricket Club, which not only rivals the M.C.C. itself in age, but also keeps up some very curious old customs. Teignmouth itself is not interesting as a town, the only relics of its ancient history being the tower and reredos of West Teignmouth Church. But it has its literary associations. Teignmouth was the home of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, and Keats stayed there while writing "Endymion."

THE SCENERY AND GEOLOGY OF THE PEAK OF DERBYSHIRE, by E. Dale (Sampson Low), is a careful compilation of the facts bearing upon the subject indicated in the title. One is rather astonished to find it ending with a general discussion of the science of geology, and its relation to modern thought, culminating in the statement that "the universe is one because it is the product of the one uncreated mind by which it is controlled and from which it ever proceeds"—a proposition barren of meaning as any one who pauses to define the terms involved in it will discover.

Patient and persevering toil have evidently gone to the making of KIRKWALL IN THE ORKNEYS, by B. H. Hossack (Kirkwall, William Peace, 16s.). The book begins with history, and passes to topography. The town is taken building by building, and house by house, and we have assembled for us all discoverable facts, not only about the Cathedral, the Bishop's Palace, the Earl's Palace, the Town Hall, the Grammar School, but also about all the private residences concerning which there is anything to be said. The last chapter relates to recent changes, such as the introduction of gas, and steam communication, and there are four maps and many admirable photographs and reproductions of old prints. Though its public is not likely to be large, it is as thorough a book as any antiquary need desire to pore over.

The perusal of BERMONDSEY: ITS HISTORIC MEMORIES AND ASSOCIATIONS, by E. T. Clarke (Elliot Stock, 12s. 6d. n.), proves that Bermondsey is not, historically at all events, the most interesting part of London. Bermondsey Abbey, of course, was there, and so, later on, was Bermondsey House, built by Sir Thomas Pope, founder of Trinity College, Oxford, and subsequently the residence of Raleigh's patron, the Earl of Sussex. But this is nearly all; and much that Mr. Clarke has to say upon these matters is extracted bodily from the writings of a previous historian of the borough, G. W. Phillips. The last chapter is mainly devoted to leading members of important firms in the leather, jam, vinegar, and pickle industries. Here, at all events, Mr. Clarke is breaking new ground, and no doubt this portion of his work will be popular locally. He also deserves praise for the care with which he has collected his illustrations. Perhaps the most interesting fact brought to light is that the attempt was made, in 1780, to make Bermondsey a "fashionable Spa." The attempt failed, Spa-gardens, Bermondsey, being closed in 1805; but Spa-road remains to keep the memory of the enterprise alive.

topographical work that has already found its public. The additional matter, relating to the "outer circle" of villages, contains some good stories, told with evident enjoyment of their good points. We particularly like this old account of a jury's expenses in 1784 :—

Jury Soot on John Willis.
23 quarts of ale	7s. 8d.
13 3d. gin and water	3s. 0d.
Hors Corn	0s. 6d.
5 mugs of ale	0s. 10d.
				12s. 0d.

It appears from the second item in this bill that, in the eighteenth century, the principle of the baker's dozen was held applicable to "goes" of spirituous refreshment. It is yet another of the fast accumulating proofs that that century was calumniated by Carlyle.

PICTURESQUE KENT (Robinson, 6s. n.) is a book of pictures drawn by Mr. Duncan Moul with descriptive letterpress by Mr. Gibson Thompson. The pictures are not more than moderately good, and the letterpress is rather obviously written up to them. The chief reason for greeting the book with mere civility instead of warm enthusiasm is that the ground has been fairly often covered. But if it only skims the surface of the subject it is, at any rate, chattily and agreeably written.

LLANDAFF CHURCH PLATE, by George Eley Halliday (Bemrose, 12s. 6d. n.), is a schedule of the Communion vessels of all the churches in the diocese except those belonging to the Parish of Merthyr (all but the district of Treharris), concerning which the author "failed to obtain any information." Most of the English dioceses possess such an inventory, but this is the first inventory of the kind relating to a Welsh diocese. There are plenty of illustrations, drawn to scale from actual measurements. A better-looking inventory could not be wished for.

THE OAK HAMLET, by Henry St. John Hick Bashall (Elliot Stock, 5s. n.), is an account of the history and associations of the village of Ockham, in Surrey—prettily got-up but hardly of more than local interest. On one page we find a bit of French—bon bouche!

ENGLAND (SOUTH), by A. W. Rumney (Philip, 1s.), is the first volume of a new set of "Cyclist's Touring Guides." It is very neatly got up, and contains plenty of the right sort of information, though the author would have given himself the opportunity of being more useful if he had not tried to cover quite so much ground in a single book.

TORQUAY AND THE SOUTH HAMS is extracted from Messrs. A. and C. Black's Guide to Devon. For its price—6d.—it provides with its maps enough information—in 48 pages as against 132 of advertisement—to help a tourist on a brief visit to Torquay.

NEW VIEWS OF THE GREEK PHILOSOPHERS.

The design of GREEK THINKERS, by Prof. Theodor Gomperz, which has been translated by Mr. Laurie Magnus (Murray, 14s. n.), is, to use the author's words, "to compose a comprehensive picture" of ancient thought, "to do equal justice to its different tendencies, every one of which has contributed its part to the complete structure of modern intellectual civilization, to consider them all impartially, and to judge them fairly," such historical narrative being added as may be necessary for the background. It is not a history of philosophy, or of speculation, or of religion, but it touches on all three, and with them on natural science, medicine, history, and all other departments in which the development of thought can be traced. The book differs thus from such works as Zeller's, and from histories of literature, in that it does not attempt to reproduce each different theory with exactness, or to give full and minute biographical and critical details; but seeks in each case to get at the heart, to find the principle underlying this or that belief, to criticize its truth or falsehood, and to trace its influence on later ages. For example: Thales is not rebuked as childish for imagining that water was the primary element, but he is credited with a first intuition of the unity of matter; to Anaximenes is due the great discovery, that all substances are capable of assuming each of the three forms of aggregation—vapour, liquid, and solid; Anaxagoras got hold of a true principle, the indestructibility of matter, though he applied it in a way ludicrously perverse; and so forth. In the way these theories are usually presented the student is apt to lay stress on their accidents, but Prof. Gomperz brings the essentials into prominence; and by his method we realize what a debt the modern world owes to Greece. Not only do we owe them inspired intuitions such as the atomic theory, but they have laid the foundations of nearly everything of value in the sphere of intellect.

But interesting as these early speculations are, we must not linger on them; we would turn our attention to the original parts of Prof. Gomperz's work, and offer a few criticisms. He has for the first time brought into due prominence the importance of the Greek medical schools in the history of thought. The study of medicine came at a critical time, when it was needed to increase the power of exact observation, and to correct hasty generalizations or credulity by its own saner methods. The author is for ever on the look-out for neglected greatness; and he does tardy justice to the genius of such men as Alcmaeon of Croton, whom he calls the founder of critical science, and Leucippus, the master of Democritus; to such movements as the Orphic, "in itself a great movement, dimmed though its greatness has been by the unprofitable customs and unlovely mythology it brought in its train." His skill in piecing together cryptic and incomplete fragments is very great. It is seen at its best in the treatment of Protagoras, whose dictum "man is the measure of all things" he shows to have been misunderstood by all the world since Plato. Prof. Gomperz points out with truth that the fragment of Protagoras on the gods is inconsistent with the theory that what seems to each separate man is for him. Protagoras, in fact, stands out in these pages as a dignified figure worthy of our respect, and Plato's not very merciful caricature is exposed. Prof. Gomperz goes so far as to identify a pamphlet "On the Art," which belongs to the collection called after Hippocrates, as by Pythagoras himself. Prodicus, too, comes in for a share of praise; and on the whole, there is a genial appreciation of all that is good which warms the heart.

Prof. Gomperz is abreast of modern research in almost every point which he touches, but there are one or two subjects where his views cannot be thought sound. When, for example, he says that "practically the entire fairy-lore of the occident is derived from India," he is demonstrably wrong. There was a time when this view prevailed, and a school which taught it; but the view rested on insufficient evidence and was supported with more zeal than discretion. Now, so far from there being "no one to dispute it," it is not likely that any competent scholar will be found to defend it. It is doubtful, again, whether he has fully grasped the Buddhist doctrine of rebirth. The people at least indubitably regarded this as a kind of metempsychosis. The author's use of the word fetish is hardly legitimate. His remarks on grammatical gender are incorrect; it is now practically certain that this has nothing of personification in it, but its origin will not be traced until we discover something about the forms of speech which preceded all those types we know of. In the notes, useful illustrations of the fear of malignant ghosts might have been got from Mr. Frazer's paper on "Burial Customs"; and it is strange that a scholar who knows English so well as Prof. Gomperz does should not have read Prof. Ridgeway's brilliant essay on "The Origin of Coins and Weight Standards," where he might have learnt more about tripods than he knows.

We cannot conclude without expressing our enjoyment of the literary style of this book. It is hardly credible that a German can have written a work so lucid, so free from pedantry or pomposity, that even sparkles now and again with epigram or humour. Hesiod, "a Roman amongst Greeks"; Melissus, "the enfant terrible of metaphysics"; these are happy phrases which stick in the memory. His choice of words is discriminating, and he hardly once fails to make his meaning clear. To crown all, he has been fortunate in his translator, who has indeed, to modify the words of Thomas Lodge, "made this admirable German talk English."

THE JINGO AS PHILOSOPHER.

IN REFLECTIONS ON THE ORIGINS AND DESTINY OF IMPERIAL BRITAIN (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. n.) Mr. J. A. Cramb says that he has been induced to publish his reflections, which were first communicated to the world in the form of lectures, "by the belief or the hope that at the present grave crisis they may not be without service to his country." If it be useful to his country that the vanity of his countrymen should be flattered, he will hardly fail to obtain his object. In perusing his pages one frequently finds oneself doubting whether the lecturer is really lecturing or only singing "Rule Britannia" with variations. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that "Rule Britannia" is not for him a song, but a series of propositions, the truth of which can be demonstrated from ancient and modern history. We English, he argues, are the Imperial race. We were bound to obtain empire because we were so great and good; and we are bound to keep it for the same reasons. It is true, of course, that where an empire exists and is in fairly flourishing condition there must be reasons in its past history to account for its existence and also for its permanence and appearance of solidity. At the same time, though Mr. Cramb's history is accurate as far as it goes, we doubt whether a general survey of history establishes all his conclusions as completely as he thinks. In the rise and fall of empires accident and economic causes play a part that is hardly second to that of moral character, and other races, not now reckoned as Imperial, have shown capacity for Imperial sway which accident or economic causes have taken from them. The Dutch certainly did so. It is arguable that the Spaniards did so, and it is certain that the French did so, since it was they who taught us how to colonize Canada and govern India. Unfairness to our rivals in the struggle for empire is, however, one of the most striking notes in Mr. Cramb's book. It is particularly unjust to Russia:—

The contrast between Imperial Britain and Russia briefly lies in this—that in the former a self-governing warlike democracy, dowered with the genius for empire, moved by a lofty political ideal, and resolute to fulfil its destiny, confronts the new age; in the latter, a strongly-organized and self-centred autocracy, an ancient government attracted by Imperialistic schemes, endeavours to force into a policy of aggression an army tainted with Nihilism, and a people passively loyal or sullenly rebellious. The theory that the Slav must "have his day" in Europe rests upon a false or superficial analogy. Genius for empire in a race, as I have said elsewhere, like genius for art in an individual, is innate, but not in all. And Russia has revealed in nothing a trace of modern Imperialism, of sympathy with modern political ideals, nor any capacity for developing that Imperialism or that sympathy.

But all this merely means that the ways of the Russians are not our ways. It does not prove at all that the Russians are incapable of becoming an Imperial race. They have their ideals no less than we have; they would say that Pan-slavism is as good an ideal as jingoism, and they certainly have a skill in subjugating, assimilating, and making use of conquered races which is the admiration of every traveller who has visited their recently-acquired territories in Central Asia.

There is another point on which many of Mr. Cramb's readers will be likely to join issue with him. Seeing that empires are good things, and are acquired by war, he is obliged to argue that war also is a good thing. Universal peace, he writes, appears not as a dream, but as a nightmare. He believes that the waging of war by Imperial Britain will "greaten and exalt the character of war," and he proceeds to glorify war in this noble peroration:—

War thus greatened in character by its ideal, the phrase of the Greek orator, let me repeat it, is no longer an empty sound, but vibrates with its original life—"How fortunate the dead who have fallen in battle! And how fortunate are you to whom sorrow comes in so glorious a shape!" An added solemnity invests the resolutions of senates, and the prayer on the battlefield, "Through death to life," acquires a sincerity more moving and a simplicity more heroic. And these, I imagine, will be the results of Imperialism and of this deepening consciousness of its destiny and Imperial Britain, whether in war which is the act of the State as a whole, or in the career of the soldier which receives its consummation there in the death on the battlefield.

There could be no better proof than this outburst furnishes that your real jingo must be sought among men of peace. "War," said General Sherman, "is all Hell"; that is a soldier's view of it. "If war must come sooner or later," said Canning, "it is better that it should come later than sooner"; that is the statesman's view of it. "The wars of the future," said Bismarck, "will be commercial wars"; that is the view of the prophet whose predictions are being fulfilled to-day. But Mr. Cramb is not a soldier, or a statesman, or a prophet, he is a lecturer in a lecture-room, and he sees things through a poetical temperament which, in spite of his undeniable knowledge of history, prevents him from seeing them as they really are.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The War.

A SUBALTERN'S LETTERS TO HIS WIFE (Longmans, 3s. 6d.) differ, we imagine, from the letters which most wives receive from subalterns. Probably they were rewritten and added to after the subaltern got home. On no other theory can we account for the long set discourses on Army Reorganization and the Flora and Fauna of the Veldt. Such sentences as "the cumbrous dualism of the War Office and the Secretary of State is responsible for the whole of our administrative failures" have rather an exotic air when one encounters them in such a correspondence. Be that as it may, however, the book—in point of "readableness" as distinguished from historical value—ranks among the best of the war books. Good stories and graphic bits of description abound. Here is Mr. Rhodes:—

His iron-grey, tumbled hair falls in waves over a tremendous head; his grey-blue eyes are extraordinarily quick and piercing, yet kindly withal; his chin is monumental. But the most wonderful thing is the voice. It runs up the whole tetrachord, beginning in the bass and ending almost in a falsetto. The lowing of a cow exactly represents it. The general effect of the man is to create an impression of exuberant vitality and power. Genial candour seemed to me the dominant characteristic; he was frankly good-natured and frankly egotistical. He directed the talk continually into the channels that interested him rather than his guests. . . .

His relations with the military during the siege cropped up, and Rhodes said:—"It's impossible to work with soldiers, they're so unbusinesslike." And later:—"Why, what d'you think? I wrote an article in the paper here, the best article they ever had, and the soldiers wanted to put me in prison for it!" If Rhodes was a person whom the Governor disdained to consult, Lord Roberts did not share his view. He wired to Mr. Rhodes in Kimberley, rather than to the heads of the military there, when he wanted something big done quickly.

Of the life of the Boers the writer gives a rather lurid picture, not, however, without a touch of relief, such as this:—

Two Boers, father and son, came round inspecting the British prisoners, and the old man felt Busschau's pockets and discovered his pipe. This he was proceeding to appropriate with great satisfaction when his son interfered. "No, father," he said in Dutch, "you mustn't do that; it is unworthy of you. Think of your own feelings if you were in this man's position, and leave him his only friend." The old man shamefacedly shoved the pipe back into Busschau's pocket.

The writer served in Rimington's Scouts, and every man in that excellent corps seems to have been an original. The book is a feast of stories, and the humour of the anecdotes is equalled by the sound sense of the military criticism. It is refreshing to find an officer recognizing that "the cleverest boys do not go into the Army," and we entirely endorse his demand that the pay should be raised to such a level as to attract ability.

THE JOURNAL OF THE C.I.V. IN SOUTH AFRICA, by Major-General W. H. Mackinnon (Murray, 6s.), is of more value as a document than as a book. It is, in fact, a diary intended for private circulation, consisting of little more than concise formal statements of fact, published at the request of members of the regiment. The statistical appendices are as interesting as anything else in it. Any one, for instance, who is interested in comparing the fighting value of the various religious beliefs will note that $\frac{1126}{1280}$ of the combatants were members of the Church of England, that Baptists were more in evidence than Congregationalists, and that Jews and Roman Catholics each furnished more recruits than all the Protestant Nonconformist denominations put together. It also appears that seventeen non-commissioned officers and privates have been given commissions in regiments of the line, and that the occupations of the Volunteers ranged from banking to pawnbroking, and from dental surgery to the management of perfumery establishments.

In the Antarctic.

The appearance within a few months of two descriptions of an Antarctic winter is a novelty in the literature of discovery. Mr. Borchgrevink's FIRST ON THE ANTARCTIC CONTINENT (Newnes, 10s. 6d. n.), though sometimes tantalizing for its brevity, is not inferior in interest to Dr. Cook's "Through the First Antarctic Night." Dr. Cook, indeed, shows far greater literary power; but there is a breezy optimism about Mr. Borchgrevink, which contrasts favourably with the rather doleful jeremiads of his predecessor. His maps, too, are far superior to Dr. Cook's (although for some unexplained reason they are made puzzling to the novice by reversing the position of north and south). This is especially the case with the map of the course of the Southern Cross over the (supposed) Wilkes Land; it illustrates far better than the text the importance of that course as determining the points at issue between Wilkes and Ross. The party established their camp on Cape Adare at the mouth of Robertson Bay, an inlet running north and south about thirty miles long; and their winter sledging was almost entirely restricted to the confines of this bay. The great height of the surrounding mountains and the broken surface of the glaciers made inland exploration very difficult; but some important work was done in delineating the country at the head of the bay. The winter was remarkable for frequent severe gales; and the huts were nearly buried in drift-snow—a fact which may have contributed to maintain them in position.

We expected every moment to see our camp lifted bodily into the air like a balloon. The metal stays by which we had anchored the huts to the ground sang lustily during the fierce squalls of the hurricane . . . had they snapped we would probably have been shaken up like dice in a box. . . . Now and again a jocular suggestion was passed from bunk to bunk as to how we should best be able to steer our hut in case it suddenly became an air-ship.

Mr. Hanson, the zoologist, died on Oct. 14; but the health of the party generally was good, although the commander testifies that the sameness of the long winter night preyed upon the mind "like a sneaking evil spirit." When the Southern Cross returned on Jan. 29, 1900, the expedition steamed southward, landing on Possession, Coulman, and Franklin Islands, and also at the foot of Mount Terror, where the commander and captain were nearly swept away by a wave caused by the "calving" of a berg from the ice-barrier. The voyage was continued to the east, until a harbour was found in the barrier, where Mr. Borchgrevink landed, and in a few hours' sledging reached 78 deg. 50 min.—about half a degree further than the "farthest south" of Ross. The narrative is here disappointingly meagre. No hint is given whether this indentation was in the same longitude as that seen by Ross on Feb. 9, 1841, or whether the position of the barrier had altered in the intervening sixty years. Mr. Borchgrevink also says little of the condition of the inner ice-sheet; but he believes that a great southern latitude may be reached upon it "in the proper longitude." The book is admirably illustrated from nearly 200 photographs, and the observations on bird life are full of interest.

Wanted, a Policy.

IN HIGHLANDS OF ASIATIC TURKEY, Illustrated (Arnold, 14s.) Lord Percy writes in a pleasant style, not without humour, of a journey taken in Armenia and the highlands of Asia Minor during 1899. His "Notes from a Diary in Asiatic Turkey" will probably be familiar to some readers, and this book gives the impression that he is a competent observer and speaks from more than a superficial knowledge of the social and political problems involved in the Eastern Question. The chief importance of the book is political. The geographer, and to a less degree the ethnologist, will be able to glean something from his pages, but that is by the way. Lord Percy notes, for example, the permanence of the ancient Assyrian type amongst certain of the modern villages, and distinguishes other types no less distinct if, perhaps, less interesting. He is not blind to a Greek inscription or Hittite sculpture; he even takes pains to trace the great Roman road. We cannot help feeling regret that he did not take with him some companion trained to understand antiquities, for the hints he gives are tantalizing. There is a fine photograph of one Hittite or Assyrian rock-carved figure, and one or two Greek inscriptions; but we do not feel confident that the inscriptions are correctly copied (p. 27), and the argument that the Hittite hieroglyph may have continued to be used for solemn inscriptions when the people no longer understood it is highly dubious.

But these matters are secondary in Lord Percy's book. He draws a vivid picture of the anarchy and violence which prevail in these regions, of the corruption and the ignorance of the official class, and of the danger of any attempt to keep things as they are. All this we knew before, although, no doubt, it is necessary to convince the average Englishman of them. He is, perhaps, a trifle too willing to believe that the Sultan would be a good ruler if he could, and too forgetful of the systematic atrocity of Turkish rule in the past wherever it met with no adverse champion. But, making all allowance for friendly prejudice, Lord Percy's political suggestions deserve serious consideration. Probably most English people will go with him heartily in condemning the shifty opportunism of all our Governments since Lord Beaconsfield died, and in desiring to avoid the partition of Asiatic Turkey. What this partition could only mean is here clearly shown—viz., that Russia would come down to the Persian Gulf, and thus a deadly blow would be struck at British prestige and power. The choice is offered us, then, of acquiescing in this and supporting Russia, or making a serious effort to bring about the reform of the Turkish Administration. Lord Percy's suggestions are on three lines:—First, as an indispensable preliminary, the finances must be reformed by abolishing sinecures and readjusting the Imperial and provincial revenues; secondly, administrative reform, by the full and punctual payment of all salaries, and promotion by merit; thirdly, judicial reform, by adopting a more suitable code of laws, and nominating the Judges from headquarters. He points out that to effect these reforms we must be prepared to resist Russia, who has shown by her action last year that she wishes to accelerate the decay of Turkey by opposing all who would try to reform her. Germany, on the other hand, eager to grow rich, is all for railways and trade; and we ought to go hand in hand with her, because this is the one thing which will benefit every Turkish subject.

We have no space to deal with other topics raised incidentally, such as the position of missionaries, the assertion of British prestige, the effects of free trade in Europe, Asia, and Africa; but, on all these, and others, Lord Percy has something to say which is always clear and moderate, and sometimes shows a quite unusual political insight. We hope the book will be widely read by members of Parliament. It ought to do something to further an immediate reinforcement of our Consular representatives in Asiatic Turkey, and a serious attempt to formulate an Eastern policy which will command respect, and will be superior to the tricks of parties.

A City Historian.

THE ALDERMEN OF CRIPPLEGATE WARD, from A.D. 1276 to A.D. 1900, by J. J. Baddeley, is a carefully-compiled work of considerable importance for the historian of London. It is published by the author (Chapel Works, Moor-lane, E.C.), and sold (5s.) for the benefit of the funds of the Metropolitan Dispensary, Fore-street. Very little has been done in the way of utilizing the records of the City for a history of the Aldermen, and Mr. Baddeley's list of authorities will be useful to those who follow in his steps. The book includes notes on the history of the ward, Lives of the Aldermen, with portraits in many cases; an account of the Aldermen's Deputies, and a full history of the City Aldermen generally and of the Common Council. The latter portion of the book is of much importance to the municipal historian, and Mr. Baddeley has done good service in extending his researches beyond a single ward. He has spent much labour in examining the Records, from which he gives many extracts, and has produced a work of real interest and value.

German Life.

Miss Hannah Lynch's book on "French Life in Town and Country" is succeeded in the same series by Mr. William Harbutt Dawson's GERMAN LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY (Newnes, 3s. 6d. n.). The two books differ as a treatise differs from conversation. Miss Lynch gave us a lively picture, but not very much exact information. Mr. Dawson gives us plenty of exact information, but no very striking picture. It will, however, usefully correct the impression left by G. W. Steevens' articles on Germany, that the Germans devote to the discussion of the intricacies of the railway time tables all the time that they can spare from the labour of signing their names on picture post-cards. The book, in fact, is full of interesting propositions about the different departments of life in Germany. What it wants is that touch of the artist which would enable us to realize what the German is like.

Economics.

ELEMENTS OF STATISTICS, by Arthur L. Bowley (King), is based upon lectures given at the London School of Economics and Political Science. The subject, as one would expect, is treated exhaustively and thoroughly. It is made quite clear what can, and what cannot, be proved by statistics, and what rules must be followed in compiling statistics if they are to be "reliable"—the author's word. Instructions are also given for the preparation of those graphic diagrams by the aid of which it can be demonstrated to the meanest understanding that the price of wheat depends upon the marriage rate or that Bishops have a better expectation of life than prizefighters. Then follow sections on the law of probabilities and the integral calculus, and the author's meaning is lost in the decent obscurity of the higher mathematics.

Mr. Phillips' little monograph upon THE TOKEN COINAGE OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND, 1797 to 1816 (Effingham Wilson, 2s. 6d.), should prove interesting to two classes of persons. The economist will draw from it many excellent illustrations of what happens to inconvertible paper currencies and regulated coinages; the numismatist will find much that is worth reading about a period which is peculiar in the history of our coinage. Few people now—unless they belong to one of these two classes—are aware that for some twenty years at the beginning of this century England suffered from all the difficulties and dangers of an inconvertible paper currency; yet many of their fathers, as Mr. Phillips points out, must have handled the "tokens" issued both by banks and by private persons to serve instead of the legal currency of which the country was depleted. It is a pity that Mr. Phillips' style and method of writing are not better. Many readers will fail to understand from his book how these difficulties arose, what were their results, and how they were at length solved. But the book is worth possessing, for it is the work of an expert who loves his subject, and it is admirably illustrated.

From the Hakluyt Society.

The Hakluyt Society has gone to the United States for an editor of THE JOURNEY OF WILLIAM OF RUBRUCK TO THE EASTERN PARTS OF THE WORLD, and it may be congratulated upon having found such a learned one as the Hon. W. W. Rockhill. For what the author of "Notes on the Ethnology of Tibet" does not know about China and Mongolia can hardly be much worth knowing, and the bibliographical list of "Titles of Books Cited" which the present publication contains will be in itself of the highest value to those who are concerned with the history of Eastern Asia. Of Friar William of Rubruck it is to be regretted that but little in the way of personal details is known. He was probably a native of the village of Rubruck in old French Flanders, and evidently "an honest, pious, stouthearted, acute, and most intelligent observer." Friar William must have been peculiarly fortunate as to the men with whom he was brought into contact, for St. Louis of France was the patron of his great journey of over ten thousand miles through Asia (1253-55), and Roger Bacon, who knew the good Friar some few years after the latter's return from the East, tells us that he made special use, in writing his geographical description of the northern parts of the world, of the work of William of Rubruck "quem librum diligenter vidi." The "Journey" itself is a fascinating narrative, and Mr. Rockhill has furnished his edition of it with copious notes and an admirable index. Both the text and the notes may be said to be indispensable to most ethnologists, and to nearly all folklorists. At the same time the story is better suited than are most of the Hakluyt Society's publications to please the taste for "human interest." This volume should encourage public librarians to obtain the consent of their commissioners to the expense of a subscription to the Hakluyt Society.

The Science of Meaning.

The study of language has fallen on evil times of late years. From the loose happy-go-luckihood to which all consonants were interchangeable, and the vowels did not matter, there was a violent reaction to the extreme of rigidity; phonetic law became the golden calf. The reaction resulted in the discovery of some valuable principles, and the successes of pioneers in this direction caused a wide study of minute things. But new principles did not appear with the same speed and clearness as at first; every privat-docent is not a Brugmann, but he feels bound to justify his existence somehow, and this he has done too often by starting airy theories founded on other theories, which some one else then proceeds to demolish, and brings down the whole pack of cards. Philological study during the last ten years has been comparatively barren.

There was one point, however, which was not admitted by all even when "phonetic law" was most devoutly believed to be invariable. A place must be left, some thought, for arbitrary forces, even for the human will. There were large masses of irregularities which could not be accounted for in any reasonable way. This is the subject which we find dealt with in SEMANTICS, Studies in the Science of Meaning, by Michel Bréal. We noticed the book when it first appeared in French, but now that it is translated by Mrs. Henry Cust and published by Mr. Heinemann, with a preface by Mr. J. P. Postgate, we may fitly recur to it. Meaning, its suggestions, associations, and influences, the effects of the mind on language and of language upon the mind, that is M. Bréal's subject. He shows how some words are "specialized" for grammatical purposes, as in French plus, originally a comparative, becomes specially the mark of all comparatives; how, when two words meaning the same thing are found in a language, they are "differentiated" to different senses; the influence of the form of a word on the meaning of other words ("irradiation"), as when the Latin -sco suffix suggests an inchoative meaning, because of the inherent force of adolesco and the like; analogy or metaphor; restriction, improvement, or deterioration of meaning; the relation of the parts in compound words; and many other such matters are treated from the new standpoint. It is all fresh and interesting, and illustrated from a wide range of knowledge. If we feel inclined to question, it is in matters of detail—as the derivation of parricidium from pater (p. 120), or the reason why e is kept in later compounds of lego (143); the principles started and illustrated are right enough. Occasionally, however, the translator seems to have mistaken the original, or used obscure expressions. Thus, “voyage” should be “journey” on p. 141; “intussusception” is not a word we desire to see again (148); the phrase on p. 151 is unhappy—“in the presence of the hearer of some information, it is natural to suppress what is self-evident.” The Sanscrit y-sound should never be printed j in an English book. What is the meaning of the note on p. 207—“By not referring to Indianists, we have simplified the quotations and suppressed the effects of sandhi”? On p. 170 “immaterial” is used for “material.” The Greek is full of misprints—ἀνδοί for ἀνδοί, Δωκερος, Ἀροειδης and numbers of wrong accents. We must, however, hold M. Bréal responsible for what appears to be a mistake in the quantity of signifer, which he appears to regard as the same as in the genitive signi.

Prof. Postgate adds a preface and an appendix, which forcibly put the claims of the new “Science of Meaning” before scholars. We cannot profess to be in love with his technical terms, rhemes, epirhemes, rhematology, semantics, and so on; but they are after all no uglier than the rest of the horrid crew of modern technical terms, since Englishmen will not talk English. The preface insists with much justice on the unity of the sentence, which cannot be picked to pieces like a flower. It is idle to talk of transferred epithets and so forth; we want to know how any one could transfer epithets, to say that a man takes a “kneeling kiss” (nixa-oscula) for example. He also breaks a lance for attraction and sense-construction, and altogether his essay should be a good corrective for the pedant.

Some two years ago we pointed out North America is a new field for the student of the origins of language; here as a field even more fruitful, the study of language in its prime and growth, and the strange history of the meanings of words.

FICTION.

Madame Sarah Grand's Book.

For a very readable comedy of manners—occasionally verging towards tragedy and somewhat too often relapsing into farce, BABS THE IMPOSSIBLE, by Sarah Grand (Hutchinson, 6s.), may be recommended. The idea it embodies is a serious one—in fact, so serious as by itself to fill a booklet which is given out with the novel. Madame Grand sees an ever-increasing danger in the number of “desolate women left in deserted country places, the pathetic victims of nature's atrophy.” “The men,” she says, “attracted by the glitter of the towns, are going up to enjoy the more genial social conditions without their women folk.” Of course, that is perfectly true, though it is perhaps not put in precisely the right way. It is hardly so much the “glitter” of towns that draws men as the simple fact that there is no work for them in the country. As for the women, the state of things that leaves a country side crowded with girls, eager to live their natural lives and with only a remote prospect of being able to do so, has long been found intolerable—so long, indeed, that we are inclined to think that Madame Grand is spending powder and shot upon lions that are rapidly dying, if not already dead. Is it true that “each succeeding year of the latter end of the century” has seen this particular evil “steadily intensified”? Are not the large hospitals, the Swedish gymnasia, the Horticultural Colleges, the High Schools, the typewriters' offices, the dressmakers', photographers', even dentists' establishments, gradually drawing off “these pathetic victims of nature's atrophy”? The vicar's daughter no longer finds her occupation in decorating the chancel and her emotional outlet in sighing for the curate. She comes up to town and shares two rooms with a girl friend and makes a cheery enough, if rather scanty, living.

However, granted a neighbourhood like Madame Grand's Danehurst, with its cluster of femininity withering on the stem, what happens in the book would probably happen in real life;

the first available male with a turn for artistic flirtation would capture every heart within reach. Mr. Jellybond Tinney is a fantastic creature; his flesh and blood is hardly more convincing than his name; and it is hard to believe that an exclusive county would have taken him to its bosom. However, he is amusing enough, and his view of himself as a joy-giver is quite legitimate. A more serious interest is supplied by Babs herself, she is in many ways Angelica over again. She has life and fascination; but her creator is right in calling her impossible. Such preternatural innocence and such extraordinary shrewdness are difficult to combine. She becomes the pathetic prey of half-understood emotions, but the book ends with a hint that she will find happiness in spite of all the cross-currents. Once or twice, the author seems to have dropped a thread she had taken up. For instance, Cadenhouse's famous tower; what comes of it? How does Lorraine the elder fare? She is almost the most interesting portrait in the book. The cleverest is decidedly Mrs. Kingconstance. It is almost a jar to turn from her capital, vivid presentment to the cruder caricatures of Tinney and his victims. In fact, we regret the farcical element altogether, side by side as it is with a really human interest. But the book is full of attraction and, we may add, all of a wholesome kind.

“Irish as a Peat.”

For a decade and a half now Katharine Tynan has been interesting an ever-widening circle of readers in her stories of Irish life. She is Irish to the bone, “Irish as a peat,” and knows the island which has given her imagination and a style and, above all, a subject, from Derry to Cork and from Dublin to Connemara, from Brian Boru to Mr. Parnell. She takes the conventional life of upper Irish society in THAT SWEET ENEMY (Constable, 6s.). We have three pairs of lovers, who are made as happy as lovers need be, a flavouring of “moonlighting,” a race meeting (no Irish novel is complete without a steeplechase), and a delightful group of characters clearly and adequately presented. Aunt Theodosia, with her shrewdness and mock irritability, her lingering feeling for romance, and her blood-feud with the English purchasers of Castle Finn, the O'Doherty estate, is an acquisition to the list of memorable characters in fiction, and Lord Innishowen is the worst of foils. Decima O'Doherty, her sister Sheila, Magdalen Murphy, the American heiress, Shaun and Phelim O'Doherty (a fine “clutch” of Irish names) are all excellent. With the other three male characters Mrs. Tynan has not been quite so successful. Even the most incorrigibly horsey man does not harp with Archdale's persistence on the metaphors of the stable. But the book is much too good to cavil at.

Toto's Tales.

It has been said that the “Yellow Book” continues to be published because the fiction which appeared in it is constantly appearing in book form. The latest volume which suggests this view is Mr. Frederick Baron Corvo's IN HIS OWN IMAGE (Lane, 6s.). The “Baron Corvo” of the “Yellow Book,” was one of its most individual writers. And this may be said for his present book which, indeed, contains tales which one first saw in Mr. Harland's quarterly. Mr. Corvo's are in two parts, Spring and Summer, and give the spirit of those seasons with freedom and grace. This queer collection of humour and folly is more for the aesthete than the moralist, and it will entertain the literary man who has wearied a little of both good and bad styles. For Mr. Corvo has a new and eclectic method. He is at once classic and colloquial, early Italian and old English, Cockney and Athenian. Caprice is the motif of his work and his figures are admirably chosen for his purpose. The tales deal with the legends and follies of religious houses of all periods and yet do not offend the taste. They do not lack humour, though, with no less than thirty of these whimsical stories, one gets something of a surfeit, and some sink a little below the standard. But such a charming piece of work “About Doing Little, Lavishly,” would alone give the volume distinction. We can cordially recommend the book to all who appreciate the bizarre, the graceful, and the gay. All lovers of literary art will find it entertaining.

Rita.

The author of "Peg the Rake" has long since won her spurs (if a lady novelist may be permitted to do so) and "Rita" keeps up the best of her own established traditions in THE SIN OF JASPER STANDISH (Constable, 6s.). Her style is full-blooded as ever. "Their minds embraced the strangeness of unimagined scenes, and revelled in idylls made eloquent by every peasant's face and every mountaineer's call. It was all so new, so beautiful, so strange; and the bruised and broken flowers in the garden of their hearts raised drooping heads once more to the sunshine of hope and the dew of blessed peace." There's a simile for you! and you will be right in surmising from it that "Rita" supplies a properly happy ending, at least in the case of one of her two pairs of lovers. Throughout, indeed, the story never strays far from the ruts of convention. The Irishry of it is according to the best literary tradition; the gossips of Rathfurley colloquy in the most approved loquacious peasant style. Of the characters it may be said that "when they are good they are very good indeed, but when they are bad they are horrid," which is not exactly the way in real life. Yet one would not willingly surrender Jasper Standish, police inspector and murderer; and indeed novel-readers must be grateful for a sensational story that cannot fail to stir even the most jaded.

From the States.

THE GIRL AT THE HALFWAY HOUSE (Heinemann, 4s.)—the first number of a new series of American fiction, to be called "The Dollar Library," and to appear monthly—is, at its outset, strongly reminiscent of Mr. Stephen Crane. Book I.—"The Day of War"—might have been written by the author of "The Red Badge of Courage." Book II., however, takes us to the Plains; and thenceforth we are concerned with the rise of a typical railway town in the Far West. Mr. E. Hough writes well, when he is not trying to reproduce Irish dialect, and his picture of Ellisville and its kaleidoscopic changes is convincing. Colonel Battersleigh of the "Rile Irish" (as the author persists in writing it) compels our admiration; but his conversation is singularly unlike that of any Irish gentleman. True, he was something of a cosmopolitan, and travel may have corrupted his native accent. For the rest, there is some good fighting in Mr. Hough's story, a sheriff quite of the Bret Harte school, and the usual admixture of love and lynch law. It makes a good start for "The Dollar Library," which intends to devote itself chiefly to the introduction of writers hitherto unknown on this side.

EBEN HOLDEN, by Irving Bacheller (Grant Richards, 6s.), is one of the books that have come over here with a flourish of trumpets from the United States, where their sales have been such as to make an author's mouth water. Such books will generally be found to have "grit" in them. Americans are fairly acute judges of literature. Above all, their taste is healthy. Few morbid works have the run across the Atlantic that a book like "David Harum" or "Eben Holden" enjoys. The latter is chiefly concerned with the old negro who gives the book its title, though he is not the hero, and the love story that runs through the pages is carried on by white folk. Eben's conversation, if not so racy as David Harum's, is always charming. Eben himself is a pathetic figure. The author runs some risk of making him too pathetic. Mr. Bacheller has a turn for verse. There is a little poem, ascribed to one of the minor characters and beginning that is delightful. "Eben Holden" deserves its popularity and will probably continue it on "this side."

Mrs. Dudeney.

The fact that novelists are sometimes dissatisfied with their reviewers has been impressed upon us once or twice. Are the writers of romance aware of the discredit they sometimes do their critics by stultifying the optimistic forecasts of a too hopeful reviewer? These thoughts are forced upon us by a reperusal of our review of "Folly Corner" before attempting to say what we think of Mrs. Henry Dudeney's new book THE THIRD FLOOR (Methuen, 6s.). Mrs. Dudeney was going to do great things; and now we find her telling the many readers we have helped to provide her with that her heroine has "beautiful eyes dusked by wonderful lashes," that some one has a "dusk of hair," that "the room was quiet and heavy with wallflowers," and a thousand other things which we cannot approve. "The Third Floor" is clever and amusing, but it does not fulfil our expectations. This is, of course, our fault, and we can only readjust the standard and begin again. There is something of the spirit of the brave days when we were twenty-one about this romance au troisième; there is youth at the prow and a touch of vulgarity and affectation at the helm. The heroine Valencia, or Mary, is pitchforked by her queer mother into the heart of the bachelor Bohemia world in Great Ormond Street. The mystery of her birth is developed with skill; many of the characters and situations are cleverly treated, and had we not expected a little more from Mrs. Dudeney we should have been grateful for something less. Frankness, candour, vivacity, observation, love of landscape and the homely garden all belong to the author of "The Third Floor." A little more study, a touch of inspiration, and Mrs. Dudeney will yet give us the novel we have the right to expect from her.

The Staffordshire Potter.

THE FROBISHERS (Methuen, 6s.) is emphatically a novel with a purpose. The duty of the public to safeguard the interests of the workmen engaged in dangerous industries and, generally, the mutual dependence of the different classes of society are the main themes of Mr. Baring-Gould's latest book. The Frobishers are the two daughters of a country squire, whose sudden death throws them on their own resources. The interest of the story lies in the development of the elder girl after she has exchanged the luxury of her old home for the lot of an apprentice in the pottery trade. The scenes in the life of a Staffordshire pottery town are well done in the author's best manner, and the cheeriness of the workpeople contrasts effectively with the squalor of their surroundings. Mr. Baring-Gould deliberately subordinates plot to the purpose of the book, and if the reader likes to dispense with the lighter elements of fiction, he will, at any rate, learn a good deal about the processes employed in a modern pottery.

Short Stories.

Nothing remarkable can be claimed on behalf of A STATE SECRET AND OTHER STORIES, by B. M. Croker (Methuen 3s. 6d.). There is a lack of invention about the time-worn theme of "Sullivan's Bargain." The incident of an Irishman who bought his own donkey back at a fair at a price far in excess of what he had received has so wide a vogue as to bear about it almost the atmosphere of folk-lore. No less than four of the stories are concerned with Irish life—sympathetically treated, but without the racy torrential narrative, the witty tip-toe dialogue, of Will Carleton, Lover, and Lever. Nor is the lack of invention in plot and dialogue redeemed by any distinction of style, for that, if free from flagrant vices, is commonplace enough. By the way, do tom-toms "hum"? Yet the author shows her grasp of the main principle of short story writing, that of fastening on an incident in life and presenting it framed in its own border. "The Little Blue Jug" and "The Clue" are, perhaps, the best. There is no excuse for allowing a short story to end in such a condition of suspended animation as "An Invitation" does.

An egotistic Colonel, whose absorbing interests are his little property and the weather; his angular, unattractive daughter—a sore disappointment at the outset to Maurice Durant, who had imagined a creature of idyllic beauty; Durant himself, an artist, irritable, humorous, clever, the epitome, indeed, of what has come to be known as "artistic temperament," such are the principals in Miss May Sinclair's first story, "The Cosmopolitan," contained in her volume TWO SIDES OF A QUESTION (Constable, 6s.). It is a subtle and capably executed character-study, marred perhaps a little by certain fine-drawn analyses of emotion, and by the author's somewhat exasperating facility for astute paradox. But satire, humour, imagination, and an excellent well-nourished style atone for minor defects, and if it is not quite clear why Miss Tancred, developed in body and mind by travel—her soul was nothing lacking from the first, and this was just what the half-blind artist couldn't see—could not accept Durant as her lover, we cannot afford to be too exacting in the case of a story so entertaining and well written. The reverse of the question is contained in "Superseded," the other story in the volume—the narrative of a middle-aged schoolmistress's hopeless love for a handsome young doctor. Miss Sinclair has contrived to render infinitely touching a situation which might easily be vulgarized by a broadly comic treatment. This is a book to be grateful for.

As a chronicler of the quaint humours of rural life in the West of England, Mr. Walter Raymond stands high. His latest volume, GOOD SOULS OF CIDER-LAND (Grant Richards, 6s.), contains four stories, two of which have been published before in another form, although there is no notification of this in the book. But they are worthy of reproduction; "Gentleman Upcott's Daughter," in particular, is one of the writer's most successful tales—a delightful picture of courtship under difficulties in a Somersetshire village. Mr. Raymond is a very keen and sympathetic observer of the old-fashioned rustic world, and his delineation of its moods is vivid and picturesque.

Mrs. Leith-Adams evidently takes a depressing view of the functions of the story-teller. CRUEL CALUMNY AND OTHER STORIES (Digby Long, 6s.) are funereal enough to damp the spirits of Mark Tapley. Two murders, a homicide, and a brace of suicides are a liberal allowance of horrors for a single volume. The writer has a vivid appreciation of the pathetic possibilities of the most commonplace incidents, and draws upon them with no consideration for the feelings of her readers. But lachrymose as they are, the stories are well constructed and full of variety.

Mrs. Lyons has written a small volume, which she calls BLACK COUNTRY SKETCHES (Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.), dealing chiefly with the Wednesbury district at periods varying from a hundred years ago to the present day. The majority of them are short, and the dialect in some is oppressively strong. In books of this kind there is no need to torture the alphabet in a vain attempt to reproduce phonetically the language of the district; it is surely sufficient to indicate the pronunciation here and there. Otherwise, some of the stories and sketches are interesting enough—the sketches more so perhaps than the stories, which are simple to the verge of dullness. A good deal of information may be gleaned here by the curious concerning local legends and the superstitions, sports, and dangers of the collier. The book should enjoy a local fame.

Mr. Cuming Walters' volume of stories, SNEAPE'S SPIRIT, and Miss Beatrice Heron-Maxwell's collection, WHAT MAY HAPPEN (both Francis Griffiths, 3s. 6d.), contain many interesting tales. Mr. Walters is at his best in those which tell of mystery and magic, but all the fantasies are entertaining. "The Shooting of the Spy" is a vivid incident of the Boer war, and "Sneape's Spirit," a story of dual existence, is a skilful piece of work. Miss Heron-Maxwell deals with the natural as well as the supernatural and is always pleasing and occasionally exciting. Such a little comedy of every-day life as "A Bit of Diplomacy" is charming, and many of the other eleven tales hint neatly that "A Hair perhaps divides the False and True." Both these volumes of collected stories may be relied upon to turn an otherwise dull hour into an agreeable one.

THE WINGS OF THE MORNING, by Helen V. Savile (Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d.), is fairly entertaining. The writer has not much humour and imagination, but she makes the most of a weak plot and some very conventional incidents, and succeeds in giving her story a general air of liveliness and vivacity.

Mr. J. Macalister's TALES OF A COLPORTEUR (Stockwell, 2s. 6d.) are interesting as a monument of Protestant zeal such as we do not often see in these days. His work lay among the Roman Catholics in an Irish district, and the priests are painted very black indeed.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie's determination not to die rich is most auspicious to the public libraries. We have had before now to record his generosity in this column, and within the last few weeks several further donations towards public libraries in the United States have been announced. In Pennsylvania three libraries receive a million dollars, and three in other states $60,000 between them. To St. Louis is offered a library to cost $200,000 if the city will provide $30,000 annually to maintain it. Illinois has $100,000 offered to two cities "on the usual terms," and the town of Siona Falls, in South Dakota, is to have a $25,000 library. But the most extensive of Mr. Carnegie's schemes aims at a system of public libraries in New York. The amount to be given is five million dollars, and its acceptance entails the opening of some sixty-five libraries. This is a magnificent gift, but the admiration of the New Yorkers seems to have somewhat subsided when they reflected that to obtain sites and maintain the libraries when erected will cost twenty-two million dollars. So that the gift is, to say the least, mainly an inducement to self-help. Many suggestions are forthcoming for the reformer to avail himself of. But three points should be borne in mind. First, housing reform, improved schools, and the rest are matters which must be dealt with by a municipality; secondly, to hand over five millions to an admittedly corrupt municipal Government would lead to dubious results; thirdly, he who pays the piper has a right to call the tune.

The Utopian scheme of a garden city without any manufacturing and of some 40,000 inhabitants near Tottenham is taking shape. The public buildings will be situated in a central ring, from which all the streets will radiate. For this ideal spot only a library was needed, and this Mr. Passmore Edwards has offered to supply as soon as the city is built. As the building, and probably the site, would be free, a sufficient income should be forthcoming to keep the library up.

It was reported that the King had given directions for the late Queen Victoria's library to be catalogued, with a view of distributing the books as gifts to the various libraries in the kingdom. This statement has been authoritatively contradicted. Instead of being dispersed, the library is to be enlarged.

A billiard table would seem to be a somewhat risky innovation in a public library. But an anonymous inhabitant of Colwyn Bay follows up an offer of £250 towards a public library with the suggestion that "the scheme should include one or more billiard tables." Possibly he thinks that his generosity entitles him to have his little joke. If he is serious we hope that the billiard table condition will be withdrawn when the Libraries Acts are adopted, as they probably will be. True, it is almost impossible for many to get a game of billiards without entering a public-house; but we should be sorry to see the public library lay itself out to catch readers by means of extra attractions. The sub-committee of the Free Library of Brighton, in Australia, suggest the purchase of two billiard tables as the best means of popularizing the institution, but this form of colonial progressiveness can scarcely be held up for emulation at home.

The Leyton Public Library sets a good example by issuing a King Alfred bibliography, including novels about the King, in view of the millenium next October. The inspector of schools for the district and the Leyton School Board offer prizes for a knowledge of the subject.

Yet another public library and art gallery is to be opened shortly at Bury, for the maintenance expenses of which a special rate of 3d. in the pound will be levied. A valuable collection of pictures has been presented by Mr. Wrigley. Mr. Archibald Sparke, of the Carlisle Public Library, has been appointed librarian and curator.

By resolution of the Borough Council, all the public libraries in Southwark will be open on Sundays from 6 to 9 p.m.

Lord Acton has succeeded the late Bishop of London as a vice-president of the London Library.

Mr. Henry Bond, librarian of Lincoln, has been elected librarian to the new public libraries for Woolwich.

Travelling libraries are gaining favour abroad, especially in sparsely-settled districts. In Denmark the town centre sends out boxes of books through the surrounding country, each village forming a delivery station. In America the express company of Wells, Fargo, and Co. maintains large libraries at half a dozen centres. Any employé may obtain a book upon application, the volume being sent and collected free of charge. Small reference libraries are also formed at terminal points. The Minister of Education for Ontario has asked for a grant from the Legislature to establish travelling libraries throughout the province,

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.—II.

In the Fortnightly, the pseudonymous Calchas, who seems as well informed as the pseudonyms Diplomaticus, asks the pointed question :—" Will Germany fail ?" He at least proves that the problems ahead of Germany are not less grave than the problems ahead of Great Britain. Germany, though not the Kaiser, rejects the friendship of England, is regarded with an unfriendly eye by the United States, is bound, some day, to quarrel with Russia, may quarrel at any time with France, and, with Austria in its present condition of unrest, has no allies worth speaking of. Moreover, a financial crisis and labour troubles loom imminently on the near horizon ; while the Empire itself is not a very happy family, but is full of jealousies making for disintegration. This article donne à penser. In " Anticipations " Mr. H. G. Wells attempts to prophesy concerning modes of locomotion in the twentieth century. He has a wonderful idea for a rolling platform as a substitute for the underground and the tube. The criticism of " Mr. Brodrick's scheme of Army Reform," by the author of " An Absent-minded War," would interest us more if our opportunities of ascertaining this critic's opinions of military matters were not so portentously frequent. M. Emile Verhaeren's article on " French poetry of To-day " ought also to be read. It is mostly about the Symbolists, but brings the subject quite up to date, announcing the appearance of other new schools. " Already are born the ' Romane ' and the ' Naturiste ' schools. The former, alas, has strayed into the blind alley of imitation ; but the second innovates in its turn, and claims to be inspired by liberty and truth, just as much as its forerunners. . . . Its growth should be viewed with hope. It has the priceless advantage of being the newest manifestation of life."

There are no fewer than five military articles in the Nineteenth Century. The one to be singled out for mention is Sir Herbert Maxwell's on " Military Training Schools for Lads." By means of these, he thinks, the recruiting problem, which will certainly become urgent when the war is over, might be solved. Historical learning is supplied by Mr. W. H. Wilkins who writes of Sophie Charlotte, the first Queen of Prussia. Mr. Stephen Wheeler sums up the work done by " Lord Curzon in India," and Professor Herbert A. Giles gives an account of the great Chinese Encyclopædia which was " bound up in 11,100 volumes, each half an inch in thickness, so that, were all the volumes laid flat one upon another, the column thus formed would reach a height of 450 feet, or nearly 46 feet higher than the top of St. Paul's." We should have thought that the column would have toppled over long before it reached that height ; but no doubt the Professor knows more about these matters than we do. Other articles are on " Emigration for Gentlewomen," by Arthur Montefiore Brice, on " Company Law Reform," by R. Gervase Elwes, and on " British Communications with East and South Africa," by Mr. Evelyn Cecil, while Sir George Sherston Baker inveighs against the King's " odious " Test Declaration.

There are various good things in the National Review. The most actual is Professor Onan's raking criticism of " The Secret Report of the Intelligence Department " which seems to have been as wrong as if the results had been arrived at by guess work. Mr. E. B. Iwan-Müller's article on Sir Alfred Milner is one of those articles that do not advance matters very much ; but Mr. H. W. Wilson " The Anti-National Party in England " is vigorous, and makes out a strong case for interfering with the freedom of the Press. Travel is represented by Commander Borchgrevink's article on " Life in the Antarctic," (we review his book elsewhere), and literature by Mr. Leslie Stephen's on " Shakespeare as a Man." Mr. Stephen takes the view of Professor Brandes that we may to a certain extent come to know Shakespeare's character from his writings, and he endeavours to construct it, in a paper which will please even readers who do not agree with the conclusions drawn.

In the Contemporary the author of " Drifting," a book which we noticed a few weeks ago, turns his heavy artillery upon the Prime Minister, on the subject of the Defence of the Empire. He is, as in his book, more concerned with prophecies of the ruin of England than with suggestions how to avert it, and as a pleasant Easter greeting for Lord Salisbury, he writes, " knowing many other countries, I have no hesitation in saying that the English Administration is the most wasteful, the most corrupt, the most stupid, and the most inefficient in any civilized land. . . . My Lord Marquess, I am placing this frank criticism and these suggestions before you with faint hope and with a heavy heart—not because I doubt your ability to provide the necessary reforms, but because I doubt your inclination to do so." Dr. E. J. Dillon has a very interesting character sketch of the Russian Finance Minister, Mr. Witte, and Mr. J. H. Round pleads for the preservation of the Declaration by the Crown against Transubstantiation, while Mr. Havelock Ellis has a rather good article on the character of the French people, who he avers are no more " Latin " than we are, and who possess the inestimable faculty of looking at things from the outside. He once saw a Frenchman run to an omnibus only to find every place occupied, and then merely lift his hat and turn away with a good-humoured " Bon voyage !" That is an impersonal way of looking at things to which Englishmen have certainly not attained.

The best article in the Monthly Review is Mr. Henry W. Wolff's on " German Anglophobia." It arises, Mr. Wolff thinks, because the Germans, being unaccustomed to greatness, are cockahoop and quarrelsome, are too proud to make themselves disagreeable to the French and Austrians whom they have beaten, and are not sure of their ground with the Russians. Consequently, they " yap " at us because they must. " yap " at some one. Mr. Wolff thinks that they will grow out of the habit by degrees, as it is to their interest to do so. Captain Young-husband criticizes " Sir Robert Hart on China." Mr. Sidney Hartland considers " The Native Problem in our New Colonies " from both political and anthropological points of view. Mr. Havelock Ellis, in a paper on " The Distribution of British Ability," takes the " Dictionary of National Biography " and calculates with patient labour what soils are most favourable to the growth of the different kinds of genius. We learn that Norfolk, whence came Nelson, Newton, Gresham, Wolsey, Coke, the Walpoles (Robert and Horace) and the Hooks (the Dean and Theodore), leads the van, and that " people of Irish and Welsh stock are better adapted than the Scotch for cross-breeding with the English." But, of course, the Irish cross breed successfully with any race, as witness the examples of the Macmahons in France, the Taafes in Austria, and the O'Donnells in Spain.

The Census Enumerator has wrested many secrets from us this week ; innocent and prosaic gentleman that he is, the completeness and relentlessness of his mission from house to house is only paralleled in Exodus. But Mr. George Bizet, writing in Macmillan's Magazine, finds that he is not so inquisitive as he used to be and as he might be. In 1851 an attempt was made towards a census of religions in England and Scotland, and " ardent sociologists " (says Mr. Bizet) " would like the census to be used as a sort of Record of Family—Faculties or Album of Life-History, with statements as to height and weight, colour of hair and eyes, possessions, and principles, and confessions as to religion." The colour of hair and eyes, and what is more, the shape of nose and face and character of coiffure are, as it is, confided by the most reticent travellers to the mayors of Continental towns. Some may resent the question as to infirmities in the present census ; but, on the whole, the authorities seem to have kept as near as possible to the sensible principle that the fewer the questions they ask the fewer the lies they will be told. Whether the unsigned article on " Literature and Democracy " is by Mr. Mowbray Morris himself or not it is certainly outspoken and amusing enough to be from his pen. In speaking of the great Victorian era of literature we are apt, he thinks, to forget that the latter half of the last century was much less productive than the former half. " In fiction and poetry," asks the writer, " what names have we to set against those which have been cited as belonging to the first years of the reign?" Yet who knows that we have not amongst us authors whom future generations will rank as high as we rank the early Victorians? Mr. J. L. Etty reaches Henry VIII. in "Studies in Shakespeare's History." In "The Man in the Ranks," "One Who has Served" is in favour, not of conscription, but of improvement in the position of the soldier. Other interesting articles are "Book Hunting" and "A Day with the Mounted Infantry."

The current Blackwood exhibits some of the characteristic excellences of that magazine—notably a most interesting anonymous paper of reminiscence and anecdote entitled "Some editors—and others." The recollections are mainly of the Saturday Review under Dutton Cook, The Times under Delane, and the Pall Mall Gazette under Mr. Greenwood. The "Musings without Method" fling mud in a superior way at the Cambridge "Medieval and Modern Language Tripos," and at the Oxford School of "Literæ Anglicæ." Mağa also has one of the best versions that we have seen of the Spion Kop affair. The writer does not mince matters, but says:—

To the onlooker the debt was plain enough, and the whole British Army, as well as the fraction of it which left Spion Kop that night, owes it to Colonel Thorneycroft that the catastrophe, characteristically described by him as "the mop-up in the morning," is only a might-have-been in our military history. The attempt and its execution must stand for ever as that which in a commander is worse than a crime—a blunder. The Army knows well enough who is to blame for that; but it is as well that the rest of the world should remain in ignorance, even if it should mean the prolongation of the pitiable discussion, for the burden of the responsibility for such a tragedy is too heavy for one man to bear in public.

The Empire Review continues to be interesting and instructive. Professor Mahaffy's remarks on "The Ebb and Flow in National Literature" are noticed in another column. Sir John Bramston's article on "the Colonial Office from within" is well worth reading, and so are Lady Macdonald's account of her visits to the Dowager Empress of China and Sir Michael Foster's summary of recent discoveries about the causes of malaria.

In the Gentleman's Magazine Karl Blind gives a learned account of the "brochs" or prehistoric towers in the north-east of Scotland, which offer as many puzzles to the antiquarian as the round towers of Ireland. Mr. Harold F. Hills and Georgiana Hill treat two interesting chapters from the by-ways of history—the wanderings of Don Antonio, the unfortunate claimant of the Portuguese Crown in the time of Elizabeth, and the chivalrous support given by Colonel Keith to Queen Caroline Matilda of Denmark, the sister of George III., on her imprisonment through the treachery of the Dowager Queen Juliana. Mr. Charles C. Osborne's attempt to reverse Dr. Johnson's unfavourable judgment on a now forgotten author of the seventeenth century, Francis Osborne, is not very successful. His "Advice to a Son" was Osborne's most considerable work, and the first part, published in 1656, went through five editions. The epigrams from it here selected are of a platitudinous order. The discovery of the new star has prompted an erudite account of recent advances in astronomy by Mr. J. Ellard Gore.

The New Liberal Review has a poem by "Carmen Sylva" on Queen Victoria, and another poem by Mr. George Meredith called "The Hueless Love." The review is much taken up with Imperialism. Dr. Herbert Hart hopes to convert the Liberal party to the views of the Imperial Liberal Council. Mr. H. A. Spender wants a clear decided businesslike Imperialism in the face of the new attitude of the Continental Powers; and Mr. Healy gets in a racy description of the wrongs of Ireland under the heading of "An unimperial race." To artists we can commend Mr. William Sharp's well-informed article on the "Impressionist."

The critico-biographical articles for which Temple Bar is justly renowned are this month about John Wesley and Jane Austen; and serials by Mr. Crockett and by Egerton and Agnes Castle are running their course in its pages.

In the North American Review Sir Charles Dilke writes a short article on "The King of England," in which he explains the reasons which have led him to abandon his Republican opinions:—

I cannot but feel that, in the last quarter of a century, the growth in the Empire of India and of the Colonies has withdrawn the adoption of Republican institutions from practical politics. The difficulty of the adoption of federal forms in the case of an Empire so dispersed, and representing forms of civilization so diverse, is immense. To bring India within the working of a Parliamentary constitution which would also include such democratic States as the Australian Commonwealth, is in my mind impossible; and the alternative means of keeping together the Empire is rather an increase than a diminution of the status of the King. Just as the Austro-Hungarian Empire has been kept together by the personality of the Emperor Francis Joseph, so the fabric of the British Empire must be kept together by full use of the sentiment which attaches to the person of the King.

Other articles are calculated to interest readers on the other side; but mention should be made of Mr. Henry James' paper on Matilde Serao.

Who was "Mrs. Ward, of Whittington," of whom Mr. F. D. How writes in the Sunday Magazine? Only the wife of a substantial farmer in the parish of Mr. How's father. But as Mr. How's most agreeable paper shows, she deserves to find a place in a series of "Noble Women of Our Time," and his account of her is far more interesting and human than the familiar description of a famous authoress or "Society" Lady "at home." Another good article is on Dr. George Matheson, "the blind poet-preacher of Edinburgh." There are two personal articles in Good Words which are worth attention—one on Mrs. Bishop among "Celebrated Lady Travellers," and another on the chequered career of Olympia Morata, the girl student of Ferrara, who celebrated her marriage in 1549 by writing a Greek triumphal ode, and dedicated her works to Queen Elizabeth.

The Badminton contains four coloured plates as usual. There are no fewer than three cricket articles. In one of them Mr. Ernest Smith defends the policy of the county captains on the throwing question; in another Mr. P. F. Warner discusses the proposed alteration of the law of leg-before-wicket. Foreign parts are duly represented by papers on "Deer Stalking on the Newfoundland Barrens," by Mr. Arthur P. Silver, and "South American Sporting Reminiscences," by Lieutenant Percival Hall-Thompson, R.N. In the last-named article the Patagonian cavy is the principal wild beast dealt with.

The Art Journal besides its usual monthly issue publishes a special Easter number devoted to Sir John Tenniel, with a number of well-selected illustrations and an account of his work by Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse. The reproduction (in monochrome) of a couple of water-colours by Sir John, who is known to the public almost solely by his work on Punch, forms a notable feature. An interesting feature of the Magazine of Art is an account of the principal address presented to Mr. Ruskin on February 8, 1899, with reproductions of some of its illuminated pages.

Cassell's Magazine contains a particularly interesting article, by Mr. Beckles Willson, on "Twentieth Century Fur Trading," an account of the present day conditions of the great Hudson's Bay Company. We should like, however, to see an article on the subject written from the point of view of the young man who thinks of adopting fur trading as a profession.

Mr. Wadham Peacock, who knows the subject well, writes in the Home Counties Magazine of "The Thames and the Boat Race," and some very interesting old prints are reproduced as illustrations. "The Will of a Plague-stricken Londoner" is a quaint document printed with explanatory notes by Mr. Arthur J. Jewers. "Finchley Parish Church" is dealt with exhaustively by Mr. W. B. Passmore, and Mr. Peter G. Laurie tells us all about the Essex ancestors of General Baden-Powell, beginning with David Powell, of Old Broad-street, London, born in 1695.

Little Folks is retelling the Victoria Cross stories, and the current number contains an allegory by Mrs. Marriott Watson.

We have received the Century, in which Mr. Charles Dudley Warner discourses on "Fashions in Literature," the Universal and Ludgate Magazine, the Asiatic Quarterly, in which Mr. G. B. Barton writes on "The troubles of Australian Federation," the Reliquary, the Antiquary, the Genealogical Magazine, the Idler, the Crisis, the Churchman, the United Service Magazine, the Girls' Realm, the Argosy, the Italian Review, St. Nicholas, the School World, the Woman at Home, the House.

The picture postcard has not so far taken root here as it has in Germany; but Messrs. Raphael Tuck are determined to show that in this particular industry at any rate we can do as well as the Germans, and their very beautiful productions will stimulate this pretty practice. The coloured photographs of the King and Queen are marvellous; correspondents who want a little more room wherein to express their feelings may prefer the reproductions from the National Gallery. But these are only a few out of a really excellent list of designs. To receive one of these postcards at breakfast would certainly brighten that meal; and the more so that any one who keeps all that he receives may qualify for one of Messrs. Tuck's collector's prizes.

"PAULINE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It may interest collectors of "Pauline" to know that my father destroyed as many copies of the first edition as he could, which partly accounts for their rarity.

Miss Browning tells me that she herself, at his request, helped him to cut up and destroy the unsold copies which he recovered from the publishers; and they were many, as few copies had been sold. He kept one copy, which I have.

This happened while they were living at Hatcham, and my aunt thinks the reason for their destruction was my father's desire to suppress a work which he considered "immature."

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

R. BARRETT BROWNING.

CHARLOTTE YONGE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be permitted a few words in reply to the note upon the work of the late Miss Yonge which appeared in your last issue? I have no desire to enter into a discussion of Miss Yonge's literary merits; perhaps as one of the large number who readily and thankfully acknowledge her influence upon their own lives I can hardly profess to be an unbiased critic, but your note contains certain statements which I am unwilling to let pass unchallenged. In reply to the assertion that "there probably never was a trained critic who ranked Miss Yonge's work very high or derived acute pleasure from its perusal," we have (1) Sir F. Palgrave's assurance of Tennyson's delight in her stories, (2) the criticism, quoted by the Bishop of Winchester, of "a man in the foremost ranks of our literature" that Miss Yonge's power of guiding a character right through a book was absolutely unrivalled, and (3) the list of signatures to the address presented to her on her seventieth birthday. And as regards the inclusion of Miss Yonge among the writers by whom girls "are taught that to continue empty-headed when they have the chance of cultivating their intelligence is not a thing to be ashamed of," we recall the suggestion made to her by Keble that one of her early books contained rather too much Greek.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

April 2.

BRIDGE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I read with interest your remarks in Literature of the 2nd on Mr. Dalton's book on Bridge Whist, but was much surprised at the date (1804) assigned for its introduction to England.

I have never had any doubt that Bridge was invented in Constantinople; at all events, I know that we received it from there, so I wrote to a friend in Constantinople, who is no mean player, and here is what he says:—

My experience of this game is that in the year 1876 when I went to England they used to play the "Cayenne," a little later the "Khedive" (whist with sans atout); was introduced, and about the year 1880-1881, if I am not mistaken, they began playing the "bridge" whist; so it must be much older than Mr. Dalton thinks it to be (1804).

I must explain that my friend by "England" means Manchester, and by "they" the Greek society in that City.

When I lived in Varna, before the war 1877-8, we used to play "Short Whist," but when I came here in 1879 I found that most people preferred Cayenne, and so it was the game played; but during the Russian occupation and until 1885, as there were many Russian officers in the place, a great deal of "Wint" was also played. I never learnt Wint myself, but I have watched the play many times; and as "Bridge" was introduced to Roustchouk in the early 80's I was able to see the resemblance.

When it was introduced we used to play it thus:—The dealer declares trumps, or passes, his partner then declares; if he announces "bridge" (without trumps) there is an end of the matter, except for doubling; but if he should chance to announce "spades" then the man on his left may raise the value of the colour and so on round the table from left to dealer. We soon found that if the dummy declared spades and the man on his left a red colour, it was almost necessary for the dealer, if he could do it at all, to declare "bridge"—because he knew his own hand; he knew his partner had declared spades, so presumably that was his best suit, and therefore, supposing he could hope to win, say, five tricks, it was better to lose two points of ten than possibly "schlemm" in hearts or diamonds. Therefore, having discovered that such a system had been abandoned in Constantinople, we decided to follow suit and disallow any changing of the suit and only to allow doubling twice—that is to say, first by an adversary and again by self or partner.

Now, as to the origin of Bridge. Though I may be corrected, I think it was "discovered" by some players in Constantinople having learned "Wint" from the Russians in 1878-9, and, not being always able to find partners, they gradually grafted "Wint" on the older games played, where it was usual to declare the trump—even if the last card was turned; but contented themselves with counting the points according to colour, without going into the further intricacies of declaring round and round the table during a quarter of an hour the number of tricks they could take.

Bridge having been invented in Constantinople naturally first found its way to Manchester through the Greeks and Armenians going there several times a year—it would naturally go slower to London, through Queen's Messengers or Secretaries and Consular officers going on leave.

Yours truly, W. H. DALZIEL.

British Vice-Consulate, Roustchouk, March 29.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Mr. Frederick Macmillan, while congratulating the Publishers' Association the other day on the success of its net book scheme, announced the purchase of an interesting memento of the abortive attempt made some forty or fifty years ago to put a similar agreement into force. The memento is a book of autograph letters—all condemning the plan of keeping up prices. The letters were in answer to a circular sent by the late Mr. John W. Parker, a publisher and editor from whose office in West Strand, once described as the cradle of Christian Socialism, issued the teachings of Maurice, Kingsley, and Tom Hughes; and he sought the opinions of authors on the matter, as it affected necessarily their interests as much as those of the manufacturers and sellers of books. The circular puts the case of a retail bookseller applying to a publisher for books with the avowed intention of retailing them at a smaller profit than that provided for between the wholesale rate and the selling price of single copies. "Do you," asked Mr. Parker, "consider the intention to sell at a low rate of profit a good and sufficient reason why a publisher should refuse to sell the books, which such retailer is ready to purchase and to keep in stock at his own risk?"

Dickens' reply was brief, but emphatic—"No, certainly not."

Carlyle wrote—"My answer to this question, for my own interests, and for those of the world, so far as I can see them, is decidedly 'No, it is not a sufficient reason'—and, indeed, I can see no issue, of any permanency, to this controversy that has now arisen, but absolute 'Free-trade' in all branches of Bookselling and Book-publishing."

Darwin, "as an author of some scientific works," replied—"I beg to express strongly my opinion that, both for the advantage of authors and publishers, booksellers, like other dealers, ought to settle, each for himself, the retail price."

Leigh Hunt excuses himself for a delay in answering on account of ill-health. "But," he continued, "I was anxious to make myself better acquainted than I was with the details of the question in order that I might give all the strength I could to my approval of that spirit of free trade and cheapness in literature in which I had already (as I hope you have been aware) expressed my hearty concurrence to Mr. Chapman."

John Stuart Mill wrote—"I think there is no case in which combination to keep up prices is more injurious than in the sale of books, and I wish success to the booksellers in their resistance to the trade regulations which restrict their liberty of selling books at a low figure."

Charles Kingsley sent a long letter on the subject, in the course of which he said—"No intention of a bookseller to sell at a low price ought to be any reason why a publisher should not supply him, but rather the very best reason why he should . . . The gain from the profits of bookselling by the cheap plan will go, first, to the consumer; and I suppose there can be no doubt that if a book be good and right it is good and right that it should be sold as cheap as possible; next, to the producers, in which term I include not only authors, but publishers, as to their skilled labour and talent for speculation the success of any book must be very much indebted."

Herbert Spencer, "believing as he does that every reduction in the cost of distributing books must inevitably extend their sale, and, by so doing, increase their profits, is of opinion that the publisher will best serve authors' interests by giving the underselling retailer every facility."

It was through the action of the authors that the old plan failed, and the association did not long survive its defeat. But, as Mr. Macmillan pointed out at the annual meeting of the present association, the position of the public and the general feeling with regard to co-operative action in those days, when trade unions were illegal combinations, has altered very much in the last fifty years. The new agreement has been successful, too, because it has been run on different lines from the old—no hard and fast law has been laid down; and if any author objects to the system he has only to say so, and his book is published in the ordinary way. The following extract from the council's report for the past year shows that the association is justified in regarding the scheme as a success:—

Reports from the booksellers' associations in all parts of the kingdom assure us that there has been no difficulty in maintaining the prices of net books, and that satisfactory results of the net book system have already made themselves evident in the balance-sheets of most retail booksellers. Many persons, whose opinions on such a subject are entitled to respect, have declared that, notwithstanding the war, which has necessarily had a bad effect on the sale of books, the retail book trade is at the present day on a more solid basis and in a more satisfactory condition than has been the case for many years.

With reference to our paragraph last week as to Miss Charlotte Yonge's connexion with the Monthly Packet, Miss Christabel Coleridge writes:—

I edited the Monthly Packet for some years, first in concert with Miss Yonge and secondly with Mr. A. D. Innes, but it ceased to exist in June, 1899, and has never been reissued.

The second and third volumes of the complete works of John Gower, edited by G. C. Macaulay, will shortly be ready for publication. They give Gower's English works; the first volume, it will be remembered, gave his French works. The Clarendon Press also have a School History of England nearly ready—the work of several teachers of experience, containing a classified bibliography.

Messrs. Kegan Paul have a new edition in hand of Bacci's "Life of S. Philip Neri, Apostle of Rome," translated from the Italian by the late Father Faber. The new edition has been prepared by Father F. I. Antrobus, and is being reprinted from the first edition of 1849, with illustrations after the original engravings. Immediately after Easter the same publishers will issue—as a companion volume to Mr. Paul Woodroffe's edition of "The Little Flowers of S. Francis"—"The Little Flowers of S. Benet: Being Legends of the Life of S. Benedict," the feature of which will again be the illustrations by Mr. Woodroffe. The next volume of "The Westminster Biographies" will be "John Henry Newman," by A. R. Waller, who edited Montaigne and Jeremy Taylor in the Temple Classics.

Messrs. Dent and Co. will publish immediately after Easter the "Benenden Letters, 1753-1821," edited by Mr. Chas. Fred. Hardy—a series of family papers giving characteristic pictures of the times of King George III.

A new series of literary essays by Mr. Coulson Kernahan, entitled "Wise Men and a Fool"—a companion volume to his "Sorrow and Song"—will be published shortly by Messrs. Ward, Lock. The book opens with a paper on "Robert Louis Stevenson as revealed in his Letters," and includes articles on Mrs. Browning, Charlotte Brontë, George Macdonald, Frederick Locker-Lampson, Browning, Tennyson, Mr. Watts-Dunton, and Emerson.

Miss Rose Graham will publish through Mr. Elliot Stock the volume entitled "St. Gilbert of Sempringham and the Gilbertines," a monastic order founded in 1131, which had twenty-six houses in the Midlands and Yorkshire.

In our book list of last week the name of the author of "A Handbook to Old Testament Hebrew" (Religious Tract Society) was printed "S. G. Greer." The author is Mr. S. G. Green.

NOTES AND NEWS.—Oxford and Cambridge met on Friday, March 29, and Cambridge won by 5 to 2. The result was somewhat unexpected; but the Light Blues have lately proved superior in the intellectual pastime. The inter-University match, Oxford and Cambridge v. The American Colleges, will be played by cable April 26 and 27. This side is managed by, and played at, the British C.C., Whitehall-court, S.W.

Additions to the already long list of problem tournaments include one in Tidskrift for Skak, Denmark, entries closing June 15; Norwood News (Surrey County Association); Leeds Mercury Supplement (two moves); Aftonbladet (Stockholm), and others.

(a) 1. * P-K3, followed by P-Q4, would be the correct way of development. As he plays, Black uselessly loses several moves.

(b) 4. P-Q4 would lead to book variations. The development chosen by the veteran is ingenious. It enables his bishop to exert a very lasting pressure on the centre and the Black queen's side, and seems to be well worth the loss of a move.

BLACK.

MIESES.

WHITE. BLACKBURNE.
White to play his eighteenth move.

- (c) Unresistingly yielding to the pressure of B-Q6, followed by Kt-QB3, and as bold and attacking a game, principally with pieces, as possible, was the proper policy.
- (d) White's strategy is constantly to busy his opponent, without giving him time for development.
- (e) The bishop ought to retire to Kt3. Even then, White might advance his pawn in front of his pieces and damage Black's position. But Black would have had an opportunity for fighting it out. As it is, his game becomes immediately disorganized by the advance of the K P.
- (f) This initiates the final attack—carried through in splendid style. White's eighteenth move is especially brilliant and vigorous.
- (g) White might have safely played 27. Kt x P, but he prefers the more forcing variation of the text, which threatens Kt x Kt, &c.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

So many accounts of the way in which "Recessional" reached The Times have been published on "the very best authority" that it may be as well to dispose of them by the publication of the following letter which enclosed the MS.:

Dear —

Enclosed please find my sentiments on things—which I hope are yours. We've been blowing up the Trumpets of the New Moon a little too much for White Men, and it's about time we sobered down.

If you would like it, it's at your service—on the old conditions that I can use it if I want it later in book form. The sooner it's in print the better. I don't want any proof. Couldn't you run it to-night so as to end the week piously?

If it's not your line, please drop me a wire.

Ever yours sincerely,

R. K.

The poem was published the next morning. Mr. Kipling was asked to name his own price, but absolutely declined all payment.

We shall publish next week (by the courtesy of Mr. William Strang and Mr. R. Gutekunst) a careful reproduction of a new etched portrait of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, by Mr. William Strang. Visitors to Mr. Gutekunst's Gallery at 16, King-street, St. James', will have seen Mr. Strang's new series of etchings in illustration of Mr. Kipling's short stories, of which an edition, limited to 125 copies, is now being issued by Mr. Gutekunst. Vol. VIII. No. 15.

The portrait is the first of the series, and is of unusual interest. It is not only the most recent portrait of Mr. Kipling which Mr. Strang has executed, but is conceived in a wholly different spirit from the large etching by the same artist which is well known. It includes, in a felicitous manner, suggestions of the characters which live in Mr. Kipling's writings, and, as an etching, the picture (which will be reproduced in the same size as the original) is marked by Mr. Strang's well-known vigour of line and characterization.

This is the second of a series of portraits which will appear periodically in Literature, as to which announcements will be made in due course. The first, that of Miss Charlotte Yonge, appeared on March 30. We may mention that copies of Literature of January 12, 1901, containing the portrait of Sir Walter Scott, reproduced from the picture by Sir Edwin Landseer in the National Portrait Gallery, are still obtainable.

The Society of Authors' Pension Fund has so far succeeded that the trustees are now in a position to award pensions to an amount of nearly £70 a year. Applications, which may be made either personally or through friends, are invited, and must reach the secretary not later than April 20.

* * * * *

A correspondence in Knowledge—a paper in which few, perhaps, would look for suggestions in this line—has raised the old question of the description (in Henry V.) of Falstaff's last moments. Few passages in the whole of Shakespeare have afforded more opportunities to the commentator. As it stands now in most editions the line is Theobald's emendation:

His nose was as sharp as a pen, and a babbled o' green fields.

"We believe Theobald's 'babbled o' green fields,' " says an old number of Notes and Queries, "to be one of many instances in which, with reference to some one particular passage, the scholiast has proved himself worthy of and excelling his author." The poetry of this "triumphant suggestion" has been universally acknowledged, but it has not prevented other critics from offering widely different renderings. In the folios the line ran:—

His nose was as sharp as a pen, and a table of green fields—a comparison not distinguished for its lucidity; and the fact that the last half of the line is omitted in the quarto edition complicates the matter. Pope, or one of the earlier commentators, suggested that this was a stage direction inadvertently copied into the text, and Mr. Percy Fitzgerald supported this view in a letter to Notes and Queries. For this rendering you have to invent a supposed property man or actor, by name Greenfields, who is to have his "table" handy for the next scene. Mr. Fitzgerald notes that the actor who plays Exeter in the following scene has to present a "table" or pedigree to the French King. Others are content to suppose that an ordinary table is meant, and that the mythical Greenfields was a furniture dealer, or the property man of the theatre. Anyhow, this explanation involves more assumption than most care to exercise. There are no records of the man Greenfields, whether as actor or purveyor of tables. Collier, or Collier's annotator, adopts the reading

His nose was as sharp as a pen on a table of green frieze—and this has been accepted with modifications by many others. Some have suggested "pin" for "pen," although this is hardly necessary, and another conjecture is "and a talke of green fields," which improves on Theobald's emendation by being something closer to the original. Others have wandered far afield, as the gentleman who proposed

His nose was as sharp as a pen or the bill of a greenfinch.
On the whole, perhaps, for the sake of lucidity no less than poetic feeling, Theobald's line deserves its place in the text as at any rate a happy conception.

It is generally dangerous to criticize other periodicals—for one reason because it opens up an endless prospect of controversy of the tu quoque order. But at any rate the critic should read the article he undertakes to criticize. A highly respected monthly, in its last issue, spoke of Literature approving of practices such as log-rolling, because they were "human." Had the writer read a little further he would have seen that we did nothing of the kind. Another journal, issued from an office generally remarkable for its intelligence in literary matters, devotes a column to our note on "Language and Provincialism," in which the confusion of thought is so curious that we can only suppose the writer read a line or two at the beginning of the note, a line or two at the end, took a hasty glance at the middle, and jumbled together such ideas as he had gathered in the process. From this article we learn for the first time that we believe "the Irish language to be identical with the Anglo-Irish dialect of the English language, that is to say with broken English"! Our note was mainly on the subject of dialect, and on the fact that its literary use is confined to the production of an artistic effect; a writer does not use it when he has a practical object in view. We added, "If dialect is rejected as 'provincial' when grave matters are under discussion, in spite of the fact that its obscurity is only relative, what chance is there that provincial languages will ever be used for such purposes?" We must really apologize to our readers for explaining so simple a matter, but it is perhaps worth while to call attention to the dangers of hasty journalism.

M. Augustin Filon, who has translated Lord Rosebery's "Napoleon" into French, has tried, in the Gaulois, to show that "never was there a man of action who read habitually so much as the Emperor did." Once at Dresden, before a circle of kinglets and princes, he said:—"When I was a lieutenant quartered at Valence I devoured the whole library of the town." Later, when he travelled with Josephine his berline was filled with new books which Josephine read to him, and during all his campaigns he read steadily en route, flinging papers and books out of the window. The story of his "travelling library" is well known. M. Filon unpacked it in 1870, when it finally reached the Tuileries. It consisted of 800 volumes packed in six boxes made expressly for the purpose. The volumes which had apparently been most read were Ossian and Ariosto, the "Orlando Furioso." Opposite the passages the most admired were dirty yellow blotches, which M. Filon thinks due to a tobacco-stained thumb. M. Filon thinks Napoleon the possessor of an imagination equal to that of Alexandre Dumas and Balzac. He was the author and the hero of his own romance—a romance more extraordinary than the "Trois Mousquetaires," more varied than the "Comédie Humaine." It was Napoleon, the dreamer, the artist, the man of letters, who, according to M. Filon, killed Napoleon the Emperor.

With reference to our mention last week of what we called the "verbatim report" of the case, "White v. Constable," Mr. White writes to us to say that no "verbatim report" was published. Our quotation was taken from the full report in the Publishers' Circular. A letter from Mr. White disputing the accuracy of this report was inserted in the Publishers' Circular on the same day that our note appeared, and that journal expressed regret for any inaccuracies that had crept into it. Mr. White says that the Judge made no reference to the use of the word "curious" in the book trade, and that with reference to reviewing for the St. James's Gazette he did not say "I was there," but "I know all about it."

AN EVENSONG FROM THE HIMALAYAS.

Far from the clamour of the tennis court
I steal away—
To watch the sunset o'er the plains on this—
My wedding day.

Here in the quiet of the peaceful eve
I sit and dream—
While, soaring high above my rocky nest,
The eagles scream.

The vultures, circling through the azure, urge
Their tireless flight—
And in the pines the countless crickets hymn
The coming night.

Deep from my heart I breathe my humble prayer
To One above—
That we may ever keep that gift of gifts
His perfect Love.

The Darkness comes apace; but in the West
There shines afar
God's token—as of old He gave the bow,
Love's own bright star.

It is well worth the collector's while to look through the annotated catalogue of Mr. William Harris Arnold's "Books and Letters," which are to be sold at New York at the beginning of next month. Besides volumes of much interest on account of their association there are some of extreme rarity. The Brownings are represented by a very fine copy of "The Battle of Marathon," 1820 (only five other copies known); Mrs. Browning's "Sonnets" (1847), which formerly belonged to Charles Kingsley, and which has never been sold by auction; "Pauline" (80 copies printed; thirteen known, as recently stated in Literature); "Gold Hair," 1804; "Cleon," 1855; "The Statue and the Bust," 1855; a proof copy of "The Ring and the Book," with manuscript revisions made before the publication of the first edition, and "Helen's Tower," privately printed in 1870 on two leaves—perhaps the scarcest trifle of its kind ever credited to a popular author. The sonnet, which recalls Tennyson's poem of the same title, was, like it, intended as a tribute to the memory of Helen, the mother of Lord Dufferin, whose memorial tower is on the Dufferin estate at Clandeboye. Equally interesting is the small octavo edition of "The Deserted Village," 1770, now recognized as a genuine privately printed edition before the first quarto of May in the same year. To this Mr. Arnold has written a long note. One of the three known copies of the first edition of Johnson's "Dictionary" in the original boards will also be offered for sale, as well as the first issue of "Paradise Lost" in its original sheepskin binding, and many scarce pieces of Keats, Shelley, and Tennyson. Many of these books or pamphlets have original letters of their authors' inserted. Mr. Arnold's collection is very strong in "Letters." Among them are the holograph MS. of Washington Irving's "The Knight of Malta," a very lengthy journal-letter of Keats to his brother George's wife, and the complete holograph MS. of the poem which Keats addressed to Charles Cowden Clarke in 1816, of which a complete facsimile is given in the catalogue. Keats' letters are extremely rare, and so, in a minor degree, are Shelley's, and Mr. Arnold has been unusually successful in obtaining fine specimens. The catalogue is most artistically produced, annotated throughout, and illustrated with facsimiles of title-pages and manuscripts.

French and English letters have always stood in so close a connexion that the comparison between them is of perennial interest. It is dealt with in the current

French and Contemporary by Mr. Havelock Ellis, but he English. compares and contrasts the two civilizations at so many points that the main current of his remarks is nearly as hard to find and follow as that of a river when it splits itself into a delta. We do not here allude to the political parallel which he draws; and we will also be silent about its ethnological and anthropological aspects. With regard to the two literatures he notes the obvious fact that French excellence is in prose and English excellence in poetry, and he proceeds as follows:—

So fundamental is the bias of the French mind to prose that, so far as I know, the only two French poets who are purely poets, as the Greeks and the English have understood poetry—I refer to Villon and Verlaine—are poets by the breaking up of the whole social personality, by becoming outcasts from society. Only by smashing the whole mould of their civilization, it would seem, can the most intense note of personal emotion be reached; whereas in England it has been possible for the greatest poets to live quietly the lives of respectable middle class citizens.

The most useful criticism to pass upon this contrast is perhaps that if, for the names of Villon and Verlaine, one substitutes the names of Kit Marlowe and Shelley the words French and English might be transposed in it, and the sentence would still read as plausibly as before. The truth is, of course, that, in both countries alike, some poets live decorously and others live tempestuously. Such difference as exists lies in the fact that French public opinion is more tolerant than ours. But this divergence is not particular but general, and it covers the cases of other members of the community besides poets. The real differences that distinguish the French from the English in matters of this kind are principally two; and we have no false shame in admitting that in each case we prefer the line taken by our neighbours. In the first place the French draw, far more clearly and rigidly than we do, the line between the man of letters and the man who manufactures reading matter for the market. The average man here—and the great popular Press which represents the average man—entirely fails to perceive that between a novelist like Mr. George Meredith and the jolly casual gentleman who shouts a novel into a phonograph every morning before breakfast there is, artistically, as much difference as between an Academician and a sign painter. In France there is no such confusion of thought. Except in a publisher's réclame no Frenchman ever suggested that Emile Richebourg was a man of letters. That is one point of difference. The second is that, in France, the profession of letters, whether a man grows rich at it or not, is—provided that his work is considered excellent by good judges—a passport, as military or naval rank is with us, to social consideration. Here the social consideration is not for the man who does good work, but for the man who makes a success and gets talked about. One may point the contrast by noting the attitude of the Court towards men of letters in the Victorian era and under the Second Empire. The poet who was honoured in England was Tennyson, middle-aged, prosperous, a courtier. The poet who was honoured in France was Daudet, who was living in a garret in the Latin Quarter. The Empress Eugénie knew nothing of him except that she had heard one of his poems recited and been struck by it; but she told de Morny to find him and give him an appointment in her household; and she did not even insist that the poet should have his hair cut like other people. Few men outside the rank of great writers have done so much for learning as the late Mr. George Smith, who conceived and rendered possible the "Dictionary of National Biography." But he received no public recognition from his country. The French, it must be admitted, take as a nation a higher literary standard than we do, and show a truer national appreciation of its value. And this is a distinction which a writer on the literary characteristics of the two nations has to explain.

Personal Views.

POETRY OF THE SEA.

In precisely the same way, I suppose, as the best journalists—i.e., those who give the most vivid impressions of what they have seen to their readers—are men who have apparently devoted a wonderfully short space of time to their observations, so it would seem that for the writing of real sea poetry an extended acquaintance with maritime conditions is not merely unnecessary but hampering. I come to this conclusion reluctantly but inevitably, for in common with all reading seafarers I have noticed that we may look in vain for sea poetry from sailors. Sailors have written verse, Falconer's "Shipwreck" to wit, but between that peculiar poem and the marvellous majesty, profound insight, and truly amazing knowledge of deep-sea secrets exhibited in the "Ancient Mariner" how great a gulf is fixed!

"Only those who brave its dangers comprehend its mystery" rings true, and yet it is no less true that Longfellow, very little more of a sailor than Coleridge, has also interpreted the mystery of the mighty ocean in a manner (most sailors think) only second in true poetic power to that of Coleridge. To the well-read sailor—and there are far more of him than one would imagine remembering the poverty of his literary output—Coleridge always stands easily highest, Longfellow next, and Byron next as the interpreters of the voices of the sea. The Biblical allusions to the sea in the Old Testament (always in terms of poetry be it remembered, the Inspired writers seeming only able to express themselves rhythmically about the sea) stand on a plane of their own. Their truth, their stupendous power is felt, as the voices of the sea are felt, rather than heard, but it is only seldom that the sailor obtains any enjoyment from them. They are overwhelming. Something of sacrilege seems involved in the attempt to enjoy them as literature, and also, although I have only twice or thrice heard this mooted, there certainly is a feeling that, grand as the passages are, they have lost immeasurably by translation. That could they but be read, with full comprehension, in the original their splendour would be beyond all ordinary thought.

But to return for a moment to the idea in the first paragraph of this article. Is not this clogging of the poetic foot, this hopeless congestion of the mental faculties forbidding their expressing what they feel, rather the rule than the exception everywhere, and not merely at sea? Is the spectacle of the man who knows too much and is consequently unable to make profitable use of his knowledge a rare one? I think not, and yet how sad a sight it is. The faculty of clear expression of thought seems to be one of the rarest, even in prose. Perhaps that is why, as if in despair, certain writers who revel in obscurity, whose meaning or meanings (for there are usually several alternatives) are apparently hidden from even themselves, are elevated to such an exalted plane by critics of eminence. These gentlemen, finding doubtless a mental intellectual exercise of the highest stimulating properties in elucidating the dark sayings of their favourites, proclaim aloud to a wondering world that in these literary mazes are alone to be found the true prophetic and informing messages for mankind.

And yet all the great masterpieces of prose and poetry are distinguished by clarity of expression, simplicity of diction. That is, if by masterpieces we understand those works that have gone down deepest into the hearts of the greatest multitude of people. Fords that a babe can wade, depths in which a mammoth may disport himself are these massive works of the giants of literature. In them the sailor luxuriates, pointing their beauties out to his shipmates in quaint language, and bemoaning his inability to go and deal likewise with the glories amidst which he lives and moves and has his being.

There is one poet, however, over whose claim to the proud title there is much controversy among experts, who does certainly come nearer to satisfying the primitive needs of the sailor in the matter of adequate sea-expression than either of the three first mentioned. And yet he is placed in a class by himself—he does not appear to claim precedence to the sailor's mind among other poets. Really I think that sailors are apt to claim Rudyard Kipling as one of themselves—I know for a fact that any sailor five minutes in his company will find his tongue wagging freely in familiar nautical jargon and will never dream of stopping to explain. Yet Kipling is no seaman. He has never spent the long, long hours of the night watches on board of a sailing ship in a stark calm, or with all sail furled but the barest scrap of canvas, in the grip of a howling gale, far out of the track of most shipping. And this not for one or two days but for all the best years of a man's life. So that occasionally even he makes mistakes, detected at once by the keen sensitiveness of the sailor, but looked upon most indulgently in his case because of the general accuracy of his knowledge and the intense sympathy with his subject manifested in all he does. That savage, brutal energy so apparent in his verse appeals powerfully to the sailor. It is of the sea, it rings true, as truly as does his much maligned rhyme of the engine-room to the practical, inaudible engineer.

But some may ask, "What about ballad poetry? Do not the stirring lyrics of Dibdin, Russell, Alan Cunningham, and Barry Cornwall appeal to the sailor? Did not the first named touch the sailor's heart in the days when a British Government found it worth their while to subsidize him for the way in which his stirring songs brought men into the Navy?" The best answer to that must be found in the fact that, whether you go into the fore-castle of a merchantman or on to the lower deck of a man-of-war when singing is going on, the songs that you will never hear are the old sea songs. Why is this? Because the sailor being intensely critical of everything he reads cannot away with the false fustian, the utterly unseamanlike jargon that these songs contain, and turns for relief to the latest music-hall inanity, which amuses him, at any rate.

High appreciation of the splendid deeds of a bygone day such as that of Mr. Henry Newbolt's "Admirals All," massive, spirit-stirring, and historically true, can and does appeal to the men in the Navy; but, after all, these fine poems deal with the warlike doings of men almost exclusively, and only by the subtlest of touches is the wide salt atmosphere of the ancient yet ever youthful sea conveyed. Over the heads of the hardly bestead merchant seamen these poems glide forcelessly. A rugged chantey like the "Ballad of the Bolivar," with all its merciless over-emphasis, its savagery, its Berserker bitterness, finds their hearts' core at once. Reading it or hearing it they feel the brine scorching their sea-split hands and feet, they hear the hiss of the curling wave-summit as it threatens to overwhelm their ungainly craft, the broken groans of the tortured engines beneath their feet grind upon their soul-strings, and they see reflected in each other's faces the fundamental fact of the imminence of death. ≡

hesitatingly give the pre-eminent position to such men as can by their primitive, rugged words, full of the elemental power that is characteristic of the ocean, strike more directly at the sailor's heart. What does it matter if occasionally there be to the sensitive ear of the highly-educated critic a jarring note? May it not be that he whose life is being passed in the careful balancing of measured language, who has all the literary artist's delight in the coruscations of faceted words, may not understand the need there is for direct, primitive, forceful expression of so mighty a chorus of voices as those of the immemorial sea? The sailor feels always, although in almost every case he lacks utterly the ability to interpret his feelings by the spoken word, that the strong wine of his life is apt to lose its headiness, its savour, when presented in a chased and jewelled goblet whose very glitter makes him fear to take it in hand; feels, too, if I may use a coarse simile, very much like the dog in the manger because he himself cannot deliver his soul of its depth of experimental knowledge, because, while the innermost chords of his being vibrate fiercely as the song of the sea sweeps against them, he has no power to tune them so that those who are without shall be able to hear and understand; therefore no mere dilettante landmen, no petty amateur looking upon the sea from the comfortable height of the promenade deck, ought to be credited with the ability to interpret those sensations which the sailor has insensibly grown to regard as almost too sacred for expression.

The time is fully ripe for the advent of the sailor poet and the marine engineer poet. Whether they write in terms of rhyme or no I care not. A virgin field awaits them, a noble inheritance maturing for ages. They can, if they come, utterly refute the false and foolish prattle of the arm-chair philosophers, and prove triumphantly that, so far from the romance and poetry of the sea being dead, it has hardly yet been given any adequate expression whatever.

WINDOWS.

The "machinery" of literature—that is, the artificial means which writers use to develop their creations—shows an entirely opposite tendency to the machinery of science. The latter is multiplying in manifold extensions and in extravagant complexities of parts; the former is putting aside the clumsy mechanisms on which it relied in the past, and working its effects by means of devices so simple as to be almost elemental. In old times there were needed, for the revelation of a soul, termless and devastating wars, the murder of kings, or enormous conflicts between heaven and hell; to-day the tragedies of human destiny rest in the banging of a door or the cracking of the finger-joints. Hence the importance of the trivial, rather injudiciously exploited by Dickens; hence the significance of the commonest objects. The hissing of the kettle is more fraught with fate than the crash of the thunderstorm—the happiness of lovers hangs upon the loss of a snuff-box.

Indications are not wanting that this changed attitude towards "machinery," this rejection of the ancient complicated engines of romance in favour of slighter and defter inventions, will cause a revolution in literary methods. But we are at present in the period of experiment; few as yet consciously try to achieve their results with these simpler tools. To illustrate what has already been done in this direction, and to point to the unexplored prospect that the practice suggests, we may take some examples of the use of the window as "machinery."

The window creates a fixed point in the flux of human life. In the streets we are merged in a multitude; to take up a separate attitude—to assert our personality—demands a strenuous effort of will. But at a window we are aloof—withdrawn—spectators of a drama that becomes more intense by its continued repetition. In tales that concern themselves with prisoners the window is so vital a factor that it can hardly be included at all in the category of "machinery." In "The Knight's Tale," in the "King's Quhair," the window is the pith, not the frame-work. These windows and their like are the windows of Romance; they become the windows of Tragedy when it is the woman that is captive. The whole Tragedy of Weariness is played out before the casements of the Moated Grange, which day after day look upon the same pale, changeless landscape. The window facing the East in "The Statue and the Bust" knows the Tragedy of Frustration; it is the "Loop of hell whence a damned soul looks upon Paradise." But the best use of the window as a centre where the threads of life congregate is to be found in the story of the "Lady of Shallot." The web of many colours that she weaves signifies the web of human destiny; over her mirror flits without ceasing the many-coloured pageantry of life. The moral of this old legend is the danger of what we may call "Window Philosophy"—the philosophy that regards life remotely, as a spectacle, without daring its trials and its fires. The lady has always lived among shadows of her own creation, and the first breath of vital emotion kills her. But the standpoint of the spectator is not incompatible with the keenest sympathy. This is demonstrated by such writings in poetry as "Casa Guidi Windows," and in prose as "The Window in Thrums." In both the window may be regarded as "machinery" to concentrate into manageable compass, in the one case the infinite and conflicting movements of Italy towards reconstruction, and in the other the myriad motives and characters of an obscure Scotch village.

The window in its more poetic employment belongs to a different class of ideas. Mechanical devices belong to the lower levels of literature; if lifted higher they become spiritualized into something different. The windows from which Keats looks out on the fragile and haunting melancholy of fairyland undergo this exquisite transfiguration:—

Magic casements opening on the foam
Of perilous seas in faery lands forlorn.

One of the most delicate idealizations in poetry is Keats' window of stained glass, through which the wintry moon is shining:—

Rose-bloom fell on her hands together pressed,
And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
And on her hair a glory like a saint. . . .

There is more fervour of imagination, though less perfection of workmanship, in Matthew Arnold's great western window in the church of Brou.

The dramatic possibilities of the window are portrayed with marvellous fulness by two modern writers, who in every other respect differ radically—Robert Browning and Maurice Maeterlinck. Not only is the use of the window frequent in both of them, but each has actually written a little tragedy relying for sole machinery upon a window. One of the scenes of Browning's "Pippa Passes" is laid within doors, and the world outside only exists for purposes of contrast. The importance of the window is emphasized at the outset, when Ottima draws Sebald's attention to "This blood-red beam through the shutter's chink." She bids him push the lattice behind the frame, and in her nervous allusions to trivialities we see how even her unscrupulous soul is overwrought:—

Sebald
It shakes the dust down on me. Why, of course
The Side-bolt catches. . . .

The window had been no slight factor in the development of Sebald's passion. "Ever your house was I remember shut till midday," he says, and he tells how, strolling through the valley, he observed and how the peasants laughed, and said, "The old man sleeps with his young wife." The effect of the pure morning landscape upon the guilty pair is carefully delineated. To Sebald it is a night with a sun added. "Where's dew?—Where's freshness?" he asks, until Ottima, in impatience, is constrained to ask him to close the lattice. Yet still the outer world, so carelessly observed by the lovers, helps in the development of the drama. Then we have a novel and pathetic use of the machinery of the window:—

Rough white wood shutters, rusty iron bars, Silent as death, blind in a flood of light. . . .

This dusty pane might serve as looking-glass,
Three, four—four grey hairs. . . .

says Ottima. At last the tragedy culminates in the voice of Pippa, brought on a waft of pure air through the closed casement. One other interior of Browning's must be mentioned with its hopelessness of a different dawn upon Paracelsus and Festus. In these instances the window gives the point of view from within; Browning has given us a window from without that serves as frame-work for one of the finest pictures in the gallery of literature:—

There at the window stood
Framed in its black square length with lamp in hand
Pompilia; the same great grave grief-ful air
As stands in the dusk, on altar that I know
Our Lady of all the Sorrows. . . .

The window from without, bright with firelight, glowing with an atmosphere of warmth and comfort, is one of the commonest devices in fiction to point a somewhat obvious contrast, and the lamp in the window is over and over again a symbol of forgiveness, as in the story of Ib and Little Christina. One might have thought that the machinery of the lighted window had exhausted its powers; but Maeterlinck has known how to revive them with a startling originality and pathos, and henceforward we may never look from without upon a happy "Interior" and not feel the pang of his tragedy at our hearts. It is night when the scene opens. Behind the window in the lighted room we see the members of a family employed in their several occupations; an atmosphere of perfect joy and peace encircles the illumined group. Watching them from outside, harrowed by the sight of the happiness they must destroy, are the bearers of dreadful news—the news of a daughter who has drowned herself. Never has the pitifulness of unconsciousness been shown more simply; seldom has the drama surprised so poignant a tragedy in the germ. This is surely the last word in the machinery of the window. But the window in "Pelleas and Melisande" also subserves one of Maeterlinck's most wonderful inventions. Not, however, in the scene between Pelleas and Melisande, where she lets down her hair out of the casement. This scene is charmingly written, but there are many parallels to it, both in fairy tale and folklore; fair ladies have loved to lean out of windows and to bend over balconies from the time of Juliet to the time of Roxane. But when Golaud lifts up his little son to peer through the window at Pelleas and Melisande, then, in the fierce anguish of the man, in the irrelevant and broken prattle of the child, in the supreme necessity for silence, occurs a moment of emotional intensity hardly equalled in literature.

The more we think of the window as "machinery," the more exhaustless its possibilities become. It is not merely the symbol of intercourse in separation—as at a convent grating; it is also used as a hieroglyphic for the most agonizing griefs. In the raising or lowering of a blind, the opening or closing of a shutter, lies the whole difference between life and death. To this significance of the window there are but few allusions in literature. There is opportunity here for both poetry and drama; but allegory has given us its final pronouncement of beauty upon this subject in the words of Ecclesiastes:—

"And the grinders cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows are darkened."

ETHEL WHEELER.

OLD GREEK SONG.

A feeling of profound melancholy creeps over us as we lay down such a book as GREEK MELIC POETS, by Professor Herbert Weir Smyth (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.), to think what we have lost. Here are things of imperishable beauty, of incomparable charm; but, with two exceptions, Pindar and Bacchylides, all scraps and fragments preserved by the merest chance, parts it may be of a schoolboy's exercise, or quoted by the old Sophister of Suppers because they contained the name of a fish or a dish; a line, a stanza—one glimpse and the vision vanishes, to leave us thirsting like Tantalus himself. What a rich variety of style and theme, of tone and temper these fragments reveal in the ancient lyrics of Greece! From the exuberant magnificence and moral grandeur of Pindar, to the smooth correctness and even flow of Bacchylides; Alcman, the amiable, beside the fierce uncompromising Alcæus; Stesichorus and his solemn dignity; Anacreon, with his dainty and delicate wit; Simonides bringing the gift of tears, Sappho her consuming flame of passion. And others there are, once famous in their own day, represented for us by an indeterminate scrap or two, which make us think of Ozymandias, King of Kings, alone in the waste and desert sands.

A few echoes of these lost voices may still be heard in Catullus or Horace, but the charm of a Greek lyric is untranslatable. For English poets, the chief debt they owe to the Greeks is inspiration. The glory of a Pindaric ode is unattainable in English; yet a Milton or a Dryden may see there a model which will nerve them to more strenuous efforts, not in direct imitation, but on a parallel line. One exception must be made, however, since there is something more intimate than this between Anacreon, or rather the later imitations of Anacreon, and Herrick. We owe to the pseudo-Anacreon that charming lyric:—

One silent night of late
When every creature rested,
Came one unto my gate,
And knocking, me molested.

We owe, perhaps, the hint of many other of Herrick's pieces to a similar source; and the same may be said of some Elizabethan ditties of love and wine, although the greater part of them are clearly native to the soil. Parallels of thought and expression are common enough, and one of the most interesting features in the book before us is the quotation of such parallels. There is a winter scene in Alcæus which is appropriately headed "When Icicles Hang by the Wall," ὕει μὲν ὁ Ζεὺς, ἐκ δ' ὀρέων μέγας,

Χείμων, πεπάγασιν δ' ὑδάτων ῥόαι, &c.

It may be roughly rendered thus:—

Down pour the showers: a mighty tempest lowers,
The running rills are frozen. . . .
Then lay the storm: light fires to keep you warm,
Mix honeyed wine, and spare not,
Of softest wool you set a cushion full,
To rest your brow, and care not.

This the editor compares with Campion's "Winter Nights":—

When winter nights enlarge
The number of their hours,
And clouds their storms discharge
Upon the airy towers;
Let now the chimneys blaze,
And cups o'erflow with wine,
And well-tun'd words amaze
With harmony divine.

Sappho's verse on the splendours of the rising moon—

See the bright radiance of the stars, how soon
They hide it at the rising of the moon:
When her round orb is fullest, and the rays
Lighten the world's dark ways —finds a more distant echo in Wotton's Elizabeth of Bohemia, and in Milton, who says of the moon in lines often quoted—

At whose sight all the stars
Hide their diminished heads.

There is something of the simple pathos of the folk-song or ballad in a maiden's lament which survives in a tantalizing scrap of verse:—

Sweet mother mine, my strength is gone,
I can ply the loom no longer;
By Aphrodite I'm undone,
And love has proved the stronger.

So, in the English ballad:—

O mother, put the wheel away,
I cannot spin to-night;
O mother, take the wheel away,
And put it out of sight.

No less close are the parallels between the specimens of the Greek folk-song proper, the Greek nursery rhymes and riddles, and those we learnt in the nursery. One such has a particular interest in having survived into modern Greek. The Rhodian Swallow-Song preserved by Athenæus—

The swallow, the swallow—hoot, dinna ye see her,
Black i' the back and white i' the wame!
Blithe days are to follow, blithe weather comes wi' her, must be regarded as the direct ancestor of a song from Thessaly, of which we give an English version below. The translation of the song in Athenæus is from Mr. W. H. D. Rouse's ECHO or GREEK SONG (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.), wherein may be found some hundred and fifty dainty little flowers of verse raised most of them from seeds first sown (in celebration of "the love of man, wine, tears, and laughter," in the garden of the Greek anthology. Mr. Rouse has entered con amore into the sentiments of his "sweet singers of an olden day." His scholarship is of a kind which bears pleasant fruit; his versification always grateful and sometimes elegant. To illustrate Mr. Rouse's success in capturing the elusive spirit and the flavour of his originals, take this from "Philodemus":—

Little nut-brown maid,
Curling parsley-head,
Skin as soft as down—
My Philænon!
O the witchery
Of that voice of thee!
Ever kind and fain—
Asking naught again!
Love her, love I will (Golden Cypris!) still,
Or until I find
One more to my mind.

Placed directly under the heading "Humorous and Convivial" it is rather startling to encounter this:—

Tarsian Dionysius, I Buried here at sixty lie;
Never a chick or child I got.
Would my father too had not.

The game-rhymes have often quite a modern ring. The game

Torti-tortoise, what are you doing there?

recalls "Baa, baa, black sheep"; there was also a versicle for Blind Man's Buff—

I'll go hunt for a brazen fly;
You'll never catch him, however you try.

The lost lyrics of Greece recall to the mind how the world has also lost an art which was once closely associated with song—the art of dancing. We know that Greek choral odes were inseparable from their own proper music and dance, which were devised by the poet to suit his subject ; but beyond that we know little indeed. The Greeks were keenly sensitive to this form of art, and carried it to a high perfection. The dance might be symbolic, its chief beauty being its rhythm, which varied, of course, according as the subject of the song was solemn or gay, martial or amatory ; but it might also mimic or interpret a story. Religious dances sometimes showed forth the legends of a god, such as the adventures of Dionysus ; and readers of Xenophon will remember how Niceratus enlivened his banquet with similar scenes. The last was frankly imitative.

Ariadne came in [he says] arrayed as a bride, and sat upon the seat ; before Dionysus appeared, the flötist played the Bacchic rhythm. Then they had cause to admire the man who had trained these dancers ; for no sooner had Ariadne caught the sound, than she so acted that every one saw she was glad to hear it ; meet him she did not, indeed, nor get up, but clear it was she could scarce keep still. And when Dionysus caught sight of her, he danced up in the most loving way that could be, and, falling upon his knees, cast his arms about her, and kissed her. And she appeared to be shy, yet embraced him also lovingly on her part.

So the scene goes on, amid the applause of the company ; it is mimicry, but also it is recognized for a dance. Weddings, too, had their appropriate dances, and, doubtless, funerals, both of which have left their traces in Greek lands. All this should properly be regarded as part of a language of gesture, which was capable of expressing thought as well as of mimicking action. The traveller may still see in Greece plays acted in mimicry, without words, in which conventional gestures are used to express recurring thoughts. Many of these are unintelligible to strangers, but the audience appear to know perfectly what it all means. An attempt was made some little time ago to translate Greek legends into the language of dance by Miss Isadora Duncan, in her performance at the New Gallery. Miss Duncan dramatized the story of Persephone in a dance of great spirit and grace, and afterwards made similar attempts to interpret idylls from Moschus and Theocritus, and Bion's "Lament for Adonis." Great things might be done by a dancer of genius on these lines, though it is perhaps too much to hope that the popular ballet will ever lose its vulgarity.

THE FIRST SWALLOW.

(Modern Greek Folk-Song.)

See the swallow, see the swallow !
 Flocks of honey-singers follow !
 She has found a perch to sing,
 Hark, how sweet her twittering !
 March, good March, I call to thee,
 And to horrid February ;
 Roast us, dry us, toast us, fry us—
 Summer's scent is wafted by us :
 All your blowing, all your snowing,
 Cannot keep spring flowers from growing.
 Goodwife, to the larder haste,
 Give us partridge eggs to taste,
 And the birds of lenten fast :
 Bring us forth a tender chicken,
 And a cake from out your kitchen.
 In the village, in the cottage,
 Where we now have made our stoppage,
 Health and wealth and happiness
 Goodman and goodwife shall bless,
 Children all, and parents, too,
 And whoso is kin to you.
 March is in—out fleas, retreat you !
 Foes avaunt—the dogs shall eat you !
 Friends and plenty hither hurry,
 Playing, dancing, making merry !
 All to-day, and all to-morrow,
 And a hundred years to follow.

AN IMPERIAL PROGRESS.

Now that the Russian in China is engaging the attention of the civilized world a good deal of entertainment and some instruction may be derived from the perusal of a very curious work, of which the second volume appeared last winter, called "Travels in the East of Nicholas II., Emperor of Russia, when Cesarewitch, 1890-1891" (Constable, £2 12s. 6d. n.). It is "written by order of his Imperial Majesty by Prince E. Oukhtomsky, and translated by Robert Goodlet," and is edited by Sir George Birdwood—an immense and marvellous book, impossible to read, delightful to turn over, exquisitely produced, shockingly edited, belated in its appearance (especially of Vol. II. which follows Vol. I. after four years' interval), and unique in style. Except as a picture-book, we cannot conceive any private person investing in two such ponderous and (salvâ reverentiâ) preposterous volumes. The illustrations are incontestably superb. M. Kazagine has done his work with remarkable skill, and the engravers and printers have done full justice to his drawings. From Olympia—where "His Imperial Highness approaches the ruined abode of the supreme heathen divinity," a suitable beginning to the sublime tour of the son of the apotheotized White Tsar—by way of Athens ("the Mayor of the Piræus was there to greet the sons of the Tsar") to Egypt, India, Ceylon, Java, Siam, China, and Japan, these splendid illustrations map out the triumphant course of the Cesarewitch, whether as the "first-born son entrusted to the treacherous element" or the Imperial Grand Duke risking his precious life in an "Imperial equipage." As a picture-book it is superb—worth every rouble of its price.

As a literary composition it is scarcely less noteworthy. To the reader of humorous fancy it will prove a second "Innocents Abroad." The Worthy Prince who was honoured by the Imperial Order—all in capitals—to be the historiographer imperial of this eventful journey seems to live in a perpetual perspiration of loyal enthusiasm. He delights in telling us how their Imperial Highnesses the Grand Dukes condescended to partake of dinner, and how wherever they went the "sons of the White Tsar" were welcomed with the "deafening roar of guns," with "countless salutes," and the "incontrollable rejoicings" of various Oriental crowds who probably had not the faintest idea what they were rejoicing at. "Their Imperial Highnesses honour with their presence the house of a native" at Thebes : "it can be imagined with what rejoicings this great honour was received." We all know Vice-Consul Mustafa's hospitable "Arab Dinner," but we do not usually make this comment : "While awaiting the dinner nothing characteristic calling for notice is to be seen," nor do we find it needful to expatiate in detail on the trite inconveniences of eating with our fingers. But here nothing is too common to be recorded. We are taken to Matariya, where "the Grand Dukes gaze in silence at the withered tree" of the Virgin, and we are borne home, solemnly impressed, when "their Highnesses drive back to the station." Wherever we go the same amazing experiences await us. "The equipage of the Imperial and Royal travellers comes to a stop," as if by some divine decree, and "the crowd bows," "the ladies wave their handkerchiefs." Everything combines to exalt the most trifling incidents to the height of wondrous majesty. Even when "His Holiness the Patriarch offered up the prayer for long life for the Empress, the Khedive despatched a congratulatory telegram"—to the same address, we presume, as the prayer. When the Cesarewitch climbed the Great Pyramid, the effect was stupendous : "Overhead a series of gigantic blocks rise up into the azure sky—one more massive and stately than the other. They all seem to be drawn upwards to that summit which unites the separate points, merges them into a harmonious whole, moulds the structure into a semblance of the cosmic combination of forces, whose sovereign is the highest and most mysterious principle. One's temples throb." They do, indeed—after an attentive perusal of as many pages of this exhausting ecstasy as a mere mortal, who is not a subject of the White Tsar, may survive. There is no end to this gush of sentiment. Prince Oukhtomsky is everlastingly on the simmer. The wonder and condescension of "their Imperial and Royal Highnesses" in making a very pleasant tour in the East are almost beyond the power of words to describe. The book is one gigantic apostrophe, a colossal, Imperial mark of admiration, from "the awful parting at Gatchina" to the day of return when "the Emperor looks kindly into the windows of the carriages. Near him we see the face of the Empress, full of emotion. The doors open, the journey is done. There are moments which can never, never be forgotten!"

To Englishmen all this sounds absurdly sentimental, and the funkeyism of the perpetual kotow to their Imperial Highnesses is offensive to our taste. But one has to remember that this is a book written in Russian by a Russian for Russians, and this makes all the difference. The almost abject deference of its tone in translation is perfectly sincere and natural in the original. It is the normal attitude of the loyal Russian to his "little father." Regarded as a manifestation of national sentiment the book has an interest of its own. And as a revelation of Russian character it is extremely curious. The naive childlike admiration and astonishment displayed at sights and customs which are commonplace of travel, the delight in novelties which one thought ancient history, the innocent citing of well-worn history or legend as though it were something fresh, the crude platitudinous reflections—all these show the true Russian, the infant Hercules of Europe, whose culture is still in the cradle. But beside this curious childlike outlook upon the East—curious especially because after all the Russian is the elementary Oriental—there is a freshness of fancy, a faculty of associating imagination, and a sympathy with what is dead or dying and in any case wholly unmodern, which are all qualities not to be observed in the usual Western traveller. One may laugh at the many absurdities of the writer, but one must also recognize, across his turgid metaphors and ecstatic "gush," his real gifts. A picture of the East by a Russian impressionist has its value.

It is merely a record of personal impressions, of course. No one would think of referring to the Tsar's "Travels" for pure information. We do not mean to say that the facts are often inaccurate; they are simply obvious and well known—the facts of the guide-book. Prince Oukhtomsky is painstaking and has read up his subjects. Sometimes, of course, he makes slips in trifles. The Khedive Tewfik was not the grandson, as he thinks, of Mohammed Ali, nor are Sekket, Fatimidi, El-Kalaoon, En-Nasr, Hatasoo, Phillipeion correctly spelled; "Yeddah" is not the name of the port of Mekka, and Seti I.'s alabaster sarcophagus was not carried away to Luxor but to London, where it reposes in Sir John Soane's Museum. The respected name of Sir George Birdwood appears on the title-page as editor, but except for some Indian notes we do not trace his skilful hand. In Egypt, for example, it was surely advisable to append some brief notes to warn readers that the remarks on the temple of Deir el-Bahri, or the limits of the Nile railway, are not up to the present date. And since there was an editor, we should like to ask him why there is no table of contents, as well as no index, no descriptive headlines, no names of places in the headings of the diary, and in fact no means (save the illustrations) of telling at a glance whereabouts in the world their Royal and Imperial Highnesses and attendant Princes have got to on any particular page. Considering the magnificent style in which the volumes are produced, such ordinary little apparatus should not have been omitted. The editor would not have been in order in supplying an antidote to the marked Anglophobia of the writer; but he must have been amused at such a statement as this, about Egypt of all places!—"The unfortunate natives were able to soo for themselves how fatal the progress of European influence and civilization might be to them." In India, in the same way, the valuable opinions of "a cultivated Mussulman journalist" on the impoverishment of the N.W.P., owing to "the excess of legality in the distribution of land," are quoted to prove the "sorry wind-up to the century which saw the triumph of European interference in the destinies of India." Prince Oukhtomsky's humour is generally of this unconscious kind. We have noted only one intentional joke: the story of the peasants who demanded baksheesh from the doctor who had been attending them gratuitously. Why? Because "we have been taking your physic many days!" This is even better than the alleged Chinese method with physicians.

GEORGE MURRAY SMITH.

Few of the guests at the brilliant luncheon which took place at the Mansion-house last June to celebrate the practical completion of the "Dictionary of National Biography" suspected that the proprietor of the great dictionary had less than a year to live. But Mr. George Murray Smith had suffered from a troublesome malady for some years, and, though he underwent a successful operation early in January, he began to sink rapidly after his removal to Weybridge towards the end of March, and died last Saturday in his 78th year. Mr. Smith had latterly taken to authorship, and his series of papers in the Cornhill, in which he told the story of his early experiences as a publisher, provided some of the best reading that has appeared in any of the magazines for a long time.

Although Mr. George Smith will be chiefly remembered as the founder of the great Dictionary yet the story of his early life and its record of energy and sagacity is full of interest. Sixty years ago the business of Smith, Elder, and Co. was carried on at 65, Cornhill, and consisted chiefly of an export trade to India and the Colonies, but with a small publishing connexion which occasionally involved a certain amount of enterprise. George Smith was about nineteen years old when he first came in touch with the book world. His father put him in charge of the publishing department, with the modest sum of £1,500 to deal with as he liked. "I stipulated that I was not to be questioned or interfered with in any way as to its use; with this sum I was to make what publishing ventures I pleased. Behold me then, a youth not yet twenty, searching the horizon for authors whose literary bantlings I might introduce to an admiring, and as I fondly hoped, purchasing world." He began well, with books by R. H. Horne ("New Spirit of the Age") and Leigh Hunt ("Imagination and Fancy"), and both proved very successful ventures. The introduction to the author of "Imagination and Fancy" was the foundation of a friendship with Leigh Hunt and the members of his family, which Mr. Smith said was very delightful to him. To win the friendship of an author, one well-known publisher has remarked, is the highest reward a publisher can have, and Mr. Smith had reason to be proud of his record in this respect. "The kindest man and the best gentleman I have had to deal with," wrote Sir John Millais, as he lay on his death-bed, deprived of the power of speech, but asking to see George Smith. Small wonder that such a publisher could win the confidence of so many distinguished men and women. "Authors and publishers," Charlotte Brontë once wrote in good-humoured reference to the very different relations which existed between herself and her publisher—"Authors and publishers are never expected to meet with any other than hostile feelings, and on shy and distant terms. They never ought to have to shake hands; they should just bow to each other and pass by on opposite sides—keeping several yards distance between them. And, besides, if obliged to communicate by post, they should limit what they have to say to concise notes of about three lines apiece." It is well-known how different was the association of author and publisher in the case of George Smith and the Brontës. Mr. Smith has himself told the story of the publication of "Jane Eyre," of the pilgrimage which Charlotte and her sister Anne made to Cornhill in order to prove their separate identity to the publishing firm, and of the deep personal friendship which existed between the Smith family and Charlotte Brontë during the remaining years of the novelist's life.

Mr. Smith to a large extent had taken over the general management of the complicated business of Smith, Elder, and Co. three or four years before "Jane Eyre" was published. His father died in 1846; Mr. Elder had already retired, and his successor proved so unsatisfactory that the new partnership had to be dissolved; and to add to his difficulties Mr. Smith had reasons for anxiety as to the financial position of the firm. "The situation," he tells us in his reminiscences, "was one to bring out whatever there was in me, and I worked with all the intensity and zeal of which I was capable." Indomitable energy, resourcefulness, and business instinct won the day, and it was not long before young Smith had placed the affairs of the firm on a safer footing. At that time Mr. Smith Williams became his literary assistant and general manager of the publishing department, and Mr. Williams remained with him until advancing years forced him to retire. It was during the forties that Smith, Elder, and Co. published Ruskin's "Modern Painters," "Seven Lamps of Architecture," and "Stones of Venice," and the firm issued most of Ruskin's works until the early seventies, when Mr. George Allen became his publisher. The founding of the Cornhill Magazine, in 1859, was the outcome of Mr. Smith's relations with Thackeray, whose "Esmond," "The Kickleburys on the Rhine," "The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century," and "The Rose and the Ring" he had previously published. "The existing magazines were few, and when not high-priced were narrow in literary range, and it seemed to me that a shilling magazine which contained, in addition to other first-class literary matter, a serial novel by Thackeray must command a big sale." Thackeray accepted the editorship for a salary of £1,000 a year, but the success of the magazine was so remarkable, so far beyond all expectations, that Mr. Smith, with characteristic generosity, immediately insisted on doubling the payment. The success was well deserved. The publisher's liberality enabled Thackeray to bring together a brilliant band of contributors—artists as well as authors, for the magazine was illustrated—the first year's list including such names as those of Tennyson, Mrs. Gaskell, Matthew Arnold, Lord Lytton, Ruskin, Anthony Trollope, Tom Hood, Charles Lever, Frederick Locker, G. H. Lewes, George Augustus Sala, Herman Merivale, Mrs. Browning, George MacDonald, and Miss Thackeray. Mr. Smith has mentioned that the largest amount expended on the literature of a single number of the magazine was £1,183 3s. 8d. (August, 1862), and that the total expenditure under that head for the first four years was £32,280 11s., the illustrations costing in addition £4,376 11s. The largest payment made for a novel was £7,000 to George Eliot for "Romola"; the largest payment for short articles was twelve guineas a page to Thackeray for his "Roundabout Papers." The Cornhill had not been running many years before Mr. Smith scored another success by starting the Pall Mall Gazette, with Mr. Frederick Greenwood as its first editor. This was in 1865, and he remained at the head of affairs until 1880, when he made the paper over to his son-in-law, Mr. Henry Yates Thompson.

The publishing business of Mr. Smith's firm had meantime been removed to its present headquarters in Waterloo-place, and it was here that Mr. Smith began to publish Robert Browning's poems, Matthew Arnold's prose works, and the books written by the late Queen Victoria, or compiled under her Majesty's direction. It was here, too, that he conceived the crowning work of his life, the "Dictionary of National Biography." The facts and figures relating to this monumental undertaking—an enterprise which cost Mr. Smith many thousands of pounds but earned for him a nation's thanks—are so familiar that we need not recapitulate them. It was sufficient to Mr. Smith to know that he had done what Mr. Morley described at the Lord Mayor's luncheon as "an act of good citizenship," and supplied a real need in English literature.

During the last few years one of Mr. Smith's sons-in-law, Mr. Reginald J. Smith, K.C., has been associated with the firm, and in this connexion it is interesting to recall a paper on "The Work of a Publisher," which the younger partner read at the International Congress of Publishers, held in London in the summer of 1899.

Having only been a publisher for a short time [said Mr. Reginald Smith in the course of his address] I may in all modesty lay claim to two qualifications for saying my say. First, I have been trained in a liberal school of outside thought, sitting for some seven years at the feet of a man, the present Lord Chief Justice of England, with whom the one unpardonable sin was failure to reach the heart of a subject, neglect to probe things to the very bottom, and in whose chambers one not only saw the working of a mind of great calibre, but one also gained a varied experience in the tangled skeins of worldly affairs. Law has been humorously defined to be the poetry of business, and perhaps publishing may be called the business of literature. Secondly, if there be any truth in my words, you will please ascribe it to the counsels of one who has truly fathered me in a new calling, who, after more than half a century of a varied and an honoured career in business, is now the doyen of English publishers, having earned if any one has the encomium passed by Dr. Johnson on the man who has enhanced the pecuniary prizes of English literature. To the ripe experience of my father-in-law, Mr. George Smith, and the lessons which I have learned from him are due any possible merit in what I have to say; in the demerits and mistakes he has neither part nor lot.

A NEW DOCUMENT RELATING TO VINCENZO FOPPA.

Two new documents have recently been discovered in the State Archives at Milan which will be of interest to art-historians, as they throw a ray of fresh light upon the history of that important, but little-known, painter, Vincenzo Foppa. Documents of this kind, which, unfortunately, tell us nothing about the master's work, have only a relative value; their interest in this case lies in the fact that they afford further proof of Foppa's connexion with Brescia and serve to disprove some erroneous views respecting his marriage. They also give us one or two fresh clues which, if followed up carefully, might lead to a further elucidation of his history; for there can be no doubt that much still lies buried in Italian archives which would add considerably to our knowledge of his life and work in Lombardy and Liguria.

The first of the two documents is a petition addressed by Foppa to the Duke of Milan, demanding of Bartholomeo de Caylina the conveyance to him of a house which Bartholomeo's mother, Catherine de Bolis, had made over to Foppa. As is usual with petitions of this description, it bears neither date nor signature, but the officer of the Milanese Chancery whose duty it was to hand it in noted upon it the day on which he consigned it—July 19, 1481—and added a memorandum to the effect that it was to be sent on to the Podestà of Pavia. It is as follows:—

O most Illustrious and most Excellent—

Dame Catherine de Bolis of Cremona formerly made a deed of gift, operative during her lifetime, to your most faithful servant Vincentius de Fopa, painter, and citizen of Milan, her son-in-law, of one house lying in the street of St. Agatha in the city of Brescia, charged as follows, to wit, that he should therefore be bound and obliged to maintain the said dame Catherine for the whole term of her life, and also to maintain a certain granddaughter (Ablatica)* of hers until she is of marriageable age, and afterwards to give her in marriage at his own costs; and with the further charge of giving to Bartholomeo de Caylina, son of the said dame Catherine, certain moneys as his inheritance; and, although the said Bartholomeo voluntarily bound himself to the said gift, and has freely had from him certain moneys, as part of his inheritance, and has confirmed and approved the said gift as by public instrument appears; nevertheless he has taken no steps to "contravene" and to carry out the aforesaid alienation of the said house and so (has involved) him (the Petitioner) in dispute and contention, contrary to the effect, provision, and satisfaction made by the said dame Catherine; and (your Petitioner) desiring to avoid disputes to the utmost of his power, Prays that, after consideration of these circumstances, you will deign to write to the Podestà of Pavia aforesaid and instruct him, on inspection of the instruments abovesaid, to compel the said Bartholomew to the observance and execution of the promise and ratification by him made as above, removing all demurs, as it should be, and he himself (the Petitioner) will acknowledge to the said persons whatsoever he is bound and obliged to do according to the form of the said deed of gift, proceeding simply summarily and plainly, without bustle or form of judgment, and without suit at law, without regard to days. Otherwise he (your Petitioner) will remain defrauded and supplanted (which he does not believe will be the case) although the attempt has been made.*

From the second document we learn that on the same day—July 19, 1481—the Duke wrote to the authorities at Pavia, enclosing the Petition and commanding them to force Bartolommeo to carry out his contract, if it should appear that he did actually consent to the deed of gift as set forth. This document is also in the State Archives at Milan among the Missive Ducali (Registro 154 a Carte 105, Busta 90).

The late Don Pietro Moiraghi, one of the most recent, though he can scarcely be called one of the most trustworthy writers on Foppa, asserted that the painter married in 1465 a lady of Pavia (1). He produced no document in support of this statement, but quoted Fenaroli and Calvi as his authorities; they, in turn, appear to have derived their information from Zamboni, who affirmed that in 1490 Foppa, who was then living at Brescia, had been obliged to return to Pavia on account of a lawsuit about a house there which had come to him as "the dowry or inheritance of his wife" (2). The latter statement seems, however, to have been a pure invention on the part of Zamboni; for, in the "Provisione del Consiglio Speciale" of the city of Brescia (August 30, 1491) (3), by which Foppa was granted leave of absence for one month to look after his affairs at Pavia, the allusion is merely to a house which he owned there. This house was probably the one bought by Foppa between 1467-68. On June 22, 1467, he writes to his patron at

Milan, Pigello Portinari (4), asking for his help in obtaining from the Duchess Bianca Maria permission to buy a house in Pavia, "as though he were a Pavian citizen." For though Foppa had for some time been living at Pavia, he had not acquired citizenship, and no strangers were permitted to buy property in the city (5). In the case of Foppa, the favoured painter of the late Duke Francesco Sforza, an exception was made, and six days after the receipt of the letter his request was granted (6). Having decided to make Pavia his home, he then sought to obtain the rights of citizenship, and this time applied directly to the Duke of Milan for a recommendation to the Podestà of Pavia. The Duke's letter, dated October 14, 1468, to the authorities at Pavia, in which he speaks in the highest terms of Foppa, was published by Moiraghi in 1897 (7). It seems incredible that this writer should, in 1898, again have repeated, and this time with great decision, the story of Foppa's marriage at Pavia in 1465, for the Duke's letter opens with these words:—"We have been informed that for the past twelve years Maestro Vincenzo da Foppa, painter, has resided continuously in this our city with his wife and children."

We must infer from this that in 1456 Foppa was living at Pavia with his wife and family, and from the document, now published we believe for the first time, it seems clear that she came of a Cremonese-Brescian family and had nothing to do with Pavia. We learn also that her mother, Caterina de Bolis, of Cremona, gave to Foppa, her son-in-law, a house in the Contrada S. Agata at Brescia, under conditions which he faithfully fulfilled, though his rights to it were disputed in later years by Bartolommeo de Caylina, the son of Caterina. Here then we have the name of Foppa's wife, a name frequently met with in Brescian documents of this date.

In the letter already referred to from Foppa to his patron, Pigello Portinari, the painter says, "I am sending this to you by Bartolommeo my brother-in-law." Moiraghi conjectured (8) that this brother-in-law was the Pavian Bartolommeo della Canonica who was employed with his brother Bertolino in the Certosa in 1465 the same year in which Foppa was also working there.* We have now ample proof that the said brother-in-law was Bartolommeo de Caylina. With regard to this family, we know that in 1471 Paolo de Caylina, a painter, received payment for works executed in the Loggetta of the Piazza Maggiore at Brescia (9). Was he identical with the painter Paolo, son of Pietro Calino, who in 1458 appears with Foppa in the house of Giacomo di Tibalderis of Mortara at Pavia (10)? If so, it is possible that in this Paolo we have another brother-in-law of Foppa, and in his father, Pietro, the husband of Caterina de Bolis. In the Turin Gallery there is a picture, signed Paulus Brixensis, and known to have been painted in 1458 for the church of S. Albino at Mortara. According to the catalogue of the Turin Gallery (11), this painter "is evidently the same as Paolo Calino" (12). This may be so, but it is absurd to imagine, as Azeglio, Fenaroli (13), and Moiraghi (14) have done (because of the similarity of the signature—Paulus Brixensis—with that of Foppa Vincencius Brixensis, in his signed work at Bergamo) that they could detect in it the style and even the hand of Foppa. Whether the two men were related or not, artistically there was no connexion between them. Paolo da Brescia's feeble picture at Turin has some affinity with early Venetian art, but shows not a trace of the influence of Foppa.

The question whether Foppa came originally from Brescia or from the neighbourhood of Pavia still remains unanswered. Moiraghi's assertion (15) that he came from the village of Foppa, which lies near Bascapè, halfway between Pavia and Melegnano, cannot be accepted as final. Moiraghi was for many years the parish priest of Bascapè, and had every opportunity of discovering all that was to be known of the painter at his supposed birthplace. But the records preserved there certainly furnished him with no proofs, for they date back no earlier than 1570—more than 100 years too late for the purpose of elucidating the history of Foppa's early life. The idea that he came from a place of the name of Foppa was first put forward by Campori (16), who published two documents relating to an otherwise unknown painter, Bartolommeo, the son of Giovanni da Foppa. Campori was followed by Crowe and Cavalcaselle (17) and by Moiraghi, both of whom positively affirmed that Vincenzo was born at Foppa. We know that his father was named Giovanni, but so far we have no proof that our painter, who in documents is variously called "Vincentius de Bressia," "de Fopa de Brisia," or simply "de Fopa," was of the same family as Bartolommeo "del fu Giovanni da Foppa del territorio di Milano," who is mentioned in Campori's documents. All that can be said is that the claims of Brescia are at least as strong as those of the village of Foppa.

THE DRAMA.

"NICANDRA."

In Nicandra, a "mystic farce" produced at the Avenue, Mr. Russell Vaun has had an ingenious idea, but has failed to develop it ingeniously. It is not in essence a new idea. In the playhouse there is no such thing as a new idea, and stories, like this one, of magic metamorphosis have always been popular there. But it starts, at any rate, as a good variant of an old idea. The old idea is the disruption of a peaceful household by a female visitor supernaturally introduced. (See Mr. Gilbert's Pygmalion and Galatea, Mr. Paulton's Niobe, &c., &c.) The novelty here is in the mode of introduction. A traveller returning from Egypt leaves his luggage at his brother's house in Lowndes-square. In the luggage is a snake, and the snake is no more a real snake than Artemus Ward's mongoose was a real mongoose. It is, in fact, a Priestess of Isis who, for an offence against the goddess, was condemned to assume her present form. In the Lowndes-square drawing-room the snake becomes a woman again, and straightway proceeds to set the household at sixes and sevens. Her procedure is very simple. She lures all the men to her feet and makes all the women (save one, a maiden protected by innocence against such spells) throw themselves at the heads of the (wrong) men. A staid matron ogles the butler, a young widow pursues the master of the house, whose nephew is adored by the housemaid, and so ad infinitum. All is riot and confusion, caresses bestowed where they are not wanted, jealousy rampant. The traveller returns, employs the counter-spell needed to turn the woman into a snake again, domestic peace once more reigns in Lowndes-square, and the farce is over. But it is not over quite so soon as one wishes. Before the fall of the curtain it begins to pall. Why?

In the first place, I suggest, because the author has not been at the pains to extract from the idea of the Egyptian snake-woman all that, as Sarecy would have said, it "comports." (1) She is not Ptolemaic. I mean that the incongruity between her ancient self and her modern surroundings is not exhibited. Import an Egyptian of 3,000 years ago (say) in a British middle-class household of to-day, and you ought to get at least some satiric criticism—out of her failure to comprehend. The classic examples of this truc in literature are the attitudes of Voltaire's Huron, Montesquieu's Persian, Goldsmith's Chinaman. Mr. Gilbert has "worked it for all it is worth" in the naïve surprise and shy questions of his Galatea. Mr. Vaun's Nicandra, it is true, calls the housemaid a "slave." Otherwise she gives no trace of her Egyptian origin, and accommodates herself to her new surroundings as though she were a contemporary Englishwoman. This is to throw away a chance. (2) For a creature of magic she is not weird enough. The people have only to open the window to escape from her power, for it seems that fresh air disarms her. If you bring supernatural "machinery" into your "fable" you ought to produce something more imposing than this. But her chief drawback is that (3) she is deficient in resource. The only mischief she can think of is that of Shakespeare's Puck—making the wrong couple fall in love. Now the amorous chassé-croisé of Helena and Hermia, Lysander and Demetrius, is pleasing because its scheme is poetry and beauty, and after all there is much more in the play. The similar business in Nicandra soon ceases to please because its scheme is prose and ugliness, and, moreover, it is all the play. It does at one moment seem to occur to Nicandra that she might complicate her mischief. She suggests forgery to one man, rash speculation to another—but the suggestions come to nothing, and we hark back to the old tune of love-madness.

Perhaps an even more serious defect than the meagreness of the snake-woman motif is the absence of anything like dramatic conflict. A struggle of wills is as necessary to farce as to any other species of the genus drama. Evidently there was an opening for such a struggle between Nicandra and the innocent maiden, the one member of the household immune against her spells. The author just suggests this and once more fails to work out his suggestion. . . . But why, it may be asked, pull a mere farce to pieces? Well, because farce-writing is an art like any other, and it is because so many people regard it merely as an industry that our farce-writers are tempted to scamp their work. Mr. Vaun is a new author, and apparently a young man. There is considerable promise in his Nicandra, and I therefore desire to pay him the compliment of taking him seriously. Apparently the present is a revised version of his work, which was originally produced a year or two ago at some suburban theatre. Miss Alma Stanley then played the snake-woman, I am told, and I can only say I wonder (respectfully) how she did it. Mrs. Brown-Potter now takes the part, a beautiful woman of the flamboyant, exotic type, as all playgoers know, but not an actress for all tastes. She glides stealthily, monotonously murmuring, through her part, in the fashion of a hypnotized "subject." The effect is certainly curious, but scarcely impressive. Whatever else a snake-woman does, she ought, I apprehend, to "make your flesh creep," but this one, somehow, doesn't.

A. B. WALKLEY.

A great sale of rare books, richly or quaintly bound, has just taken place in Paris—that of the collection of the late M. Guyot de Villeneuve, son-in-law of Count Montalivet—which attracted connoisseurs from all quarters of Europe. A set of Molière's works of the 1682 edition, one of the four known copies printed before the suppressions, fetched 13,700f.; a copy of "Les Sentiments de l'Académie Française sur la Tragi-Comédie du Cid," 1638, in 8vo., bound in red morocco by Le Gascon for Cardinal Richelieu, who is said to have inspired the work, which was directed by jealousy against Corneille, was knocked down at 9,420f.; a copy of the original edition of "Esther," with a dedication on the fly-leaf by Racine to Madame de Maintenon, bound in red morocco, with her arms, brought 7,500f.; a folio copy of Cervantes, the first edition published in French, with the arms of Louis XIV., 5,100f.; Molière's "Précieuses Ridicules," three 12mo. vols., 1660, 5,100f.; the poetical works of Louyse Labé, Lyonnaise, 1535, in antique binding, formerly in the Sunderland Library, 5,000f.; Ronsard's works, 1567, six quarto vols., 3,515f.; a copy of La Fontaine, 1665, bound in white vellum, 3,400f.; Rabelais' works, edition of 1556, bound in lemon-coloured morocco, with mosaics in blue morocco, by Curzin, 3,200f.; a unique copy of "Rymes de gentille et vertueuse dame D. Pernelle du Guillet," Lyonnaise, 1532, 3,000f.; Molière's "Sganarelle," 12mo., edition of 1660, bound by Curzin, 3,000f.; "La Nouvelle Héloïse," supposed to have been Rousseau's copy, which formerly belonged successively to the Duke of Marlborough and Bishop Reginald Heber, 1,780f.; "Le Tombeau de Marguerite de Valois," Paris, 1551, an 8vo. volume, said to have the widest margin known, nearly seven inches, 1,160f. The total proceeds of the sale were 390,947 francs.

M. SEIGNOBOS ON MODERN EUROPE.

Of all historical periods the age in which we live is that which it most concerns us to know. Unfortunately, there is none of which the world in general knows less, or which presents greater difficulties to the historian. The chief cause of this provoking dilemma, according to M. Seignobos, a translation from whose POLITICAL HISTORY OF CONTEMPORARY EUROPE SINCE 1814 is published by Mr. Heinemann (20s. n.), is the overwhelming abundance of material.

The rigorous historical method demands the direct study of the sources. Now the life of one man would not be long enough, I do not say to study or to criticize, but to read the official documents of even a single country of Europe. It is therefore impossible, in the nature of things, to write a contemporary history of Europe which shall conform to scientific principles. So the professional historians, judging their method to be inapplicable to the study of the 19th century, have abstained from dealing with this period. And so the reading public is ignorant of contemporary history because the learned have too copious means of learning it.

Glancing through M. Seignobos' lists of authorities, which indicate a formidable array of authors who have aspired to treat contemporary history in its various departments and special aspects, we are at some loss to know what class of writers he intends by "professional historians." As he expressly disclaims the title for himself, we conclude that he is only indulging in a dry jest at the expense of that fatiguing class of persons who insist that only those are entitled to be heard on any historical subject who have hopelessly muddled themselves, during many years, over "the original documents." In the same vein, M. Seignobos explains that his readers must not expect from him anything in the nature of erudite research or copious narrative, any discussion of particular facts subject to controversy, any descriptions, sketches of character, or anecdotes. They must understand that he is neither an eloquent historian nor a learned historian. Least of all is he an enthusiastic historian. Most historical writers are fired with a certain ardour, inspired partly by the supposed dignity and importance of the function they have assumed, partly by the political and social causes which have gained their sympathy, or provoke their indignation. Not so M. Seignobos. As for history, that has about as much claim, in its present state, to rank as a science as chemistry had in the days when all things were resolved into the "four elements," earth, air, fire, and water.

History is still so rudimentary a science—if a science it may be called—that it has no vocabulary of technical terms. To designate political phenomena, the historians have borrowed from the vocabulary of jurists and philosophers abstract terms which have now become part of the language of history. These terms have but vague notions to rest on, owing to our ignorance of the real nature of political phenomena; but they give the vagueness an appearance of technical precision.

In these depressing circumstances it is clearly impossible to work oneself up to any great degree of enthusiasm about history for its own sake. But the subject-matter of history—the struggles of classes for political enfranchisement and equal rights, of nations for independence, of secular interests to throw off the clerical yoke—all this is apt to inspire a degree of sympathy, and even fervour, which the historian, conscious that it disturbs the mental balance, may strive to suppress, but cannot wholly conceal. M. Seignobos confesses that he has a private leaning to certain principles. He prefers limited monarchy to despotism, has great faith in democracy, and is for resistance to clerical pretensions. But he has a conscience also, and believes that it has saved him from the temptation to distort or ignore anything because he finds it personally distasteful.

The object which M. Seignobos has aimed at, in his own modest phrase, is to write simply an explanatory history; to make his readers understand the essential phenomena of European political life in the 19th century by explaining the organization of nations, governments, and parties, the political questions which have from time to time arisen, and the solutions they have received. Especially, he has endeavoured to make as clear as possible the formation, tactics, and policies of parties, these being the capital facts determining the fate of institutions, and to show how local administration, the army, the Church, the schools, the Press, finance, political theories, and economic systems have been affected by political life and have reacted on it. But how are these multitudinous details to be intelligibly grouped in a single picture? After thinking the matter out, M. Seignobos found that there were three distinct ways of going to work. A writer may adopt the logical order, which consists in regarding Europe as a whole, and taking abstract national institutions—central government, defence, finance, justice, and so forth—separately and successively. Or he may choose the chronological order, dividing the century into periods, each leading up to the next, and marked by some predominant character of its own. Or, lastly, he may adopt the geographical order, dealing with each nation in turn. All these methods have their advantages, and M. Seignobos therefore decides to use them all in succession. In the first and longest section of the work he follows the geographical order, first giving a short description of the Continent as reconstituted by the territorial restorations of 1814. He then proceeds to the internal history of each State, beginning with the United Kingdom, which furnishes a model for political organization to all Europe. Next in order follows France, with her most advanced neighbours, the Netherlands and Switzerland; then Spain, Portugal, Italy, Germany, Austria, and the Scandinavian countries; finally he deals with Russia and the Ottoman group of States, which have retained longer than any others the political forms of the 18th century.

The twenty-one chapters including this first and most important part of the work occupy 670 closely-printed pages, or about four-fifths of the whole. M. Seignobos has executed this part of his task, which must have cost him immense labour, with admirable judgment and ability; and he has furnished us with a most valuable summary of the domestic history of each European State. It is difficult to single out any chapter; but the reader will naturally turn to the three which relate to France, and are entitled "The Monarchy of the Property (should it not be 'Propertied'?) Class" (1814-1848), "The Republic and the Democratic Empire" (1848-1871), and "The Parliamentary Republic." English people, who, with few exceptions, decline the trouble of understanding the political conditions of a country so near to their own, but so differently circumstanced, ought to read these chapters. M. Seignobos admits that at first sight the story of France during the past century seems an incoherent series of revolutions; "hence," he continues, "the general opinion of other countries that the French are capricious, and do not know what they want. Precisely the same was said of the English at the end of the 17th century." The comparison is a fair one; and in certain departments of national policy the same thing might have been truly said of the English not very many years before the end of the 19th century. Nothing is more exasperating to foreigners than a nation that does not know what it wants. Now that we have made up our minds, and that other nations know it, probably we shall all get on better together. In the second part of the work M. Seignobos treats of certain elements of progress and change which are common to all or most of the nations of Europe. He groups these under three heads—(1) transformation in the material conditions of political life through industrial inventions, new means of destruction in war, new methods of communication, increase in wealth and population, and changes of an economic nature; (2) the altered relation of the Churches, especially the Roman Church, to the State; (3) the growth and influence of international revolutionary parties, from the humble Carbonari of 1820 to the immense Socialist international organizations of our own day. The third and final section of the work gives a rapid but very able sketch of recent changes in the balance of power, and in the aims of national policy, and of the international controversies which have disturbed, or threatened to disturb, the peace of the European world. This subject M. Seignobos treats in four sections—"Europe under the Metternich system" (1815-1830); "rivalry between Russia and England" (1830-1854); "French preponderance and the Nationalist wars" (1854-1870); "German ascendancy and the armed peace," which has lasted to the present time. From the concluding page we take the following extract as a specimen of the keen insight which marks the whole work:—

A natural tendency to attribute great effects to great causes leads us to explain political evolution, like geological evolution, by deep and continuous forces, more far-reaching than individual actions. The history of the 19th century accords ill with this idea. . . . The revolution of 1830 was the work of a group of obscure Republicans, aided by the blunders of Charles X. The revolution of 1848 was the work of certain Democratic and Socialist agitators, aided by Louis Philippe's sudden lack of nerve. The war of 1870 was the personal work of Bismarck, prepared by Napoleon III.'s personal policy. For these three unforeseen facts no general cause can be discerned in the intellectual, economic, or political condition of the continent of Europe.

These three accidents, he contends, have completely changed the face of Europe—the first by destroying the alliance of Sovereigns against revolution, establishing the Parliamentary system, and thus preparing a firm hold for the Catholic and Socialist parties; the second by bringing about universal suffrage, and paving the way, in certain countries, for national unity; the third by creating the German empire, destroying the Pope's temporal power, transforming the art of war, and establishing the system of armed peace. M. Seignobos admits that in this last instance the mine was prepared, and nothing was wanted but the lighted match. Was not this the case also in 1830 and 1848?

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY MEMOIRS.

The eighteenth century has its admirers and its detractors. From a literary point of view, however, there can be no doubt that it was an extremely picturesque period. Johnson, for instance, and Addison are a hundred times more interesting than any of the barons who slaughtered each other during the Wars of the Roses. So also with the less important people who are the subjects of an entertaining book before us—LITTLE MEMOIRS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY, by George Paston (Grant Richards, 10s. 6d.). They are distant enough to be historical, but are not so far from us as to make it difficult to sympathize with them. The author has written short and lively biographies of "two grandes dames of the second George's Court, a playwright who dabbled in diplomacy, an aristocratic declassée who died in the odour of royalty, an ex-shoemaker turned bookseller, a Highland lady with literary proclivities, and a distinguished scholar who was chiefly remarkable for his misfortunes." The lives are of Lady Hertford and Lady Pomfret, Richard Cumberland, Lady Craven, James Lackington, Mrs. Grant of Laggan, and John Tweddell, all of whom have just this much in common, that they left behind them either their letters or their autobiographies. Perhaps the best memoir of all is that of James Lackington, if only because he belonged, not to the great world, but to the world of trade, which one's studies of the eighteenth century are apt to leave a little in the background. Our author, indeed, points out the want of documents treating at first hand of the labouring and trading classes of the period. As he says, we hear often enough of the aristocracy and the mob, but have less information as to the intermediate classes. Lackington, however, tells the story of his struggles and successes in his candid and unreserved memoirs, which were published in 1792. He was born in 1746 at Wellington, in Somerset, the son of a drunken father and a hardworking mother, and was brought up to his father's trade of shoemaking. He was studious and religious; he fell under the influence of the Methodists; he read every book on which he could lay his hands. He married young, and soon afterwards came to London, where he opened a little shop for the sale of books and boots, his entire stock being worth about £5. The business prospered, but his wife died in the following year "in enthusiastic rant on November 9th, surrounded by Methodist preachers." He married again very shortly afterwards, the business still prospering until at last it became a very extensive concern. The author says that many of the best-known booksellers of the nineteenth century are said to have received their training at the famous house which he founded.

Even after unexpected prosperity had blessed his basket and his store, Mr. Lackington continued for some years his careful and frugal mode of life, taking down his own shutters, pricing his own books, and writing his own catalogues. At first, to use his own words, "I welcomed a friend with a shake of the hand, but a year later I beckoned across the way for a pot of good porter. A few years after that, I sometimes invited my friends to dinner, and provided them with a roasted fillet of veal; in a progressive course the ham was introduced, and a pudding made the next addition to the feast. For some time a glass of brandy and water was a luxury; raisin wines succeeded; and as soon as two-thirds of my profits allowed me to afford good red port, it appeared on my table, nor was sherry long behind." In the same gradual fashion a stage-coach was transformed into a chariot, and a suburban lodging into a country house.

In short, with his business instincts and his passion for books, Lackington had a remarkable career.

Lady Craven's life was more brilliant, but less edifying. She was Lady Elizabeth Berkeley, born in 1750, and was married at the age of 17 to Mr., afterwards Lord, Craven. She was beautiful; Reynolds and Romney painted her portrait; but her beauty and her wit became the subject of scandal, and at the end of 1782 she and her husband parted for ever. It is difficult to discover the rights of the story; perhaps they do not much signify. The result was that for some years Lady Craven led a wandering life, half in and half out of society, like an aristocratic Becky Sharp. At Vienna she saw the Emperor Joseph; at St. Petersburg she was received by the Empress Catherine; there she saw also the old Princess Romanzof, the Empress's first maid-of-honour, who was 90 years old. "I am so old," she told her visitor, "that I have seen your great Duke of Marlborough and his Duchess at The Hague. He was so stingy that when his black stockings had holes in them they were darned with white thread. As to his beautiful Duchess, she used to get tipsy on rum-punch."

Lady Craven was also invited to dine with Prince Potemkin in an immense palace that he was building. The only room finished was 300 feet long, and she came home quite ill with the cold and bored into the bargain; for she says that she never heard the sound of her host's voice except when he asked what she would take to eat.

This adventurous lady had friends as well as enemies. Among the former was the Margrave of Anspach, the nephew of Frederick the Great, whom she married almost immediately on the death of her husband in 1791, Horace Walpole remarking that she "received the news of her husband's death on a Friday, went into woods on Saturday, and into white satin and many diamonds on Sunday." The Margrave withdrew from Anspach, and settled with his wife at Brandenburg-house, Hammersmith, where they gave a magnificent house-warming, and theatricals, of which several curious accounts have been given. The Margravine, however, was not altogether well received in England; her daughters "with due deference to the Margravine of Anspach informed her that out of respect to their father they could not wait upon her." Queen Charlotte refused to receive her at Court as Margravine of Anspach. The Margrave died in 1806, and his wife says of him "a better man never existed . . . he was so perfectly genteel and princely in his air that even with his great coat and round hat the Sovereign was perceived." The Margravine lived on till 1828, to the end of her days under the delusion that she was a genius, a beauty, and a pattern.

As love-letters are in fashion just now, our final reference shall be to the chapter on the Romance of John Tweddell, a distinguished scholar, and the unfortunate lover of Miss Isabel Gunning, a cousin of the three famous sisters. Tweddell was the son of a gentleman in Northumberland, and was born in 1769. At Cambridge, where he was a Fellow of Trinity, he won a Members' Prize, and all the three Browne Medals in one year. When he was twenty-five years old, his unlucky fate made him acquainted with Miss Gunning, to whose family his slender means and liberal opinions did not recommend him. The lady, however, was attached to him, and for some years they carried on a more or less clandestine correspondence, part of which has lately come to light in the shape of some of Tweddell's letters. We should not have described them as ardent, but the author warns us that in an age of sober common-sense love becomes "regard," passion "sentiment," and charm "propriety of conduct." Still, one must suppose it possible to make love, and to be jilted, in the most decorous eighteenth century English, for this is what happened to poor John Tweddell. There is nothing to show clearly why he was jilted. Perhaps he bored the lady with too much philosophy and morality, subjects on which, to say the least of it, he wrote with considerable fluency. At any rate, she saw, and preferred, and married some one else, which, as the author truly observes, is the most practical of all adverse comments on a lover. Tweddell bore his disappointment like a man, and there is dignity as well as pathos in his acknowledgment of the letter which put an end to the correspondence. An "Englishwoman" of to-day might learn a lesson from an Englishman of a hundred years ago. He concludes:—

I would not willingly tease you if you are forearmed against all I may say, and that my reasoning is all to no purpose. As for seeing you for a few hours, this would in my present state only agitate without relieving. I have too much to say to you to say it in one breath, scattered as are all my ideas, and confused and tumultuous as are all my feelings. I could observe upon your letter at great length. But the time is passed away when I found happiness in lengthening my letters to you! Be not angry at anything I may have said—I hardly know what I have said—ce pauvre cœur a tant aimé. God bless you. May you be happy.

For the next few years he travelled, and, having plenty of good introductions, visited a great many well-known people. He studied for a long time at Athens, and made a number of valuable drawings of all kinds of antiquities, a work for which he was well qualified; but here, unhappily, he was seized with a malignant fever, and died soon after he had passed his thirtieth birthday. He was buried at his own request in the Temple of Theseus. An ill-starred man—even his drawings and other collections were pursued by a species of posthumous bad luck. The ship in which they were being taken to the Embassy at Constantinople was wrecked. They were recovered from the wreck, and were deposited in the cellars of the Embassy, and then, to the scandal of literary and diplomatic circles, they disappeared for ever.

We cannot refer in detail to the other lives in this amusing and well-written book; we can only recommend them cordially to our readers. In their variety they present a picture gallery worthy of a century that is too often spoken of contemptuously by those who pride themselves on their unconventionality. We doubt if a hundred years hence a future Mr. Paston could amass better material—true and at the same time amusing—from our own times.

IN PERSIA.

Colonel C. E. Yate was Consul-General for Khurāsān and Sistān from 1893 to 1894, returning thither in 1896 and remaining till March, 1898. His headquarters were at the sacred city of pilgrimage, Mashhad, but he travelled a great deal about the two provinces, and in KHURĀSĀN AND SISTĀN (Blackwood, 16s.) he describes with painstaking accuracy what he saw there and also on his journey through Afghanistan. As a road book for a little known part of north-east Persia his volume may be commended to future travellers, who will find many useful topographical notes and hints on accommodation, provisions, roads, climate, inhabitants, &c. The account of trade and industries and of the general condition of the population, whether Persians or Turcomans, is also valuable, and the more so since Colonel Yate writes as a matter-of-fact observer, keen-eyed and practical, who has no theories to prove and not the faintest tendency to enthusiasm on any subject—except, perhaps, sport. The book makes no effort to be interesting; the style is bald and colloquial. Nor is there any attempt at antiquarian or historical research. Colonel Yate describes such monuments as he came across, but in the spirit of a surveyor not of an archaeologist, and he evidently knows very little of the history of Persia. Some of his blunders are ludicrous, but when we find that his chief authority is a book by a recent Persian Secretary of State we are not so much astonished. This Secretary was responsible, among other things, for a Persian version of Yākūt's Arabic geographical dictionary, and he accomplished it by turning into Persian M. Barbier de Meynard's French translation of part of the Arabic text! One might as well translate Dante into French by way of somebody's English selection.

Setting aside the question of literary or historical merit, Colonel Yate's volume is not to be despised, especially in view of the coming political problem connected with Persia. There is a good deal of useful geographical data concerning places which have been very imperfectly explored; there are here and there curious examples of local customs; and there are queer descriptions of the ways of those troublesome gentry the Turcomans on the Russian border. A special value attaches to the author's professional criticism of Asiatic soldiers, and his opinion of the Persian troops is as low as his approval of the Afghans (whom he found increasingly friendly towards England) is marked. But when he quotes an absurd Afghan prophecy that the Armageddon between England and Russia will be fought on the Dasht-i-Bakwa, where 12,000 riderless horses will wander after the battle, he should not trace it, with perfect gravity, to a Persian author of the fifteenth century. One would like to hear the ideas of a Persian of 1430 about the Russia and England of his day! One of Colonel Yate's journeys took him to the celebrated turquoise mines of Khurāsān. They are invisible to the unpractised eye of the ordinary traveller, and no one riding by would suspect any workings. "The mines are worked in the roughest manner possible. The only implements used by the miners are short iron jumpers about eighteen inches in length, and a small hammer with which they drive holes into the rock, which is then blasted out with common country gunpowder." The mines seem to be in a neglected state now, and there is a vast amount of leakage; everybody in Colonel Yate's camp invested in turquoises, which had probably been stolen. Unfortunately these turquoises when purchased by the inexpert have a curious trick of losing their colour in a week. Indeed, the dyed turquoises of Khurāsān demand as careful a scrutiny as the glass sapphires of Colombo. Though the importance of this volume lies mainly in its commercial and political observations, we must confess we found most pleasure in its descriptions of nature. Persia has often been praised in song—by its own poets—but one is apt to think of it chiefly as a deserted land, where long journeys over bad roads, with no decent inns, are unrelieved by any special beauty of scenery. The mountain country in the north, however, is remarkably fine, and our quick-eyed traveller found plenty to interest him in nature, not merely in game, though of that he had fair sport, but in "smale fowle."

Spring at Mashhad [he says] is a charming time, and the whole country seems to blossom out. Birds of all sorts appear to breed. The blue jay or Indian roller—the Kulagh-i-Sabz or green crow, as it is called by the Persians—comes in hundreds and takes possession of almost every nullah bank, closely followed by that gay bird, the European bee-eater, which similarly lays its eggs in a hole in some bank. Almost every Kanat well has its pair of pied wagtails, the sky is full of swallows and swifts, and the Persian nightingale sings and breeds in the gardens. At one time I had two nightingales' nests and six or seven nests of a little tree-warbler in my garden, all within a few yards of the front-door steps. Soon after the middle of April the quail appear, and the cock birds are netted in large numbers, by means of calls, in the young wheat crops, and sold in the bazar at the rate of six for a kran. They breed around the town, and towards the end of July, after the corn is cut, young quails are to be found in the grain-fields, and are excellent eating. Another bird that breeds in Khurāsān in large numbers is the rose-coloured starling, the Sār, as the Persians call it. The Koh-i-Sangi is a favourite resort of these birds; large flocks gather there and breed among the tumbled mass of rocks and boulders that forms the western end of the hill. In June, when the young birds are fledged, men and boys go out from the town with baskets and catch them in numbers. It is a curious sight hunting about the rocks for the nests. The old birds sit around, jabbering away as hard as they can, almost every one of them with either a grasshopper or a white mulberry in its mouth for the benefit of the young birds that, alas for them! are being ruthlessly carried off.

THE AGNOSTIC'S DIFFICULTIES.

The aim of THE MIRACLES OF UNBELIEF, by Mr. Frank Ballard (T. and T. Clark, 6s.), is a simple one. Impressed by the way in which religious difficulties are made an excuse for indifferentism, he has set himself to show that the difficulties of irreligion are far greater than those which meet the orthodox Christian. It is an attractive and, in some respects, an easy task to play the Socrates to other men's dogmas; in the case of the somewhat insolent assertions of that militant agnosticism which is now become old-fashioned, it has the charm of poetic justice. Undoubtedly, in the first flush of their triumphs over the very defective theology of their day, the agnostic scientists were unduly fond of ascending the papal chair. To-day their mantle has fallen upon lesser men; the discoveries of one generation's pioneers become the prejudices of common men a generation later. This is why Mr. Ballard is so impressed by the dangers of materialism; and, if he rather exaggerates the danger, it is because he evidently works in that portion of society which is some way behind the University standard. The man in the street who wishes to shelve the deeper problems of existence is a large devourer of cheap heresies; and with him are plenty of cultured men who do not happen to have spared any of their time for the study of religious questions. To them Mr. Ballard. A little provincial—for him Lord Grimthorpe is a serious authority on biological questions, for him Mr. Le Gallienne's theology is worth confuting, for him "Turner and Tadema" represent art, "Wesley and Whitefield" devotion, "Dorner and Fairbairn" represent theology, and are classed with Plato and Shakespeare; yet in his own department, that of a scientific Christian apologist, he is exceedingly acute and forcible.

Trenchant a critic as he is, the book would be far less useful were it merely negative and destructive; as a matter of fact it supplies abundant material for a sane belief, and is not confined to the "miracles of unbelief" which put so severe a strain upon the credulity of the agnostic. For instance, he retorts upon those who are dismayed by the mystery of pain that the mystery of painlessness is far greater and is all on the other side, yet, at the same time, he gives us a very good explanation of pain, and returns again to its defence in the last chapter. Or again, after an able analysis of the chance theory of creation, he proceeds to defend the argument from design, and claims that Paley was far more in the right than those who hastily assumed that he was out of date. He is out of date, Mr. Ballard argues, only in that the later discoveries of science have enormously increased the evidence of design. Here is an example of Mr. Ballard's method, a fragment taken from a long criticism of a passage from Mr. Clodd's "Plain account of Evolution"—:

Then again, somehow, being next to nothing themselves, and having nothing to work with, they endowed themselves with all those potentialities—"their inherent forces and energies"—out of which all the infinite possibilities of worlds to come should be evolved. Then, further, through no power at all outside themselves, these self-differentiated atoms began to move. They were "not evenly distributed"—i.e., they distributed themselves unevenly, and manifestly with a purpose, namely, so that "Force," which came from nowhere, might not draw them around one common centre, which was everywhere, and "energy awakened by collision of atom with atom"—which collision in every case awakened itself—might not be "profitlessly" lost to a universe in which there was nowhere any mind whatever to appreciate, or anticipate, either profit or loss.

Mr. Ballard passes on to the realm of history, pressing home the well-known arguments as to the difficulty of accounting either for Judaism or Christendom except on a supernatural hypothesis. Next he explains to the agnostic his difficulties in psychological and ethical matters; then he gives a chapter to the great dilemma in the character and the claims of Christ. A short essay on comparative religion, a concluding chapter, an appendix on Haeckel, and a list of authorities complete the volume, to which, unfortunately, there is no index. Mr. Ballard has certainly produced a book that is just what is wanted for the average young man who makes easy assumptions; it is distinctly worth the study of wiser men who have not read the first-hand authorities; it will be extremely useful to ministers of religion. Personally, we should have preferred a writer who did not speak of "the human yearn for immortality" and "the high and quenchless yearn of humanity." Some day we may hope to see the work better done by some one who will unite to Mr. Ballard's high qualifications others which are not his. Till then "The Miracles of Unbelief" will hold the field.

STATUTE LAW BEHIND THE SCENES.

LEGISLATIVE METHODS AND FORMS, by Sir C. Ilbert, K.C.S.I. (Clarendon Press, 16s.), is a title which fails to indicate the varied character of the contents of Sir Courtenay Ilbert's new book. This will appear from a brief survey of its scope. We have first an attempt to trace in historical outline the relations between the Common Law of a nation and its Statute Law. The example both of England and of other European countries shows how—as civilization develops and a country shakes down, or rises up, from barbarism to a fixed form of Government—its customs become settled law, or, as we generally call it, Common Law; whilst changes in the Common Law, either by expansion or contraction, are made by fresh legislation—whether it be the result of the deliberations of a legislative assembly or the fiat of an autocrat is a mere matter of detail. All this is here worked out admirably, although Sir Courtenay only devotes nineteen pages to the subject. Within that compass he brings the story down to the French codes issued under Napoleon and to the still more recent codes of the German empire. The author then turns to the English Statute Book and addresses himself to the following questions:—"What is the English Statute Book? What are its contents? Where are they to be found? How are they arranged? What facilities are there for ascertaining the enactments which have been made on a given subject and the extent to which they are in force?" These are questions of every day interest and importance which every cultivated Englishman ought not only to wish to ask but to know how to answer.

Probably, unless we except Lord Thring, there is no living lawyer who could answer them so fully and so clearly as Sir Courtenay Ilbert. He describes the origin and development of our "Statute Book" (though such a "Book" does not really exist), showing when, where, and by whom the Statutes have been framed, edited, and printed, and how they are now issued to the public. Much has been done during the last half century—and it is here fully explained—to bring about improvements of an editorial character, so to speak, in the outward appearance of the Statutes as they reach the hands of the public at a penny a sheet. The older Acts of Parliament have been taken in hand of late years by the Statute Law Revision Committee, whose labours Sir C. Ilbert summarizes. The scheme for the systematic improvement of the Statute Law, begun by Lord Westbury and specially developed by Lord Cairns and Lord Selborne, involved the four-fold task of indexing, purging, re-publishing, and consolidating. The first three points are now fairly carried to completion up to date, but the very important matter of consolidation has come to a standstill by obstruction, systematic and unsystematic, in Parliament and out of it. The importance of consolidation, both to the practitioner in Court and in Chambers and to the officials of local authorities, is not, we often think, sufficiently appreciated, or more earnest efforts would be made to deal with it. To take an instance; the "Public Health Act, 1875," is now after a quarter of a century very much out of date and urgently needs treatment on the consolidation principle. Yet those who can look back as far as 1872 when the Public Health Service of the country was re-organized by Statute will remember the terrible confusion which the new sanitary authorities had to face in discovering their legal powers and duties. These were scattered over more than thirty Acts of Parliament which were admirably brought to a focus by Lord Norton's Royal Commission. The Draft Consolidation Bill, drawn up by that Commission, was, by the way, a far better arranged scheme than the Bill eventually brought in and carried in 1875 by Mr. Selater Booth. Incoherent as this was, however, it introduced a great deal of order into the previous chaos. The "Municipal Corporations Act, 1882," and "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894," were also types of great legislative successes in the way of consolidation, and we believe that the credit of the former rests with the author of the present book. From consolidation, codification is a not distant step, and one which ought long ago to have been taken more frequently. No better justification of this remark need be looked for than the success from a publisher's point of view of Sir J. Stephen's Criminal Code Book. It is now a recognized text-book of the highest authority, yet it is nothing but the Draft Code which was prepared some years ago as an intended Act of Parliament, but which the Government of the day had not courage or perseverance enough to carry through. Not the least interesting portions of Sir C. Ilbert's book are his chapters on Indian and Colonial Legislation and his practical hints for the guidance of Members of Parliament and others as to what to do and what not to do in drafting Bills. A careful study of his suggestions would save us from much of that slovenly drafting which too frequently characterizes the condition of Bills in Parliament after they have emerged from the ordeal of Committee. It is perhaps inevitable that they should at this stage be in an unsatisfactory condition considering the tinkering by inexperienced amateurs to which they have been subjected. It is quite time that every Bill approaching its final or third reading stage should be reviewed from a literary and editorial standpoint by some tribunal such as a standing joint-committee of both Houses which would make sure that the new Statute would read grammatically, that it was not arrant nonsense—a condition of things by no means unknown—and that it did not, as is often the case, conflict with previous legislation. Sir C. Ilbert's book is not only a useful legal treatise for the student and practitioner, but a book which the layman can read with interest and profit.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

"Napoléon Prisonnier."

One would have supposed it impossible to find any more unpublished diaries and memoirs relating to Napoleon's captivity at St. Helena. M. Paul Frémeaux, however, has obtained possession of those by Dr. John Stokoe, surgeon of the Conqueror, and one of the ex-Emperor's medical attendants; but, instead of printing them textually as matériaux pour servir, he has woven them into a book of his own, NAPOLÉON PRISONNIER (Flammarion, 3f.50c.). There is a good deal, if not a great deal, in the book that is new; but the nature of the additions to our knowledge is such as to appeal more powerfully to persons interested in Stokoe than to persons interested in Napoleon, and they, of course, are a minority. Still the subject is one on which anything new, however trifling, is welcome; and one can read the statement of Stokoe's grievances with sympathy. He was tried by Court-martial and dismissed the service for offences which really amounted to little more than an inability to get on with Sir Hudson Lowe and Sir Robert Plampin. Joseph and Louis Bonaparte and Madame Mère did what they could for him. He acted as guardian to Joseph's daughters on their voyages across the Atlantic, and he lived till 1852. There was not much to be made out of the scanty materials of his journal; but M. Frémeaux has done as well with them as could have been expected.

A Study in the War of the Revolution.

In CHARLES WILLIAM FERDINAND, DUKE OF BRUNSWICK, A HISTORICAL STUDY, 1735-1806 (Longmans, 6s. net), Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice has written a really valuable monograph on one of those enigmatic characters which perplex the historian. In the Duke's case the problem is complicated by the sharp contrast between his military reputation in life and after his death. It sounds almost like romance that the commander-in-chief of the Allies who signed the manifesto against France which precipitated the War of the Revolution should only six months before have been offered the command of the French army. This fact alone is sufficient testimony to the Duke's fame as a general; but it illustrates also that inveterate habit of "sitting on the fence" which was the great defect of his character. The French leaders who made the offer were, perhaps, influenced by his enlightened rule of his own duchy no less than by his strategic renown. But political liberalism did not prevent him from continuing to be the obsequious henchman of the absolute Prussian King. This want of consistent action rather than of settled principle was fatal to his success as a statesman. Lord Edmond credits the Duke with some skill in diplomacy in connexion with the battle of Valmy. According to some historians the French generals after the battle prolonged the negotiations for their own purposes. Lord Edmond adopts the contrary view—that it was the Duke who amused them with negotiations while he was gaining time for a masterly retreat. The misfortunes of his later career are here shown to have been due not to military incompetence, for he was quick to discern the right move in a campaign, but rather to his readiness to be overruled in council. In recording how Brunswick took the field against Napoleon in 1805 Lord Edmond cites Lucan's contrast between Pompey and Cæsar before Pharsalia. On one point, however, his parallel fails; it is absurd to ascribe Cæsar's "dash" and audacity to his "youth," for he was almost as much a veteran as his antagonist. Before the Duke of Brunswick actually encountered Bonaparte he was mortally wounded at Auerstädt; and the loss of his guiding hand at a crisis in the battle changed a probable victory into an irretrievable reverse. Those who are inclined to commiserate the captive Emperor during his "Last Phase" may here find how truculent he could himself be towards a vanquished and dying foe. Lord Edmond's book is illustrated by a map and by two excellent portraits; he might have added with advantage to his readers a pedigree explaining the relationship of the various Dukes of Brunswick to each other and to the English Royal House.

Jingoism.

Mr. J. A. Hobson's PSYCHOLOGY OF JINGOISM (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.) would be more effective if its author were a little calmer. He starts off by describing jingoism as "the hatred of another nation," which seems to us to show a want of careful discrimination. With all the faults of Englishmen and of English jingoism, it may be doubted whether we take the trouble to "hate" anybody, at any rate in the way in which some Germans and Frenchmen hate us. When we read that it is "the cold steel and the twist of the British bayonet in the body of the now defenceless foe that brings the keenest thrill of exultation" to the minds of "mild and aged clergymen, gently-bred, refined English ladies," we feel that Mr. Hobson is a little overstating his case. This is a pity, because he has, on such subjects as the methods by which "jingoism" is worked up and on "Christianity in Khaki," a good deal to say that is worth attention by unprejudiced persons.

Some Poison Mysteries.

M. Funck-Brentano, the writer who solved the mystery of the man with the iron mask, continues his criminological researches in PRINCES AND POISONERS (Duckworth, 6s.), translated by George Maidment. It is not to be accepted, as the title might suggest, as a collection of sensational stories, but as a real contribution to history. One of the chapters deals with the sudden death of Henrietta, daughter of Charles I., Duchess of Orleans, which inspired one of Bossuet's most eloquent orations. It was generally believed that she had been poisoned. M. Funck-Brentano, aided by two eminent French physicians, examines the evidence from the point of view of medical jurisprudence, and proves that "she succumbed to an acute peritonitis, the immediate and inevitable result of the perforation of the stomach by an ulcer." Another case considered is that of Racine. He was reported to have poisoned his mistress, Du Parc. M. Funck-Brentano establishes the strong probability that she died as the result of a surgical operation improperly performed. His most interesting pages, however, are those which relate the marvellous story of Marie Madeleine de Brinvilliers. Her name, of course, is sufficiently familiar to every student of the reign of Louis XIV., as well as to every student of toxicological affairs, and indeed to every student of French literature; but the story of her iniquities has never been accurately and completely told. M. Funck-Brentano's monograph is a masterly performance, and embodies the results of research among documents not previously used. It should be added that the book is not one for young people, but only for adults.

S. Louis.

Mr. Frederick Perry's Life of S. Louis (Putnam, 5s.), in the "Heroes of the Nations Series," claims no more, we should say, than to be a popular life of the best of the French Kings, written with the knowledge of the modern historian; and as a popular book it could hardly be better than it is. It is written with fluency and brightness, and with a sound knowledge of mediæval life. It avoids the too common fault of judging saints of the Middle Ages by modern standards, and it is utterly without the curious assumption of superiority which Milman, for instance, cannot avoid when he speaks of Saint Louis or of the Imitatio Christi. It is therefore a delightful book to read—simple, sympathetic, and vivid. While Mr. Perry has evidently a clear grasp of the political importance of the work of Louis IX. and his mother, and does not fail to set it clearly before his readers, he is at his best in narration of stirring incident, and his chapters on the Crusades of "the most Christian King" are as good as anything of the kind we have read. The book is one to be very warmly commended. We cannot but regret, however, that Mr. Perry did not in a preface or appendices give the ordinary reader some guide as to the authorities for the life of his hero. Everybody has heard of Joinville, but it may be doubted if any other French chronicler of the time is known except to specialists in England. Mr. Perry seems to have determined simply to tell his tale and leave any one who cared to investigate it; and though this may result, as in this case, in a good popular book, it is by no means the best method. Points of considerable interest in controversy are thus passed over with a rapidly sketched conclusion where some details would have been of value. The illustrations are well chosen and a great improvement on most of those in the series; but does Mr. Perry really believe in Viollet-le-Duc?

Lord Rayleigh's Papers.

The second volume of Lord Rayleigh's SCIENTIFIC PAPERS (Cambridge University Press, 15s. n.) covers the years 1881-1887, barely half that dealt with in the first series. Moreover, the number of separate communications is only 63, as compared with 78; yet the total quantity of printed matter is greater by some 40 pages. Electricity, and not acoustics, is now the principal theme, and much space is devoted to the author's arduous labours, in conjunction with Mrs. H. Sidgwick and Dr. Schuster, on the determination of the ohm. The British Association Committee on Electrical Standards made its first report so far back as 1863, but it was not till some time afterwards that the first approximation to the ohm—the resistance of a column of mercury less than 105 centimetres in length, and 1 square millimetre in section, at the temperature of melting ice—was arrived at. By degrees it became evident that this value was fully 1 per cent. too small, and various investigators, from Weber and Zöllner (whose work was taken up by Wiedemann) to Foster and Lippmann, Lorenz, and Rayleigh, have arrived at numbers averaging about 106.25 instead of that quoted above. Later experiments have added slightly to this figure, and in the London Gazette of August 24, 1894, it was officially set forth that the ohm was the resistance of a column of mercury 100.3cm. long, and of a uniform section such that the weight of the column should be 14.4521 grammes—thereby avoiding an explicit statement of the cross section—at the temperature of melting ice. Lord Rayleigh's work, however, is not impugned thereby, and still remains as a standard of reference. Hardly less important are his papers on the electrochemical equivalent of silver, and the Clark cell, which have served as the basis upon which the Board of Trade values of equivalents and electromotive force are reckoned. Other subjects dealt with, to name only a few, are liquid jets, the crispations of a body resting on a vibrating support, the constant of magnetic rotation of light in bisulphide of carbon, and the soaring of birds, the latter of which was subsequently expanded into the Wilde lecture delivered before the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society last year. Lord Rayleigh's style is faultlessly correct, but cold and academic, even in the article "Optics" written for the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and the presidential address to the British Association at Montreal in 1884. The thoroughness and conscientiousness of his methods are shown in the carefully-worded sentences, each having a logical relation to the context and incapable of being construed in any other sense than that which they were meant to bear. Yet, in spite of the absence of the personal element, traces of the zeal which has accomplished so much are apparent in the background, and happily there is every indication of its continuance for years to come.

Eugene Schuyler.

Eugene Schuyler was a typical example of the cultivated American diplomatist who does not think it necessary to cease to write for the newspapers because he has been sent to "lie abroad" for his country's honour. He served in Russia, Turkey, the Balkan Provinces, and Italy; did good work in helping to make the truth known concerning the Bulgarian atrocities; and he sent many letters home to New York, where they were printed in the Nation. These are now reprinted under the title ITALIAN INFLUENCES (Sampson Low, 10s. 6d. net). Most of them are reviews of books. Few of the reviews really add anything to the contents of the books, but they seldom fail to summarize their contents in an interesting and instructive manner. They would be model "Book of the Week" articles for the Sunday papers. Uniform with this volume appears SELECTED ESSAYS, with a memoir by Evelyn Schuyler Schaeffer.

The essays are old Scribner articles. One of them, an account of a visit paid by the writer to Count Tolstoy in 1860, has a certain topical interest now. It is interesting to find Mr. Schuyler expressing the opinion that "judging from the past there has never seemed to me any reason to believe that the present phase of mystical religious enthusiasm through which Count Tolstoy is now passing would last for the whole of his life, or that he is permanently lost to literature." Some of the novelist's table talk is also reproduced with the skill of the practical interviewer.

Mrs. Alice Morse Earle has not quite so good a subject for her social and domestic researches into American history in STAGE COACH AND TAVERN DAYS (Macmillan, 10s. 6d.) as she had in her previous books on child-life in colonial days, but still she makes a volume which will, at least, be widely popular in America, where the youth of the nation inclines it to hold by all that bears a semblance of antiquity. Mrs. Earle's chapter on "The Puritan Ordinary" is full of curious research; her accounts of the "Tavern in War" and the "Romance of the Road" are interesting and often amusing by reason of the author's own pleasant humour and style. The illustrations which crowd every chapter are, mainly, from photographs, but many are reproductions of old drawings of the time of which Mrs. Earle writes or of the signs of inns used in the stage-coach days. The volume is a mine of anecdote and a magazine of out-of-the-way knowledge, but to the English reader it is slightly exotic and unimportant.

Mr. Henry James calls his pleasant book, A LITTLE TOUR IN FRANCE (Heinemann, 10s. 6d.), "sketches on 'drawing paper' and nothing more," but, of course, the articles are something more. Literature and archaeology, acute impressionism, unconscious personality, and a thousand other subjects and moods go to make up his delightful essays—on Poitiers and Nîmes, Tarascon, Arles, Le Mans, Angers, Nantes, Tours, Blois, Chambord, Chenonceaux, Bourges, Beaume, and Dijon, to mention only a few of the places of which he writes. Mr. Joseph Pennell is equal to the difficult task of adding attraction to Mr. James' book. His ninety-four illustrations are instinct with the spirit of beauty. To those who know the places visited it is a book of charmed reminiscences.

In THE ENGLISH TURF (Methuen, 15s.) Mr. Charles Richardson discusses the subjects which absorb that large class of the community which attends race meetings and aspires to back the winner. "Doping" is duly dealt with, and so are the manoeuvres of Tod Sloan. The principal seats of the horse-racing industry are accorded separate chapters, and there are also exhaustive discussions of such themes as "training," "breeding," and "lines of blood." The sticky, smudgy photographs which serve as illustrations are, however, a poor substitute for the drawings which adorned the sporting literature of an earlier epoch.

Mr. F. T. Bullen, who contributes to our columns this week an article on "The Poetry of the Sea," has already shown his keen desire to advance the highest interests of seamen, and his little book WITH CHRIST IN SAILOR TOWN (Hodder and Stoughton, 1s. 6d.), is an account of the Seamen's Mission in East London. It stands apart from books of a similar kind not only because of the writer's unique experience of the sailor's life, but because of the high literary gifts which he can bring to his task; and it will help the public to know more than they do of an excellent work which appeals, above all, to Englishmen.

Mr. Baring-Gould's "Frobishers," just published, has given us a picture of the life of those who are engaged in the Staffordshire pottery industry. The history of this industry—one of great interest to economists—is given in a very readable form by Mr. H. Owen in THE STAFFORDSHIRE POTTERS (Grant Richards, 6s.), which describes the conditions under which the workers labour and the point at which their efforts to improve those conditions now stands. The book includes a careful account by the Duchess of Sutherland of what is exactly meant by "Dangerous Trades."

ART.

'THE STOLEN DUCHESS.'

Once more Messrs. Agnew are in possession of the world-renowned picture which fell to their bid of 10,100 guineas on May 6, 1876. By whom it was cut from its frame on the night of May 26, 1876; how the thief gained entrance to the Old Bond-street galleries, then undergoing structural repairs; what have been its wanderings, who its custodians, during the last quarter of a century, till a few days ago it was handed over in Chicago to Mr. Morland Agnew—of these interesting matters we as yet know little or nothing. Eleven times newspaper correspondents have reported its discovery; in the summer of 1893 the Pall Mall Gazette published the "Confession of the theft of the vanished Gainsborough," but the mystery remained unsolved. No wonder, then, that when what proved to be authentic news reached England on Sunday it was received with incredulity. Now that no doubt remains as to the identity of the recovered picture, connoisseurs are again eagerly discussing, prior to its exhibition early in May, whether or not it be a Gainsborough, and who "the stolen Duchess" actually is. Again, the recovery of the picture may make Gainsborough hats a temporary vogue, and it is by no means improbable that a detective story on the subject will appear before the month is out.

According to some authorities, the portrait is that exhibited as a full-length at the Royal Academy, then located at New Somerset House, in 1783, the year preceding Gainsborough's request that a work by him should be hung on the line, low down, near the floor—a request the refusal of which caused the artist to refrain from exhibiting here during the three or four remaining years of his life. Apparently, it has been in the possession of but five persons, including the thief. From the Academy it was bought by Mrs. Magennis; in 1839 Bentley, the picture-restorer, gave her £56 for it; some years thereafter Mr. Wynn Ellis purchased it of Bentley for 60 guineas. Mr. Bentley's grandson has related in The Times how the lady from whom his grandfather purchased the picture admitted that she had cut it shorter at the foot so as to fit it into the space over her chimney-piece, and that she had burnt the piece she had cut off. When the Wynn Ellis collection came up for sale at Christie's in May, 1876, "any one passing the neighbourhood of St. James's-square might well have supposed that some great lady was holding a reception." All the fashionable world went to see "a beautiful Duchess created by Gainsborough"; they came, saw, "and were conquered by her fascinating beauty." The bidding began at a thousand guineas, then came an offer of 3,000 guineas, and, by leaps of 500 or 1,000 at a time, of 10,000 guineas, this last on behalf of the then Earl of Dudley. Mr. Agnew, however, adventured 100 guineas more, and the "lot" fell to him. As will be seen from the accompanying table, wherein particulars are given of the six highest-priced pictures sold by auction in this country, this sum remained a record until 1894, the Delmé group being in turn relegated to a second place by the pair of Peel Van Dycks.

Artist.	Subject.	Sale.	Price.
Van Dyck .. .	Genoese Senator and Wife	Peel, 1900 .. .	£34,350
Reynolds .. .	Lady Betty Delmé and Children .. .	Delmé, 1894 .. .	11,000gs.
Romney .. .	Viscountess Clifden and Lady Spencer .. .	Clifden, 1896 .. .	10,500gs.
Gainsborough .. .	"The Stolen Duchess" .. .	Wynn Ellis, 1876 .. .	10,100gs.
Gainsborough .. .	Lady Mulgrave .. .	Price, 1895 .. .	10,000gs.

It will be observed that 10,100 guineas remains as a record for Gainsborough, although the Lady Mulgrave, which changed hands in the eighties at 1,070 guineas, and for which Mr. Price refused 7,000 guineas when the picture was exhibited at Burlington House in 1885, is but a "short neck" behind.

If the portrait be indeed that exhibited at the 1783 Academy, this disposes of the theory that Gainsborough was at work upon it at the time of his fatal illness, and that Lawrence added some finishing touches. Allan Cunningham tells us that "amongst those who sat to him (Gainsborough) was the Duchess of Devonshire, then in the bloom of youth, at once the loveliest and the gayest of the gay. But her dazzling beauty and the sense which he entertained of the charms of her looks, and her conversation, took away that readiness of hand and hasty happiness of touch which belonged to him in his ordinary moments. The portrait was so little to his satisfaction that he refused to send it to Chatsworth. Drawing his wet pencil across a mouth which all who saw it thought exquisite lovely, he said, 'Her Grace is too hard for me.' The picture was, I believe, destroyed." Cunningham adds that among Gainsborough's papers were found two sketches of the Duchess, "both exquisitely graceful," the one a side, the other a full face; "she seems to move and breathe among the groves of Chatsworth." Those who have made a special study of Gainsborough's technique, however, will soon have an opportunity to discuss afresh the question as to whether or not we here have an example by this "immortal painter," as Ruskin called him. Sir J. E. Millais always expressed doubt as to the genuineness of the portrait. Millais was of opinion that this was not Gainsborough's view of a woman, and it differs somewhat from the best authentic Gainsboroughs. This may be accounted for by the fact that Lady Elizabeth Foster was a bad sitter. There is, however, an admirable full length of this beautiful woman by Sir Thomas Lawrence at Chatsworth.

As to the identity of the sitter, little doubt remains that she is not the celebrated and beautiful genius of the Whig party, of whom Walpole says "her youthful figure, flowing good nature, sense and lively modesty, and modest familiarity make her a phenomenon." In the National Portrait Gallery is a presentment of Georgiana as a child, and, if we mistake not, at Chatsworth and Althorp are portraits of her in later life, all by Reynolds. The famous belle died in 1806, and thereafter the fifth Duke married Lady Elizabeth Foster, née Hervey, daughter of the Earl of Bristol. She is probably "the stolen Duchess." If, unlike her predecessor, she never "supplanted a vote" for Fox, nor was addressed as "Devon's fair, arrayed in matchless beauty," she was hardly, if at all, less lovely, and, with her sister Lady Duncannon, was for some years the ruler of London society. She outlived the fifth Duke of Devonshire by 13 years, much of this time being spent in Italy. To her, it is said, is attributable the discovery and preservation of the column of Phocas in the Forum. One question remains. What is the money value of the picture to-day? If in truth an American millionaire is prepared to give £40,000 for it, Messrs. Agnew will not, to say the least, be losers financially. On the other hand, if the work be as excellent as is asserted, then its fitting home is in our National Gallery.

Among those who this year send pictures to the Royal Academy inspired by or associated with literature is the President, Sir E. J. Poynter. His "Helena and Hermia" aims to translate into form and colour the lines of Shakespeare:—

We, Hermia, like two artificial gods,
Have with our needle created both one flower,
Both on one sampler, sitting on one cushion,
Both warbling of one song, both in one key.

But, instead of being in a wood, they are on a marble seat, shadowed by a laurel hedge. As title for his picture of Wolsey refusing audience to three foreign Ambassadors in the garden of Hampton Court Palace, Mr. Seymour Lucas takes Wordsworth's line "The Clouds that gather round the setting Sun." Mr. Byam Shaw, who has forsworn "Love the Conqueror" and the passing strange ways of men, will be represented by a subject landscape, whose title, "Last Summer green things were greener," is from Christina Rossetti's "A Bird Song." There is, again, Mr. Herbert Draper, for whose "Tristram and Iseult" the beautiful frame, of Celtic design, is reproduced from the "Book of Kells," A.D. 650-90, preserved in Dublin. Mr. Draper's intention has been pictorially to interpret this beautiful passage from Malory: "Then did King Mark's bride, and then did Tristram, drink of the cup, all unwitting; so that a great love entered into them; the which love departed not from them all the days of their life, neither for weal nor for woe."

Amongst the most interesting things shown in London on Studio Sunday was an important decorative panel which Mr. E. A. Walton has completed for the new municipal buildings at Glasgow. Mr. Walton has certainly achieved a very striking panel, choosing for his subject a great horse fair in the fifteenth century, drawing it all in the broadest spirit and with a rich colour scheme. Mr. Walton's panel is the last of the four which have been commissioned by the Glasgow municipality, the others, from the hands of Mr. Roche, Mr. Henry, and Mr. Lavery, being already in place.

The Fine Art Society has been very busy of late; Mr. Mortimer Menpes' war pictures gave place to an interesting exhibition of early drawings by Sir John Millais, for the most part done in his Pre-Raphaelite period, and including at least one drawing which shows young Millais' skill at an age when most children are content with the slate-pencil. Many of Millais' early drawings have disappeared, since they were drawn on the wood for the engraver, and not many of those now exhibited were done for illustration. They display precocious ability and a charm which his more mature pictures do not always retain. The studies for pictures are possibly misnamed, as Millais always asserted that he did not find it necessary to make preliminary studies for his pictures. They are rather in the nature of notes for pictures, but are none the less interesting for that. The early drawings, by reason of the sentiment which Millais seldom failed at that time to engraft upon a masterly technique, appeal to us more surely than those popular canvases of his middle period, and the bold but unsympathetic commonplaces of his later years. It is impossible not to regret that so fine a picture as "Sir Isumbras at the Ford" has been spoiled for most of us by the extremely clever paraphrase of it by Frederick Sandys. In the same gallery Mr. Samuel J. Hodson, of the old water-colour school, places before us subjects from some of the picturesque towns on the Loire, and shows a more than usual facility for drawing architecture; while Mr. Eyre Walker has a series of paintings of considerable ability and many methods.

The Doré Gallery in Bond-street has at last made an important change from the pictures which have so long been associated with the great French illustrator. Not that the Doré pictures have been removed, but they have been rearranged so as to permit of a collection of some 15 important pictures by Jan Ten-Katé forming a central collection in the galleries. These pictures have been painted by the famous Dutch artist for an object, and accordingly should not be judged entirely from a technical standpoint. They are for the most part allegorical, and have been designed to portray the horrors of war and the blessings of peace. His painting is greatly superior to that which is generally associated with canvases designed to convey a set impression.

M. Monet, after a lengthy visit to London, has returned to Paris. He has taken with him a large number of studies of the Thames made from his room at the Hotel Cecil and from a balcony at St. Thomas's Hospital.

The Whitechapel Art Gallery has at all events succeeded in rousing the curiosity of the East-end, though no doubt it will be long before what is at present a means of recreation may become a source of real artistic pleasure. No less than 10,000 visitors entered the building on each day during the first week after the opening. After that there was naturally a slight falling off in the numbers, but the Gallery was full to overflowing during the Easter holidays. Next Monday the first exhibition closes, and its success offers every encouragement for the future.

The Daily Chronicle records an amusing and ingenious treatment now being undergone by Mr. Sargent, R.A., for a slight affection of the voice. The only remedy is silence, and so Mr. Sargent, who, we are told, cannot speak a word of Dutch, has been sent to Holland. It will be interesting to see what influence this sojourn in the land of Rembrandt will have upon him.

FICTION.

Good Writing.

We have received from Messrs. Eason and Son, of Dublin—who disclaim the soft impeachment that they are publishers—a copy of MY NEW CURATE, which is issued by them, and of which they say that “although it has been out some time it is only now coming into notice.” The book, indeed, appears to have reached its twenty-second thousand in America, where it first appeared as a serial in the American Ecclesiastical Review. This circumstance certainly says a good deal for the literary taste of America; for though the story bears obvious traces of being written as a serial, it makes a remarkable book. Father Sheehan, the author, is by no means unknown as a writer, and he knows Ireland, where the scene of the story lies, well. A writer in these columns last May deplored the absence in modern fiction of a truthful picture of the Irish peasant. Father Sheehan gives a picture which is at any rate less misleading than that of most Irish writers. But the reason why we call special attention to the book is its prose style. How delightful are those rare occasions on which one happens unexpectedly on a passage of fine, cultured, lucid, rhythmical English—on a writer who rises above obscurity, who is not self-conscious, who has no tricks or conceits, who never strains after brilliance, and only writes well because he cannot help it. We make no apology for giving our readers two passages in support of what we say:—

I often spent a pleasant hour in his surgery over his microscope, where I saw wonderful things; but what has haunted me most is the recollection of a human brain, which the doctor had preserved in spirits, and on which he has given me several lectures. I remember well my sensations when I first held the soft, dark, pulpy mass in my hand. All that I had ever read in psychology and metaphysics came back to me. This is the instrument of God's masterpiece—the human soul. Over these nodes and fissures it floated, like the spirit of God over the face of the deep. Here, as on a beautiful instrument, the spirit touched the keys, and thought, like music, came forth; and here were impressed indelibly ideas of the vast universe without, of time and eternity; yea, even of the Infinite and Transcendent—of God. Hushed in the silence of prayer, here the soul brooded as a dove above its nest; and here in moments of temptation and repentance, it argued, reasoned, prayed, implored the inferior powers that rebelled or recanted beneath. With what sublime majesty it ruled and swayed the subjects that owned its imperial dominion; and how it touched heaven on the one hand for pity, and earth on the other in power! And when the turbulent passions raged and stormed, it soothed and quelled their rebellion; and then, in recompense to itself, it went out and up towards the celestials, and joined its emancipated sisters before the great white throne, and drank in peace and the blessedness of calm from the silences and worship of Heaven. Where is that soul now? Whither has it gone? Silent is the instrument, just crumbling to inevitable decay. But where in the boundless ocean of space is the deathless spirit that once ruled it in majesty, and drew from it music whose echoes roll through eternity? And how has science mapped and parcelled it, like a dead planet. Here is the “island of Reil,” here the “pons Varolii”; here is the “arbor vitæ”; and here is the “subarachnoid space”; and here that wonderful contrivance of the great Designer that regulates the arterial supplies. I lift my hat reverentially and whisper, Laudate!

Our second extract is on a subject more familiar, and may be entitled “My Books”:—

No, dear silent friends, I should be the meanest, most ungrateful of mortals if I could be ashamed of you. For forty years you have been my companions in solitude; to you I owe whatever inspirations I have ever felt; from you have descended in copious stream the ideas that raised my poor life above the commonplace, and the sentiments that have animated every good thing and every holy purpose that I have accomplished. Friends that never obtruded on my loneliness by idle chatter and gossip, but always spoke wise, inspiring things when most I needed them; friends that never replied in irritation to my own disturbed imaginings, but always uttered your calm wisdom like voices from eternity, to soothe, to control, or to elevate; friends that never tired and never complained; that went back to your recesses without a murmur; and never resented by stubborn silence my neglect—treasures of thought and fountains of inspiration, you are the last things on earth on which my eyes shall rest in love, and like the orphans of my flock your future shall be my care. True, like your authors, you look sometimes disreputable enough. Your clothes, more to my shame, hang loose and tattered around you, and some of your faces are ink-stained or thumb-worn from contact with the years and my own carelessness. I would dress you in purple and fine linen if I may, yet you would reproach me and think I was weary of your homely faces. Like the beggar-maid you would entreat to be allowed to go back from queenly glory and pomp to the tatters and contentment of your years. So shall it be! but between you and me there must be no divorce, so long as time shall last for me. Other friends will come and go, but nothing shall dissolve our union based upon gratitude and such love as man's heart may have for the ideal and insensible.

The manner is of course suited to the individuality of the old Roman Priest whose experiences with an enthusiastic young curate are related in the book. It is to some extent his simplicity that gives the writing its charm. But that only makes it a better object-lesson for the modern stylist in the supreme virtue of simplicity.

The Wonders of the Deep.

In Mr. Clark Russell's continuous succession of sea stories there is a surprising variety of incident. From the same theme he extracts a wonderful number of different melodies—and if one is sometimes reminiscent of another it is tuneful enough to bear repetition. Here is his latest—labelled THE SHIP'S ADVENTURE (Constable, 6s.)—and it shows no falling off, though Mr. Russell has used the main feature before, if we remember right, in “My Danish Sweetheart.” But the mad captain who drugs the whole of his crew, officers included, is novel enough to satisfy the most captious. Indeed, as the author grows older he seems also to grow more daring. With each successive book his incidents grow more astonishing to the mere landsman. We have no particular objection to this, but it is curious to notice Mr. Russell's consciousness of his increasing temerity, and his half apologetic manner of introducing some surprising coincidence. “And now happened,” says he, “something which I fear the reader will think more incredible than any other incident in this volume.” His command of metaphor leads him astray sometimes. And he can never resist dealing a sly thrust at steamships, and the modern spirit, and unbelief in general. But the adventures of the full-rigged ship York, lost, found, and steered home again by a man, a girl, and a dog, are at any rate uncommon enough to furnish an afternoon's amusement to lovers of the sea.

More Blackmail.

When a novel begins with the appearance of a doubtful stranger demanding a private interview with the bridegroom on his wedding morning, the least experienced of readers will say to herself “Blackmail!” This ill-omened word is the mainspring once more of Miss Iza Duffus Hardy's story THE LESSER EVIL (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), and where there is blackmail there is not infrequently—experience teaches us—sudden death meted out to the villain who demands it, and an array of circumstantial evidence pointing to the innocent hero as the murderer. These things, sure enough, come to pass in “The Lesser Evil,” and the agony is piled up towards the end in a manner that betrays the practised hand of the novel writer. Miss Hardy believes in giving the public good value for their money, lots of incident, plenty of love-making, and an effective climax. There is not much trouble about analyzing character, but the book is readable for all that—perhaps, because of that. It is a survival from the time when plots were everything, and writers labelled their wooden puppets "hero" or "villain" without shame. In the hands of an expert constructor these stories have still a fascination.

Mr. Fergus Hume.

The most conscientious reviewer can hardly keep pace with Mr. Fergus Hume, who can hardly have taken a holiday since he first discovered a mystery in a Hansom cab. Of his four latest novels, which are now before us, A WOMAN'S BURDEN (Jarrold and Sons, 6s.) and THE GOLDEN WANG-HO (John Long, 6s.) are the best. In the former the criminal classes figure largely, especially a couple of cleverly-sketched gaol-birds who might have stepped out of the Newgate Chronicle. Mr. Hume is not strong in portraying feminine character, and his heroine, who is dragged down to poverty by the burden of a worthless brother, does not move us. But in point of style the book marks a distinct improvement on Mr. Hume's previous work. "The Golden Wang-Ho" works round a mysterious Chinese idol imported to England and tracked by Chinamen, and the reader plunges with zest into the game of discovering its whereabouts. It is a familiar device of fiction, but the story is a very brisk and clever one and would do excellently for a railway journey. The other two novels are A TRAITOR IN LONDON (John Long, 6s.), a very conventional story written up to the Boer war; and SHYLOCK OF THE RIVER (Digby, Long, 6s.), which begins with a murder, and a lady who has "eyes of a deep-sea ultramarine and golden hair in fluffy little curls." All ends with a double wedding, and speeches from the happy couples that could not have been improved upon if the speakers had known Mr. Fergus Hume was taking notes for the last page of a novel.

Military Society of Yesterday.

"You know courage is reckoned the greatest of all virtues, because, unless a man has that virtue, he has no security for preserving any other," Mrs. M. E. Carr quotes in her novel, LOVE AND HONOUR (Smith, Elder, 6s.). But she forgets the value of courage in a novelist. A little more of it would have made her book a better one. But, as it is, the picture of the then newly-made Westphalian Kingdom, with Jérôme at its head, and the adventures in love and war of Heinz von Ostenburg are capably set forth. The historical touches are admirably blended with the story; the atmosphere of the end of the eighteenth century is preserved, the "costume" and the staging are all excellent. It is only when we come to the heart of a man's desire that Mrs. Carr loses our sympathy. Her characters are drawn with care, but they do not touch us. "Love and Honour" is an excellent object lesson in writing a popular semi-historical novel; it is clear, conventional, complete, but it lacks the psychic force that makes the difference between a work of art and an imitation.

Diplomatic Society of To-day.

The British Legation at Zafra is evidently a place round which a good deal of scandal may circulate. In Mr. Hope Dawlish's book, A SECRETARY OF LEGATION (Methuen, 6s.), we learn all there is to know about its members and their often rather petty concerns. Mr. Dawlish gives us some real men and women, and he knows the world of which he writes; but he lets his own immense interest in his hero, Dale, and his lady with a past, Mrs. George Trehearne, and his little girl Eileen, run away with him. He would write well were he not verbose. Words, words, words. An eclectic spirit, directness, and the art of cutting down are the trifling gifts that he needs to make him an entertaining writer. He is capable and widely experienced—a little artificial too, but that will doubtless pass with the exercise of writing.

Mr. Charles Garvice.

There is at the moment no lack of opportunity for making the literary acquaintance of Mr. Charles Garvice. Three novels from his hand are before us:—HER HEART'S DESIRE; NANCE; and THE OUTCAST OF THE FAMILY (Sands, 3s. 6d. each). To those who appreciate Meredith and Hardy, Mrs. Craigie, Mrs.

Ward, not to say Mr. Barrie and Mr. Zangwill, such books as Mr. Garvice offers must seem obvious and dull. To those who have read little and like a fluent story of the domestic emotions they should be welcome enough. They contain suggestions of Anthony Trollope without his humour, and hints of Miss Yonge without her sincerity; there are portraits of children which do not suggest any previous writer but are none the better on that account. Substitute a few more aristocrats for commoners and add some extra pleasantries of the pantry pattern, and Mr. Garvice's book might well bear the title of "The Outcast of the Family Herald." Yet the characters are carefully enough depicted, there is a wealth of words and a great elaboration of scenes, and things generally end up very nicely.

Melodrama.

The eyes of John Van Hemelryck "shone with the feline yellowish light of the man-eating tiger." He also possessed the hand of a mesmerist—and these two facts, taken in conjunction with the name, go a long way to show that Mr. Van Hemelryck was a very thorough-paced villain indeed. He is, in fact, the chief figure in Miss Gertrude Warden's gallery of rogues, which she has chosen to call A SYNDICATE OF SINNERS (Digby, Long, 6s.), and his special form of vice is to pose as a philanthropist while extorting blackmail from any unfortunate gentlemen whose lapses in the past happen to be known to him. His adventures, and those of his numerous colleagues in crime, are told with spirit, and the plot of Miss Warden's story is complicated and original. Her book has also the crowning merit of a happy ending—except for the numerous villains, who are routed, dispersed, or destroyed in the handsomest manner. In short, this is a bright, lively tale, as full of coincidences, plots, and counterplots as any we have read for some time. It can be read with very little trouble, and the reader is introduced to several ladies and gentlemen of rank and title.

THE LEAVEN OF LOVE, by Beryl Goldie (Routledge, 6s.), has a frontispiece that promises melodrama. Below it is written "Before Grant could interfere, he had struck her brutally on the face and flung her into the snow-covered path." The striker is shown vanishing into a lonely house on a snowy night, leaving "her" prostrate and beautiful at its doorstep, and "Grant" hurrying to the rescue with a clenched fist eloquent of chivalry. The villain is the hypnotist of fiction whom we had rather thought exploded by this time. Here, however, he appears in full swing, and there is a diamond two inches square to complicate matters. The style is not so startling as the plot, and is, in fact, natural and pleasing. We should like to read a story of every-day life by this author.

When a book has a title connected with a clergyman, one usually finds that it is concerned with some indiscretion of his early youth. Novelists have always found this a fascinating subject. Mr. Beresford Fitzgerald's THE MINOR CANON (Digby, Long, 6s.) is no exception. His past returns to confront him at a peculiarly inopportune moment. Part of the dénouement (his engagement, for instance, to his own daughter) would be very unpleasant if he were a shade more lifelike than he is. As things turn out, he becomes "heir to the ancient Barony of FitzHerbert" and to a moated house with two Tudor towers. This may not be strictly in the interests of morality; but if the reader is not frightened by what we have said of the book he will find it an average readable novel.

Mr. Townshend bears the leading rôle in THE GOLDEN TOOTH (Digby, Long, 6s.), Mr. J. Maclaren Cobban's latest addition to tales of mystery. Townshend is a little too clever for a real detective, but then the gods work for him. Will Lomas, as pretty a lad as ever served his King and Country, has a row with Squire Kesteven, as bad a villain as ever was killed in an early chapter of a novel of mystery, and Will is, of course, suspect, and his sweetheart believes in him and things go badly and come right in the end. And it is all owing to the cleverness of Mr. Townshend and Mr. Cobban. There is a large demand for such books; well-written but commonplace, story-telling, with "no offence in't," and not much wit or wisdom.

Correspondence.

"MISQUOTATION."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—After reading Mr. H. Cohen's very interesting essay on "Misquotation," I am tempted to offer one or two comments. The author gives "cacoethes scribendi" as the only habitual misquotation from the classics which he can remember. I have not a book of reference at hand; but may not the hackneyed "Maxima debetur pueris reverentia" also serve as an example? Once more, Mr. Cohen thinks that Don Quixote is "laid under contribution to express the impartiality of physical nature, when 'the sun of Heaven' is said 'to shine on the just and the unjust.'" Need I remark that this phrase and the phrase of Cervantes are alike derived from a passage in the Sermon on the Mount?

In the first edition of a popular book an able writer had the couplet referring to the Bible:—

*Liber hic est in quo quaerit sua dogmata quisque;
Invenit et pariter dogmata quisque sua.*

I ventured to remind him that the "Liber hic" contained two false quantities, and that the words should be transposed. He told me that in no one of the numerous reviews of his book had this error been pointed out.

The popular use of the Shakespearean line about "One touch of nature" is a good instance, not indeed of a misquotation, but of an unconscious improvement on the sense of the original—of what might be termed a misapplication for the better.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

LIONEL A. TOLLEMACHE.

48, Albemarle-street, W., April 8.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I have read with great interest Mr. Cohen's paper on Misquotation, but cannot agree with him that general familiarity with the English Bible causes it to be quoted accurately. Not only writers in newspapers and periodicals but preachers—who should be well acquainted with the text—constantly quote the Bible incorrectly. In the Sermons of Cardinal Manning, published when he was an English Archdeacon, a large proportion of the texts cited contain verbal errors.

Is it in consequence of this familiarity that Mr. Cohen goes to Cervantes for: "He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust" (St. Matt., v. 45)?

Yours obediently,

W. SPENCER JACKSON.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Mr. Cohen is no doubt by this time aware that he has himself produced the gem of the collection in attributing to Don Quixote the great saying on "the impartiality of physical nature." It is further curious that he has misquoted Don Quixote, and that Don Quixote misquoted Scripture. Christ's words (as Cervantes knew them) are "Solem suum oriri facit super bonos et malos, et pluit super justos et injustos." Don Quixote inverts the order of the final words:—"Hace salir su sol sobre los buenos y malos, y llueve sobre los injustos y justos." "Shine" for "rise" is almost universal. I may add that the Vulgate, as given above, misquotes the Greek which has "the evil and the good."

April 5.

I am yours faithfully, D. P.

"S. OR ST.?"

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be allowed a brief comment on the sentences in one of the reviews in your yesterday's issue?

"We suppose it is hopeless to protest against the fashion here adopted of writing the letter 'S.' instead of 'St.' before the name of a saint. To the average carnal man 'S. Valentine' suggests the omission of 'Esq.' at the end."

My brief comment would be this. To the average carnal man "St." suggests the word for which it is the invariable abbreviation—viz., street. And "S." is the ordinary old English abbreviation for "Saint." It is very common indeed, for instance, if not universal, in the XVII. century. Moreover it is used by one of the most exact and accurate of living writers, the author of our greatest Constitutional History, the Bishop of Oxford.

Your obedient servant,

W. H. HUTTON.

The Great House, Burford, Oxon, April 7.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The spring publishing season is beginning in earnest, and this year there is some talk of extending the season well into the summer. Mr. Heinemann has again chosen August for the publication of Hall Caine's new novel. Booksellers are anticipating a brisk market until at least the end of June. The trade, so far, has been rather dull as a whole. "We want the Americans over to wake us up," remarked a West-end bookseller to us the other day, for Americans, it seems, are large book-buyers when they come to London. It was a little surprising to learn further that the sale of Lenten devotional books, which used to form an important branch of the booksellers' business in the early spring, has dwindled so much that the trade now regards it as hardly worth taking into serious account. One feature of the season is the enormous output in sixpenny reprints of popular novels. Publishers have been selling these paper-covered editions literally by hundreds of thousands. Messrs. Cassell, for instance, have calculated that with thirteen of their sixpenny editions they have sold 1,250,000 copies, the secret of the success being that the popularity of each book has previously been tested in its more expensive form. Among the new books which have recently run into second editions are Mr. Churton Collins' "Ephemera Critica"; Lady Hodgson's "Siege of Kumassi"; Mr. Frank Bullen's "Sack of Shakings"; and Mr. Barry Pain's "Another Englishwoman's Love Letters." In fiction Mr. Charles Marriott's first novel, "The Column," has had a large sale; and it is also going well in the United States. An American novel which is having an unusual run in this country—where it is being published both by Mr. Fisher Unwin and Mr. Grant Richards—is Mr. Irving Bacheller's "Eben Holden," Mr. Unwin alone having reached a third edition of the book. In America this novel ran through 175,000 copies in three months. Messrs. Methuen's most successful novel of the year, so far, is Mary Findlater's "A Narrow Way," which will shortly reach its third edition. Mrs. Croker's "A State Secret" and Mrs. Dudeney's "The Third Floor," also published by Methuen, are in their second editions. "Babs the Impossible," Sarah Grand's new book, is the latest success on the market, and Mr. Frankfort Moore's "According to Plato"—another of Messrs. Hutchinson's publications—has also sold well. Mr. Frank Mathew's new historical romance (John Long), after hanging fire for some time, has now exhausted its first edition.

We have already referred to Captain Dreyfus' book, of which an English translation entitled "Five Years of My Life" will be published on May 1st by Messrs. George Newnes at the price of 6s. net. The book, which will contain some illustrations by the author, will be issued simultaneously in France, Germany, and the United States. Some extracts from the diary kept on Devil's Island will be given in an article in the May number of the Strand Magazine.

Messrs. Archibald and Co., Limited, write as to the "Paston Letters":—

In Literature of April 6 your reviewer says:—"It would be only fair, we think, that the volume with introduction and supplement should be issued alone to purchasers of the earlier edition. The rest of the world are not likely to let the 'Paston Letters' remain on the publisher's hands."

We beg to point out that the volume containing the introduction and supplement is issued separately, and this fact is generally mentioned in our advertisements. The published price of the volume is 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Constable will publish Mr. George Meredith's new volume of verse, "A Reading of Life, and Other Poems," early in May, and they announce that Volume XII. of the new edition of Smollett—"Miscellanies"—completing the work, will also be ready shortly. This month they are publishing Mr. T. F. Dale's book on "The Eighth Duke of Beaufort and the Badminton Hunt." In fiction they will shortly issue, besides the tales included in our list of "Books to look out for," a new novel by H. and E. Prichard—joint authors of "A Modern Mercenary"—entitled "Karadac"; and for May they promise "The White Cottage," by Zack; "Ensign Knightley, and Other Stories," by A. E. W. Mason; "Marr'd in Making," by Baroness von Hutten, and "Retaliation," by Herbert Flowerdew.

Next month Messrs. Chapman and Hall will publish Mr. George Gissing's new book of travel, "By the Ionian Sea," in which he describes his rambles across the mountains of Calabria and other less known parts of Southern Italy. Messrs. Chapman and Hall are also publishing Mr. Gissing's new novel, "The Charlatan." The series of battle sketches left by Stephen Crane, entitled "Great Battles of the World," will be issued by them during May. The operations dealt with are "Vittoria," "The Siege of Plevna," "The Battle of Bunker Hill," "The Storming of Burkersdorf Heights," "Leipzig and Lutzen," "The Storming of Badajos," "The Brief Campaigns against New Orleans," and "The Battle of Solferino." Mr. John Sloan has illustrated the book.

The first volume of Professor William Ridgeway's work on "The Early Age of Greece" will be published almost immediately by the Cambridge University Press. In it Professor Ridgeway attempts to solve the problem which Dr. Schliemann raised by his excavations at Mycenæ in 1876, when he "lifted the veil which so long enshrouded the elder age of Hellas." He compares the results of later discoveries with the antiquities preserved elsewhere of certain peoples who lived and reigned at Mycenæ, in order to see whether they can be identified as belonging to any race previously known. Professor Ridgeway has examined the literary as well as the monumental data, and tested the trustworthiness of each class with the other.

Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh's "Short History of Greece from the Earliest Times to B.C. 146" in the Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges is also nearly ready. The last chapter is devoted to Greek literary and artistic movements. Another forthcoming addition to the same series is "An Outline History of the British Empire from 1500 to 1870," by Mr. W. H. Woodward, the general editor of the series.

Mr. Justice Kekewich was rash enough last week to say that there was no room for an original remark on any of the best-known plays of Shakespeare. That the thing is still possible would seem to be proved by a forthcoming book called "The Messiah-ship of Shakespeare, sung and expounded by Clelia" (Charles Downing), to be published by Messrs. Greening. The author maintains that Shakespeare creates artistically the religion that Professor Seeley sketched speculatively in "Ecce Homo" and "Natural Religion"; that The Tempest is the artistic counterpart of "Ecce Homo," and "The Sonnets" the artistic counterpart of "Natural Religion"; that Shakespeare, in these two works, presents himself as the exemplar of the ideas which he symbolically teaches.

Mr. Fisher Unwin has been obliged to postpone Captain H. H. P. Deasy's record of his three years' exploration "In Tibet and Chinese Turkestan" in consequence of the great demand for the book from America, but it will be ready shortly. Another important work to be published by Mr. Unwin during the spring is Mr. W. S. Lilly's "Renaissance Types." Touching first upon the genesis of the Renaissance, Mr. Lilly deals with various aspects of the movement as exhibited by Erasmus, the Man of Letters; Luther, the Revolutionist; Sir Thomas More, the Saint; Reuchlin, the Savant; and Michael Angelo, the Artist. The book closes with a chapter on "The Results of the Renaissance."

The next "Temple Classic" (Dent) will be Gilbert White's "Selborne," edited by Mr. C. Weekes and containing reproductions of Bewick's old bird drawings.

The second volume of Captain Phillip Hore's "History of the County of Wexford" will deal with the districts of Tintern Abbey, Rosegarland, and Clonmines, and is compiled from ancient records and State papers, notably at Canterbury and Cambridge, with views and facsimiles, &c. It will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

(a) All up to this point is, of course, pure "book play." The text-move, however, initiates a very ingenious and, we believe, quite original variation invented by Mr. McConnell himself. It invites 6. Q-R5 ch, Q Kt-B3! when if 6. P-Q5, B-B4! and White must stop to play 7. Q Kt-B3, for if, instead, 7. P×Kt, B-Q B7; 8. P×P dia, ch, B×Q; 9. P×R (Q), Q×Q, and Black has won Q and P for R and Kt.

(b) While we think Jones initiative by this move, 9. Kt-Q B3, at once seems far better, for, if then, e.g. 8. * Q Kt-B3, White might play 10. B-Kt5! for if 10. * B×K Kt, then might occur 11. B×B, Kt×Q P; 12. B×Kt, P-R-Q Kt; 13. Q-R4 ch, P-Q B3 (best); 14. B×P ch! Q Kt×B; 15. B×Kt, B×B; 16. Q×Kt ch, and should win.

(c) Best. 19. * R×Q; 20. B×Q, Q R×B; 21. P-Q Kt4, R-Q B7; 22. P-Q B5, &c., would be distinctly inferior.

(d) 22. * Q-Q2 seems his only sound response.

(e) 23. Q×R P (ch) was, we believe, a far stronger, if not a winning move for White, for best, 23. * K×Q; 24. P×Q, Q-R-Q B; 25. Kt-Q2, R×P; 26. Q-R-Q B, &c., with a P ahead and equal, if not better, game.

BLACK. MCCONNELL.

WHITE. DAMERON.

White to play his twenty-third move.

(f) 24. P-Q Kt3 was, we think, much better.

(g) Best. 26. * Kt×P, now, would be answered by 27. Kt×R P! Kt-Kt3; 28. R×K ch, K×R; 29. B-Q B, &c.

(h) A vain attempt to save his P at B7 by sacrificing that at Q B4. Seemingly 27. B-Q B was in order.

(i) Not 30. R-Q B3, for then 30. * P-Kt6 and wins!

(j) Black has now a distinct superiority in force and position, but still a terribly hard game to win. The end-game is very interesting and well played on both sides.

(k) His best move to try for a possible win.

(l) Very inferior. 60. R-K B ch looks best, as, of course, the Black K cannot take, and White gains a move.

(m) And this directly throws away the game, which, we believe, might, almost surely, have been drawn by 62. * K-R2, instead.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We understand that Mr. Justin McCarthy intends before very long to bring the "History of Our Own Times" down to the close of Queen Victoria's reign. At present he is engaged at the other end of his historical task in telling the story of Queen Anne's reign, to precede the "History of the Four Georges and William the Fourth."

Recently we quoted Mr. Gosse's vigorous denunciation of the Widow as the "triumph of the unfittest" in the matter of biography. A remarkable illustration of the Widow as literary executrix is supplied by a recent incident in Paris. It recalls the motive of one of the most striking of the tales in Mr. Henry James' "The Soft Side"—namely, the story which he called "The Abasement of the Northmores," but which might have been entitled "Save us from our Widows."

What has happened is this. M. Jules Claretie recently published in the Temps the results of his examination of Michelet's papers at the Library of the Carnavalet Museum. He extracted a number of passages from Michelet's Journal Intime and his Journal des Idées. These were instantly recognized by every one but himself as having already appeared in the volume published in 1888 by Madame Michelet under the title Mon Journal. But between M. Claretie's text and that published Vol. VIII. No. 16.

by Michelet's widow there were numerous and important variations. They were, indeed, so great as to cause a shock of surprise and regret to all those who had never questioned the claim of Madame Michelet to the halo of esteem and even of admiration with which her husband had surrounded her. A painful suspicion discrediting all Michelet's posthumous works as published by his wife, Adèle Mialaret, was at once created by this revelation. Madame Michelet seemed to have submitted all his manuscripts to positive profanation. Yet she had passed as the model of literary executors. For twenty-five years she had exercised control over his published and unpublished works, and she may have dealt with them in other cases as cavalierly as she is shown to have done in this.

These revelations have evoked from M. Descaves, in the Echo de Paris, a protest against the "monstrous regiment" of Widows in the matter of their husbands' literary remains. We quote M. Descaves in the full flow of his indignation:—

French contemporary literature abounds in widows comfortably installed in their husbands' work as in a cheese which they scoop out up to the crust. It is their means of subsistence, their occupation for their old age. It would be far better for them—and for us—if they did crochet and tapestry work instead of patching up manuscripts. But they are persuaded that they have a mission to fulfil. Rising betimes, en négligé, with échenilloir [caterpillar destroyer] and pruning shears in hand, they scour, in every sense of the word, the domain of intelligence and work of which the management and preservation has been so imprudently left to them. No gardener ever did his trimming with so good a courage. And so—I prune you, I give you air, I make "cuttings," allez donc! The results of this method of cultivation are heart-breaking; the poor plants, tied up and stunted, produce little of the fine crop of former days, when enlightened care stimulated their growth.

But the widow, established for all time as universal collaboratrice, is well satisfied, and walks triumphantly, not only, alas! in the paths, but over the devastated flower borders. She will have, so they say, her revenge—her revenge for the inferior rôle of copyist to which the writer has reduced her—violating his thought, now that he is no longer there to defend and preserve it from contamination. It is the hour watched and waited for, the hour of revenge and of pillage. The widow hurls herself on the manuscripts, as on her lawful prey, to destroy them. This is what she describes as "to gather together with religious care all that contributes to the completeness of his resurrection." I have often heard the wish expressed that an artist or writer might have a cultivated companion like Madame Michelet. Thanks for the gift! In preference to such a woman, erudite and self-willed, how much sooner would I, for my part, choose you, ye wives obscure, ignorant, and devout; widows truly loyal who preserve your beloved heritage intact, and do not think it necessary, after performing the toilet of the dead for burial, to subject to the same process those dusty manuscripts which you carry to an editor.

We have often thought that novelists might sometimes with advantage do what Mr. R. S. Warren Bell does in his "Love the Laggard." He gives us a list of dramatis personæ at the beginning. Of course there is not the same reason for giving them in a novel as there is in a theatre programme from which we want to learn the names of the actors. And it might be urged that we do not want a guide to a novel as we do to a play. The list of characters, too, might give a reader quite the wrong idea of the book. Still such a list might often encourage one to go a little further. And the practice might assist a definiteness in characterization which is often much to seek. At any rate editors of reprints might bear the suggestion in mind. What a help it would be if one might take up a volume of Dickens as one can a volume of Shakespeare, and know at once which of the familiar characters belong to the particular book in hand !

General Sir H. E. Colville is engaged upon a book describing "The Work of the Ninth Division," which will be published by Mr. Edward Arnold next month. It includes a brief account of the operations under Lord Methuen for the relief of Kimberley, in which General Colville was engaged prior to the formation of the Ninth Division, of the capture of Cronje at Paardeberg, Sanna's Post, the Lindley affair, and numerous other engagements.

The recent revival in the artistic crafts has long called for a standard series of technical handbooks. Mr. W. R. Lethaby, a director of the London County Council Central School of Arts and Crafts—who has just been appointed Professor of Design at South Kensington—is editing such a series, and it is to be published by Mr. John Hogg, of Paternoster-row, at a price which brings it within everybody's reach. A start will shortly be made with a volume by Mr. Douglas Cockerell on "The Craft of Bookbinding and the Preservation of Books." Mr. Cockerell is himself designing the cover as well as writing the letterpress, and for type we understand that he has chosen a Caslon fount. Mr. Cockerell will have something to say on the subject of the Society of Arts Committee on Leathers for Bookbinding, of which he is a member. Other books in the series are to be "Gold and Silver Smiths' Work" and "Cabinet Making and Designing," by Mr. H. Wilson and Mr. C. Spooner respectively—both experts who are qualified to speak on the subjects and both, like Mr. Cockerell, officially connected with the Arts and Crafts School.

Mysteries have always been popular—however the word may be understood—from the days of mystery plays to that of mystery novels. But despite the success of "Junius," the commercial value of a mysterious author is only just beginning to be recognized. The success of the so far anonymous "Love Letters" is rapidly bearing fruit. Mr. Lane announces a novel, "The Aristocrats," by "the most beautiful woman in London." This is a mystery it would be rash to try to solve. Another secret is guarded in the case of "Colloquies of Criticism," as to which Mr. Fisher Unwin announces that he is not allowed to know anything of his author "save that he is a famous man of letters !" Where is this new method of stimulating the sales of anonymous books likely to end ?

The curiosity of one may almost say the whole of France centred last Thursday round the French Academy when M. Emile Faguet was admitted to the seat left vacant by Cherbuliez. The interest taken in the ceremony is not due to M. Faguet only, despite his high position as a critic and the wide range of his criticism—as shown once again by his latest book entitled "Problèmes Politiques du Temps Présent" (Colin). What has excited the public is the fact that M. Faguet was officially received by M. Emile Ollivier, the unfortunate Minister of Napoleon III. Rightly or wrongly, he has been held responsible by an entire nation for the supposed frivolity of the phrase he uttered in the Chamber of Deputies in defence of the war policy of the Empire. The notorious "cœur léger" has rung in his ears for more than a quarter of a century. Until last Thursday, poor M. Emile Ollivier had never been allowed to appear on any stage, political or academic, without insult. True, in 1892, he read the report on the Monthyon Prize ; but, until then, his associates had seized every possible pretext to deprive him of his rights. At Thiers' death, as also when Henri Martin died, he, as temporary Director of the Academy, should have delivered the panegyric, but the same political reasons were found to deprive him of the honour. At last he is allowed to step forth from his enforced seclusion, and he has had the good taste to deliver an address devoid of political allusions. In his discussion, which was purely literary, there are remarkable portraits of Balzac and Comte.

* * * * THE TABERNACLE. * * *

Crag upon crag and the dark lough below—

Only my heart climbs ever unto thee !

Here, where the mountain rears its sunlit snow

Comes like a wraith, thine image unto me.

Gleam of far waters (silver braids of light

On Day's fair garment) makes my world divine—

O, that thy face could keep this heaven bright !

O, that thy lidded eyes could once more shine !

Some lilt of motion in the risen grass,

Some stir of incense when the bloom is sweet,

Some flow'r-smile o'er which thy face did pass,

Tells of the soil that once detained thy feet !

I, climbing, halt by many a heather-hill,

God's earth upon my hand, the bread of thought ;

There, league on league, the waters lie—and still Comes thy remembrance all the land athwart !

Till, at the last, the wind blows strong and cold—

Care, like a kestrel, pauses in the air :

Dear soul ! with thy lost love my heart unfold—

The spirit reach, the tabernacle share !

A little time ago we mentioned a curious mistake made by Browning, to which Mr. Roger Fry called attention when he was lecturing at the Albert Hall. Browning makes Filippo Lippi allude to Masaccio as a "youngster" who "comes to our convent, studies what I do." Masaccio was, in fact, Lippi's senior by about five years, and died many years before him. A correspondent has sent us a very interesting letter from Browning himself on the point. It deals also, as will be seen, with another error to which Browning pleaded guilty, and subsequently altered. Our correspondent writes :—

In 1866, when I was 23 years old, I was very familiar with the three-volume edition of Browning's Poetical Works, and I noticed what appeared to be two errors :—(1) In the poem "Transcendentalism" Browning called Boehme "Swedish." The lines are :—

As Swedish Boehme never cared for plants

Until it happened, a-walking in the fields,

He noticed all at once that plants could speak,

Nay, turned with loosened tongue to talk with him.

He changed "Swedish," I think, to "German." My own belief is that Browning was thinking of Swedenborg. In his letter to me he speaks of an "Autobiography" by Boehme. Was he thinking of Swedenborg's Spiritual Diary ? This is Browning's letter :—

19, Warwick-crescent, Upper Westbourne-terrace, London, Oct. 13, '66.

My dear Sir,—I was out of reach when your very kind and welcome letter arrived here—you guessed this, I will believe—hence these very tardy thanks for it. The first blunder you point out is enormous—only explicable to myself, and hardly that, from the circumstances under which I well remember having written the poem "Transcendentalism." I was three parts thro' it, when called to assist a servant to whom a strange accident, partly serious, partly ludicrous, had suddenly happened, and after a quarter of an hour's agitation, of a varied kind, I went back to my room and finished what I had begun. I have never touched the piece since—and really suppose that the putting "Swedish" for "German," or "Goerlitzish" is attributable just to that, for I knew something of Boehme, and his autobiography, and how he lived mainly, and died in the Goerlitz where he was born. But the thought in my head was of that revelation he describes—not of his nationality—hence, I hope, my blunder and such excuse as it may admit of. Depend on it, I will alter the word in the next edition—ay, and look more warily after what may be other slips of the kind.

But—here I get up from my knee and assure you there is no slip in the other case—at least, I was wide awake when I made Fra Lippo the elder practitioner of art, if not—as I believe—the earlier born. I looked into the matter carefully long ago, and long before I thought of my own poem, from my interest in the Brancacci frescoes—indeed, in all early Florentine art. I believe the strange confusions and mistakes of Vasari are set tolerably right now; you may know, he took Lippino the son, for Lippo the father. I suppose Lippo to have been born—as Baldinucci says—about 1400; he entered the Carmine aged eight years, and immediately "in cambio di studiare, non faceva altro che imbrattare con fantocci i libri"; let us assume even, with the last editors of Vasari, that he was born in 1412, and that this entrance took place in 1420—still, since it is certain that Masaccio did not begin the paintings in the Brancacci before 1440—you see there was a good score of years wherein Lippo might well work and Masaccio watch him working. The editor sums up "Se le pitture del Chiostrò e della Chiesa del Carmine furono fatte da Lippo quando vestiva l'abito Carmelitano, bisognerebbe conghietture con ragione che le pitture sue furono poi e studiate e imitate da Masaccio"—which is my own reasonable conjecture. Masaccio was born in 1402, and, as Vasari writes in his life, "lavorava nel Carmine seguitando sempre le vestigie di Filippo." But all that Life is a tissue of errors. I could never have had these facts shaken out of my head, even by the crying and laughing of poor W., my servant, aforementioned.

But—thank you just as heartily in this case as in the former. I don't deserve such kind care about my works—but am very grateful for it, all the same; and shall ever be,

My dear Sir, yours most truly,

ROBERT BROWNING.

On the second point he admits no error. I am no authority, but I was wholly unconvinced by his defence, and (leaving the decision to others) I still think that he erred.

The thought may have occurred to some readers of Mr. Herman Cohen's article on "Misquotation" which we published a fortnight ago, and as to which another Quotations. correspondent writes to us to-day, that the standard of accuracy there laid down was rather exacting.

The phrase which popular usage appropriates for its own purposes often becomes transformed—it is no longer a quotation but a familiar idiom retaining a very loose connexion with its original. Of course, if it continues to shelter itself under the prestige of its inventor, it must not play him false. But, even so, perhaps an inch or two of licence may be conceded. We do not do Juvenal much wrong if we say "Cacoethes scribendi," despite the fact that the exigencies of hexameter verse made him say "Scribendi cacoethes." But accuracy always has its value, if only as a principle; and slovenly quoting not only betokens a slovenly mind, but often does gross injustice to a fine line, as in "They kept the even tenor of their way"—a mere travesty of Gray's "They kept the noiseless tenor of their way." The Saturday Review of last week, however, in an interesting article on "Quotability" hints an apology for misquotation which would in certain circumstances make the practice respectable. It defends, at any rate, the misquotations of Lamb as "the mark of a good memory and a well-stored mind." There may be, in fact, higher and lower forms of the art of misquotation, and it may sometimes be a proof not of ignorance but of knowledge. Another instance might be given of a writer who had not "just enough of learning to misquote," but so much learning that misquotation became pardonable—viz., Isaak Walton, who seems to have found pleasure in drawing upon a richly-stored memory, and would not mar that "contemplative man's recreation" by anything so businesslike and prosaic as "verification." But these are examples to be condoned rather than followed, and for "us others" it were better not to quote at all than to misquote. Why, indeed, should we quote at all? It is a question which should be asked much more frequently than seems to be thought necessary. The fact that nothing gives more pain to a properly-constituted mind than the use of a hackneyed quotation proves that there is a virtue in quotation, and that it is not simply an instrument of language fitted for rough wear and common daily use. Selden gives his reasons for quoting with great candour. He quotes authors mostly as witnesses, for matters of fact; but also "sometimes for a free expression, and then I give the author his due and gain myself praise by reading him." This desire to "gain myself praise" is responsible for many errors, not only of quotation, but of style. Selden does not show a right understanding of quotation. Its true intent is for the delight of the reader by granting him a momentary glimpse into a world of fine ideas, by lifting him for a moment into the higher atmosphere of "style," by linking his train of thought to those universal truths which have been carved once for all into beautiful shapes. Or it may achieve its purpose by an unexpected or humorous aptness, as when Elia contemplates his roast pig snatched away from "the grossness and indocility which too often accompany maturer swinehood":—

Ere sin could blight or sorrow fade,
Death came with timely care.

As a literary embellishment it should not be too utilitarian. "Quoting of authors for matter of fact" is a work of science, not of art; and even the higher use of quotation as a means of tersely uttering sage and appropriate reflections does not put it on its true basis. The Saturday Reviewer, who, however, is discussing rather the origin of quotations than their use, is too much inclined, we think, to require of a quotation that it should embody a sentiment or a judgment, and to find its popularity in the fact that the thought it conveys is one universally approved. A list of the most familiar quotations would not, like a list of familiar proverbs, reveal any large body of common thought. It is a matter chiefly of expression only; many of them taken by themselves are mere phrases without matter—"Uno avulso non deficit alter aureus"; "For this relief much thanks"; "Non ragioniam di lor, ma guarda e passa"; and a thousand others—the bearing of them lies in the application. Nor is the origin of quotations due simply to the familiarity of the source from which they are derived. It is often due to a mere accident. "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever" wins its position because it is the first line of a poem, though the poem is certainly familiar. Few read Addison's Cato; but a single line of it—"Tis not in mortals to command success," &c.—has attained immortality. Nothing is more interesting in a good Dictionary of Quotations than to find from what obscure sources so many of them are derived. Some happy chance at the moment of its birth has often wrested a phrase from its context and launched it down the ages. Quotations are full of old and dim memories, and that is one secret of the strange magic they possess in the hands of those who have the cunning to use them as they ought to be used.

Personal Views.

THE TECHNICAL ELEMENT IN FICTION.

There is a great and growing body of fiction, especially in the United States, which is written, by men who have worked, about the very work on which they have been engaged. It possesses all that actuality which comes from the most intimate personal acquaintance with railroads or telegraphs or mining or the work of logging camps; and though it is classed as fiction it is in reality that transcribed experience which has an attraction very seldom given to the made fiction of the ordinary novelist. It sometimes happens that it is a trifle difficult to follow by reason of its technicalities, but, nevertheless, the reader who does not know a "drawhead" from a "patent injector" must delight in the knowledge that he is face to face with real things at only one remove. This constitutes the value of the new "plein air" school of fiction. It is as different from the studio novels of most English writers as Constable is from Sir Peter Lely. It is, in fact, a return to nature.

The Americans have returned to reality more easily than their English fellows. They have had less to contend with in the nature of tradition. And in the United States the critic, for many reasons, is of less account than his European confrère as the repository of that body of doctrine. In England it is very difficult for a man to write fiction without knowing it. In the Western States much good work has been done by men who knew nothing of writing as an art. Their estate is somewhat the more gracious, as they have not been dominated by the dead. And I do not doubt that they have exerted, and will continue to exert, a strong influence of a healthy naturalistic kind. For they deal very largely with the actual struggles of real men face to face with nature, while the greater portion of the old European school still remains contented with mere re-combinations of worn-out themes and motives, whereby style is exalted and the story is nothing, not even new.

This actual knowledge of the affairs of real men (in which it may be noted women play a naturally small part) has a great attraction for the newer writers even in England. But owing to the generally inferior education of Englishmen the manual worker is not yet gifted with a voice. He is not even capable of writing for a newspaper. As a result, work of this kind has been written rather by the better class of "scallywag," who is only casually acquainted with the trade he deals with, than by the trained man. The success which such work has attained has led better writers to attempt this kind of fiction at second-hand, and, though a second-hand knowledge of reality is better than no knowledge at all, the result is often incommensurate with the toil involved. It is certainly inferior to knowledge learnt naturally, digested, assimilated, and turned into "work" by a true physiological process. And it is a process curiously fertile in technical errors.

It is possibly a misuse of the term "technical error" to say that the greatest error of this kind is the forcing of one's knowledge on the reader. It is a fault often to be found in the best men of the modern school. It perhaps matters nothing when a fertile writer without knowledge writes seriously of a Colonel rushing into the firing line in a general engagement and there seizing a rifle and "potting away"; but when a novelist of reputation loads his pages with undigested drill-book, it is not only wearisome but absurd. If a man really knows a thing his knowledge becomes artistic of itself, and is easily borne. As a great physician said:—"We do that best which we do easiest," and nothing is truer than this in fiction, although writers are naturally inclined to plume themselves on those works of theirs which cost them the most conscious labour. If a writer desires to write about things which he does not know he must choose one of two methods. He must either pretend to know or must adopt the attitude of the observer who is learning. But for him to play the rôle of the man who knows is peculiarly difficult. Knowledge is no more immediately translatable into work than is food. It has to be digested. To listen to a smart sailorman telling a story to his mates may not always teach the way to tell a sea story, but it will go near to it. For the storyteller knows what he is talking about, and everything essential is easily suggested to those who know with him. And though the public may not know what is right or wrong in technique, it should be treated as if it did, or else the workshop is obtruded and the due effect is spoiled. For instance, Marryat never explains his sea work, and only goes into details when treating of something which even few sailors comprehend, such as "club-hauling" a ship, and then he carries his explanation of the manoeuvre no further than to make it easily comprehensible to seamen.

It is true that genius may sometimes construct a story which is wrong in every technical detail and is yet wonderful. Oliver Madox Browne in the "Black Swan" made a ship which never sailed on any sea but that of romance. She had, so far as one can gather, neither cargo nor ballast in her; yet even so his toy ship was a marvel, though she "rocked" instead of rolling. But there is no doubt that technical accuracy in the story would have improved it. For such accuracy is a witness to knowledge and a means of ease. It is this ease which is really artistic. Mere strength in the athlete is nothing without ease. And even if the "man who knows" can find no fault with a story he is often or always conscious when knowledge has been "got up" rather than absorbed. I remember handing a well-known sea poem by a better known writer to a sailor for his opinion. His judgment was that it contained no particular error, but that it was, nevertheless, "all wrong."

The endeavour to be accurate is one of the signs of the advance towards naturalism in fiction. And the writer who is conscientious will always improve in this matter, since one real error may easily destroy the whole apparatus of illusion. It would be difficult to say what the feelings of a sailor are when he comes across such an extraordinary error as that of Robert Louis Stevenson in "Treasure Island," when he wrote "'Luff,' said he, and I put the helm up." However great the power of a writer he cannot afford to make many such mistakes when dealing with a public whose general knowledge increases. Stevenson, however, made fewer errors as time went by, and his later sea stories contain no such blemishes as the one mentioned, or as that other in the same book where he puts down a compass bearing in absurd and contradictory notation.

The very general desire among writers to work in some new field is responsible for many of these errors. And in a book which deals with any great portion of life there is a not unnatural tendency to display intimacy with all branches of the subject. For instance, a writer who is essentially middle-class by training and education (as most writers are) finds it necessary to be acquainted with the upper classes. Having made a fair attempt at this pretence he ends in believing he really knows what he does not know, and becomes ridiculous. Or another has some medical knowledge of the slightest kind and turns it into material by means of a handy text-book. He either makes mistakes or exhibits the source of his knowledge. It is probable that the latter is the most fatal blunder, for a novelist need not know medicine, and it is not necessary to criticize him when he talks of "brain fever." But when he writes of "cerebritis" or "meningitis" he usually confuses the two, or is so fearfully accurate as to suggest a weary hour with a note-book over Professor Clifford Allbutt. In the old days a man died very successfully of "brain fever" or "heart disease" and no one was disturbed, even if a physician smiled when he discovered that in fiction acute inflammatory diseases of the brain were rarely fatal.

Mr. Kipling has been the great apostle of technical accuracy, and there is no doubt that he usually is accurate. Nevertheless, he is most fascinating when the reader knows he is dealing with matters that he absorbed rather than "got up." And even he makes errors now and again. What, for instance, is a "patent truss" in bridge building? Can a truss be patented any more than a cantilever? Such errors—and there are very few, I acknowledge—would have no importance were it not that a certain class of story depends entirely on the assumption that the writer knows absolutely. In such cases a single error vitiates the underlying, unseen, major premiss of the artistic syllogism. In more than one instance of late years a writer has founded a story very largely on a supposed knowledge of Mahomedans, when it is obvious to the least instructed Orientalist that Moslems have never even been observed by the story-teller. The very attitude of the Oriental mind has been misinterpreted. I can recall one very notorious instance in which certain Arab Mollahs are cousins-german to the Covenanters masquerading in flowing robes. It may be said that such a lack of knowledge makes little difference to the tale. It makes all the difference from a literary point of view if literature be interpreted, as I imagine it must be, as a witness to the truth of the subjective writer or the objective world.

This, indeed, is the highest form of technical accuracy, and to treat of it would be to treat of the very basis of art, or of its two bases, things seen and the seer of things. And here accuracy becomes sincerity, without which art does not exist, since sincerity alone produces true illusion. The search for knowledge to be used merely as the apparatus of illusion is almost necessarily insincere. It smacks of the theatre and of the pay-box. The artist works on what he has assimilated, and if he becomes great it is because he grows. To put down to-day what was learnt yesterday is to work for to-morrow only.

MORLEY ROBERTS.

IN DEFENCE OF IZAAK WALTON.*

[By Mr. R. B. MARSTON.]

In his "Kings of the Rod, Rifle, and Gun," two handsome and most attractive volumes, "Thormanby" has produced a work really worthy of the praise which is so often unworthily bestowed on a book on sport—viz., that it "deserves a place in every sportsman's library." A critic in the Athenæum suggests that from remarks here and there throughout the volumes the impression is conveyed that the author is "more conversant with the mysteries of book-making than with those of sport"; but it would have been impossible for one who was not a practical sportsman—and a most experienced one at that—to write with the spirit and knowledge and genuine love of sport which is displayed by "Thormanby." One of the charms of sport with rod and gun is its infinite variety and the wide range in views which it allows equally good sportsmen to hold on the same subject. In support of his insinuation the critic in question says that "'Thormanby' makes merry over John Younger's opinion that a salmon fly represents a shrimp, and seems to think that the modern practical angler believes that trout flies alight on the top of the water, rather than rise from the bottom." But the question as to what salmon think salmon flies represent is not settled and never will be, and what "Thormanby" is merry over is honest John's idea that "shrimps are as varied in their colours as a flock of fancy pigeons," and he asks "had John ever seen a shrimp in its native state? I trow not. He was thinking, no doubt, of boiled shrimps as Victor Hugo was of boiled lobsters, when he described that crustacean as 'the cardinal of the sea.'" The paragraph about the trout flies is too long to quote, but there is not a word in it to show that "Thormanby" thinks differently from the modern practical angler; in fact, if he had not corrected Younger's dogmatic half-truths he would have laid himself open to the imputation of being as ignorant of the higher branches of fly-fishing, especially dry fly-fishing, and trout fly entomology, as Younger was himself.

What an angler may fall out with "Thormanby" about is that while he puts the "rod" first in his title, he gives the gun and the rifle nearly three times as much space in his book. What the angler who loves the "Compleat Angler" and its author must fall out with him about is the, in some respects, unfair and untrue picture which he gives of Walton and his work. I say in some respects, for nothing could be handsomer than many of the compliments he pays Izaak; but to shake a man by the one hand and then knock him down with the other is not grateful or comforting, and I heartily wish Walton were with us to reply for himself; I question if "Thormanby" would find him quite so "meek" or wanting in "devil" as he imagines.

To begin with the compliments. In noticing Sir Humphry Davy's work "Thormanby" says:—"But as a piece of literature, eloquent and poetical as 'Salmonia' often is, it cannot bear comparison with 'The Compleat Angler.'" The subtle charm, the sweet simplicity, the living, breathing freshness, the racy redolence of Nature, which have made the London linen-draper's homely volume a joy for ever to all who love true literature—all these are lacking in Sir Humphry Davy's pages." This is all very nice and true, but why add that "as a treatise on angling 'Salmonia' is so immeasurably superior to old Izaak's immortal classic that to compare the two is ridiculous"? Why not say at once that one was written nearly two hundred years before the other? According to "Thormanby," "The Compleat Angler" is a perfect "Cyclopædia of errors," and he gives some specimens, and then adds:—"All these things and a thousand others equally ludicrous to the well-informed person of the nineteenth century Master Izaak Walton believed in." The italics in the passage just quoted are mine. Let us see how far the charge of credulity against Walton and of making thousands of errors can be substantiated by the specimens.

"Thormanby" alleges that Walton believed "that pike are generated from the pickerel weed." Walton mentions the old idea that some pikes are bred of pickerel weed and other glutinous matter, "or are brought into some ponds from such other ways as is past man's finding out, of which we have daily testimonies." But it is hardly fair not to add that Walton's account is qualified by saying "unless Gesner be much mistaken," especially as he gives a perfectly true account a little farther on of exactly how pike are bred—evidently from his own observation. "Thormanby" says Walton believed "that frogs settle on the heads of carp and ride the fish to death." Walton gives this story as told him by a gentleman who had it happen to carp in his own pond, and Walton says he believed him, and so do I, for it is a known fact and was fully described in the Deutsche Fischerei Zeitung some years ago; it is also referred to in the Standard of May 14, 1870. That eels are bred "either of dew or out of the corruption of the earth" is not asserted by Walton; he merely mentions that "some say" it is, so, he giving a much more rational account of the matter. And of the other wonderful things that "Thormanby" says Walton "believed," all he does is to quote them as being asserted by writers who were then considered learned authorities. He does not say that "the marrow of the thigh bone of a heron is a great temptation to any fish" on his own authority, but that "an old angler" told him it was—a very different matter. I have never tried it, but see no reason to doubt it; fish, like other animals, are strongly affected by some scents. "Thormanby" wishes Walton had exercised his own powers of observation a little more and trusted less to learned writers, and thinks that in this respect he was infinitely inferior to Gilbert White; and yet White, writing a hundred years after Walton, says, "It is strange that the matter with regard to the venom of toads has not yet been settled;" gives a very erroneous account of the May fly, for which he is complimented on his observation by Pennant; and leaves us somewhat in doubt as to whether he believed the story of the swallows hibernating "under water." This is what he says, and if Walton had said it we should have been told he believed it. White, after describing how swallows roost in the osier beds at Sunbury, &c., goes on:—

Now this resorting towards that element, at that season of the year, seems to give some countenance to the Northern opinion (strange as it is) of their retiring under water. A Swedish naturalist is so much persuaded of that fact that he talks, in his calendar of "Flora," as familiarly of the swallow's going under water in the beginning of September as he would of his poultry going to roost a little before sunset.

I acquiesce entirely in your opinion—that, though most of the swallow kind may migrate, yet that some do stay behind and hide with us during the winter.

I wonder what Mr. R. Bowdler Sharpe will have to say to this and other of White's observations in the new edition he is editing of "The Natural History of Selborne." As the Athenæum critic says, when referring to "Thormanby's" severity on Walton's "credulity," "It may be that some present beliefs, if examined, would stand the test no better than old Izaak's."

I took my first theoretical lessons in angling from Walton nearly forty years ago, and the longer I live the more admiration I have for him, not only as a writer, but as an exponent of the delightful art of angling. To say, as "Thormanby" does, that Walton knew nothing about the habits of trout and salmon and how to fish for them is to ignore all that he wrote on the subject. His account of the life-history of the salmon and trout is, for the period, wonderfully accurate—especially of the trout—and as to his not being a trout angler, we have Charles Cotton's testimony that Walton was "undoubtedly the best angler with a minnow for trout in England," and that he used both the natural and artificial. Cotton's repeated and hearty testimony to Walton's skill as an angler demolishes the sneers of Franck or any subsequent writer—"He understands as much of fish and fishing as any man living"; in another place he refers to him as the "great master in the art of angling, for so in truth he is."

To say, as "Thormanby" does, that Walton was "not a fighting man" may be true, but it does not warrant the inference that "he was the very embodiment of the prudent and pacific bourgeois to whom the thought of risking his skin is abhorrent." Walton was fifty years old when the Civil War broke out, and yet nearly ten years later we find him not only risking his skin but his life. After the battle of Worcester (Sept. 3rd, 1651) Walton performed a service for his King of the peril of which there can be no doubt. Cromwell and his Parliament had declared "that whoever shall assist the King with Horse, Arms, Plate, or Money against them, are Traytors"—and they had a short "sharp way of dealing with traytors." And yet we find that one Royalist prisoner at Stafford, Robert Milward, selects "the trusty hands" of Mr. Izaak Walton to convey the King's "lesser George" jewel to another Royalist prisoner—Colonel Blague, in the Tower of London, who, escaping soon after, had the gratification of restoring the George to the King. We know from his writings that Walton was a staunch Royalist, but this incident proves that he was recognized and trusted as such by his party at a time when their prospects were darkest.

Of the other "Kings of the Rod and Gun" I may, with the Editor's permission, have something to say later on. "Thormanby's" account of them is by a long way the most fascinating and interesting book on sport and sportsmen that has been published for many years.

P.S.—Since writing the above I have heard from Mr. R. Bowdler Sharpe that while White certainly never believed swallows passed the winter under water, "the theory of hibernation of swallows was the ordinary one of his day. White gave his evidence pro and con with his usual judgment, but never committed himself."

This is exactly the position from which Walton should be judged. I have the greatest admiration for Gilbert White, and agree with Mr. Sharpe that he is "the best ideal of an exact field naturalist, and the father of all the British school;" but even Homer nods.

THE VOICE OF OLD LONDON.

At last the voice of Old London has become, so to say, officially articulate. For years the pickaxe of the utilitarian has struck at the heart of "the flower of cities all"; but, save for the protest of a few so-called sentimentalists—echoed occasionally by the Press during Parliamentary vacation and when no sensational murder trial is in progress—there has been silence. Old London, to regard it as a personality, has been patient over-long; stoicism may become a crime. Wherein consists the appeal of London, that appeal which differentiates it from the cities of the new world? Do the thoughtful find paramount pleasure in great shops, vast warehouses, unlovely blocks of flats; or, rather, do they not discern the spirit of London dwelling in the Abbey Church of Westminster, standing on what once was the island of Thorney, in St. Paul's Cathedral and the ancient City churches, in Staple Inn, and in a hundred other relics of a richly-dowered past? The truth is that the atmosphere of London, of England, of Europe—and art and literature no less than life, whence art and literature issue, depend on atmosphere—is indissolubly bound up with a hundred thousand yesterdays; destroy the architectural children of those yesterdays and we lose a measure of our heritage. The public hardly recognize that it is folly to give with the right hand money for children to be educated, with the other to pull down a fine old seventeenth century palace to make way for a Board school. Book learning can be imparted anywhere; a Jacobean mansion in a parish must ever conduce to enlightenment, to a more living interest in the history, in the arts and crafts of the past. The structure razed, this source of truest education is lost for ever.

It is for these reasons, among many others, that all who are genuinely interested in literature, art, science, or history will welcome the publication, under the auspices of the London County Council, of "The Survey of London," the first of a number of volumes wherein authentic information will, it is hoped, be given of buildings which, by reason either of historic associations or architectural significance, are worthy of preservation. Some five years ago, on the motion of Sir John Lubbock, now Lord Avebury, the Council resolved to pay heed when practicable to the contemplated destruction of any important monument. But in the absence of trustworthy registers it not seldom happens that effective action is impossible. A conference of various societies was held in December, 1897, when it was determined, as an initial step, to aim at the compilation of such a register; moreover, in 1898 the County Council obtained Parliamentary powers to purchase and, if need be, preserve valuable historical landmarks. Even to the inexperienced it is apparent that to survey London systematically, with a view to gathering up threads of the past, is a gigantic undertaking. Fortunately it chanced—although the word is hardly applicable to a work at that time so thankless and so difficult—that the Committee for the Survey of the Memorials of Greater London had already collected a large amount of material, and this they generously offered to hand over to the Council, stipulating that it should be printed. On this committee Mr. C. R. Ashbee was, and still is, an active and enthusiastic worker, and to him we are in large part indebted for the new volume.

At first it was hoped to deal with ten parishes in the initial work, but, even with utmost condensation, it has been found possible to treat one only—Bromley-by-Bow. We must express regret that no mention is made of the derivation of the place-name. Bromley is generally traced to A.S. brom-leag, a field or heath where broom grows, and Bow serves to remind us that the Consort of Henry I., in order the more easily to make her pilgrimages, caused a fine arched bridge to be thrown over the Lea hereabouts, thus superseding the crossing at Old Ford. Mr. Ashbee contributes a concise and able preface: he appeals to the historical conscience, points out the unstatesmanlike folly of not, when practicable, saving from destruction monuments of a vanishing past, and pleads for the establishment of museums, not “hugger-mugger” in character, but such as shall contain objects of direct local interest. The love of humanity is reached by stages of the family, the village community, the country; and it is no less true that a thirst for larger knowledge is born of knowledge and interest in one's immediate surroundings. We commend to all thoughtful folk Mr. Ashbee's introduction.

One of the tables in the volume is at once useful as a signal of warning and deplorably long as a record of fact. It gives details of the buildings destroyed during the last six years within the Administrative County of London. The Old Bell Inn, Holborn, last of the galleried coaching hostels on the Middlesex side; Wren's churches of St. Michael, Wood-street, beneath whose floor, according to tradition, the head of James II. of Scotland was thrown by a master glazier, temp. Elizabeth, and St. Michael, Bassishaw, its name reminiscent of the powerful family of Basing; Dick's Coffee-house, often alluded to in eighteenth century literature; the Rolls Chapel, containing Torrignano's monument of Dr. Young; the last fragment of the old Priory in Mitre-square, Aldgate—these are a few only of the voices of Old London stilled during the past six years. Subsequent lists indicate buildings swept away outside the Administrative County of London, but within the confines of the Greater London Survey, and those threatened in the two areas to which attention has been given.

But to come to the Survey proper. Accounts, descriptive, historical, bibliographical, are given of sixteen buildings or blocks of buildings in Bromley-by-Bow, each of genuine interest. Of these no less than six have been destroyed during the compilation of the work, while at least two others were threatened. Nothing has remained for long of the old church of St. Mary, originally the chapel of that of St. Leonard's Convent, where Chaucer's Prioress spake French—

. . . . full fayre and fetisly,

After the scole of Stratforde-atté-Bowe,
For French of Paris was to hir unknow.

But inscriptions from the more noteworthy monuments have been transcribed, and the history of the church has been traced. On the tomb of William Ferrers, who died in 1625, beneath the figure of a sleeping child, is the facetious epitaph:—

As nurses strue theire Babes in bed to lay
When they too ly-berally the wantons play.
Soe to preuente his farther growinge crimes,
Nature his nurse, gott him to bed betimes.

Ferrers was thirty-five when he died. The most lamentable loss recorded is that of the so-called Old Palace, pulled down to make way for a Board school. James I. is supposed to have founded a settlement at Bromley early in the seventeenth century, and to have built this “Palace” as an occasional residence or hunting box for himself. A considerable part of it dated from 1606, and the carved timbers, the panelling, the richly-moulded plaster ceilings—in the centre of that in the state room was the shield of James I., with the initials I.R.—were in excellent condition. Deplorable to relate, the structure was sold to housebreakers for £250; but upon protest being made by the Survey Committee and other interested societies the fireplace of the state room, again bearing the Royal shield, was repurchased for £150. Subsequently, the South Kensington authorities acquired, for a sum not stated, the panelling and ceiling of this state room, which, as far as possible, has been temporarily reconstructed at the Victoria and Albert Museum.

Other buildings in Bromley that have disappeared, and of which details are given, include the Seven Stars publichouse, whose old moulded beams, mullions, &c., were of the same character as those in the Old Palace—it was constructed about the same time; and Tudor House, temp. Elizabeth, in the garden of which, now under the control of the County Council, stands one of the gateways of Northumberland House. But the Survey does not confine itself to recording what has been swept away; it also directs attention to buildings which it is desirable to preserve; and herein lies at least half the value of the volume. Besides a reduced Ordnance map, whereon buildings of æsthetic or historical interest are marked in red, there are thirty-six illustrations—ground-plans, exterior views, details of this or that decoration or ornament. In a word, the book is a singular instance of what can be accomplished when knowledge, patience, enthusiasm, are wisely directed towards a laudable end. In subsequent volumes we would suggest the addition of a general account, however brief, of the parish or parishes concerned, and in every case where allusion is made to a work of reference the volume and page should be stated.

JUNIUS AND THE FRANCIS LETTERS.

But for the mystery attaching to the authorship of the Junius Letters the name of Junius would probably long ago have been forgotten, except by the historian. But for the suspicion that Philip Francis hid behind the pseudonym, little fame as a writer would have attached to Junius, the qualities of whose method of writing are thus well summarized by Professor Saintsbury:—

An affectation of exaggerated moral indignation, claptrap rhetorical interrogations, the use, clever enough if it were not so constant, of balanced antitheses, a very good ear for some, though by no means many, cadences and rhythms, some ingenuity in trope and metaphor, and a cunning adaptation of the trick of specializing with proper names with which Lord Macaulay has surfeited readers for the last half-century.

The publication of “The Francis Letters” (Hutchinson, 24s. n.) will certainly help those who do not find Francis in “Junius,” and this in spite of a prefatory note on the controversy by Mr. C. F. Keary, in which he proves to his own satisfaction the identity of the two men. These “Francis Letters” throw naturally no light on the person of Junius, but they go some way to prove, negatively, that Philip Francis was not Junius.

Whatever the similarity of the handwriting of Francis to the “disguised hand” of Junius; whatever the opinions of graphological experts—the Dreyfus case has shown us the value of such expert opinion—whatever the silent admissions of Francis himself in his vain and frivolous old age, it is difficult, after seeing him drawn by himself and his family in this correspondence, to credit for one moment his identity with Junius. His whole character and mode of life, his opinions, his ambitions, his ideals, are a strong contradiction to the theory of his being the author of the celebrated Letters; and although a man may successfully disguise his handwriting on specific occasions; although he may for years successfully conceal his authorship of certain works, he cannot at all times disguise himself, he cannot hide his real character. Every movement he takes, every word he speaks or pens is a direct revelation. Francis, in these volumes, shows himself, unconsciously, of course, as a person whose chief idea in life is to get on in the world, to make money, to win position. He loves to mix in the refined society which then haunted Brighthelmston, to be known as a boon companion of the Regent. No elevated ideal, no altruistic sentiment, no love for freedom, no recognition of the public welfare, no criticism of the powers that be, ever falls from his pen—whether he writes as a lad of eighteen in 1758, when the correspondence begins, as a clerk in the War Office in 1769 (in which year the first letter from Junius appeared in the Public Advertiser), or as an old man of seventy-three in 1814, when inditing love-epistles to the lady who became his second wife. To assume that he is Junius is either to assume that he adopted a character entirely foreign to his own during the production of the Letters, or that he, on this occasion only, displayed his real character and sentiments, and managed to disguise them completely during sixty years of private life. Such essential discrepancy of character appears to us more convincing than the discrepancy of style, although the voluminous correspondence of Francis never recalls for one instant the vigorous style of Junius.

To tell the truth, the letters of Philip Francis are dull reading, because his personality was in no wise an interesting one. A third-rate politician, something of a fribble, vain and irritable, loving to eat well, to drink much, and to lie soft, his character had its redeeming points in his home life in his affection for his wife and children and his adoration for cats. His terms of endearment for his daughters are, "My own dear Grimalkin, my dearest fat Cat," and, when away, he never fails to inquire after the reigning real cat of the moment. But even a share in his estimation for the feline race did not suffice to carry us through these six hundred pages of small beer with much pleasure. His children, who inherited his love for writing and preserving letters, inherited also his want of personality. His daughter Mary, aged twenty-two, and married to a certain Mr. Johnson, is at Brighton in 1802, and has the felicity of being received at the Pavilion. What an amusing, what a valuable account of the Prince and his associates might have been given by a clever girl with the seeing eye! But Mary Johnson, hypnotized by Royalty, sees it only in conventional aspects:—"We have passed every evening," she writes, "(till near three o'clock in the morning), at the Pavilion this last week. I cannot do justice, by all that I can say, to the charming Prince's gracious kindness and goodness to us. . . . His amiable qualities, fascinating manners, and uncommon accomplishments—his talents for conversation and powers of entertainment are truly extraordinary and delightful. . . . the excellences of his heart are equal to his incomparable understanding, &c." A discriminating account this of the man known to history as George IV.!

In the season of 1805 she is at Brighton again and always equally charmed with the dear Prince. A true daughter of Francis, society and amusement are the chief aims in life to her. She records with pride that—"the gaiety of the last week was almost too much for me, I was out every night and three times at the Pavilion." On the third occasion she went on the Prince's special invitation with her two little girls, as H.R.H. was giving "a little Ball to the children, it being Minny's birthday." "Minny" was Mary Seymour, a child living under the guardianship of Mrs. Fitzherbert, and the daughter of Lady Horatia Seymour. Minny was a great favourite with the Prince, and she figures with Mrs. Fitzherbert in many contemporary caricatures. Strangely enough, it was through her kindness to this child that Mrs. Fitzherbert lost her hold over the Regent a few years later—but that is another story. The little Misses Johnson, aged about ten and eleven, were delighted on hearing of the Prince's invitation. "They were dressed the same as at Mrs. Thomson's," and their Mamma "thought they looked very pretty." They appear to have overeaten themselves at supper, since their grandfather Francis writes the next day:—"Mary is now doctoring the children, who were at the Ball last night, where one of them danced with Lord Clare, the other with Mr. Fitzgibbon." The editor informs us in a note that this was the third Earl of Clare, and that Mr. Fitzgibbon was his brother, who became fourth earl; but the really interesting point is that Lord Clare was Byron's Clare, of whom he wrote, "I have always loved him better than any male thing in the world," and "I never hear the name Clare without a beating of the heart even now (1821)." In the November of 1805, when Lord Clare, aged thirteen, was dancing with little nobodies at the Pavilion, Byron, aged seventeen, was up for his first term at Trinity College, Cambridge.

There are some correspondents of the Francis sisters, two Misses Gunn, said to be Irish girls in society, whose letters read just like the conversations of Lucy Steele and her sister in "Sense and Sensibility." The Misses Gunn might have sat to the incomparable Jane for their portraits, so well has she painted them in this novel with their illiterate minds and their craving for admiration and beaux. These ladies, like the Misses Francis, adore Brighton and are enraptured with the Prince. They had made his acquaintance in London at Lord Barrymore's Masquerade. This was "Cripplegate" Barrymore, who, like Byron, was club-footed. His brother, who held the title before him, was known as Hellgate Barrymore, in compliment to his manners and language. Another clerical brother was known as "Newgate," the locality in which he usually found himself, and the fourth member of this charming family, a sister, was nicknamed "Billingsgate," from her habit of swearing. The Misses Gunn see the Prince next at a Brighton review:—"I did not think he would remember us in our Sables, but he did us the Honour to give us three of his bows. . . . I long, I must say, to see him once more, as his manners are quite enchanting." The girls go to regimental festivities where the Royal Dukes are guests—"We were the only Ladies present, of course had them all to ourselves." The following might really have fallen straight from the lips of Anne Steele:—"As all our Beaux are gone, and the Ladies going, we shall now get snug over our firesides, for I will not go to Petticoat Parties. We have been, as usual, spoiled this season, as nothing could be done without us. Our Beaux were chiefly Irish and very agreeable, most of them too poor to think of Hymen, who has been shamefully idle amongst so many fair Ladies." "Lord, Anne!" cried Lucy Steele on one occasion, she having a shade more discernment than her sister, "you can talk of nothing but Beaux! You will make Miss Dashwood believe you think of nothing else!" Certainly Miss Matilda Gunn and her sister inoculate the bored reader with this belief. The best letters in the book are a batch by Eliza Johnson, a stepdaughter of Mary's, who afterwards became the wife of Philip Francis, junior. These are sprightly and show a sense of humour. But for the rest, the chief entertainment the reader will find in the volume is the entertainment which he himself takes there.

Foreign Letter.

MODERN DANISH LITERATURE.

The literature of Denmark, which, after undergoing the influence of German writers, passed, mainly at the initiative of Dr. Georg Brandes, under that of French, is at the present day beginning to show signs of inspiration derived from English sources. When a German dynasty was established on the throne of Denmark in the fifteenth century, the German tongue and German thought obtained predominance in the little kingdom. The language used by the Court and the upper classes was German; the poet Klopstock, subsidized by Christian VII. to reside in Copenhagen, became the leader of the literary movement. It was a literature of giants, which could boast a Oehlenschläger, a Madvig, a Kjerkegaard, a Heiberg, a Paludan-Müller, and many another writer of genius almost, if not quite, their equals.

But with Dr. Georg Brandes (b. 1842) a reaction, the importance of which it is impossible to overestimate, and which owes its inception exclusively to him, set in. A critic of singular acumen, and having the faculty of his race (he is a Jew) for assimilation rather than for creation, he succeeded in awakening a burning enthusiasm for literature in the youth of Denmark, and in founding a school of writers who derive their inspiration from French sources. Brandes hoped at one time to become Professor of Æsthetics at the University of Copenhagen, but his well-known atheistic and revolutionary tendencies stood in the way, and he retired in 1877, disappointed, to Berlin, where—for he speaks and writes German as fluently as he does his parent tongue—he lectured on literary subjects to crowded audiences. In 1883 he returned to Copenhagen, and his friends and admirers there united their efforts to secure him an income of 4,000 crowns per annum.

It is too soon to form a definite appreciation of Brandes' work. His last word has not yet been spoken, and he is still in the prime of a life spent in the midst of fierce and heated controversies. So far the greatest result of his labours is this—he has taught people to think for themselves rather than accept the dictum of others, and he has aroused a new and ever-increasing enthusiasm for literature in his native country. Nevertheless, he has shared the common fate of reformers, who are often carried against their own will further than they originally intended to go. He tried to remove the accumulated dust of ages by rudely breaking the windows of the chamber. The strong blast of fresh air which he thus let in has perhaps only whirled the dust up to let it settle again. In his zeal for reform he has acted like the servant who, in arranging a study, throws away all the loose papers she finds, and thus destroys, perchance, her master's best treasures—his records of his memories, his thoughts, and his dreams. Such was assuredly not Brandes' intention, but in the excitement he aroused it was inevitable. He is a voluminous writer. Besides his well-known work on Shakespeare may be mentioned "French Æsthetics in Our Times," "The Principal Sources of the Literature of the Nineteenth Century," "Danish Poets" (a chef-d'œuvre of psychological analysis), "A History of Scandinavian Literature," many books of travel, and several biographies, including that of Lord Beaconsfield.

The most powerful, and at the present day the most admired, of the prose writers who owe their inspiration to the teaching of Brandes is J. P. Jacobsen (b. 1847, d. 1885), a novelist whose genius Brandes himself was the first to discover. He wrote little, and wrote, like Heine, while suffering from an incurable malady; but that little is still unsurpassed in the department of literature to which it belongs. A disciple and translator of Darwin, he sought in vain a suitable form for the expression of his genius, till, encouraged by Brandes, he invented the psychological novel. He is, above all, a stylist. In the words of Mr. Edmund Gosse, one of the few English men of letters who has made a study of Danish literature, "The English reader must be kind enough to take our word for it, that all competent Danish critics agree in saying that no artificer in prose ever used the Danish language so subtly as did in his brief career this brilliant 'inheritor of unfulfilled renown.'" "Marie Grubbe," Jacobsen's first and greatest work, was followed by "Niels Lyhne," which has been translated into English under the title of "Siren Voices," and by "Mogens and Other Stories." "Mogens" has been called "the quintessence of Jacobsen's wonderful style"; yet the strong feeling for nature, originality, and capacity for subtle dissection of delicate psychological emotions, as well as the minute and infinitely refined descriptions of accessories which it contained, came, like his other works, as a shock to a public educated to consider the subject and plot of a novel as its only essential qualities. To subject and plot Jacobsen and the new school which he represents attach but little importance. He sought before all things to penetrate the psychological motives of actions, the moral causes of events, and their effect upon the personages involved. Though he died young, and in spite of a limited literary output always interrupted by illness, Jacobsen nevertheless created in Denmark the modern psychological romance, the new and more artistic novel; he ranks as master among the novel-writers of Denmark, as Holger Drachmann, another follower of Brandes, does among its poets. Many authors, both Danish and Norwegian, have fallen under Jacobsen's influence—an influence subtle, refined, pervading, and often dangerous.

A good illustration of the present literary taste of the Danes may be found in the works of Amalie Skram. Laura Marholm Hanssen, in her book on "Modern Women," says:—"In the whole of Europe there are only two genuine and honest naturalists, and they are Émile Zola and Amalie Skram." Though born in Norway, Amalie Skram claims the right of being called a Dane, because she has married a novelist of that nationality, writes in Danish, and lives in Copenhagen. In the preface to the only book by her yet rendered into English, the translators remark:—"Like Zola, Fru Skram chooses primitive themes, and her men and women are human beings in close touch with nature, with the stern, rugged nature of the North." "She paints work-a-day people," says Björnson, "and the work-a-day side of human nature, never the Sunday man. By the first I mean our everyday life under the influence of passions and conditions of struggle more or less fruitless." The great Norwegian critic describes her "Professor Hieronimus" as "an epoch-making work." "It is," he says, "the first time that a great author in full possession of her mental powers has had the opportunity of making such a study. Seeking quiet and treatment for a nervous affection, Fru Skram of her own free will became the inmate of a lunatic asylum. Thus she had a chance of studying one of those specialists in mental disease who are too apt to mistake rebelliousness for a sign of mental derangement. Of this doctor, of the patients, the nurses, her whole environment, she gives a picture so vivid, of such absorbing interest, that it can vie with the most thrilling romance." Though far from the equal of Jacobsen in ultimate psychological analysis, she is yet a profound observer of mental phenomena, and surrounds her personages with an atmosphere, less refined indeed, but quite as realistic. No wonder her works are extremely popular in Denmark; in fact, the writings of these two authors may be taken as typical of modern Danish novels, novels which are very much what Brandes, inspired by French writers, and especially by Flaubert, has made them. The future alone can tell whether, under fresh and different influence, a literature of equal excellence will result.

The sudden revolt of Danish intellect against German influence was no doubt principally due to race hatred engendered by the unhappy Slesvig-Holstein war. The new tendency towards England and things English is following a more normal and gradual course. It is conspicuous in much besides literature—for example, in the craze for cricket, golf, tennis, and other sports particularly English which has lately seized the inhabitants of Copenhagen. Holger Drachmann, the greatest of living Danish poets, speaking at the banquet given in his honour during his recent visit to London, indicated the direction of the current. "I have," he said, "read and studied your literature considerably—a literature which so greatly influenced me in my hot youth." "Come over and visit us," he continued, "Come to Denmark and try to speak to us in our language. You will find us patient enough and anxious to meet you half-way. For the languages of the two countries are very much related to one another, and, like lovers, they stretch their hands across the North Sea."

Drachmann is one of the most striking personalities of Denmark. Beginning life as a marine painter, he has lived for years among the sailors and fishermen of Skagen, that desolate point of land where the North Sea, the Skager Rak, and the Cattegat meet. Novels, dramas, essays, and some of the finest lyrics ever written in the Danish tongue—and the Danes are past masters of lyric poetry—testify to the genius of Drachmann; but the best illustration of the present English tendency is the fact that he has rendered "Don Juan" into his native language with such aptitude and vigour that it is almost impossible to believe the poem a translation. It is significant, too, that the poems of Carl Gjellerup closely resemble (though without the same erudition) the poems of his favourite English author—Swinburne. Edgard Høyer is the only living Danish author who has had the good fortune to attain popularity in countries other than his own, his play The Jensen Family having been produced in many cities, especially those of America, with great success. Other followers of Brandes are his own brother Edvard; Schandorf, a novelist of great power; Peder Nansen, Carl Ewald, Sven Lange, and Rode.

It is singular that the French should be so much better acquainted with Scandinavian literature than we are, though to a cognate race like ourselves it should prove of far greater interest than to the alien Gaul. The Americans also have devoted more attention to the subject than we have so far done. Most of our authors are translated into Danish, the two languages lending themselves to transference with unusual facility. All our classics are, I believe, accessible to the Danes in their own tongue; they know their Shakespeare much better than the average Englishman does. They particularly appreciate Dickens and Kipling, and I was surprised to find them familiar also with the latest productions of Ouida and Marie Corelli; while we remain in crass ignorance of the whole of a literature of which Mr. Gosse justly remarks, "There is not another of the minor countries of Europe that can point to names so illustrious in their different spheres as Oersted, Oehlenschläger, Madvig, and H. C. Andersen." Of these four, the name best known to us in England is that of the writer who has peopled our nurseries with elves and fairies and filled our schoolrooms with romance, forging an everlasting link of sympathy between the children of the two countries—Hans Christian Andersen. He was the darling of his own countrymen; in the streets of Copenhagen every one who knew his appearance touched his hat and said "God bless you!" Mrs. Browning's last lines were written to him, as he never tired of telling his friends:—

Now give us men from the sunless plain,
Cried the South to the North.
By deed of work in the snow and rain
Made strong and brave by familiar pain,
Cried the South to the North.

As far as journalism is concerned, Danish newspapers and magazines are conducted much on English lines. Copenhagen is well supplied with periodicals, and every shade of opinion is represented. Most of them indulge in a feuilleton in imitation of the French, but it is often a translation from the English. The Berlinske Tidende is the organ of the Government—cold, correct, and impartial. The National Tidende is a journal of the Right or Government party, as is also the Dannebrog, the latter being distinguished by its vigorous onslaughts on Politiken, which supports the Left or Opposition party, employing the most advanced writers of the day, and enjoying what is for Denmark the large circulation of 20,000 copies daily. The Socialists have an organ to themselves, Socialdemokraten, and woman's cause is voiced by Kvindernes Blad and Damernes Blad. A weekly illustrated paper, Illustreret Tidende, also appears, and is not unworthy to be classed with our own illustrated weeklies. There is, of course, a large number of journals of a lower class.

MARGARET THOMAS.

THE DRAMA.

"THE WILDERNESS."

Among our younger playwrights there is none more promising than Mr. H. V. Esmond. The epithet "promising" may seem to ignore the substantial achievements already standing to his credit, and yet I think it is the right one. For he seems not yet completely to have realized himself, to be still in the experimentalizing stage, a little uncertain in touch, without the confidence to let himself go. He has tried, in One Summer's Day, pure sentiment, "favour and prettiness." In Grierson's Way he has tried stern, unflinching realism. In The Divided Way he has tried passion, hot and strong. None of these attempts was a failure; yet some of us are still looking for a work from him which shall be the expression of his real and absolutely unimitative self. Perhaps we begin to get a glimpse of that self in The Wilderness, his new comedy at the St. James's. This play is a curious blend of contradictory qualities—stage-convention and alert "modernity," sentiment and cynicism, sincerity and artifice. Mr. Esmond is an actor as well as a playwright, and he has not always resisted the actor's temptation to reproduce stage types, instead of studying direct from life. Thus his old women in this play, the respective mothers of his hero and heroine, strike one as distinctly stogy. One is the scheming, worldly mother, intent upon "good marriages" for her girls, and absolutely incapable of comprehending the life of the affections. The other is the lively dowager who lacks the courage to be old; rouged and dyed, cynical, incurably frivolous. They are both conventional figures. And there is a good deal of convention, too, I think, in the whole idea of the "marriage market" which is as it were the background of the play. It is one of the commonplaces of fiction. No doubt in real life some mothers are willing to sell their daughters, and rich young men are pursued by designing maidens; but this feature of life is grossly exaggerated by novelist and playwright. Again, I find convention in the hero's diatribe against London, as a sink of the politer iniquities, an orgie of dinners and balls, a "wilderness" of artificiality. He beseeches the heroine "to come out of the wilderness into the light," meaning apparently that she should leave the heartless chatter of a Bond-street tea-shop for the simple, natural life of the country. Ever since Thackeray our writers of fiction have been pleased to present London in this way; but I submit that the picture is absurdly over-drawn.

Where, then, do I find the glimpse of what I take to be the playwright's true self, of the artist deserting the beaten track of art for the satisfaction and revelation of his own temperament? Well, I think I find it in his woodland scene, wherein the hero flings himself down in the bracken to recapture the first fine careless rapture of his boyhood in the same spot. There is the same fairy ring that he knew of old, there the rabbit-hole whose occupant he used to be on intimate terms with, and in recklessly boyish mood he renews his early sensations even in the discouraging presence of a prosaic old gentleman, his uncle. To chime in with his mood, some actual children come on the scene, and prattle to one another about the fairies, for whom they have brought food in the shape of a dried fish and some old bones rescued from the dust-bin. The author dwells with complacency upon this scene, even keeping the action perceptibly waiting for it and giving undue importance to what is only an episode. That is why I think I get a glimpse of Mr. Esmond's self here. Depend upon it, if you want to detect the most intimate moods of a playwright watch him over his episodes and over all those passages which are excrescences in his play. This is notably the case with Shakespeare, as I have tried to show in these pages in speaking of Hamlet and of Richard II. When you get a detail which is not essential to the action or to the character then you may be sure that the dramatist put it there because he could not help it, because the need for self-expression overcame just there his strict attention to the business of the scene. From the point of view of that proper business of the playwright many people at the St. James's must have felt that they were getting a little too much talk about the fairies, a little too much dried haddock and bones. I had that feeling, I know, myself; and yet, regarding the play as a "document," as evidence of the real, native qualities in Mr. Esmond, this incident is the most valuable in all the three acts. Evidently Mr. Esmond has the gift of fancy; he can appeal to the tender, whimsical, childlike mood in us in a quite peculiar way. This is a rare gift, and I look forward to

CURRENT LITERATURE.

THE JESUITS IN ENGLAND.

The want of such a book as THE HISTORY OF THE JESUITS IN ENGLAND, 1580-1773 (Methuen, 21s. n.), by the Rev. Ethelred L. Taunton, the author of "The English Black Monks of Saint Benedict," has long been felt. Mr. Taunton, without doubt, has set himself no mean task, and one which would have been beyond the reach of any writer not qualified to rank as an authority on this particular subject. No complete record of the English members of the Society of Jesus has hitherto been published that can lay claim to stand as independent and impartial testimony, free from either theological or political prejudice. To compile such a work, founded on original research, has been, so the author asserts, his high ambition; and, although his style is not faultless, and his judgment on certain controversial points, such, for instance, as to whether Father Garnett was an accessory before the fact to the Gunpowder Plot, is often slightly obscure, there can be no doubt but that he has, from the first page to the last, proved himself to be eminently open-minded and impartial. Granted this, therefore, his readers, Roman Catholic or Protestant, may rest assured that they are not being presented with a mere ex parte theological treatise, but with a history of permanent value, which covers ground never properly investigated before, and is replete with the results of original research.

Mr. Taunton relates the history of the English Jesuits from about the date of Edmund Campion's conversion to Roman Catholicism down to the time of the formal suppression of the Society by the Pope. In this eventful period the two great landmarks are the years which embrace the respective labours of Fathers Parsons and Petre—that is to say, the reign of Elizabeth with a portion of James I., and the entire reign of James II. In both instances it seems clear that Parsons and Petre worked principally on behalf of the private interests of their Society, without heed to the harm that their impetuosity and selfishness were causing their secular brethren in particular and the English Catholic laity in general.

Mr. Taunton's account of Robert Parsons makes one wonder that no authentic biography of this wonderful man has yet been given to the world. The prolonged silence of members of his own Society is, we fear, significant. In one of Foley's volumes, it is true, there is a biography of him, but it simply supplies a piece of special pleading that is of no value to the student of history. Of Parsons the priest we have read much by Jesuit or other Roman Catholic writers, but of Parsons the politician, the agent of Philip of Spain, the political director of Cardinal Allen, we have read next to nothing. The late Father Morris, S.J., we believe, once essayed the task of writing a life of Parsons, but abandoned it at an early stage, since he found, by his own confession, that he was, as a faithful servant of his Order, treading on very slippery ground. That historians have, generally speaking, failed to recognize the vast importance of the position occupied by Parsons as a statesman, as the ablest rival of Burghley and Walsingham, there can be but little doubt. He was, moreover, it must be allowed, the typical Jesuit of Protestant tradition. His whole life, from the day that he left Oxford—and here we think Mr. Taunton has represented the exact cause of his departure, or rather expulsion, from the University in far too complimentary terms—illustrated the practice of rendering the means absolutely subservient to the end, as can be seen in his political pamphlets. Yet, with all his genius, his energy, as these pages amply demonstrate, spelled total failure. In his campaign, undertaken to restore England to Roman Catholicism by the aid of Spanish arms and Spanish gold, he only dealt a blow to his own co-religionists, which served to exile them (except during what our author terms the "golden day" of James II.) from English public life for a space of some 200 years. For the ordinary reader Mr. Taunton's most interesting information will probably be forthcoming in his criticism of its full and free exercise some day—that is to say, in a play where it provides motif and atmosphere, instead of, as here, figuring episodically. I will admit, however, that even here it is something more than episodic. The author designs it, no doubt, to bring out the simplicity, sincerity, and general unworldliness of his hero's character, which has to be contrasted with the worldliness and pretence of his match-making, husband-hunting entourage. Perhaps the simplicity of his hero is a little overdone; a husband who, after living happily with his wife for several months, jumps to the conclusion that her love was all make-believe merely because of the discovery that she had flirted with another man before her marriage verges on the fool. It is, however, necessary that he shall make this mistake in order that Mr. Esmond may have his final scene between the pair, which would lose its effect of joyous reconciliation were it not prefaced by mutual misunderstanding. In such detail as this one sees that Mr. Esmond's touch is still a little uncertain. He will learn by-and-by to get his critical scenes without recourse to the artifices of the stage.

Am I wrong in feeling more uncertainty in his handling of the heroine's character? He aims at showing us the awakening of conscience and sincere affection in a girl whose young mind has been temporarily warped by the lessons of a fortune-hunting, vulgar-souled mother. There are two women in Mabel, the real and the artificial, but during the first half of the play it is only the artificial woman that we see, and I think we ought to have had at the outset some adumbration of the other. As it is, the hare-brained, chattering little minx of the first act gives no sign of the true and deep-natured woman of the last. The part, it is right to say, is admirably played throughout by Miss Eva Moore; and Mr. Alexander is evidently in complete sympathy with his author in the whimsical episode of the second act. This play not only serves as a pleasant departure from a groove in which the St. James's management threatened to become fixed, but marks an interesting phase in the development of a young writer who bids fair to take a very high place among contemporary English dramatists.

A. B. WALKLEY.

In Coriolanus Sir Henry Irving attempts a task in which more than one well-known actor of the past has failed. At the time of Kemble's historic revival (1789), with Mrs. Siddons as Volumnia, the play was sufficiently unpopular to allow of the introduction of two acts from James Thomson's Coriolanus. Macready confessed that he acted only parts of the play well, and Kean's robust rendering dissatisfied critics who adhered to the "sublime" traditions of Kemble. Phelps was more successful at Sadler's Wells in 1848. Sir Henry Irving's realistic "crowd" was more than paralleled by the ambitious "supers" who then assisted. Mr. Clement Scott has an amusing reminiscence of their achievement in his "Drama of Yesterday and To-day."

The supers, instructed by Phelps, were little short of actors, and, in the scene where the mob banishes the proud General, acted with such intensity that, on the fall of the act-drop, after the usual compliment had been paid to the great actor, a cry went up from the audience which at first nobody could understand, but which soon resolved itself into "Supers!" "By God!" said Phelps, "they are calling for the supers; and damme! they deserve it—I never saw better acting in my life!" The act-drop was then raised, disclosing the unusual spectacle of the supers "taking a call," loudly cheered by the spectators.

Coriolanus has found its way to Scotland and America. We do not know of any performance of it in France, but there is a French dramatic version of the story written in the seventeenth century by Chapoton. It has its historical interest; the influence of Shakespeare's example being strong enough for Chapoton to introduce a murder upon the stage in spite of the French traditions.

Parsons' political system as compared with that of Oliver Cromwell. It seems strange, but it is, according to the extensive evidence adduced by Mr. Taunton, a fact that the Commonwealth, as directed by Cromwell, followed closely on the lines of the policy laid down by Parsons for the deposition of Princes; whilst, at a later date, Petre, in his interference with the government of England, never deviated from the doctrines of Parsons, so far, at all events, as his contempt of the powers of Parliament was concerned—with the result that, once again, the leaders of the loyal English Catholic gentry were sacrificed to the treasonable methods of Jesuit politicians.

Next to the careers of Parsons and Petre the most valuable part of the book is that which deals with the Gunpowder Plot, and this, in our opinion, represents, on the whole, our author's happiest effort. Here the tone is calm and judicial, the tendency to repetition restrained, and a lucid and clever summary of the entire mystery ends the matter. Mr. Taunton, we note, thinks that a brief passage in Macbeth contains an allusion to the Plot, and the evidence brought forward by him in substantiation is certainly strong, as a reference to the passage itself makes clear, viz. :—

"Here's a knocking indeed. . . . Here's a farmer that hanged himself on the expectation of plenty. . . . Knock, knock! Faith, here's an equivocator that could swear in both the scales, in either scale; who committed treason enough for God's sake, yet could not equivocate to Heaven: O, come in, equivocator!"

By "farmer," Garnett (whose favourite alias was "Farmer") is, Mr. Taunton thinks, undoubtedly referred to; and, by "equivocator," Father Oldcorne, or some other Jesuit. This is worth comment, because, although Mr. Taunton apparently does not know it, one of the chief arguments recently employed by Father Gerard in order to demolish "the traditional story" was that no reference to the Plot is ever made in the plays of Shakespeare. Of the peculiar superstitions relating to Garnett's so-called "miraculous straw" Mr. Taunton merrily makes very short work, as well he may.

To sum up, the chief items of historical value to be gathered from this volume are, we consider, the connexion existing between the politics of the early Jesuits and the Puritans; the ceaseless jealousy among the Jesuits of the English secular priests; the impotence of Cardinal Allen in the hands of Parsons; the attempt made by the Jesuits to exclude James VI. from the English throne; and the wonderful power usurped by the Society all over England under James II. So much for Jesuit politicians; but the same chronicle that reveals the mundane ambitions of such as Parsons, Henry Garnett, the extravagant Heywood, the superstitious Weston, proclaims the courage, the devotion, the self-denial, the piety of "martyrs" such as Campion, Briant, Walpole, Arrowsmith, and Southwell the poet; although we are by no means too sure that Briant was ever formally received into the Society, a doubt in which Mr. Taunton evidently shares. Portraits of the most famous of these Jesuits are included in the dozen illustrations that adorn the book. Of these portraits that of Parsons, printed from a very rare engraving, is striking in the extreme, and shows a face of exceptional ability and power, if not also of craft. The features of Parsons depict a very different type of character to that of his fellow-missionary, the ascetic Campion, of whom, too, a good portrait is given. We must not omit to mention that this most interesting and careful book is furnished with an unusually exhaustive index, which, having tested it again and again, we have found correct.

The Roman Church in England is the subject of several notable works this season. Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's "Fifty Years of Catholic Life and Progress," in two volumes (Fisher Unwin), appears next week, and Messrs. Longmans have two further works in the press, one of these being a series of letters from converts, edited by J. Godfrey Raupert, and entitled "Roads to Rome." The other volume is by Lady Lovat—"The Catholic Church from Within"—and contains a preface by Cardinal Vaughan.

BOOKS ON CHINA.

One seeks counsel on the Chinese question from Sir Robert Hart as from the man who knows. If he does not know, then no one knows. But when one has read THESE FROM THE LAND OF SINIM (Chapman and Hall, 6s.) one finds that Sir Robert Hart professes to know very little, and seldom sees his way to go beyond the balancing of the pros and cons. His doubts, it is true, are more instructive than the cock-sure prescriptions of writers like Mr. Alexander Krausse and Mr. Archibald Little; but to a statesman in search of a policy, like Lord Salisbury, the warnings will be more valuable than any positive hints. And even the value of the warnings is impaired by the fact that Sir Robert Hart not only contradicts the other experts but also contradicts himself. As regards the proposed partition of China, for example, we read on page 49 that "it could never be expected to be a final settlement, and unrest and unhappiness and uncertainty would run through all succeeding generations." But, no further on than page 53, we read :—

If the Powers could agree among themselves and partition China at once, and thereafter, with a common understanding, give fullest effect to the old Chinese idea and discourage militarism—make it a law that none of their new subjects could drill, enlist, or carry arms; prohibit their own and other nationals from there engaging in any kind of trade in arms—and employ only their own race for military and police work there, it is possible that the peace-loving, law-abiding, industrious Chinaman might be kept in leading strings until the lapse of centuries had given other civilizing influences time to work through successive generations, and so change the composition and tendency of the national thought and feeling of the future as to carry it into that sphere of international life where friendly relations, common interests, and international comity take the place of dictation, jealousy, and race hatred, and thus blot out the "Yellow Peril" from the future of humanity.

These rival sentiments cannot easily be reconciled; but their simultaneous appearance in the works of so great an authority is eloquent of the difficulty of the problem. Probably the link between them lies in the tacit assumption that, though partition may be tried, partition of this thorough-going character is outside the range of practical politics. In that case the former sentiment is the one that matters; and it is properly supplemented by a warning that the plan, so popular with arm-chair experts, of setting up a new dynasty, will not work :—

The plan would plunge the country into years of anarchy, and for a dynasty to be established by a Concert of foreign Powers would be an ear-mark of weakness and disgrace for ever after. Remains then the third plan—to accept the existing dynasty as a going concern and make the best of it.

But how to make the best of it? On this point Sir Robert Hart is not so helpful as his admirers must have hoped; and he is least helpful when he is most definite. His one clear proposal is that the Powers should abandon the principle of extra-territoriality. "Could we but give up this and relations would at once right themselves, rancour disappear, and friendliness rule instead." So far as practical politics are concerned he might as well propose to sink the Chinese Empire beneath the level of the sea. It is just the policy that no European or American statesman would dare to adopt, even if he wished to; and so long as Chinese prisons and Chinese punishments are what they are, its adoption would not solve the problem. We should be sure to have a Jenkins' ears case on our hands before very long; and we know what is the effect of cases of that sort upon the comity of nations. Sir Robert Hart, indeed, feels driven to try to make his suggestion palatable by pointing out that the appearance of foreigners in Court would be of rare occurrence; but one such appearance, resulting in the application of some picturesque Chinese torture to, say, a German missionary, would be quite enough to make the Kaiser prescribe the regimen of "mailed fist as before."

A YEAR IN CHINA, 1899-1900 (Macmillan, 8s.6d. n.), is Mr. Clive Bigham's straightforward and agreeably-written account of his wanderings and adventures. Mr. Bigham took a journey far into the interior, was with Admiral Seymour on his attempt to relieve the Legations, saw something of the campaign on the Amur, and came home by way of Siberia. He tells his story in a high-spirited, unaffected style, not without an occasional touch of humour, and he is much too modest to set up as a solver of problems. His criticisms of our allies are rather interesting. The Americans struck him as "about the best practical and intelligent fighters it is possible to imagine." Everything that the Germans did "they did as one would expect from the best modern machine of the day." The Russians, for five days, "lived on half a ration of biscuit and filthy river water, and were never sick or sorry." There is humour in the story of the Chinese servant who, finding that both wages and expenses were high in Vladivostok, proceeded to propound the principles of political economy in pigeon English:—

Suppose common Chinese man comes this side, catch a good pay, must large expense, no can profit. Suppose no get a work at all, must die. More better Shanghai side, small pay, small expense. Chinese belong man, no belong dog.

The book is very entertaining, and really more instructive than many books with more ostentation of profundity.

THE SIEGE OF THE PEKING LEGATIONS (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d.) is by the Rev. Roland Allen, acting chaplain to the British Legation in Peking. He covers the ground, not unsatisfactorily, though less picturesquely than Mr. Bigham. On the question of looting Mr. Allen does not seem quite to have made up his mind what to think. The conduct of the Russians who looted individually "made an honest man feel cross"; but there is no condemnation of the British policy under which "foraging parties went out under the command of an officer and brought in quantities of silks, furs, china, silver plate, and ornaments of all kinds, and these were sold by public auction." The use of the word "foraging" in this connexion is a delightful euphemism; and we doubt whether the Chinese whose property was brought to the hammer will understand why honest men should feel more kindly towards British than towards Russian methods. Nor is it altogether unamusing to read, immediately after this account of wholesale pillaging, that "the supernatural overwatching care of God ordering events for His good purpose is commonly revealed through the natural care of men for themselves." Finally we miss, what we should have liked to find, a definite and authoritative statement from Mr. Allen on the grave allegation that for a good deal of the looting missionaries and their converts were responsible.

SHAKESPEARE'S FAMILY TREE.

The world has long agreed to take an interest in the smallest fact respecting Shakespeare, and many good wits have burrowed amongst the driest of genealogical details in the faint hope of expounding the pedigree of an obscure Warwickshire lad with that minute and painful accuracy which as a rule is devoted only to the house of a Cecil or a Russell. Probably the greatest contribution to the discussion, at least since the days of Malone, was made by the late Mr. Halliwell-Phillips, the results of whose unwearied researches are summed up in the successive editions of his "Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare." On this work, as well as on Hunter's earlier "Illustrations of Shakespeare" and Mr. George Russell French's "Shakespeareana Genealogica," recent biographers, such as Mr. Sidney Lee, Dr. Georg Brandes, and Mr. Hamilton Mabie, have freely drawn. Some new material was published in Mr. Pym Yeatman's eccentric and much controverted "The Gentle Shakespeare." But Mr. Yeatman was perhaps more interested in establishing the religious belief of the Shakespeare household than in tracing its family tree, and on this somewhat will-o'-the-wisp enterprise he has been followed by the Protestant Mr. Carter with his "Shakespeare, Puritan and Recusant," and the Catholic Father Bowden with his "The Religion of Shakespeare."

Now comes Mrs. C. C. Stopes to call the matter back to the genealogical plane, and to treat the poet, not as a poet, but as "an interesting Warwickshire gentleman." The subject-matter of SHAKESPEARE'S FAMILY (Elliot Stock, 10s. 6d. net) really goes far beyond the promise of its title. Mrs. Stopes has practically made it her object to collect notices of all persons bearing the name of Shakespeare, and of a very large number bearing the name of Arden, from the first appearance of those designations in English nomenclature to the present day. She has accomplished her task with no little industry in amassing facts and, on the whole, with reasonable modesty in drawing inferences from them. If occasionally she ventures a conjecture which rather gives the reader pause, at least she supplies the data upon which he may reject it.

We must say at once that the net outcome of solidly-established information with regard to the family relationships of Shakespeare, before his own generation, is as small as it can be. The name was of the commonest in Warwickshire during the sixteenth century, and it is next to impossible to determine the one out of a score of villages from which the Bailiff of Stratford-upon-Avon and his son sprang. Like Mr. Yeatman, Mrs. Stopes has a romantic affection for the idea of a "gentle Shakespeare":—

By the Spear-side his family was at least respectable, and by the Spindle-side his pedigree can be traced back to Guy of Warwick and the good King Alfred. There is something in fallen fortune that lends a subtler romance to the consciousness of a noble ancestry, and we may be sure this played no small part in the making of the poet.

Mrs. Stopes does not actually demonstrate nearly as much as this. On the Spear-side—it was really a Mattock-side—Shakespeare can claim a father with certainty, and a grandfather, in a small tenant-farmer at Snitterfield, with fair probability. Beyond that it is impossible to go, and in particular the claim made by the father and son, when applying for a grant of arms from Heralds' College of an ancestor "advantaged and rewarded with landes and tenementes" by Henry VII., cannot be verified, and may be mere heraldic magniloquence. On the Spindle-side there was a great-grandfather, one Thomas Arden, whom Mrs. Stopes connects with the well-known family of Arden of Park-hall, and so with the glories of Guy of Warwick and the good King Alfred, by argumentative processes which we cannot approve. Perhaps our scepticism in the matter is assisted by the fact that we do not agree with Mrs. Stopes in finding "the consciousness of a noble ancestry" amongst the stuff of Shakespeare's poetry.

PHILOSOPHY.

Mr. W. R. Scott's monograph on FRANCIS HUTCHESON (Cambridge University Press, 8s.) deserves to be counted as a permanent addition to our philosophical literature. Hutcheson's life was not more eventful than that of most successful professors, but Mr. Scott has disinterred some interesting family documents which throw fresh light upon his philosopher's pursuits, friendships, and character, and gives us a clear picture of the state of learning and thought in Scotland at the time. Hutcheson led the reform party at Glasgow, and by founding the noble line of Scottish thinkers exercised a vast influence on the intellectual and moral development of the country. A principal merit in Mr. Scott's book is that he does not try to melt down all Hutcheson's writings into one consistent body of doctrine, but recognizes that his mind passed through several stages. In his earlier work the influence of Shaftesbury is predominant; in the later we trace that of Butler, Aristotle, and the Stoics. But with all this learned and skilful disentangling of the elements of Hutcheson's thought, Mr. Scott cannot be acquitted of a fault which is not very common in works of this kind—viz., a defective appreciation of the value of his author's contribution to philosophy. Mr. Scott himself is fully aware of this, and remarks in his conclusion "that the account of Hutcheson's position in the previous pages must seem very iconoclastic." As a teacher Hutcheson's merits are amply recognized. He was, like T. H. Green, a preaching professor in the best sense of the term; one who, with the sincerest devotion to the intellectual side of his subject, never lost view of its bearing on practice. But to Hutcheson's distinctive ethical doctrine of the Moral Sense Mr. Scott does not do justice. That doctrine created a real epoch in the development of ethical theory, and, when compared with either the German intellectualism or the English utilitarianism that succeeded it, it contained a much greater core of truth than is generally admitted. After being developed by Hume and Butler it languished in the schools, though rooted in the favour of common-sense. The state of knowledge in the eighteenth century did not permit of its systematic completion. Perhaps the task of ethics in the immediate future will be the rehabilitation of the Moral Sense in the light of modern progress in philosophy and evolutionary science.

Mr. F. W. Headley's PROBLEMS OF EVOLUTION (Duckworth, 8s. n.) is an interesting study by one who is not only an accomplished biologist and naturalist, but has also thought much on questions of human progress and degeneration. In the first part, which deals with organic evolution in general, Mr. Headley shows himself a very strong champion of Darwin and Weissmann and a determined opponent of Lamarck. In many places the thought suggests itself that the polemic against Lamarckianism goes too far. Mr. Headley is almost theological in his insistence on scientific orthodoxy as he understands it. Some of the doctrines he denounces as dangerous heresies seem to differ merely in form of words from what he holds to be the true rule of faith. In the treatment of Human Evolution in his second part Mr. Headley is always suggestive but often depressing. The great agent in human improvement, he argues, is the elimination of the unfit which is mainly effected by hardship, vice, and disease. Every national improvement in bodily comfort, virtue, and sanitation makes the people softer and allows more of the unfit to survive. It would seem, then, that instead of extirpating social evils, such as drunkenness, we ought to be thankful for their persistence as the means of killing off our black sheep. Private vices become public benefits in a sense which Bernard Mandeville never thought of. So with diseases. The modern warfare against pathological germs such as the Society for the Prevention of Tuberculosis recommends, could not gain Mr. Headley's approval. We even appear to be driven to the conclusion that the disappearance of, say, the mediæval bubonic plague from Europe was really a curse in disguise and weakened our national stamina. No doubt there is a certain element of truth in all this, but not nearly so much as Mr. Headley seems to think. It is risky to apply these simple formulæ of natural selection to so complex and spiritual an organism as human society.

In Professor A. T. Ormond's FOUNDATIONS OF KNOWLEDGE (Macmillan, 12s. 6d. n.) we have a serious attempt on the part of a well-trained and well-read student to grapple with some of the fundamental problems of metaphysics and the theory of knowledge. Much of the general spirit of the work may be gathered from the fact that it is dedicated with expressions of the deepest respect to the memory of James McCosh, Professor Ormond's teacher and predecessor at Princeton. The author's standpoint is frankly empirical; not in a bad sense, but as taking experience for the datum to be explained, and regarding reason as falling within experience, not outside it. This brings the author ultimately into conflict with the view of metaphysics represented by Mr. F. H. Bradley. Here he is on strong ground. He argues forcibly and, one may fairly say, unanswerably against the formless and structureless Absolute to which, in spite of his protestations, Mr. Bradley's metaphysics must in consistency lead him. At the close of his work Professor Ormond discusses the bearing of his views upon religion and ethics. As we might anticipate, he is strong in his rejection of pantheism in its various forms. In his discussion of the transcendental ground of ethics he shows that morality is based on the relation of the individual to society, but adds that "it is necessary, in order to render its principles adequate and stable, that they be ultimately grounded in the concept of an absolute experience."

Mr. F. S. Turner's KNOWLEDGE, BELIEF, AND CERTITUDE (Sonnenstein, 7s. 6d. n.) belongs to that rather puzzling class of books which are too amateurish and diffuse in form to hold the attention of professional students, and yet are not sufficiently lucid and popular to be read by a wider circle. This is a pity; for a great deal that Mr. Turner says is true, and he has evidently read and thought much about epistemological questions. One point for which he claims high credit is really a serious blemish. He says in the preface, "When years ago I wrote the first part of this book I had no foresight of the conclusions which afterwards emerged." This may be satisfactory to the writer, but it is highly unsatisfactory to the reader, who wants to know reasonably early in a book which way the argument is tending. As for Mr. Turner's final result, it is a kind of faith-philosophy, which does not seem to differ seriously from others of the same kind now in vogue. And, altogether, his conclusions do not strike one as having that transcendent importance which he boldly claims for them.

Mr. Thomas Whittaker's NEO-PLATONISTS (Cambridge University Press, 7s. 6d.) is, on the whole, a meritorious piece of research in a field which has been almost entirely neglected by English writers. In fact, the only work worth mentioning in our language dealing directly with Neo-Platonism for its own sake, and apart from its connexion with Christianity, is to be found in Mr. Benn's long and admirable chapter on the Spiritualism of Plotinus in his "Greek Philosophers." With Mr. Benn's work this volume of Mr. Whittaker's will naturally be compared. The verdict will probably be that, though the book is notably inferior in vigour and literary skill, Mr. Whittaker holds his own in philosophic breadth and careful exposition. Both writers agree in rejecting the notion which is all the average man knows about Plotinus' thinking, that it was a mere mysticism largely influenced by Oriental superstitions. They show that the mystical element is comparatively unimportant, and that Plotinus, who was the only original mind of the school, was, though Egyptian by birth, intellectually a pure Hellenist. Mr. Whittaker's standpoint on this vital question is indicated by the sub-title of his book, "A Study in the History of Hellenism." The same sub-title indicates another view, very clearly discernible in the book and one which explains what appears to be the disproportionate space assigned to the Neo-Platonist polemic against Christianity. In this polemic Mr. Whittaker is plainly on the pagan side. He conveys the impression that Neo-Platonism was the last rally of the old culture against the growing power of the "fanatical monk and domineering ecclesiastic," by whom it was ultimately crushed. There is, of course, something to be said for this point of view. We are not sure that we should not have liked Mr. Whittaker, simply for the sake of a clear issue, to have risked unpopularity, and put it in a sharper and more emphatic form.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA, by Dr. Alfred Caldecott (Methuen, 10s. 6d.), has a misleading title. One expects a volume of the same type as Principal Caird's lectures on the philosophy of religion. Dr. Caldecott, however, confines himself to an elaborate classification of different types of Theistic belief, and then gives a detailed criticism of different writers on Theism in Britain or America. His survey is wide enough; it includes Chalmers and George Eliot, T. H. Green and Mr. Balfour, Archbishop Temple and John Ruskin. Dr. Caldecott defends his method by the suggestion that "a survey of the past, and a comparison of the methods which compete for our acceptance in the present, may be the remedy needed by the tendency to agnosticism on the one hand, and the apparently chaotic advocacy of incompatible systems on the other." He does not attempt to exhibit the close connexion of British or American with Continental thought, but this might have enlarged his book to unwieldy limits. There is a good deal of interesting criticism in the book, which attempts also to do justice to some minor thinkers whose fame is not perhaps equal to their merits. It is, in fact, a conscientious classification of writers and systems, including some well-stated judgments on living writers, one of which may be quoted as a specimen :—

Tulloch called the work of the Cambridge Platonists "the first attempt to wed Christianity and philosophy made by any Protestant school." He did not live to see the issue of the Lux Mundi essays, or it can hardly be doubted that he would have given cordial recognition to this as the second combined attempt of a group of sympathetic friends to articulate philosophy and history with theology. The temper of this later group is not a whit less attractive than that of the older; while their work is in form so superior, in style so much more literary, as a whole, that their prospect of permanent influence is much greater.

TWO NEW BOOKS ON THE REFORMATION.

TREASON AND PLOT, by Martin A. S. Hume (Nisbet, 16s.), is the latest contribution to historical learning of the extraordinarily prolific writer who, not content with editing the "Calendar of Spanish State Papers" in the Record Office and with visits to Simancas for the purpose of illustration of the English material, is constantly producing well-written monographs on subjects connected with the history of Spain and England in the sixteenth century. His latest book is, in some respects, the best he has written. It is close-packed with the results of minute investigation, yet it is never overloaded. The style is clear, without any of the doubtful picturesqueness in which the author formerly indulged. The subject—or subjects, for, indeed, there are several not too tightly linked together—with which he deals is of great interest and has been hitherto almost neglected. When we have said this we must hasten to add that a great deal of minute work had already been done before Mr. Hume at the last years of Elizabeth's reign, especially in its ecclesiastical aspect, and that the publications of the Camden Society have made us familiar, for example, with the dissensions among Romanists in England and with the clever policy of Cecil in regard to the Succession question. But none the less it is undeniable that Mr. Hume has worked for himself, and, like every one who thus works, he has found out not a little that is both novel and interesting.

The main lines of interest in "Treason and Plot" converge on Spain, Ireland, and the Jesuits. A brief note must suffice us for each of these subjects. Much as Mr. Hume has already told us about Philip II., he has in this book more to tell, and it is full of interest. Not only do the general lines of his policy stand out clearly, but we learn much of the details of the ineffectual attempts on Ireland and on England. The negotiations of Father Cecil, who was, indeed, as Mr. Hume calls him, an "extraordinary man," are full of interest, and little less so the plots of Father Ogilvie; so are the changes and counter-changes of the Irish and Scottish alliances. But stranger still are the new proofs of Philip's almost insane love of secrecy and obstinacy. The destination of the expedition of 1596 was kept secret up to the very last. "Some conjecture," it was said, "that Africa will be the object, but common opinion points to Ireland or England; . . . but nothing certain can be known at present, as all orders are sent to the Adelantado under the King's own hand." Its destination, indeed, was kept secret even from the high officers on board the fleet. When it sailed, as we all know, it was shattered by storm and pestilence, and, as Mr. Hume says in his picturesque way :—"Out of the welter of misery one fact stood clearly—that for this year, at least, England had no cause for fear of any attack from Spain; and the watchers by the beacons, who had stood, like links of a chain, on every headland along the southern British shore, slept sound of nights in their beds, for the second Armada had shared the fate of the first, and the Power that ruled the tempest fought still on the side of England." The mention of the Armada reminds us of a curious story which has never been noticed before—that of the eight Spanish sailors, cast ashore in Ireland from the Armada, whose letter Mr. Hume has discovered at Simancas. The changes and chances of the later expeditions and attempts were almost equally curious, but for them we must refer our readers to Mr. Hume's book.

Much of the Irish history is, if not quite new, told with much fresh additional detail. The adventures of Essex, for instance, stand out very vividly in Mr. Hume's story. The Jesuits, again, lead us to the plots against Elizabeth's life, and it is to be observed that, while Mr. Hume rightly emphasizes the results of their disputes with their co-religionists in England as fatal to the prospects of a restoration of Romanism, he has little belief in many of the alleged schemes of assassination. He points out that Philip certainly did not consent to them, and he concludes that the stories of "widespread and numerous plots" are "to a large extent unsupported by serious evidence." The famous Lopez plot has been examined before by many who are interested in the history of Jews in England, by Mr. Sidney Lee among others, but Mr. Hume tells it extremely well, and we think with additional detail. The story of Yorke and Williams, which follows, is characteristic of the troublous times, and by the side of it may be placed those of Stanley (1598), Walpole, Squire, and the rest.

On the ecclesiastical aspect of the last ten years of Elizabeth's reign Mr. Hume does not dwell at any length; he disclaims making any contribution to "religious controversy." None the less his book is of great value to the Church historian, because it shows how utterly un-English the Romanists had become in those critical years. We observe, en passant, that Mr. Hume thinks that "vestments, lights, incense, and images" were included in the practice of the Elizabethan Church.

In so large a book it would hardly be possible to avoid some slips. We have noticed very few. Two may be mentioned. By "Winchester College, Oxford," Mr. Hume doubtless means New College; and for "Eylescliffe, Durham," he should write Eglescliffe.

Mr. Hume's book bristles with references to original authority. THE REFORMATION, A RELIGIOUS AND HISTORICAL SKETCH, by the Rev. J. A. Babington (John Murray, 12s.), is a book of another stamp. It is almost pathetic to read a work of such evident pains, the labour, as its author tells us, of twenty-five years, which has, by the omission of footnotes, been deprived of practically all value to the student. When Mr. Babington epitomizes books or laws, of Luther, or Calvin, or Knox, or Languet, he is clear and useful. But for the whole of his extended survey he vouchsafes us no means of checking his statements. He writes ex cathedra, and we are bound to say that when we begin to test his judgments we do not feel disposed to accept him as infallible. He writes, he tells us, "not as a member of any particular Church, but as one who can sympathize deeply with all the Evangelical Churches," which may perhaps account for some lack of differentiation and discrimination. We do not, however, feel much concern about his theology. It is his facts that we find defective. Bishop Creighton could have taught him to modify his judgment of Wolsey, Mr. Andrew Lang to look deeper into the work of John Knox. Mr. Brewer would have warned him that the satires of the sixteenth century are hardly convincing evidence against the clergy. The Utopia, we may note, can hardly be said to "testify eloquently to the corruption of the Papacy." The Reformers can hardly be massed together as objecting to clerical dominance in politics as Mr. Babington masses them on pp. 77-83; nor is it quite fair to saddle them with transferring "at one blow the ultimate decision and jurisdiction" in questions of marriage and divorce to the temporal power. The comparison between the Tridentine and the Protestant doctrines of justification is hardly just, since it is ignored that the Council of Trent was admittedly writing exactly and for trained theologians. Beza's appearance at the Conference of Poissy was hardly so startling to "his courtly audience" as Mr. Babington states, for his assumption of the "character of a Huguenot minister" was hardly a thing of yesterday. Philip II. was certainly not thought by Elizabeth to be "little better than a fool." The conference between the Marian Bishops and the advocates of Reform, on Elizabeth's accession, had none of the equality and freedom which Mr. Babington attributes to it. Had Mr. Babington given references throughout, his book would be one which an intelligent reader might use with advantage; as it is we fear that it cannot have an extended usefulness.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

An Austrian Officer on the War.

MY EXPERIENCES OF THE BOER WAR, by Count Sternberg (Longmans, 5s. n.), is entertaining, and the notes and introduction added by Colonel G. F. R. Henderson, who was Director of Intelligence on Lord Roberts' staff, make it also instructive. Count Sternberg is, on the whole, a friendly critic, though very ill-informed. His desire to take part in the war was so great that he did not care on which side he fought. Ultimately, his services having been declined with thanks by both combatants, he went out as a war correspondent attached to the Boer forces, and was captured at Paardeberg Drift. His references to the conduct of our soldiers, if not to the genius of our generals, are always complimentary. He is quite clear that "no Continental army would have done better than the English with the same or even somewhat greater numbers," and he doubts whether, "as regards practical equipment, technical smartness and readiness, a Continental army would have done so well." Nor has he any doubts as to the righteousness of our cause, in spite of his willingness to fight against us. The Transvaal is "the Hanover of Africa, which cuts into English territory just as Hanover cut into Prussia"; that is enough for him. Most of his criticisms, however, are very casual, and for real criticism it is necessary to turn to Colonel Henderson's introduction. Colonel Henderson considers that the lessons of the war are as follows:—

1. Infantry, attacking over open ground, must move in successive lines of skirmishers extended at wide intervals.
2. Cavalry, armed, trained, and equipped as the cavalry of the Continent, is as obsolete as the Crusaders.
3. Reconnaissance, even more important than heretofore, is far more difficult.

To the first of these propositions, at all events, the Continental theorists are diametrically opposed. At the last Continental manoeuvres the old system of thick firing lines supported by closed bodies was still adhered to. But Colonel Henderson gives very good reasons for his view that they will have to change their methods when the cartridges cease to be blank. He does not believe in "bludgeon work":—

Numbers thrown in after the same reckless fashion as they were thrown in by Napoleon at Wagram, or by Grant at Spotsylvania, or by Steinmetz at Gravelotte, may win once; but even the best disciplined army will not readily respond to a second call of the like nature.

When Count Sternberg is not relating his military adventures, he criticizes the toilet and personal appearance of Mr. Kruger in a light and entertaining style.

Native Races.

The South African Native Races Committee pours out its stream of facts in THE NATIVES OF SOUTH AFRICA (Murray, 12s. n.). As is proper at this stage, information is provided more abundantly than argument. There is much less indiscreet enthusiasm than might have been expected, and the general tone is singularly sober. Occasionally, too, there is a welcome touch of humour:—

Much is said about the necessity of teaching him [the native] "the dignity of labour." This lesson is not for him only; it appears that no inconsiderable part of the white population, especially in the Transvaal, have hitherto failed to appreciate it. There is proneness to dwell on the indisposition of the natives to engage in hard, continuous work. Such indisposition is not confined to the natives.

Not the least useful part of the book is the appendix in which are printed the answers of various South African correspondents to specific questions as to the proper treatment of the natives put to them by the Committee. In the Cape Colony, and even to a certain extent in Natal, there is a considerable body of opinion in favour of treating the Bantu as a man and a brother, but he is only regarded as a Gibeonite by the dwellers north of the Limpopo. Mr. W. E. Thomas declares that black men should be flogged by white men, and he does "not approve of freehold or any other personal proprietorship in land by natives" of the country exploited by the Chartered Company. The views of the missionaries are worth special notice. Mr. David Carnegie expresses "the united opinion of the members of the district committee meeting of the mission" on the subject of compulsory labour thus:—

We would suggest that every able-bodied man that cannot show a certificate of three months' work done for some employer, during one year, that an extra tax be imposed upon him.

He does not apparently recognize the possibility of an able-bodied man wishing, and being able, to work for himself and his family.

The Boers in 1801.

Lady Anne Lindsay, principally famous as the author of "Auld Robin Gray," married, at the age of forty-three, Mr. Andrew Barnard, son of the Bishop of Limerick, and, through her influence with Lord Melville, then Secretary for War in Pitt's first Administration, procured her husband, who was fifteen years her junior, the appointment of Secretary of Cape Colony, under Lord Macartney, in 1797. She lived five years at the Cape, returning to England, after the Peace of Amiens, in 1802. During the whole of her stay there she was in correspondence with Lord Melville, and her letters, which were preserved, are now published, with a memoir and brief notes by Mr. W. H. Wilkins, under the title SOUTH AFRICA A CENTURY AGO (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d.). Mr. Wilkins has done his part of the work with his usual taste and discretion; but the letters themselves are rather disappointing. There are commonplace accounts of ordinary up-country journeys, and there is a certain amount of personal gossip that has long since lost whatever interest it may once have had. Beyond this there is not very much, though it is interesting to see how old and inveterate are the animosities of English and Boers. The Boer women are the favourite objects of Lady Anne Barnard's criticism:—

They remind me very much of the women one might find at an assize ball in a county town. What they want most is shoulders and manners. I know now what is meant by a "Dutch doll"; their make is exactly like them. But the most exceptional things about them are their teeth and the size of their feet. A tradesman in London hearing their feet were so large, sent a box of shoes on speculation, which almost put the Colony in a blaze, so angry were the "Beauties." But day by day a pair was sent for by a slave in the dark, until at last all the shoes vanished.

There is also an interesting and vivacious account of the Cape Association—the earliest of the Cape Town Volunteer Corps.

Mediæval Germany.

Whoever desires to know all that can be said against Luther and the German Reformers should consult THE HISTORY OF THE GERMAN PEOPLE AT THE CLOSE OF THE MIDDLE AGES (Vols. III. and IV.), by Johannes Janssen, translated by A. M. Christie (Kegan Paul, 25s. n.) The work has run through many editions in Germany, and has evoked much criticism. These volumes begin with two chapters on Erasmus and the German humanists, and then deal with the rise of Luther and his doctrines to the end of the Peasants' insurrection of 1525. The ghastly tale of this revolt is told at great length, and the author tries to fasten the responsibility for it upon the leaders of the Reformation. Indirectly, no doubt, it was occasioned by their vehement attacks upon the old order of things; but the real causes lay deeper. Dr. Janssen's method of writing history is peculiar. He lacks the power of condensation; and he is deficient in that luminous treatment which gives the reader a firm grasp of the connexion of events. For many chapters together his work is not a narrative at all, but rather a "catena" of citations from, or analyses of, contemporary writings; and, in the case of men with whose aims he is not in sympathy, these citations are not always fair. Sir James Stephen has remarked that no writer can be less fairly judged than Luther by isolated passages, and that he is only really intelligible to those who are impartial as well as laborious. Dr. Janssen seems anxious to produce all the choicest flowers of Luther's vituperative vocabulary; and this is certainly no light task. No disputant ever flooded the world with such a torrent of abuse; but it was the controversial fashion of the day, and we are wrong if we allow our judgment of the man to be warped by it. There are several passages in which Dr. Janssen speaks strongly against some of the abuses in the Church that aroused Luther's wrath; but he seems unwilling to allow the same privilege to the Reformer using the coarser language of his day. His estimates of Erasmus and Hutten strike us as peculiarly one-sided. How could any one who often quotes the "Manual of a Christian Soldier" describe the former as "devoid of all moral seriousness"? Although the work of a partisan, the book is interesting and a mine of information upon a great subject.

Mr. Arthur Mee's JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (1s. 6d. n.) in the New Century Leaders Series (Partridge) is, without being very good, rather better than most books of the kind. Mr. Mee, at all events, is not afraid of criticizing, and sees in Mr. Chamberlain not only the great Imperialist, but also the man who "has not been too keenly sensitive of the necessity for raising the public life of England above all possibility of suspicion." There is, after all, not much value in these little biographies if they provide, as they so often do, nothing but eulogy.

CITIES AND CITIZENS, OR BRITAIN'S NEXT CAMPAIGN (H. Marshall, 6s.), is a plea for the principle of brotherhood and for the establishment of a "National League of Help" in order to better the condition of the poor, especially as regards housing. It is written by Miss Sutter, the author of "A Colony of Mercy." It is frankly socialistic and does not enter very deeply into economic problems, but it is written with great enthusiasm and in an attractive style, and its most important contribution to the question is its description of the most remarkable work done in Leipzig and Elberfeld, towns which have carried out successfully a comprehensive scheme for interesting the well-to-do in their poorer neighbours.

FREE LANCE JOURNALISM: HOW TO EMBARK UPON IT AND HOW TO MAKE IT PAY, by Basil Tozer (Arthur Sykes, 2s.), gives a good many practical hints that beginners will find useful, though it hardly grapples with the subject so thoroughly as did a volume in the "How To" Series, which we recently reviewed. As we find the author gravely protesting that a University education is of doubtful utility to a journalist, we presume that it is with the lower branches of the calling that he is best acquainted. A "double first" very likely would not interview a chorus girl about her art as satisfactorily as a good many thoroughly uneducated men; but on the best papers the Universities do more than hold their own. Even Steevens, the most successful of all the new journalists, was once "the Balliol prodigy."

ART.

Piero della Francesca.

Mr. W. G. Waters contributes a very carefully-compiled and well-written volume to Messrs. Bell's series of Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture in PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA (5s. n.). On first opening the book we must confess we were surprised to find the well-known profile portrait in the Poldi-Pezzoli Gallery at Milan given as a frontispiece, for no critic now ascribes this picture to the Umbrian master, and Mr. Waters expressly states that in his opinion it is not Piero's work. This is a little confusing to the reader, but with this exception we have nothing but praise for the volume. The author disposes of Vasari's fables and inaccuracies and gives us the few facts and dates regarding the artist which modern research has discovered.

Piero, whose family name appears in contemporary records alternately as dei Franceschi and della Francesca, was a native of the Umbrian city of Borgo San Sepolero, in the upper valley of the Tiber. Vasari places his birth as 1406, a date which Mr. Waters accepts; but if Milanese is correct in saying that his father, Benedetto dei Franceschi, was married to his mother, Romana di Perino, in 1416, the painter must have been born some ten or twelve years later. This would make him about twenty when we first hear of him as the pupil of the Florentine artist, Domenico Veneziano, who decorated the Casa Baglioni at Perugia in 1438. It is certain that Piero accompanied his master to Florence in the following year, for he is mentioned in the accounts of the Hospital of Santa Maria Nuova as the assistant of Messer Domenico, who was engaged in painting the adjoining chapel of Sant' Egidio from 1439 to 1445. Mr. Waters, by the way, often refers to Sant' Egidio as being a chapel of Santa Maria Novella, the great Dominican church in another quarter of the town, instead of being attached to the Hospital of Santa Maria Nuova. Unfortunately, the frescoes with which Domenico Veneziano and his two scholars, Piero della Francesca and Alessio Baldovinetti, decorated this chapel have been totally destroyed. The loss is the more to be regretted since these paintings represented an important phase in the development of Florentine art and would have supplied many links which are wanting in the history of its evolution.

The earliest of Piero della Francesca's works now in existence are the altar-piece of the Madonna and Saints in the chapel of the Misericordia in his native city, which he painted soon after 1445, and "The Baptism of Christ," formerly in another church of Borgo San Sepolero, which was acquired by the National Gallery forty years ago. The well-known "Nativity" in the same collection, with the choir of angels singing and playing musical instruments, belongs to a somewhat later date, but has suffered terribly from ill-judged restoration. Mr. Waters draws attention to the obviously Flemish type of the Virgin's face, which shows the influence exerted on contemporary Italian art by Northern masters, and especially by Hugo van der Goes, whose great "Adoration" had been lately placed in the Portinari chapel of Santa Maria Nuova. Borgo San Sepolero is fortunate in retaining one of Piero's undoubted masterpieces, the magnificent "Resurrection," which "is unquestionably the strongest manifestation of his power, the creation upon which rests his most valid title to immortal fame." The Umbrian master's conception is wholly unlike any other "Resurrection" in the world, both in its sense of irresistible force and in the majestic dignity and structural beauty of the rising Christ who soars upward from the tomb. The same consummate rendering of the nude, the same splendid and robust display of muscular strength strikes us in the fresco of Hercules which has lately been discovered in a private house of Borgo San Sepolero and now hangs in the Villa Cattani. This last-named work was probably executed about the same period as the frescoes which Piero painted in the church of S. Francesco in Arezzo between 1460 and 1466. The legend of the Discovery of the Holy Cross, as set forth in the "Golden Legend" of the monastic writer Jacopo di Voragine, is the subject of this great series, and it is interesting to compare Piero's conception of the story with the version of an earlier master, the Giottesque painter Agnolo Gaddi, who had already illustrated this theme on the walls of Santa Croce of Florence. The contrast between the methods and aims of the two artists is strongly marked, but, full of charm as is Gaddi's manner of telling his story, Piero's superiority in the matter of artistic representation is manifest at every turn. In our author's words—

We have here for the first time a serious endeavour to represent, by a hand and an intelligence scientifically trained, certain great secular scenes of historic significance. . . . Never before had energetic action been so skilfully portrayed; never had the sense of motion been so vividly realized as in the floundering horse of Maxentius and the waving banners in "The Battle of Constantine"; and in the same fresco the consideration of scenic effect shown by the sharp division of the two groups of the composition stamps the picture as a triumph of artistic arrangement. In the "Vision" Piero reaches his highest point as a master of light and dark; no finer achievements can be ascribed to him in anatomical study than those in the "Burial of Adam"; and in the "Meeting of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba" he makes manifest how complete was his knowledge and how correct his eye as to the relative value of colours and of the due arrangement of the same.

Another interesting group of pictures belonging to a later period is connected with the visit paid by Piero della Francesca to Urbino in 1469, when he was invited to paint a picture for the Guild of Corpus Christi and stayed in the house of Raphael's father, Giovanni Santi. Only one of these is still at Urbino, a small picture of the "Scourging of Christ," with a number of striking contemporary portraits and a rich background of the Renaissance architecture which the painter loved to introduce. The fine altar-piece of the Madonna, with the Child asleep on her lap, and Duke Federigo, in black armour, kneeling in the foreground, is now in the Brera, while every visitor to the Uffizi is familiar with the splendid portraits of the Duke and Duchess Federigo, with his strong face, short crisp locks, and broken nose, and Battista in her rich brocades and quaint frilled head-dress. These portraits have little in common either in technique or colouring with the much-discussed profiles of the Poldi-Pezzoli and Berlin Galleries, which are plainly the work of a Florentine master, Andrea Verrocchio or, as others hold, Piero Pollaiuolo. Neither can we recognize any trace of his hand in the so-called "Isotta da Rimini" (585) of the National Gallery, or in the other profile (758) which goes by the name of the "Contessa Palma of Urbin." The one is by some inferior imitator, the other was formerly attributed to Paolo Uccello by Signor Frizzoni, and has been ascribed by Mr. Roger Fry in a recent lecture to Alessio Baldovinetti.

Mr. Waters dwells with good reason on the technical excellencies of Piero's art, on his mastery of perspective, his skill in the use of oil-varnishes, dexterity in the distribution of light and shade, the noble simplicity of his composition and stately pose of his figures. He might have said even more in praise of his beautiful and harmonious colouring, which in its gaiety and delicacy is so distinctly of Umbrian and not Florentine origin. The chapter which discusses the influence of Piero's paintings in the Vatican on the mind of Raphael is both interesting and suggestive. When Mr. Waters says that up to the time when the great Urbinate left Florence he had only painted one picture which was not religious in subject, "The Three Graces" at Chantilly, does he not forget that lovely little painting, "The Vision of a Knight," which belongs to Raphael's early days at Urbino? The illustrations of the book are remarkably well executed and include the Rimini fresco of Sigismondo Malatesta kneeling with his greyhounds before St. Sigismund, and many excellent reproductions of the Arezzo frescoes, as well as the Hercules of Borgo San Sepolcro, a figure which, in its noble proportions and admirable modelling, recalls the finest works of Greek sculpture.

Mr. Strang's Kipling Illustrations.

We publish this week a reproduction of Mr. W. Strang's new portrait of Mr. Rudyard Kipling. It belongs to the series of thirty etchings by W. Strang, illustrating Rudyard Kipling's Short Stories. These etchings, recently exhibited, and now published by Mr. Gutekunst in King-street, St. James', can be judged merely as etchings, without regard to the subject-matter; and they can be criticized as illustrations of familiar stories. They are more likely to receive unqualified approval when regarded from the former standpoint, for it is notoriously as difficult to satisfy pictorially a mentally preconceived type as it is to correct an obviously incorrect but widespread misconception. As etchings, it will be readily apparent that Mr. Strang has lost nothing of that vigour of line or that firm, healthy use of strong contrasts which have so long made his work noteworthy. He is a fearless draughtsman, and the rugged, direct incisiveness of his method should pre-eminently fit him as an illustrator of the unconventional prose of the author of "Plain Tales" and "Black and White." This much may be accepted as a somewhat certain result of the attempt of a powerful artist to recreate by line and tone impressions that have taken root in our minds through the power of a strikingly individual narrator.

When we come to ask the question, how far does the etcher as illustrator appear to us to represent the type already mentally created? the reply is so much a question of temperament and individual inclination that it is difficult to arrive at a mutual basis for criticism. It would seem certain, however, that the subjects in which the elephant—as in No. 5, "Toomai of the Elephants," and No. 18, "My Lord the Elephant"—rather than the man is the central idea are the more satisfactory. An elephant well drawn is an elephant always; but a man, however well drawn, is, as an actor in a word-drama, capable of acquiring so many and various forms that to fix a type is extremely difficult. The conception of the writer dominates the mind and has the advantage of being anterior to the illustrator's attempts, to the newly-tried efforts of Mr. Strang. Nos. 15 and 16, "The Man who would be King," for example, hardly convince us; No. 14, "Without Benefit of Clergy," appears inconsequential, and No. 23, "The Undertakers," is as gruesome as the story, but lacks its fascination. On the other hand, No. 30, "A Disturber of Traffic," realizes for us what the writer has hardly conveyed with so much certainty. It has the power and the imagination of a Boyd Houghton. If we take a somewhat analogous case, the connexion between Dickens and his first illustrators, our point may be more easily be understood. If ten intelligent readers of Dickens, who had made their acquaintance with the works of this writer for the first time through the medium of an illustrated edition, were to set down descriptions of the appearance of the characters depicted to them simultaneously by writer and artist, we should probably find that the majority of the readers would describe the types as drawn rather than the characters as described. Thus the drawings by Cruikshank and "Phiz" are an inseparable part of the popular conception of Mr. Pickwick, Sam Weller, Mr. Micawber, Jingle, and Barnaby Rudge; and later illustrators who depart from these types find it as difficult to arrest and retain the affections of the reader as any illustrator would who attempted to create a Don Quixote differing in any material characteristic from the creation of Gustave Doré. Mr. W. Nicholson has tacitly acknowledged this in his recent "Characters of Romance." It is difficult, therefore, we repeat, to decide with any degree of confidence whether Mr. Strang has succeeded in illustrating Rudyard Kipling. In the "Frontispiece," however, which we reproduce by permission of Mr. R. Gutekunst, he gives us a pictorial allegory and portrait, concerning the excellence of which there can be but little question. As to the rest of the series, the combination of the thought of two artists of so much individuality and power could not fail to have been of the greatest interest, and no one of the etchings, however much or little our ideas or ideals may differ from Mr. Strang's representation, is unworthy of a great occasion.

So many painters, who made the first exhibition of the New English Art Club at the Marlborough Gallery in Pall Mall famous, have found their remedium amoris in a decent retreat within the fold of the Royal Academy that the Club—but for its French predilections—is in some danger of becoming more English than New. It is true that Mr. Wilson Steer remains to keep alive the jibe that the “broad” school is adapted to hide inefficiency behind self-sufficiency, but he has but few to keep him company this year. Of these the most typical are Mr. H. Walker, Mr. C. W. Furse, W. W. Russell, and A. S. Haynes. It only remains for these gentlemen to master the “sweet convincingness” of drawing to remove from the exhibitions of the Club what used to be the chief characteristics of their middle period. For it is apparent that we are arriving at a new phase in the history of the Club. The pictures that stand out from the walls of the present exhibition are not the ambitious “slapdash” polychromatic problems of yore, but those which are distinguished by an appearance of high finish. Here, for example, is a picture by Mr. William Orpen with a catalogue title “A mere fracture, in the Newcomes, Fitzroy-street.” The description is open to as many interpretations as the fancy of the casual observer may dictate, but the work is Dutch in finish if somewhat bourgeois in conception. It serves to show that Mr. Orpen is a still-life painter of great skill, and we need only call attention to the group on the table to demonstrate this. Then there is Mr. Francis Dodd’s quite unrecognizable portrait of “W. E. Henley, Esq.,” Mr. C. T. Stabb’s “Miss Marion Powers,” a thinly luminous “Interior” in the style of “the Master,” by Mr. Will Rothenstein, another carefully-finished “Interior” by David Muirhead, and a portrait of “A Lady in Black” against a grey background—a well-worn and generally effective studio treatment—by Mr. Orpen. These highly-finished pictures are sufficient to give an unaccustomed tone to the collection and they deserve to rank with the works of Moffat Lindner, Murray-Smith, W. S. Stacey, H. Watson, James Henry, and S. J. Douglas, as the successes of the exhibition. The characteristics of many former collections, the archaic mannerisms of C. Conder, Alfred Thornton, Roger Fry, H. Bellingham Smith, C. J. Holmes, and A. S. Hartrick, are less numerous than usual, and they leave the eye sufficiently attuned to admire the colour scheme of Mr. Wilson Steer’s “Hydrangea,” however much his inability to draw a cat may be deplored. Then there is the pearly “Rye” by L. C. Powles, the very breezy “Breakers” by W. S. Stacey, the brilliant—if somewhat scattered—“Brentford” by Bernhard Sickert, and the bold, rich, and successful “Bridget” by S. J. Douglas. Mr. W. G. von Glehn with his solidly-painted, semi-classical “Swan,” shows that strength can be obtained with luscious colour no less than with the powerful low tones that Mr. Hugh Carter has employed in his “Green Old Age.” Much that is shown is in violation of the gospel of the rampant days of the Club.

The silver statuette to be presented to Lord Roberts when he visits Bath will not (by his special request, we believe) be exhibited at the Royal Academy or elsewhere. One or two friends of Mr. Onslow Ford, its designer, have, however, seen it in the Acacia-road studio. It is an equestrian figure of Lieutenant Roberts, whose gallantry in attempting to rescue the guns at Colenso won for him the Victoria Cross, but led, unfortunately, to his death almost ere he heard of the distinction. It is a fine piece of work. Though on a small scale, it is dignified, and conveys a sense of mass; the lines, from whatever standpoint viewed, are rhythmically beautiful, and horse and rider are knit into a genuine whole. It were well could all swords of honour take a form as æsthetically welcome.

Never has there been so much done as now to raise the standard of taste by cheap reproductions of good pictures, and the Review of Reviews helps the work by issuing large collotypes (about 1ft. 6in. in height) of Rossetti’s “Proserpine” and Mr. Henry Wood’s “Cupid’s Spell”—a good shilling’s worth—in its Masterpiece Portfolios.

Mr. Whistler is at present in Algiers, and we may hope that he is painting some of the unusually attractive impressions of this brilliant country.

FICTION.

Young Ireland.

“Who fears to speak of ’98?” is hardly a question which can appositely be asked of that other Irish movement which, sharing in the general European enthusiasm for revolutionary ideas, reached its not very glorious consummation in 1848. To be quite candid, this latter attempt to throw off English supremacy proved pretty much of a fiasco. In his story MONONIA (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), Mr. Justin McCarthy does not betray any desire to gloze over the real facts. Yet the angle of observation is necessarily that of the sympathetic Irish politician who, while participating in his fellow-countrymen’s sense of grievance, has always favoured constitutional remedies; only “Mononia” is redolent of Young Ireland and the days when the young manhood of Munster and Connaught was aflame for freedom, discussed “the rights of man” in its debating societies, and raved over Béranger and brotherhood. Mr. McCarthy gives just the right impression of those emancipatory times, and apart from its political interest the story is strong and pre-eminently readable. The narrative is never dull, flowing on smoothly and cleverly, with a hundred happy touches of characterization, to an end which is agreeable to the general reader and truthful enough for the artistic. One pair of lovers are allowed to be happy, but another pair are separated. “Mononia” is essentially a novel of character and “atmosphere,” and not of plot. A critic agog for the dramatic might accuse the author of having “missed chances,” as the cricketers say, especially in connexion with the quiet description of the unsuccessful upshot of the secret confederation and its plottings. But that is not Mr. McCarthy’s way. He keeps the story circling about the Munster homestead which, by the time we have finished the book, we know very well indeed, because we have lived at leisure in it and intimately shared the thoughts of the dwellers. While he might have given us a stagey Phil Colston, rampant on the hustings and victorious in tussles with the constabulary, he renders us a strenuous young barrister, who relinquishes his rich uncle’s favour for the sake of “the movement,” and comes to the front through enthusiasm and ability rather than pushfulness. Moreover, Colston is a failure, albeit a splendid one. Maurice Desmond, too, less of a leader but not less enthusiastic, is finely drawn, and the affection between him and his sister Kathleen beautifully presented. This is certainly one of the most admirable characteristics of the story; the world does not outgrow brotherly and sisterly affection however assiduously modern novelists may leave it rusting on the shelf. “The head of the house of Desmond,” who lives on the imagined echo of a great past, is very happily portrayed as the harmless sensualist for whom anything but the agreeable is too troublesome. When he died there was on his face “the smile of grateful acknowledgment for the recognition given to the ancestral claims of the house of Desmond.”

Another War Story.

It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to say what is the main subject of THE ETERNAL QUEST (Hutchinson, 6s.). In novels, at any rate, the eternal quest is Love, and Mr. J. A. Steuart here gives us plenty of the right sort. Two gallant and spirited young men, two charming girls—and the rest a fine medley of war in many climes, winding up, of course, with the present campaign in South Africa. It is too late now, perhaps, to enter a protest against the habit of dealing in novels with events of so recent occurrence as Maghersfontein (as Mr. Steuart prefers to spell it). Here we have again the story of the Highland Brigade at that disastrous attack, and the unfortunate brigadier in command falls back into Ivor Malcolm’s arms, using a form of words that has been too often repeated and too often disputed. We do not want this kind of realism in fiction, and Mr. Steuart’s inventive faculty and charm of narration should make him independent of any such tricks. Otherwise “The Eternal Quest” deserves all praise. The characters are drawn with an affectionate insight; old General Malcolm and his life-long friend and comrade Carmichael are as pleasant a pair as we have met for a long time, and the ladies, old and young, are worthy of their company. It is a good, healthy, spirited story, not easy to lay down, and written better than most novels of the day.

Genteel Comedy.

In HIS OWN FATHER (Hurst and Blackett, 3s. 6d.) Mr. W. E. Norris gives us his usual indefinable flavour of good breeding. The characters move in good society, and their conversations (reported at considerable length) approximate closely to what you might hear any day in a London drawing room if something of importance were being discussed. Mrs. Hamilton and her daughter, and their confidant, Captain Clough, all behave with remarkable discretion and converse in the politest phrases. The Austrian count and his son act after the manner of foreign gentlemen of title. Mrs. Perkins and her amiable family supply the necessary contrast of pushing but well-intentioned vulgarity. It is all dexterously done, and most readers will excuse the tenuity of the plot for the sake of the dialogue. For the story is extremely slight, and could have been told satisfactorily in a dozen pages, but Mr. Norris no longer wastes his material in writing short stories.

"Evangelist."

A SOLDIER OF THE KING, by Dora M. Jones (Cassell and Co., 6s.), deals with a subject of great interest, in the career of that John Gifford, one of the wildest of Royalist soldiers and conspirators, who, after conversion, became an earnest minister of "Christ's people" and is immortalized as Bunyan's "Evangelist." It traces Gifford's plots on behalf of Charles I., his share in the Kentish rising of 1648, his base and fruitless schemes against the innocence of Grace Wilson, daughter of Thomas Wilson the well-known preacher at Maidstone, and closes with his almost miraculous escape from Maidstone gaol after the failure of the Royalist plans. Unfortunately, the story hardly gives more than a glimpse of the soul conflict which must have been fought before such a man was transformed into the penitent, evangelist, and saint. The novel is well constructed, the sombre drama of Gifford's life being balanced by the romance of his sister and the Puritan captain, and written with fairness and skill. The writer also knows the period, and the characters are life-like, if not always actually living. We miss, however, some final insight and intensity in the study of Gifford, and the depth of light and shadow suggested by such a career. The beautiful cover-design tells the story powerfully in its own fashion.

Miss Adeline Sergeant.

Miss Adeline Sergeant appears to grow more and more prolific. Perhaps this is a mere accident of publication. It is difficult to tell whether Miss Sergeant wrote THIS BODY OF DEATH (Hurst, 6s.) when she was new to the art or in the fulness of her experience; for she is always fluent, correct, and clever. The story of a Russian lady, deeply involved in secret societies, whose English husband betrays the cause to save the lives of his nearest and dearest; the up-bringing of the son of such a union after the father's death; the remorseless conduct of the secret societies—these are topics with a sadly familiar ring. But "This Body of Death" restates a somewhat worn case with ease and finish. It is a novel of mediocrity written as if it were extraordinary.

Mr. Frederick Langbridge, the author of LOVE HAS NO PITY (Digby, Long, 6s.), describes his book fairly accurately in a dedication:—

It's half a web of the dreams that flatter,
It's half a clod of the earth we know,
It's all a bungle—but what's the matter?
Like it for sake of the years ago.

It has some imagination; it is occasionally true to life; and it is all rather incoherent. Violent actions follow one another bewilderingly and for doubtful reasons. There is humour of a mild kind ("In three days, the canal bore well enough to drown a boy" is a fair specimen), and there are human touches, especially about the character of Julia, the "man-eater." A little more, and "Love has no Pity" would have been what it has somehow just missed being—a clever, well-written novel.

Every detail in HIS LORDSHIP'S WHIM, by Gordon Cuming Whadcoat (Effingham Wilson, 6s.), strikes us as laboured and insincere. The leading idea of a maiden who is allowed to grow to maturity without seeing a man of any kind is not a new one, but lends itself to effective treatment. Mr. Whadcoat's heroine is an ill-realized and unconvincing being, in spite of her "satin lips" and "reginal dignity." The pathos of the book is maudlin. Let any one who has ever seen a newspaper boy compare him with Wally. The author has plenty to say, but he does not know how to say it; and it is doubtful whether it is quite worth saying.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Cardiff is well known as a library centre. Nevertheless, the last meeting of the Library Association held at that town drew attention to the dearth of libraries in the thickly-populated colliery districts of South Wales. This is not the fault of the workmen, who have in many instances agreed to deductions from their pay for the support of reading-rooms. It is the apathy of the District Councils that is complained of. If they would only see the benefits which a public library confers, they have the power to support reading-rooms and establish adequate collections of books. At the meeting Mr. F. J. Burgoyne, Librarian of Lambeth, read a paper on the choice of books for small libraries. He maintained that the proper selection of books is the most important duty of a librarian. Few will dispute this, unless it may be those members of library boards who like to see their officers occupied with technical matters which might be entrusted to junior clerks. Mr. Burgoyne's bibliographical lists are good, and his paper is a useful guide in the formation of a library.

From Chicago comes the complaint that the books in public libraries are capable of communicating disease. This traverses a widely-quoted medical opinion given at last year's meeting of the Library Association as the result of bacteriological investigation. Who shall decide when doctors disagree? The Chicago Committee advise dry sterilization, to which a contributor to the Globe adds a recommendation that the hands should be washed after reading. May we suggest as an improvement the washing of hands before reading?

From a bibliographical standpoint the most valuable "loot" acquired by any of the allied forces in China is the library established at Mukden when the Manchu dynasty asserted itself over the older régime. It is scarcely possible that this collection contains any early European MSS. It is more than possible, however, that the Tartar race had enough of the collector's spirit to acquire many important documents of Chinese and Oriental origin. The result of expert investigation will be awaited with curiosity. St. Petersburg takes much literary interest in the "capture." As to its moral aspect opinions may differ.

It is a useful plea that Mr. James Duff Brown makes in the new number of the Library for descriptive cataloguing. Every one must have experienced the desire to know something more of the contents of a book than is revealed by its curt, often misleading, title. Our readers will have noticed that we now give some guidance of this sort either under our Book List or list of "Books to look out for." A Library Catalogue could, of course, do it far more completely than is possible in a weekly journal. The old-fashioned title-page was frankly descriptive; the modern one, as Mr. Duff Brown says, is a mere "motto or trade mark." The explanatory note is wanted not only to explain, for instance, that "Oils and Water-colours" is a volume of verse, but in fiction to help readers who do not want sensation, who do not want stories of foreign countries, or who read nothing but historical novels.

On either side of Ardnamurehan Point, in Argyllshire, is a small village—Kilmory on one side and Kilchoan on the other. The library movement has reached to both sides of this remote headland and small libraries are being formed in Kilmory and Kilchoan. The proprietor—this sounds sufficiently primitive—has sent 100 volumes to be interchangeable between the two institutions. "The formation of these libraries," says the Oban Times, "is hailed with much enthusiasm by the youth of the parish, the great majority of whom are eager readers."

"MISQUOTATION."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—On reading Mr. Cohen's interesting paper on "Misquotation," I am reminded of an example of what he calls "the minor or negative form of the peccadillo." Who has not at one time or another heard that "Money is the root of all evil"? There is also a curious example of the reverse form in the misuse of the words "anathema maranatha." This has the high authority of the authorized version of the Bible itself where we read (1 Cor. 16, 22) "Let him be Anathema Maran-atha." What St. Paul wrote was, of course, "ἄνω δαδθεμα", the "ἡμῶν δαδ" following being a separate phrase signifying "the Lord cometh."

I am, Sir, yours obediently,

April 14.

ALFRED MICHELSON.

"ST. OR S.?"

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I remind your correspondent Mr. Hutton—

(1) that when St. means street it always comes after a proper name not before it,

(2) That the analogy of Mr. and Dr. is entirely in favour of St. ? (By the way, Dr. stands for debtor as well as for doctor, but that is no reason why doctor should be abbreviated into D.)

In our language the rule seems to be that when two or more words have to be abbreviated initial letters only are given (e.g., Q.C., M.P., B.A.), but that when one word only has to be abbreviated either the first and last letters are given (e.g., Dr., Kt.) or the first syllable (e.g., Rev., Prof.). If S. is to take the place of St., why should not M. take the place of Mr. ?

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

OXONIAN.

JOHN WESLEY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In an article on John Wesley in Temple Bar the writer credits even that wonderfully energetic nature with powers beyond those of mortal men. She affirms that Wesley preached four hundred thousand sermons. The mind feminine has in many cases a delightful disregard for the value of figures, and it must be so in this instance if there be no misprint. For this appalling computation of four hundred thousand implies that without one day's rest, without one hour's illness, Wesley preached eighteen sermons every day for sixty years! One is at a loss which to pity most in such a case, preacher or hearers. But Wesley himself speaks of eighteen exhortations a week, and if he had continued at this rate without a break for sixty years there would then have been a sum of over fifty-six thousand sermons, sufficient one would have thought to conjure with. The number of hymns he wrote is so great as to tragically depress the student of poetry, and suggests that the tap of devout rhyme is not difficult to set flowing; and when to these already overwhelming figures are added the miles he travelled, and the volumes he prepared for the "Christian Library," then, like the inquiring Queen of Sheba, there is no more spirit in one!

Yours faithfully,

Lowlands, Bungay, April 12.

ARTHUR HOOD.

VICTORIAN WOMEN WRITERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Will you allow a foreigner to point out a need greatly felt by lovers of literature ?

England may boast of having a large number of lady writers who are in no way inferior to their Continental sisters, and whose names are familiar to all. How does it happen that writers and publishers do not produce a work special to the Literary Women of the Victorian era—by which I mean not a mere biography with a few extracts of their books, but a full study of their character, style, and influence, if any, over the people's minds during the last two generations ?

Unlike the eighteenth, the nineteenth century has not, as far as I know, produced any women's memoirs of mark, whether by way of letters like Mme. de Sévigné, or "Histoire de ma vie" like George Sand.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ALF. HAMONET.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston, and Co. (St. Dunstan's-house, Fetter-lane) write :—

To the Editor.

Sir,—We are preparing to publish Volume VI. of the "English Catalogue of Books," 1898-1900, which completes the list of works produced during the century. As we wish to make it as complete as possible, may we ask those of your readers who have published books between January 1st, 1898, and December 31st, 1900, for the full titles, sizes, prices, month and year of publication, and author's and publisher's names, to be sent as soon as possible, addressed to Editor, "English Catalogue of Books."

P.S.—Particulars of books which have already appeared in the Publishers' Circular or in the Annual Volumes of the "English Catalogue of Books" are, of course, not required.

Mr. Strang's series of Kipling etchings at Mr. Gutekunst's Gallery in King-street, St. James'—including the new portrait which appears in this week's Literature—will be reproduced in the autumn in a five-guinea book to be issued by Messrs. Macmillan. Meantime, Mr. Kipling's publishers have printed a list of his works, giving the sales of each book up to the end of last year. The arithmetical method of judging books is, no doubt, misleading, but the figures in this case are interesting as showing the varying successes of a popular author's works. Here is the list in order of numerical merit :—

- "The Day's Work," 56,000.
- "The Jungle Book," 55,000.
- "A Fleet in Being," 55,000.
- "Plain Tales from the Hills," 48,000.
- "The Light that Failed," 44,000.
- "Life's Handicap," 39,000.
- "The Second Jungle Book," 38,000.
- "Many Inventions," 36,000.
- "Stalky and Co.," 33,000.
- "Captains Courageous," 27,000.
- "Soldiers' Three, and other Stories," 20,000.
- "Wee Willie Winkie, and other Stories," 17,000.
- "From Sea to Sea," 14,000.
- "Soldier Tales," 10,000.

Making a total circulation, including that of "The Naulahka," by Rudyard Kipling and Wolcott Balestier, which Messrs. Macmillan took over from Mr. Heinemann, of about half-a-million copies.

The sales of the early Kiplings, in the original editions, are even more interesting. Last year the market value dropped disastrously for collectors who had bought their copies in 1899, when the rise in prices had been equally rapid. "Schoolboy Lyrics"—as recorded in "Book-Prices Current"—fell from £135 to £3 5s.; "Echoes, by Two Writers," from £29 to £18 10s.; "Quartette," from £10 5s. to £3 12s.; "The United Service College Chronicle," from £101 (19 numbers only) to £5 7s. 6d.; "Black Canyon," from £13 to £2 6s.; the two leaves on light blue paper, known as "The Marguerite," Davoz-Platz, 1882, from £4 to £2; and so on. But it is only fair to add, as we pointed out at the time, that the record price of £135 given for "Schoolboy Lyrics," in 1899, was for a perfect copy with a MS. title and design on the cover done by the author's father, whereas the copy sold for £3 5s. last year was a soiled copy which was further disfigured by having a former owner's name written on the title. The general depression caused by the war probably affected the fall in prices, but the more plausible explanation is that the remarkable sales of 1899 led to the discovery of other copies hitherto unsuspected. The early Stevensons suffered in the same way.

Messrs. Sands will shortly publish "The Ashanti Campaign of 1900," by Captain C. H. Armitage, Acting Resident at Kumasi, and Lieut.-Colonel (then Major) Montanaro, of Colonel Willcock's General Staff.

There are several new war books to announce this week. Perhaps the most interesting is "A Doctor in Khaki" (Murray), by Mr. Francis Fremantle, a son of the Dean of Ripon, who went out in 1899 on the staff of the first General Hospital in the South African War. The author was in Bloemfontein at the time of Mr. Burdett-Coutts' report; was with General Hamilton in the march to Pretoria, his experiences during that period including a day with a Boer commando. He is said to be strongly in favour of reforming the Army Medical Corps. Another war book from Mr. Murray is by an American named Mr. H. F. Mackern, who accompanied the march to Pretoria as journalist and photographer. It is entitled "Side-Lights on the March," and is illustrated by photographs. A third khaki book, printed for private circulation, and published by Messrs. Sampson Low, is entitled "The Green Horse in Ladysmith"—an illustrated record of the 5th Dragoon Guards during the siege, edited by Lieut.-Colonel St. John Gore, who commanded the regiment during the absence of Colonel Baden-Powell, then commanding at Mafeking. A similar regimental record was made by Major-General Temple Godman when the 5th Dragoon Guards were in the Crimea, but that, unfortunately, was destroyed in the fire at Scutari. One account of Elandslaagte is written by Lieutenant Norwood, who was subsequently awarded the Victoria Cross. Further accounts are contributed by other officers and non-commissioned officers of the regiment.

Mr. Heinemann announces a work on "The New South African Colonies: their Value and Development" by Mr. W. Bleloch, who has lived ten years in South Africa, and knows the Boers and their language. He believes in the capacity of the new colonies to provide revenue and pay a share of the war debt.

Mr. Fred. T. Jane's Naval Annual, "All the World's Fighting Ships," is to be enlarged, and, besides 23,000 illustrations, will include articles by the Grand Duke Alexander of Russia, Prince Louis of Battenberg, Marquess de Balincourt, Admiral Cervera, &c. Submarine boats are dealt with by the heads of the Italian, Norwegian, and French navies. Messrs. Sampson Low publish the volume on May 1.

Mr. Jane has invented a new coast game of which Messrs. Sampson Low are the English publishers. It is a sort of addendum to Mr. Jane's naval war game, which has been taken up by most of the foreign navies, as well as by our own. Every possible kind of coast warfare is assimilated, from submarine boat operations to landing parties and high-angle fire. It is said to have been already adopted by the French and American navies.

Orientalists everywhere will be glad to learn that the first part of Vol. I. of the "Repertoire d'Epigraphie Sémitique," by the Commission of the Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum, has just appeared from the National Printing Office in Paris, and is on sale at M. Klincksieck's bookshop. The president of this commission, which has long been doing for Semitic monuments what the founders of the Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum have done for Roman monuments, is the Marquis de Vogüé. He explains the need of founding a periodical review to place the newly-discovered texts rapidly at the disposal of scholars. This will admit of critical work upon the texts before they take their definitive place in the Corpus.

The renowned Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough is the subject of a biography by Mr. Fitzgerald Molloy which Messrs. Hutchinson and Co. will publish under the title of "The Queen's Comrade."

Messrs. Harpers are shortly publishing "Understudies," by Mary E. Wilkins (the author of "Jerome"), in which the author takes certain animals and flowers and uses their characteristics as material for short love stories.

Students of our naval history will be curious to see "The Diary of Captain Hoffman, R.N.," which Mr. Murray announces. Captain Hoffman fought at Trafalgar and in many other engagements; and he kept a diary which has hitherto remained unpublished. The work has been edited by Mr. A. Bedford Bevan and the Rev. H. B. Wolryche-Whitmore. "The Commonwealth of Australia" is another interesting addition to Mr. Murray's list; the author is Professor Harrison Moore, and his book is intended to be a sort of guide to the new Commonwealth, somewhat after the manner of Mr. Bryce's book on "The American Commonwealth," published in 1888.

The third volume of Dr. Beattie Crozier's "History of Intellectual Development" (Longmans) is nearly ready. The first volume, dealing with Greek and Hindoo Thought, Græco-Roman Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity down to the closing of the Schools of Athens by Justinian, appeared in 1897, and Dr. Crozier hopes to have the second volume ready in about a year. Volume III. deals with "Practical Statesmanship," and contains detailed schemes of political reconstruction, for England, France, and America respectively, for the twentieth century. Several further additions have been made to Messrs. Longmans' list of announcements. Mr. Andrew Lang has returned to a favourite study in a book which is now in the press—"Magic and Early Religion"; Professor Shaylor Mathews, of Chicago University, has written a sketch of the French Revolution, which will appear shortly, with a portrait of Mirabeau; and Major-General G. Allgood, C.B., is publishing his "Letters and Journals of the China War, 1860."

Mr. Grant Richards is preparing under the editorship of Mr. A. R. Waller a new series, "The French Novelists of the Nineteenth Century." The first two volumes,—"The Latin Quarter," "La Vie de Bohème" by Henri Murger, and "Salambo" by Gustave Flaubert—are to be translated by Miss Ellen Marriage and Mr. A. W. Matthews respectively, and both will contain introductions by Mr. A. Symons, with photogravure portraits of their authors.

Mr. Fisher Unwin will shortly publish a pamphlet by Edmund Kell Blyth on "The Last Step to Religious Equality," stating the historical side of the Disestablishment question which hitherto seems to have been little touched upon. Mr. Unwin has a volume of essays by young Cambridge men—among them Mr. G. P. Trevelyan—dealing with the problems of modern city life in England. It is entitled "The Heart of the Empire," and most of the writers claim from actual residence in the poorer quarters to possess a first-hand knowledge of the facts and the possible lines of reform.

The nineteenth century has already had many judgments passed upon it, and an American volume on the subject is to be published by Messrs. Putnam. Several English writers have contributed. Mr. Edmund Gosse gives a review of "English Literature in the Nineteenth Century"; Mr. Leslie Stephen deals with "Evolution and Religious Conception"; Mr. Arthur Sidgwick with "English Political Developments," and there is a chapter on physics by Professor Lodge. There are many other well-known contributors, American and English, and the story of the development of steel manufacture in the United States is told by Mr. Andrew Carnegie.

The Rev. R. M. Benson's devotional commentary on the Psalter, which Mr. Murray has in preparation, is entitled "The War-Songs of the Prince of Peace." Two of the three volumes are in the press; the first deals with the construction of the Psalter, the second contains a translation of the Psalter from the Hebrew, with notes explanatory and spiritual. Another theological announcement in Mr. Murray's new list is a volume on "Sunday and the Sabbath"—the "Golden Lectures" for 1900-1901—by the Rev. H. R. Gamble, Rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate. One of the next volumes in the Progressive Science Series will be by Professor Newcomb on "The Fixed Stars."

The Syriac lexicon to which the late Dr. Payne Smith devoted the best part of the last thirty-six years of his life has been completed, and the concluding volume will be published almost immediately. When he died in 1895 he had published all but the last part of the ten fasciculi of the dictionary. Only 350 copies were deemed sufficient for each fasciculus when the early divisions of the lexicon were printed, but this was increased to 750 after the sixth number had gone through the press, and additional copies of the earlier fasciculi were produced by photography. Mrs. Margoliouth, who assisted Dr. Smith in the later stages of his work, is one of his daughters, and is compiling the "Compendious Syriac Dictionary," founded upon her father's lexicon, which the Oxford Press is bringing out in four parts. Two have appeared, and the third part is now announced. Another Syriac dictionary which the Oxford University Press announces as nearly ready is Canon Maclean's "Dictionary of Vernacular Syriac."

The second volume of Messrs. Putnam's Knickerbocker Literature Series will be Noah Brooks' "Abraham Lincoln." The same publishers announce another new book by Horatio W. Dresser, entitled "The Christ Ideal," uniform with "Living by the Spirit," by the same author. "The Improvement of Towns and Cities; or, The Practical Basis of Civil Aesthetics," by Charles Mulford Robinson, member of the Agricultural League of America's Committee on Architectural Improvements, is also announced. Messrs. Putnam, by the way, have just taken up the London agency for Messrs. Small, Maynard, and Co., of Boston, U.S.A., whose publications include books formerly issued by Messrs. Copeland and Day.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall announce a new novel by Mr. Neil Wynn Williams entitled "Lady Haife."

The Letters of Abelard and Héloïse are to be included in Messrs. Dent's Temple Classics, edited by Miss Honnor Morten.

Antiquarians and genealogists will be interested in Messrs. Constable's announcement of a series of reproductions made by Mr. St. John Hope of the enamelled and painted gilt metal stall-plates of the Knights of the Garter, covering the period between 1348 and 1485. The stall-plates are of full size and in colours, and are accompanied by letterpress, and reproductions (in many cases) of the seals of the Knights, reproduced from casts taken for this work.

The first edition of "The King's Printers' Memorial Prayer-book" is out of print. It contained the Victorian edition of the Prayer-book, the Memorial Service used at the Queen's funeral, and the prayers as amended since the accession of Edward VII. A new and sumptuously-bound edition of 500 copies is being prepared, with a special title-page in colours and a portrait of her late Majesty.

The second April number of the Revue de Paris, which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish in a few days, contains an article by André Le Breton on "The Origins of the Popular Novel."

The title of Mr. Douglas Sladen's new novel which Messrs. Hutchinson and Co. are bringing out has at the last moment, owing to Mr. Beckles Willson's prior claim to the title, been changed from "The Great Company" to "My Son Richard; or, The Great Company; A Romance of the River between Maidenhead and Marlow."

A new recruit to the ranks of literary agents is Mr. Stanhope Sprigg, of 110, St. Martin's-lane, W.C. Mr. Sprigg was the founder and first editor of the Windsor Magazine.

CHESS.

Address "Chess": LITERATURE, Printing House Square, London.

PROBLEM No. 154. by F. AMUNDSEN, Copenhagen.

WHITE. 7 pieces.
 White to play and mate in two moves.

PROBLEM No. 157. by Dr. T. SCHAAD, Zurich.

WHITE. 8 pieces.
 White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 158, competing in La Stratégie.—White (4 pieces) K at K6; R at K R5; pawns at K R6, K B2. Black (5 pieces) K at K B3; B at K2; Kt at K sq; pawns at K R6 and Q3. White to play and win.

M. Numa Preti (Paris) has for many years rendered splendid service to the game. Lately he has started his great problem tourney in La Stratégie, and issued Carpenter's "Two Hundred Problems," which is a most valuable addition to the literature of the game. "American Chess Nuts," a collection of 2,000 problems by American authors, appeared in 1808, and there Carpenter's name figures largely. After 33 years the veteran issues this splendid collection.

SOLUTIONS.—Problem 140, Nield (2), B-K4. No. 141, Holst (3), 1 P-K5, followed by Q-B6 ch., &c. No. 142, Schwes, White wins by Kt-B6, ch., &c. No. 143, Wheeler (2), Kt-R2. No. 144, Patterson (2), Q-R7. No. 145 (Omega) (3), 1 R-QB7, B-R; 2 Q-B8, Any; 3 Q mates. If 1-, P-Kt5, &c.; 2 Q×P ch., &c. No. 146, Troitzky, 1 Kt-Q7, B-Q3;

2 P-B8=Q, B×Q; 3 Kt-K5 and draws. No. 147, Teed (3), 1 Q-Kt5, Kt×Q ch; 2, K-Kt4, Q×P ch; 3, Kt-B4, mate. No. 148, Varains (2), Q-R8. No. 149, Hallström (3), 1 Kt-Kt4, threatening 2 P×P ch, K×Kt; 3 Kt mates. No. 150, Troitzky, 1 B-B3, K-Kt7; 2, K-Kt4, K-B7; 3, K-B4, K-Q7; 4, K-K8, K-K3, and draws. Correct solvers are:—S. L. Snellgrove, 137, 140, 148; T. A. Moser, 138, 139, 148; L. R. N., 138, 148; W. Newsom, 144, 150; J. W. Tucker, 143 to 145, 148, 149; W. S. Manley, 140; Otto Würzburg (Michigan), 125, 126, 129 to 131, 134, 135, 137, 138; White pawn (Kensington), 140, 148.

Notes by A. C. W.—"No. 145 is one of the few three-move problems with no threat first move. No. 146 is one of Troitzky's most charming endings. At the start the White Kt appears to be quite out of play, and the Black Q ready to take possession of the board. In three moves the Black Q is shut in, and the White Kt dominates everything. The point of my contention as to Problem 122 and others really comes to this:—That the form, as well as the idea of the problem, is made for criticism. As an illustration compare Problems 74 and 76 in the number for Oct. 20, 1900. Both are two-move problems, and the idea is the same in each. But 74 is beautiful, and 76 is, as certainly, clumsy. I think that a direct threat of mate has no right to be any part of the 'idea' in a two-move problem: if it does come in, it is a defect of form. Given the idea of No. 122, and one of those Bohemian composers, and I am confident the result would be a 'lyric' in chess, instead of a dull bit of prose. So far as my lights go, I think I distinguish between problems that are creations and problems that are manufactures. I can pay no higher tribute to the Chess Column in 'Literature' than to point out how seldom I am able to find fault with a problem. But no—I can 'go one better' than that—I have found it necessary to make a little collection of the end-games, to get them in a convenient form for reference."

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We publish in another column an account and appreciation of the work of the late Bishop of Oxford by the Rev. W. H. Hutton, the well-known ecclesiastical historian. In our correspondence column will be found a letter from Dr. Sandys, of Cambridge, containing two interesting unpublished letters about the late Bishop written by Mr. E. A. Freeman.

Complete light will shortly be shed on one of the most mysterious transactions of the Commonwealth. The negotiations between the Jews and Oliver Cromwell, which resulted in the foundation of the present Anglo-Jewish community, have hitherto been only imperfectly known. Indeed, until some fifteen years ago, when Mr. Lucien Wolf published the first results of his investigations, it was generally believed, on the authority of Tovey, that the negotiations were abortive, and that the first permission to the Jews to resettle in England was accorded by Charles II. Mr. Wolf has now written the story at length in a volume entitled "Menasseh ben Israel's Mission to Oliver Cromwell," which will be published by Messrs. Macmillan. The volume contains a reprint in facsimile of the three tracts published by Menasseh, and Mr. Wolf has supplied an introduction in seven chapters, together with elaborate notes. Three portraits of the famous Jew, two by Rembrandt and the third by Salom Italia, accompany the letterpress. Mr. Wolf shows that the Jew question in 1655-1656 was of much greater importance than is generally supposed, and that it played a considerable part in Cromwell's schemes of Imperial expansion. Mr. Wolf has long been known as the chief authority, in this country, on Jewish history.

Pending the publication of the biography of Disraeli, of which so much has been said with so little result, Englishmen may find some interest in a French life of the statesman which is just announced as forthcoming. It is by M. Courcelle, and forms one of M. Alcan's series of Ministers and Statesmen.

A curious point in the ethics of biography—a topic on which we have had something to say lately—is raised by the statement that Mr. Sidney Colvin intends eventually to write a separate memoir of Stevenson. When Stevenson was ill in 1888 he gave Mr. Lloyd Osbourne a sealed packet for Mr. Colvin. When this was opened after Stevenson's death in 1894 it was found to contain an expression of his wish that Mr. Colvin should prepare a selection of his letters and a sketch of his life. The first fruit of the request was the publication the following year of "The Vailima Letters," the journal letters written from Samoa to Mr. Colvin himself. Four years later followed Mr. Colvin's edition of the general correspondence (which Mr. Churton Collins opines ought never to have been published) connected by a thread of biographical notes. In the introduction to that book Mr. Colvin explained that he had not found, and was not likely to find, leisure enough to write the "authoritative" biography, and that accordingly that task had by the wish of the family been taken over by Mr. Graham Balfour, Stevenson's cousin. This biography by Mr. Balfour now approaches completion; and meanwhile Mr. Colvin, finding himself in a position of greater freedom and less responsibility, seems at last to see his way to writing a memoir himself too.

Those who took upon themselves to reprimand Mr. Colvin for publishing Stevenson's Letters neglected even to give him credit for his moderation. For every letter printed in his edition, Mr. Colvin has told us, half-a-dozen at least had to be rejected. There remain, therefore, enough unprinted Stevenson letters to fill another dozen volumes, and it seems unlikely that so much matter will for ever remain unutilized in a day when time and paper are the only things wasted by an industrious literary generation.

We learn with sincere regret of the loss suffered by Mr. William Canton in the death of his daughter after a three days' illness. There is no better note in modern letters than that which tells us of the mind of children; and of the few writers who draw their inspiration from the true source none write of it with more insight and sympathy than Mr. Canton. The sympathy and gratitude of the thousands of readers of "W. V. Her Book," will, we would fain hope, do something to lighten his sorrow.

Mr. Herbert Spencer, who is eighty-one to-day, has fairly earned the homage of the whole intellectual world by his long life of self-devotion. It was certainly not by virtue of his physical strength that Mr. Spencer has come to four-score years ; but only by the careful husbanding of health and the jealous exclusion of activities alien to the chosen purpose of his life. His biography may almost be said to be contained in the list of "Works" which Messrs. Williams and Norgate published in this journal last week. It is no mean testimony to Mr. Spencer's character that not even the newest editor or publisher seems to have attempted to exploit the philosopher's reminiscences of George Eliot.

There is a touch of the humour of Rip Van Winkle in the case of the retired medical man, who, having had no time to read novels while in practice, writes to ask the editor of the Lancet, of all people, to recommend him some. Alas for the immense circulations, the pages of advertisements of the newest fiction, the columns on columns of reviews ! The case would be parallel if a retired man of letters were to write to us to say that he had never yet taken drugs, but had now time to take them, and would be glad if we would tell him what to take. The Lancet does not undertake to solve the problem proposed by its correspondent, but, with a noble disregard of the efforts of contemporary writers, anticipates that he will spend some of the pleasantest hours he has ever spent in making the acquaintance of "Lever's and Ouida's guardsmen, Marryat's post-captains, Braddon's and Collins' villains, Austen's nubile heroines, and Trollope's troubled clergy." We might, if we chose, criticize our contemporary's suggestion in the same genial temper in which the Lancet would doubtless criticize us, if we told our imaginary retired man of letters of the pleasure he would derive from a mixed regimen of phenacetin and syrup of the hypophosphates. But we strongly suspect that ne sutor ultra would be the missile maxim that would be hurled at us in such a case.

Last week one of London's historical houses was sold—No. 4, Whitehall-gardens, once the home of the great Sir Robert Peel, who formed there the fine collection of Dutch and Flemish paintings which now form part of the National Collection. It was in the dining room facing the river that Sir Robert died on July 2nd, 1850. Time has wrought many changes in Whitehall-gardens—or Privy-gardens, as the present row of houses used to be called. Here it was that Pepys on May 21, 1662, "Saw the finest smocks and linen petticoats of my Lady Castlemaine's, laced with rich lace at the bottom, that ever I saw ; and did me good to look at them." In Sir Robert Peel's time No. 4 had steps leading down to the river, and the third Sir Robert, in the action which he brought in 1870 to obtain compensation for damages caused by the construction of the Thames Embankment, said he remembered "that on one occasion, when a boy, preparations were made to remove the family and valuables by boats on occasion of a threatened attack by a riotous mob on his father's house." Messrs. Constable, the publishers, are now established at No. 2.

The Critic gives some extracts from a book auction catalogue issued at Wyoming, which show how the ingenious American auctioneer labours to amuse :—

Haggard, H. R. "She." (Unique.)
Holmes, O. W. "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."
(Plates missing.)
"How to be Happy Though Married. (Rare in this state.)"
Phelps. "The Gates Ajar." (Unopened.)

Mr. Eugene Didier, in the Literary Era, of Philadelphia, devotes an article, under the title of "An Illustrious Plagiarist," to Tennyson's "Literary Dishonesty," as shown by the fact that Adelaide Anne Procter wrote a poem with the same plot as "Enoch Arden." He suggests that Tennyson, though he wrote "Enoch Arden" in 1862, waited to publish it until Miss Procter died (in 1864). Mr. Didier should surely, before writing this article, have looked into Tennyson's Life by his son. He ignores altogether the statement of the present Lord Tennyson that "Adelaide Procter wrote a poem on a similar subject, but this my father did not know until after 'Enoch Arden' had been published."

Apropos of the Cowper celebrations at Olney last Thursday—the anniversary of the poet's death—a correspondent has been inspired by "The Nightingale and the Glow-worm" to send us the following :—

THE FLOWER AND THE LEAF : A DIALOGUE.

The Leaf.

"There's love that lasts all seasons through,"
Said the evergreen leaf—"and love less true,"
She added, turning to the flower,
"Love that scatters before the shower."

The Flower.

"Think not, proud Leaf of evergreen,
I'd change my cloak of varied sheen
For thine monotonous and sad—
I, like a star in summer clad."

The Leaf.

"Green is the livery of the trees
That scorn the storm cloud, kiss the breeze,
And if I might I would not choose
Your dress, and live among the dew.
"Blind prey of every wandering foot,
Thin stalk that slender hands uproot,
See now where yonder clouds uprise,
And in your bosom close your eyes !"

The Flower.

"What though the wanton storm should tear
And far away my beauty bear,
My heart another home shall find,
Whereto 'tis carried by the wind.

"And if the rain should pierce my soul,
The sun shall shine to make me whole.
Another fate awaiteth thee—
A lingering death upon the tree.

"Through the long nights the searching darts
Of winter seek the forest hearts,
Till, bending low each frozen head,
The trees their withered splendour shed.

"Then shall the flaunting forest take Another hue of frost and flake ;
Then shalt thou shiver, crisp and hoar,
Now by warm sunlight gilded o'er."

Thus bandied they in foolish wise
Such words as jealous hearts devise,
The while across the meadow strayed
A child, and by the Flow'r delayed.

She plucked and wove it in a chain ;
Upon the bough a drop of rain
Fell plashing through the laden air—
The Leaf lay buried in her hair.

M. Augustin Filon has translated Lord Rosebery's "Napoleon, the Last Phase," with a preface. He criticizes two of Lord Rosebery's opinions, viz., that the confinement of the ex-Emperor was essential to the peace of Europe ; and that his death was not due to the climate of St. Helena. As regards the former point, the anxiety of the Allies was surely intelligible even if it was not justified. As regards the latter, the autopsy proved that Napoleon died of a disease by no means peculiar to his place of exile, and M. Filon's suggestion that the climate of the island hastened his end is hardly borne out by the little that medical science knows of cancer. There are indications that the Emperor had already shown symptoms which foreshadowed the end as early as the date of the Battle of Leipzig.

* * * *

It seems to surprise M. Filon that the British public should have received with enthusiasm a book which "told them hard truths in clear language"; but, of course, there is nothing unusual in the phenomenon. On the other hand M. Filon regrets that "those beautiful ceremonies in which the freedom of the City is bestowed upon the men whom the City delights to honour," do not exist in France. Else he would like to see them employed to demonstrate that, in the opinion of the French, "ce livre vaut les parchemins qu'on enferme dans une boîte d'or." "We," says M. Filon, "shall always remember that Lord Rosebery has given us this book. May he never forget that he has written it!"

A sale which includes a fine copy of a Shakespeare folio is sure to attract attention. In the four days' book sale which concluded at Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's last Monday the most important item was a particularly good copy of the Third Folio, wanting two leaves and somewhat broken on the stitched margins, but otherwise in excellent condition. It fetched the high price of £385, the record for an imperfect copy. The other notable books were Arnold, "Empedocles on Etna," first edition, £3 3s.; Brontë, "Jane Eyre," three vols., first edition, £12 5s.; E. FitzGerald, "Euphranor," first edition, £4 15s.; "Polonius," first edition, £3 15s.; "Six Dramas of Calderon," first edition, £11 15s.; "The Downfall and Death of King Ædipus," £7; Grimm's "Popular Stories," illustrated by Cruikshank, first edition, £16 10s.; George Meredith, "Poems," first edition, £16; Creighton, "Queen Elizabeth," £9 2s. 6d.; Kelmscott Books, "The Story of the Glittering Plain" (1891), £19; "Biblia Innocentium," £22; "King Florus," vellum copy, £16; "Amis and Amile," vellum copy, £10; "King Coustans," vellum copy, £9 5s.; "Hand and Soul," vellum copy, £8; "Sigurd the Volsung," £22; Gay, "Fables," two vols., first edition, £18 5s.; Dickens, "Pickwick Papers," parts one to eighteen, £15 10s.; Thackeray, "Vanity Fair," original parts, a fine copy, £46; Moreau, "Suite d'Estampes," both series 1774-1777, brilliant engravings by Martin, £305. The sale also included two long autograph letters by Tennyson; one relating to a visit to Ireland, dated 1848, fetched £21 10s., and the second one, written in 1850, fetched £31. In this latter, after making some references to "In Memoriam," Tennyson thus refers to his wife and to his marriage:—"I am not going to be, but am, married to a lady four years younger than myself, one who has loved me for 14 years without variableness or shadow of turning. Though not very young or very beautiful she has the most beautiful nature I have met with among women. It was done very quickly at my particular request so that my own mother did not know of it till it was done." Of the interesting eight days' sale of the Fraser Library, which began on Monday, we shall give some account next week.

The attitude of Count Tolstoy towards the Tsar—whose ancestor Nicholas was so struck with the talents of the rising young novelist that he ordered his generals in the Crimea to keep him out of the way of danger—Centres of Disturbance.—and the enthusiasm of the Russian students for Count Tolstoy are phenomena which might be regarded from many points of view. To the Vicomte de Vogué, who discusses the subject in the Gaulois, they suggest an historical parallel:—

The attitude of the great writer, the passionate attachment which ranges under his banner, in Russia and elsewhere, all restless spirits enamoured of novelty, the moral force which universal admiration bestows upon him, and the immunity which this admiration assures him in a country in which any one else would pay dearly for such audacious demonstrations—all these points of resemblance revive for us the reign of King Voltaire.

There is no denying the exactness of the parallel, and there is nothing surprising in the alacrity with which the Vicomte de Vogué has pounced upon it. The only wonder is that he did not cover a whole page with parallels. For the phenomenon which he recognizes is one with which, though it is hardly known in England, a long series of experiences has made most countries on the Continent familiar—the phenomenon of the man of letters as the centre of a disturbance. In Russia, of course, the causes of the phenomenon are clear enough. The poets and the novelists are the only Russians who ever get a fair chance of issuing manifestoes in opposition to the opinions of the ruling powers. Extinguishers are easily put upon the journalists and pamphleteers, but the imaginative writers are not, to the same extent, the objects of suspicion. On the one hand, the censor does not study their productions nearly so closely as he studies the newspapers; on the other hand, they have subtle ways of insinuating a gospel instead of preaching it. Consequently they are able, so to say, to steal the horse before the stable door is locked, and become the centres of disturbances because of their exceptional opportunities for causing them. In France the case is different; there any one may cause a disturbance who likes, and the name of those who like is legion. The strange thing, to the English observer, is that the men of letters should so readily be accepted as the leaders of popular movements. For of the fact that they are habitually so accepted there is no room for doubt. The Vicomte de Vogué instances the case of Voltaire as if it were unique. It is, on the contrary, the typical precursor of innumerable cases. As Voltaire was the centre of a disturbance in the case of Calas, so was Zola the centre of a disturbance in the case of Dreyfus. Their nearest analogue in English literary history is Charles Reade; but though Charles Reade delighted in disturbances, and wrote to the papers, like Zola, to stir them up, he was never taken so seriously. Not he, but Samuel Plimsoll, was the centre of the disturbance to which "Foul Play" was a contribution. But, in France, the cases of Voltaire and Zola do not exhaust the list but only begin it. Other notable examples which at once suggest themselves are those of Rousseau who set not France only, but a great part of the Continent, by the ears on a variety of questions ranging from the propriety of playgoing to the propriety of employing foster nurses; of Madame de Staël who led the Opposition to the first Empire, and of Victor Hugo who led the Opposition to the second; of Etienne Arago, the astronomer, who headed the rioters when they assailed the guard house in the Place du Château d'Eau in 1848; of Lamartine who told the Anarchists that the Tricolour had been carried round the world, whereas their red flag had only been carried round the Champ de Mars; of François Coppée and Jules Lemaitre, those great twin brethren of the meetings of the Nationalist League; and of Paul Déroulède, the French Kipling, who, whether he lives at Paris or at San Sebastian, is always the animated centre of lively internecine strife. It is a long list, and we in England have no list to compare with it. Among our contemporary men of letters the only one who has any claim at all to be placed upon such a list is Dr. Conan Doyle; and though Dr. Doyle fires off many stirring letters about Army Reform and the misdeeds of South African cricketers, we do not find the general public taking sides for and against him as the French public takes sides for and against M. Déroulède. The only cases, in fact, in which the British public has violently taken sides for and against a man of letters have been those of Huxley and Lord Byron. The one was a centre of disturbance because of his opinions as to the descent of man; the other because British respectability considered itself affronted by certain circumstances in his personal history. The difference in the phenomena is no doubt due to differences in national temperament. But it is certainly one which deserves attention from the literary historian.

WILLIAM STUBBS, BISHOP OF OXFORD.

It is too soon to estimate the permanent value of the work of the great worker who has been taken from us. Foreign nations, in the titles and dignities and appreciations that they have given during the last 30 years, have already spoken, and with no uncertain voice. Few will doubt that the next age will repeat their verdict—that in William Stubbs England had her greatest historian in the nineteenth century. During the last few years a new school of historical writers has arisen, which has in some important respects challenged the conclusions at which he had arrived; but while many eminent names have been treated by the new writers with scant respect, that of the author of the "Constitutional History of England" has never ceased to be regarded with the highest reverence.

It was a reverence which was the reward of pre-eminently honest, minute, and accurate work, and work which was in the highest sense original. Dr. Stubbs belonged—it is a commonplace to say it—to a school, the well-defined school of Oxford historians, which owed much of its original impulse in equal degrees to the great German scientific historians and to the Tractarian movement. But he was notably the most original, the greatest, of the workers of whom the world gradually recognized him to be the leader. Haddan, and Freeman, and Green, and Bright, each had characteristic powers, but he seemed to combine them all, accuracy, and a deep though often silent enthusiasm, indomitable perseverance, and a wide outlook. The leadership which his friends—as all readers of Mr. Freeman's Life will remember—were so proud to recognize came to him naturally not only from his great powers of mind, but still more from his character. Its absolute loyalty and conscientiousness, its sincerity, its courage, its tolerance made him a man to whom workers in the same field naturally looked for guidance. Certainly they were never disappointed.

Perhaps no English man of learning, certainly no English historian, has left behind him so large a number of works of the highest excellence. In his editions of the great English mediæval chronicles beginning with those of Richard I. in 1864 and ending in 1889 with William of Malmesbury, he set for English scholars at least an absolutely new standard of minute accuracy and of breadth in survey. They had all the merits of the greatest editions of classical texts, and they showed an intimate acquaintance with mediæval life which had never been equalled, and is not likely to be surpassed. The "Constitutional History of England," published 1874-1878, showed that the editor of mediæval texts was also a great original worker. Nothing on so great a scale had been attempted in England since Gibbon; and the insight, the breadth, the extraordinary accuracy of the work recalled the memory of the greatest of English historians. "The history of institutions," wrote the author, in a preface which has become classical among historical students, "cannot be mastered, can scarcely be approached without an effort. It affords little of the romantic incident or of the picturesque grouping which constitute the charm of history in general, and holds out small temptation to the mind that requires to be tempted to the study of truth. But it has a deep value and an abiding interest to those who have the courage to work upon it. It presents, in every branch, a regularly developed series of causes and consequences, and abounds in examples of that continuity of life the realization of which is necessary to give the reader a personal hold on the past and a right judgment of the present. For the roots of the present lie deep in the past, and nothing in the past is dead to the man who would learn how the present comes to be what it is."

The book which was introduced in these words was one which many people found could not be approached "without an effort"; but it was one which left on its readers the ineffaceable impression that "nothing in the past is dead." Perhaps, when it is read again and again, it appeals even more than by its massive learning, its extraordinary patience of investigation, and its singular acuteness of insight, by its deep sympathy for human life. That was a sympathy which was a marked feature of its author's character. The sympathy was that of the historian, not that of the philosopher. When he went back to Oxford as Regius Professor of Modern History he said:—

I desire to introduce myself to you, not as a philosopher, nor as a politician, but as a worker at history. Not that I have not strong views on politics, nor short and concise opinions on philosophy, but because this is my work, and I have taken it up in all sincerity and desire of truth, and wish to keep to my work, and to the sort of truth that I can help on in the inquiry; because you have plenty of politicians and plenty of scholars to whom, if they wish to have it, I certainly will not begrudge the name of philosophers. I suppose that it is truth we are all seeking, and that though the sorts of truth are distinct and the ways that we work in are very different, when we have found what we seek for we shall find all our discoveries combine in harmony; and I trust and believe that the more sincerely, the more single-heartedly we work each of us, the nearer we consciously come to the state where we shall see the oneness and glory and beauty of the truth itself. So that the theologian, the naturalist, the historian, the philosopher, if he work honestly, is gaining each for his brother, and being worked for each by his brother, in the pursuit of the great end, the great consummation of all. We may all speak humbly, the theologian because of the excellence of his subject, the rest because of the vastness of our field of work, the length of our art, and the shortness of our life; but we cannot afford to speak contemptuously of any sort of knowledge, and God forbid that we should speak contemptuously or hypercritically of any honest worker.

Work undertaken in this spirit by a man of commanding ability could not fail to be great. And the characteristics of his greatest work were those of all else that he wrote. Here there is hardly space even to name them—the appendices to the report of the Royal Commission on Ecclesiastical Courts, lectures on Mediæval and Modern History published and unpublished, the brilliant sketch of the early Plantagenets, lives of Anglo-Saxon saints and scholars, sermons and episcopal charges which have never been made accessible to the public,—the same marks are on them all, accuracy, sympathy, profound judgment. Thus, while he was a man of strong convictions and loyalties, he was never a partisan. He could speak of Dr. Pusey as "the master," and of the execution of Charles I. as "the tragedy of the Royal martyr, itself the sealing of the Crown of England to the faith of the Church," without departing from the rigid impartiality of the historic teacher. "It was not my work," he said when he had held the chair of history at Oxford for ten years, speaking with the delightful humour and the sound sense which his audience came to look for in those very informal statutory lectures;—

It was not my work to make men Whigs or Tories, but to do my best, having Whigs and Tories by nature as the matter I was to work upon, to make the Whigs good, wise, sensible Whigs, and the Tories good, wise, sensible Tories; to teach them to choose their weapons and to use them fairly and honestly. Well, I still adhere to that view, and every year what I see in public life around me confirms my belief in the truth and value of the principle. How far I have been successful in acting upon it I cannot of course say; but I feel sure that the growth of sound historical teaching would have spared us such national humiliation as we have undergone, during the last few years, in the treatment of the Public Worship Act, the Judicature Act, and the Royal Titles Act. I am quite sure that both the speakers and writers on those subjects would have been very much wiser and more modest men, if they had, I will not say attended my lectures, but passed a stiff examination in the history school; if we could not have made them wiser, we would at all events have made them sadder.

Insensibly in writing of Dr. Stubbs we fall into quoting his own words. No others can so fully explain him. He made what he was, what he thought, what he taught, transparently clear to those who had eyes to see, by the strangely elaborate but yet entirely natural complexities of his literary style. "Steeped in clerical and conservative principles" he called himself, and yet he rejoiced that he scarcely betrayed "ecclesiastical prejudice or political bias." In a fine passage he once described how he understood "the clerical spirit and mind" to be that

Which regards truth and justice above all things, which believes what it believes firmly and intelligently, but with a belief that is fully convinced that truth and justice must in the end confirm the doctrine that it upholds; with a belief that party statement and highly coloured pictures of friend and foe alike are dangerous enemies of truth and justice, and damage in the long run the cause that employs them; that all sides have everything to gain and nothing to lose by full and fair knowledge of the truth. And a clerical view of professional responsibility I take to be the knowledge that I am working in God's sight and for His purposes.

With this "clerical" outlook, the mind of Dr. Stubbs was yet essentially critical, quite as much as it was, or, perhaps, because it was, sympathetic. It was this which caused him, while he readily welcomed historical discoveries on particular points, such as those of Professor Vinogradoff, to reiterate in the last edition of his "Select Charters" a caution as to the unsound methods which seemed to him to be coming into fashion. His attitude towards the "Higher Criticism" is to be explained on the same grounds; it was an historical and critical objection that he felt rather than a theological one.

Yet no one who knew anything of the Bishop's work doubted that one of its characteristic excellences was due to the fact that he was a theologian as well as an historian. Much that has been dark to other writers on mediæval history was clear to him because he knew the theology of the Fathers and the philosophy of the schoolmen as well as the chronicles of the monks and the laws of the kings. The extraordinary width of his reading in ancient and modern literature was another special feature which gave distinction to his work. It gave, too, it may be added, inimitable humour to his lectures. Those who heard him will not forget how he illustrated Robertson's view of Charles V. by the "Hunting of the Snark."

All this goes only to say, very inadequately, that William Stubbs was a great historian in the widest sense. Men in high place know, too, that he was a wise and great man. And those who have worked under him, as historian or as Bishop, remember, most of all, the generosity, the sincerity, the beauty, of his character.

W. H. HUTTON.

Although Dr. Stubbs was not a popular historian like Macaulay or Froude, his works—most of them published by the Oxford University Press—have always been sure of a steady sale, and his "Early Plantagenets" has proved one of the most successful books in Messrs. Longman's half-crown series of "Epochs of Modern History." His last volume, a third edition, revised and enlarged, of his "Seventeen Lectures on the Study of Mediæval and Modern History," was only recently issued, with two new addresses delivered at Oxford and Reading.

The most interesting thing about the new edition, however, is the preface, in which Dr. Stubbs roughly glances at his position as a historian—takes stock, as it were, of his literary output—and has something to say to his critics. The lectures, delivered under the pressure of statutory compulsion, "and against the grain"—for Dr. Stubbs had a deep-rooted dislike to compulsory professorial utterances, and had the satisfaction of seeing the statute altered during his last year as Professor of Modern History at Oxford—were first published in collected form in 1886. "The lapse of fourteen years," he writes, "had been sufficient to enable me to get my professional personality in focus, and perhaps also to get the work of my term into perspective." In reading the proofs he found himself still profoundly convinced of the truth of the principles which he held thus long ago on the study of history. "Whatever more I have learned has generally strengthened, and has never weakened, the convictions of my first and last public lectures. . . . If I spoke harshly of the casual criticisms of the casual critics, they have had their revenge in deciding that my writings are not literature; perhaps that is enough. I do not remember that the thought occurred to me at the time that I was expected to have a style that would qualify me to meet the criticisms of those to whom for the moment belongs the adjudication of what is, or is not, literature, to determine, in fact, the fashion of the uniform of the Man of Letters." He had always worked hard, he added meekly, and never found work anything but happy. Nineteen volumes of texts and prefaces which he had edited for the Rolls Series; four volumes of "Constitutional History"; three volumes of joint work on the "Councils"; the contributions to and revision of Dr. Smith's two great "Dictionaries of Christian Antiquities and Biography"; a good deal of mechanical labour, as on Lechler's edition of Wycliffe's "Dialogues," and Dr. Pusey's issue of "Torquemada on the Immaculate Conception," with two or three minor diversions of the same kind;—

These things [he said] constitute my claim to the title of a qualified if not skilled operative in the field which had opened before me, and which, indeed, I should have chosen if other influences had not superseded the necessity of making a choice. It was as a worker that I said what I had to say—I am, and have been, all through, what I was called in company with Hallam in an examination paper last year, a horny-handed son of toil—and experience of work has confirmed me in my beliefs.

In his last lecture, delivered in May, 1884, Dr. Stubbs expressed the hope that he might find time, on leaving Oxford to succeed to the See of Chester, to complete two or three works on which he had already made considerable progress—including a fourth volume of "Councils" and a second series of "Select Charters"—but he had to abandon that idea. It is to be hoped that these unfinished works are still available, and that it will be found possible to complete them. Dr. Stubbs' first series of "Select Charters," published in 1870, and described by Freeman as "worthy of the unerring learning and critical power of the first of living scholars," is now in its eighth edition. His chief work, "The Constitutional History of England, in its Origin and Development," in three volumes, published respectively in 1874, 1875, and 1878, is now obtainable in a library edition and in crown octavo volumes. Vol. I., in crown octavo form, has gone to a fourth edition; the remaining volumes are in their third editions.

Personal Views.

THE PROGRESS OF THE SIGNATURE.

While the New Review was under the conduct of its founder, Mr. Archibald Grove, I wrote in it two papers on "the question of the relative advantages of signed and unsigned articles in the newspapers." It would be more correct to say that I edited these papers, since they were composed chiefly of letters I had received on the subject from many well-known writers for the Press—novelists, publicists, and others. Of these (in all, I think, about five-and-thirty) rather more than one-third are no longer living—Mr. Gladstone, Mr. H. D. Traill, Mr. William Black, Mr. James Payn, Mr. G. A. Sala, Mr. R. H. Hutton, Mr. Grant Allen, Mr. Archibald Forbes, Mr. James Runciman, Mr. Haweis, and Mrs. Lynn Linton. Mr. Gladstone gave me his wisdom on a postcard:—

My opinions [he said] are decidedly favourable to making known the authorship of articles. I have myself only thrice in the course of my life written with the intention of secrecy; this was only for a time, and only because the obtrusion of my personality would, at the moment, as I thought, be officious and unbecoming.

Lord Brougham was in favour of extending this rule even to the newspapers. The point is difficult, but there is much to be said in favour of his view.

Among contributors numbering over thirty some dissident opinions would be looked for, but, except in the case of the leading article, the argument in favour of the signature had, I am glad to say, quite the best measure of support. A well-reasoned letter on the other side was that of Mr. R. H. Hutton, of the Spectator, who considered it "far easier to co-operate heartily, for a journal has to keep up its journalistic individuality, if the articles are unsigned." Mrs. Lynn Lynton also was mainly in favour of anonymity :—

If, for instance, a paper represents the opinion of many influential minds, and a line is taken after careful deliberation and discussion, the hand which writes the words is of no more individual value than a copying machine. It is The Times, the organ of a grave and important section of thought, or the Standard, or the Daily News—what you will. . . . The editorial "We" has, then, its real value.

With this may be contrasted the well-remembered expression of Mr. Morley concerning "the childish imposture of the editorial 'We.'" The editor of a powerful provincial daily maintained that what he wrote as "We" would be different, "much more ministerial, so to speak," from anything he would write as "I"—which, I fancy, is precisely where Mr. Morley would be down upon him. Mr. L. F. Austin cited the famous case in fiction of Thackeray's Captain Shandon in the debtor's prison, writing for the Pall Mall Gazette (not Mr. Astor's) his eloquent appeal to the gentlemen of England, and asked whether, had the captain signed his article, the gentlemen of England would have been deeply impressed by his sentiments? The retort courteous to this seemed fairly obvious—Is Captain Shandon to stand as the type and flower of anonymous journalism? Is not Thackeray's picture of him, penning his "eloquent appeal" in that distressing situation, a rather profound satire on the whole institution of anonymous journalism? Mr. Traill, in a letter both witty and wise, insisted that "the influence, whatever it may be, of any newspaper would not be either increased or diminished one whit by the signature of its articles." M. Villars, of the Débats, held that political articles, "being supposed to represent the views of a party, should be anonymous, but political articles only." I must own at once that, as far as the political leader was concerned, the majority of my correspondents were against the signature; yet there were brave voices for it, and most notably those of Mr. William Archer, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, and Mr. James Runciman. The leading article, said Mr. O'Connor, "is not the opinion of many men, but of one. It is written not by many men, but by one man. It is, of course, revised by the responsible editor. To that extent, and to that only, is the article the work of more than one hand. Being the work—with this small reserve—of one man, it should stand or fall as the work of one man." "If," said the trenchant Runciman, "the articles were signed, then you could pin a man and make him own that he lied through lack of knowledge; but you can't pin a journal." Mr. Archer got home still closer.

Are the views of a paper [he asked] any the better for being insincere, or half-sincere? A paper's "policy" represents the cowardice or bigotry of the most cowardly or bigoted person who has a voice in its councils. . . . Let us by all means have the policy formulated day by day in an editorial article or column of notes; but why reduce the whole political journalism of the country to this washed-out complexion? . . . But the deception is almost played out. Even the British public is beginning to suspect that behind the magniloquent "We" lurks, not the collective wisdom of a council of sages, but the collective cowardice of a clique of shareholders.

Mr. Bernard Shaw instanced the case of the political hack who, with no opinions of his own, serves as the mere finder and arranger of words for any opinions that may be in need of them. Here, said Mr. Shaw, there should be "a double signature. Thus, when the editor means the article but doesn't write it, and a professional journalist writes it but doesn't mean it, it could be signed 'Brown iav : Jones scrip.' " Nevertheless, "since a man who writes without conviction in the third person is generally a pest and a bore, and seldom now gets really important work to do, his signature is uncalled for, and his sphere is that of pure news."

But the case of the leading article remains just where it did. Four-fifths of the power of its anonymity it owes to the credulity of the public, but while that credulity lasts the unsigned editorial will keep its place. It may be good for "the policy of the paper," and it is probably good for the proprietor's till. But I still think hopefully of Mr. Archer's prophecy, that "if you and I outlive the first decade of the new century, there is every chance that we may yet read signed leaders in The Times."

Turning from the leading article to other columns of the paper, how great is the change which the last few years have witnessed. Ten years ago, when the New Review gave this matter a hearing, the signature was just cropping up here and there. It was, I think, unknown, or almost unknown, in the "leading organs." I am pretty certain it had never shown itself in The Times, and quite certain that all the morning papers were extremely shy of it. Such an announcement in any of them as that the distinguished Mr. Blank would contribute a series of signed articles on his special subject would almost have raised Fleet-street up on end. Now and again initials were allowed to obtrude themselves at the foot of an article, but their rareness gave them a braggart air; and even articles of criticism and pure literature, in which the expression is individual or nothing, were almost always, in the "leading organs," written with the mask on. Ten years ago, in a word, it was almost as bad as fifty years ago. The Press offered a means of living, but very little else. "Journalists who are honest," Mr. Runciman wrote me, "have all the worst of the bargain at present. In almost every other profession a man has the chance of getting the very substantial rewards that come from being known; but the newspaper writer fritters himself away." "Distinguished journalists," said Mr. Austin, "have moulded public opinion for a generation, and have gone to their graves with no more recognition of their labours than a Kensal-green paragraph." And Mr. O'Connor :— "A journalist may write the most brilliant articles for years and not be known outside his newspaper office." But ten years have so modified the conditions that journalism at this day offers to the able writer only fewer chances of getting his name to the fore than the young actor or the young barrister of parts may count upon in the theatre or at the Bar. Perhaps, indeed, the opportunities of the Press are now equal to those of any other calling; for the signature begins to be dominant, and we have ceased to do reverence to anonymity. We look for the signed article now where, ten or a dozen years ago, we might as reasonably have expected the editor to speak his editorial to his subscribers through the phonograph. Is not this advance of the signature a gain both to writer and to reader? The writer gets the credit of his work, the reader gets the benefit of that greater amount of conscience which usually goes into the article that is signed. "All articles expressing individual opinions should be signed without exception," said Mr. Shaw; and this is the principle which is getting to be taken almost for granted. Leaving the editorial on one side, what objections may be raised to the signature in other cases? That the objection, at the best, is conventional or fanciful seems more or less proved by the very rapid progress of the signature in nearly all those departments of the paper which are not concerned with politics or the paper's "policy." Still, there were some among my correspondents who were resolute for anonymity in every case. Mrs. Lynn Linton, while admitting that in articles of criticism the signature offered a certain guarantee against "the brutalities of anonymity," insisted that it also opened the door "to a sickly flattery quite as objectionable on the other side." I submit that that kind of criticism which is only another name for "sickly flattery," the puff direct, has been common enough in anonymous journalism, and that the signature, which makes the writer more responsible than the journal he writes in, tends to improve the moral quality of the writing. It can scarcely be denied that it tends to improve the literary quality. Mr. Sidney Low believed that impartiality in criticism would be "difficult and almost impossible if the reviewer were expected in all cases to sign his article." The example of the monthly periodicals seems opposed to this view; and it is surely much easier to be unfair and dishonest when writing in the first person plural than when writing over one's proper signature. What writer of real character and honesty is often embarrassed by being called upon to speak the truth in his own name? "I have done a good deal of criticism, both signed and unsigned," wrote Mr. Archer, "and this I can say in all sincerity, that if ever I have spoken without fear or favour it has been over my own name." Both Mr. Hutton and Sir Wemyss Reid protested that the general adoption of the signature would be another obstacle in the path of the beginner; but has that objection been made good? Ten or a dozen years ago the writers for the Press whose names were in any way familiar to the readers of the papers they wrote for owed their reputation, with few exceptions, to work that Fleet-street had no claim upon. The purely journalistic reputation, such as Sala's, which was enjoyed by a very small number of writers, owed itself rather to length of service on the Press, and to the social qualities of the individual, than to any help from the calling. Think, then, how many young writers of ability the larger use of the signature has helped to the front in very recent years. An Archibald Forbes' genius might compel recognition, every hindrance of anonymity notwithstanding; but the war now in progress is the first that has given to any number of special correspondents the chances of literary distinction over their own signatures—and no war of ours has ever been so well described in the Press. The courtesy extended to the signature, so far from keeping young writers in the background, is their best hope of fame; and the newspapers read better than they did ten years ago.

TIGHE HOPKINS.

JOACHIM.

London musicians are delighted to hear the familiar tones of Joachim's violin once again in St. James's-hall, and are looking forward to his appearance in Mr. Newman's London Musical Festival at the Queen's-hall. Joachim is also, I believe, to revisit Oxford, whereto it has so often been the felicity of the University Musical Club to entice him. It is clear that his arduous duties as Director of the Academy at Berlin cannot altogether prevent him from revisiting the country to whose musical destiny he has contributed so much. It was in London that he met with one of his earliest triumphs, when, at the age of 13, he performed the Beethoven violin concerto, under the bâton of Mendelssohn, to the wonder of all hearers, including the warm-hearted conductor. Not long since, at a Philharmonic concert, after a performance of the same concerto, he made a humorous reference to the former occasion, when, as he said, the society had broken their then severe rule against the appearance of youthful prodigies in their concerts.

The partial reappearance of Joachim will to some extent console the ardent subscribers to the Popular Concerts who were once accustomed to listen to him for three or four months regularly every year. And there is a further consolation offered to them by Mr. Philip Wellby, in the shape of a well-timed translation by Miss Lilla Durham of Professor Moser's biography of "Joseph Joachim." The Londoner already knows Joachim to be a supreme artist without a touch of virtuosity. He has learned from him, as from no one else, how to appreciate the later Beethoven quartets and the Beethoven violin concerto. Maybe he has been converted by the persistency of Joachim into an admirer of Brahms. With the aid of Professor Moser's clear and concise account of the musician's career in Germany, he will find what insight and determination went to the making of the artist whom we in England associate with such high ideals. In matters of musical taste Germany was rent in twain when Joachim was quite a young man. While Mendelssohn was still alive the classic traditions which he upheld in the Gewandhaus at Leipzig held sway over Germany. But shortly after his death a revolution set in. On leaving Leipzig for Weimar Joachim found himself in contact with what Professor Moser terms the "New German School" of Liszt and Wagner. To Wagner the name of Mendelssohn was like a red rag to a bull, and even Schumann's music seemed out of date to both Wagner and Liszt. The question arose whether Joachim, already the leading violinist of the day, and concertmeister at Weimar, would stand firm to the traditions of his boyhood or become a partisan of the new school. It was impossible for a mind of such susceptibility as his not to be affected by the romantic genius of Wagner and the great talent of Liszt. Joachim has never been an anti-Wagnerian. But he has always reserved his right to criticize freely the master whom the new school worshipped as a god. As to Liszt, while admiring him as a performer and a friend, he seems to have been altogether out of sympathy with his compositions. The letter which he wrote to Liszt assuring him of his determination to stand firm to the traditions of the classics disposed of all doubt as to his intentions.

The course which Joachim steered at this difficult time was all important to English musicians. Had he decided otherwise, the Popular Concerts might never have acquired that special academic position which they have occupied. We are more susceptible to foreign influence in music than any other country in Europe. With his wonderful playing Joachim might have done as much harm to our musical taste as he has done good. After his departure from the Popular Concerts the position of first violin was filled for a time by a variety of performers. But a new and interesting epoch in these entertainments has been marked during the season which has just been brought to a close, in which the great Belgian player, Ysaye, has taken the place of Joachim. It is natural to compare the two performers. In some respects Ysaye is a greater player than the Joachim of late years. There is more wealth of tone in his instrument; the vigour and romantic intensity of his playing are more calculated to electrify the listener on first hearing. He is most at home in interpreting modern music, and has introduced several interesting novelties into the repertoire of St. James's-hall. But there is a touch of virtuosity about his performance, and his rendering of the classics is not so entirely satisfactory as Joachim's. It may be that we have become so accustomed to Joachim's reading of certain passages that we are prejudiced into mistaking what is merely different to be slightly inferior; but, in my opinion, Ysaye does not reach to the same perfection in phraseology. And it is just this quality that has made Joachim so pre-eminent among musical interpreters—the faculty of blending notes together, giving to each of them their exact value, and so presenting them in a coherent phrase, which seems to exactly translate into tones each separate idea as it occurred to the composer.

After leaving Weimar Joachim became concertmeister to the blind King George of Hanover. But here the reader of Professor Moser's biography will have some difficulty in following his career owing to the playful arrangement of pages adopted by the printer. The most violent "progressions" of the "New German School " were not so startling to the critics of an earlier generation as the leaps and bounds here forced upon the would-be sedentary reader. To what might be called the shuttlecock theme we are carried breathless from page 113 straight to page 116; back again to 113; on again to 116. The second theme is in accordance with the old school, page 117 following naturally on page 116. But this interval of calm serves only to reintroduce the shuttlecock subject, this time in a different key: 113, 116, 113, 116 becoming 117, 120, 117, 120. The second theme also reappears, but after this regular repetition of the two subjects we are landed in a "free fantasia" which beggars description. The last we hear of the principal theme is a desperate leap from 125 to 128, which ends the movement.

Fortunately the account here given of the work done by Joachim as Director of the Academy in Berlin, and of his championship of Brahms' music, is printed on the old-fashioned lines, page 255 following page 254, and so forth. But to the general reader the earlier part of the book will be more fascinating on account of the intimate pictures it gives us of Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Spohr, as well as of Joachim. Of Schumann we are told a most characteristic story. As a small boy Joachim had just played the Kreutzer Sonata with Mendelssohn:—

After the music, there was an informal supper-party. Joachim sat at a table with Schumann; it was summer-time, and the starlit sky was visible through the widely-opened window. Schumann, who had long remained silent, presently laid his hand gently on the knee of his little neighbour, and, pointing heavenwards with his hand, said kindly, "I wonder whether beings exist up there who know how beautifully a little boy here below has just played the Kreutzer Sonata with Mendelssohn."

As Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland says in his introduction, it would be perfectly possible to read the book from end to end without detecting the foreign authorship of the original. A word of praise is also due to the capital photographs of Joachim at all ages.

"KINGS OF THE ROD, RIFLE, AND GUN."*

[By R. B. MARSTON.]

(SECOND ARTICLE.)

It is curious to note how suspicious some anglers are as to the weight of fish which other anglers have caught. In his account of Colonel Thomas Thornton, "Thormanby" mentions a pike said to have weighed 96lb., caught in Broadwood Lake, Killaloe, a Shannon pike of 90lb., and the 72lb. Kenmure Castle fish; but a halo of doubt and mystery surrounds the history of these monsters, and even Colonel Thornton's famous 47-pounder has not been quite unlike Cæsar's wife. Yet his account of its capture should surely disarm suspicion. After a terrific fight all over Loch Alvie, during which the pike "frequently flew out of the water to such a height" that the Colonel dreaded losing so extraordinary a fish, it was at last thought they might safely attempt to land him, which was done in the following manner, to quote the Colonel's own account:—

Newmarket—a lad so called from the place of his nativity, who had now come to assist—I ordered, with another servant, to strip and wade in as far as possible, which they readily did. In the meantime I took the landing net, while Captain Waller, judiciously ascending the hill above with the rod, drew the fish gently towards us. He approached the shore very quietly, and we thought him quite safe, when, seeing himself surrounded by his enemies, he in an instant made a last desperate effort, shot into the deep again, and in the exertion threw one of the men on his back. His immense size was now very apparent.

They proceeded with all due caution, and finally the Colonel, having got the snout of the pike into the hoop of the net, and the two men pushing behind, they eventually landed the monster; their shout of victory "re-echoed through the whole range of the Grampians." The length, accurately taken, was 5ft. 4in. from eye to fork. "There may be larger pike, but I cannot," says the captor, "readily credit the accounts of such until I receive more authentic information." A good many years ago I offered a sovereign per pound for every pound over forty that any pike sent to me from Ireland might weigh, but 37lb. is the largest I have seen so far, either from Ireland or elsewhere.

"Thormanby" devotes a considerable amount of space to Colonel Thornton, who was unexcelled in all kinds of field sports. One entry in his diary records twenty-two moor game to the gun, three to the hawks, and eighteen brace of trout. His favourite toast was "Success to Fox-hunting," which he invariably gave at the weekly dinner of the "Falconer's Club," which he had established when he retired to Paris, where he spent the last few years of his life. He was introduced to Napoleon when he was First Consul and presented him with a brace of very handsome pistols; indeed, the Colonel prided himself on his knowledge of firearms, and he gives an amusing account of Joe Manton's attempt to make a "double-rifle gun sufficiently stout to carry seven balls each barrel, and that they would do more execution than one of my seven-barrelled guns, which were only stout enough to carry three balls each, i.e., twenty-one from the seven barrels." When Manton's gun—it must have been more like a cannon—was finished, the Colonel, he tells us, went to see the first experiment with it, which took place in a narrow passage adjoining Manton's shop.

He (Manton) loaded the piece with the utmost exactness, and, by his appearance, he would cheerfully have relinquished the honour of firing it to me; but I thought it no more than justice that the inventor should be first gratified. Accordingly he placed himself and took exact aim; but the subsequent concussion was so great, and so very different from the firing of any other gun, that I thought the whole shop was blown up, and fully expected, when the smoke dispersed, to find that the piece had burst. This, however, was not the case; it appeared that the whole force of the powder, being insufficient to drive out the seven balls, had come out through the touch holes. The gun was uninjured.

Of course "Thormanby" has many a record of wonderful shots made by his kings of the rifle and gun, but I doubt if there is one more extraordinary in its way than that described by John Colquhoun—one of the best sportsmen and best writers on sport who ever lived, but who is somewhat unaccountably not included in this book of kings; let us hope "Thormanby" has another in view. Colquhoun tells us that two stalkers, at the close of an unsuccessful day, were resting behind a knoll close by a brook. Three harts came down from the hills to drink. Immediately detecting human footsteps, the three antlered heads lowered on the scent in a direct line from the men. One of them raised his rifle, fired at the nearest head, which was the only part of the deer he could see, and, to his utter amazement, found he had killed the three, shooting them all fair through the head. Colquhoun was fond of a good story; what he saw among the herring fishers in the way of indulging in dirt was bad enough—the women curers worse, if possible. "They brought to my mind the predicament of an Edinburgh clergyman when an applicant for marriage presented himself in the most disgusting figure that ever darkened his study door. 'When is it to take place?' 'Directly, Sir.' 'You mean after you have cleaned yourself?' 'Och, I'm weel enough' (looking down at himself with evident satisfaction). 'You couldn't be married in such a dirty state.' 'Me dirty! What if ye saw hir!'"

In his account of that interesting sporting parson the Rev. William Barker Daniel, author of the famous "Rural Sports," "Thormanby" says that the most extraordinary incident in connexion with shooting which Daniel gives is his account of a pig which was trained to find and point and retrieve partridges and rabbits, pheasants, snipe, &c. ; in fact, this wonderful pig would point any game except hares ; " she has sometimes stood a jack-snipe when all the pointers had passed it by " ; in fact, the dogs got so jealous of " Slut " that they would not hunt with her if they could help it. Of that " Norse demigod," as his friends called him, Christopher North, " Thormanby " gives a most interesting picture, but I have space only for this glimpse of him left us by Thomas Carlyle in one of his letters :—

Last night (he wrote) I supped with John Wilson, Professor of Moral Philosophy, . . . a man of the most fervid temperament, fond of all stimulating things, from tragic poetry down to whisky punch. It was at the lodging of one John Gordon, a very good young man from Kirkcubright, who sometimes comes here. Daylight came on us before we parted ; indeed, it was towards 3 o'clock as the Professor and I walked home, smoking as we went. I had scarcely either eaten or drunk, being a privileged person, but merely enjoyed the strange volcanic eruptions of our poet's convivial genius. He is a broad sincere man of six feet, with long dishevelled flax-coloured hair, and two blue eyes as keen as an eagle's. Now and then he sank into a brown study, and seemed dead in the eye of law. About 2 o'clock he was sitting in this state, smoking languidly, his face lazy and inert, when all at once flashing into existence, he inquired of John Gordon, with an irresistible air :—" I hope, Mr. Gordon, you don't believe in universal damnation?" It was wicked, but all hands burst into inextinguishable laughter !

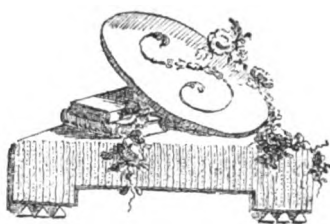

It is recorded of some of the kings of sport whose doings are so well chronicled by " Thormanby " that in the evening of their active lives they have retired to some quiet country seat and there surrounded themselves with all the live game they could get to live near them, not to kill, but to rear and keep alive. The Hon. Grantley F. Berkeley was one of these, his place—Beacon Lodge—on the skirts of the New Forest being a perfect paradise for wild animals, of which he loved to make pets. But none of his stories of his own pets is so funny as this one which he tells of a raven which belonged to a neighbour :—

The bird was tame and pinioned, and had strayed from his owner's house into the orchard of the village curate. A lot of rooks having visited the parson's cherries, the reverend gentleman kept his gun in readiness, and seeing the raven under his trees, he stalked him by the aid of a hedge. Bang went the fruit-avenging gun, and the raven having felt a shot or two rattle on his feathers began to hop and flap along the ground as fast as he could. Up ran the parson, thinking to secure the offender, to be impaled as a future scarecrow, when just as he was about to grasp the raven, the bird opened his mouth to bite, and cried " Damn your blood !" So startled was the divine, that he threw down his gun and ran away !

Of all the sportsmen whose biographies and portraits are given by " Thormanby " probably most people will agree with him in placing Sir Samuel Baker at the head of the list. " In his love of true sport, and in his fearless enjoyment of the perils as well as the pleasures of the chase, Sir Samuel Baker has had certainly no superior, and I think but two equals. William Cotton Oswell and Frederick Courtenay Selous I rank as his peers in daring and skill, but he eclipsed them both in the varied nature of his experiences." Certainly it is a very fascinating picture which he gives of both Baker and Oswell—indeed, the same may be said of nearly all these biographies, and I feel sure that most sportsmen will agree with me that " Thormanby " has admirably acquitted himself of a by no means easy task, and without by any means always agreeing with all he says they will heartily thank him for so sportmanslike, and at the same time literary, a piece of work.

The public interest in Izaak Walton, about whom Mr. Marston wrote last week, does not seem likely to fail, and yet another edition of THE COMPLETE ANGLER is added to Messrs. Gay and Bird's tasteful little series called " The Sportsman's Classics," with a short introduction and a frontispiece.

BOOK-PLATES OLD AND NEW.*

A BOOK-PLATE DESIGNED BY GOETHE.

The man who possesses a library naturally desires that his books should bear some distinctive mark. If he be a recluse and his books are the only friends whose hospitality he accepts ; or, if, on the other hand, touched with the bibliomania of which Dibdin has written, he collects volumes, not so much to read as because they are typographically important or extremely rare—in either case such a mark is desirable. It may take one of several forms ; an autograph signature can be decorative as well as useful ; each volume may be re-bound and stamped with motto or arms ; a book-plate may be introduced. The earliest ex-libris—if, indeed, it can so be designated—known is an Egyptian tablet in the British Museum, circa 1400 B.C. It is a small piece of light blue pottery, whose inscription shows that it was used as a label for the cases holding books or papyri in the possession of Amenophis III. Before the discovery of printing by moveable types, Bibles, psalters, and classic works were transcribed in the monasteries for this or that noble, and his coat-of-arms was frequently introduced by way of decoration. Within twenty years of the printing by Gutenberg—for we must still credit him with this great achievement—of the Mazarin Bible a woodcut ex-libris was produced in Germany, thus indicating the need felt for a mechanically reproduced mark of ownership to place in mechanically reproduced volumes. Not long after, the most celebrated of all ex-libris designers, Albrecht Dürer, engraved a number of plates, among others for Bilibald Pirckheimer, who is said by Oldys to have possessed many MSS. from the great library of Matthias Corbinus, King of Hungary, some of which may possibly be among the Arundel collection in the British Museum.

Granting ample means, and other favourable circumstances, the example of John Grolier, prince of book collectors, who had his choice specimens clothed in special bindings for his own behoof, would doubtless be followed by many. One great disadvantage it has, however—the original covers which link books to their birthday have to be sacrificed. Erasmus, revered by Grolier for his profound learning, said, with approximation to truth :—" You owe nothing to books, but they owe a good deal to you ; because it is by your help that they will go down to posterity." Rich, powerful, the Treasurer of Milan had fine taste, and now to possess a book from his library is in itself a distinction. According to a Greek proverb, all things are common among friends, and stamped on a number of the exquisitely beautiful bindings executed for Grolier are the words " Et Amicorum." But, despite the particularly welcome revival of bookbinding as an art, the modern collector, even were he ready to sacrifice the old sheepskin or calf, could not procure bindings at once so durable and so graceful in design as those which protected the early printed books in the library of John Grolier. In a word, the bibliophile has recourse of necessity to the ex-libris.

There has just been added to the series of handbooks published by Messrs. Bell and Sons an exhaustive work on German book-plates by Karl Emich, Count zu Leiningen-Westerburg, translated by Mr. G. Ravenscroft Dennis. The author possesses a collection of ex-libris numbering some twenty thousand examples, about half of which are German. He writes with knowledge and precision. At this moment, when the collecting of ex-libris is a vogue, the many illustrations, early and late, will materially aid those who affect the pursuit. German and English heraldry, knowledge of which is requisite for all who would find pleasure in ex-libris ; characteristic inscriptions on book-plates, whether in German, Latin, or French ; warnings and cautions, intensifying into threats and curses on defaulting borrowers ; a historical survey of the subject from early to modern times ; detailed mention of noteworthy examples belonging to the fifteenth and succeeding centuries—this, in brief, is the scope of the work. Almost every writer on book-plates unnecessarily labours one obvious point, doubtless because of the mistaken but widespread impression that any one can design an ex-libris. We are told that we must not entrust an inexperienced amateur with the work. This should be no whit more necessary to insist upon than that a tyro cannot safely be commissioned to paint an atmospheric landscape, a powerful portrait. Indeed, difficulties of a peculiar kind beset endeavour in this direction. As a work of art—and every example should be that—a book-plate should be charged with the personality of its designer ; in other words, it must have character ; again, it should be linked by something more than a mere inscription to its possessor ; moreover, as it has to be placed in dozens or hundreds of volumes, its æsthetic appeal should be of a kind that will bear again and again to be experienced ; by no means least, a bookplate is imprisoned within covers, hence naturalistic treatment of landscape or figure is all but out of the question, if to the imaginative the library is not to become as a prison-house for nature or for man. Difficulties such as those indicated inspire the true artist ; every " impossible " situation is but a post to be conquered. But the man without ability can never hope successfully to sail through these perilous shallows. From " German Book-Plates " we reproduce three examples. It appears that Goethe, as a Leipzig student, etched a plate in 1767 for Käthchen Schönkopf—representing a triangular pedestal with books, sprays of flowers, and oval tablet initialled " S." Not eminently strong, not particularly decorative nor appropriate, it is yet interesting as a putting to proof in advance " art alien to the artist's." In Prince Bismarck's bookplate, designed by Lina Burger in 1895, the oak and trefoil are introduced in wisely conventionalized form. In the book-plate of the German Emperor, executed by Emile Doeple, junr., 1896, the crown, the imperial arms, &c., are aptly used, and it will be noted that the books at the bottom form the initial W.

The inaugural exhibition took place this week in Bloomsbury-square of a society whose object is to stimulate genuine artistic effort in the designing of ex-libris. The little show of " The Book-Plate Society "—not to be confused with the Ex-libris Society of some years standing—comprises about 50 examples, among others by Messrs. Louis Rhead, James J. Guthrie, J. W. Simpson—whose crowing chanticleer is designed for the books of Mr. T. N. Foulis, probably a descendant of the great Glasgow printers—and Mr. D. Y. Cameron. To the etchings of Mr. Cameron especial attention may be directed. He apprehends the requirements of a book-plate, is something more than a merely capable craftsman, and knits his scheme into a dignified and decorative whole. The fourth number of this society's official publication, recently issued, contains reproductions of five of Mr. Cameron's plates, and as examples of the seventeen he has executed they may be recommended cordially to the attention, not alone of those in quest of an ex-libris, but of connoisseurs. The Book-Plate Society, if it be true to its aim, should do a good work.

THE DRAMA.

"CORIOLANUS."

All the famous interpretations of Coriolanus belong to the first half of the nineteenth century. Kemble's has been described by Hazlitt, Macready's by John Forster, Phelps' by Professor Henry Morley. But these descriptions are only the points de repère of a whole literature which has grown up around the acted play. Stage-anecdotalage is filled with it. We are told how George Frederick Cooke, hissed from the stage by a Liverpool audience, retorted with Coriolanus' " I banish you," adding, " There is not a brick in your dirty town but what is cemented by the blood of a negro ! " We read how Sarah Siddons, as Volumnia, marched in her son's triumphal procession, " and almost reeled across the stage, her very soul, as it were, dilating and rioting in its exultations, until her action lost all grace, and yet became so true to nature, so picturesque and so descriptive, that pit and gallery sprang to their feet electrified by the transcendent execution of the conception." That was an ebullient age, and people were always springing to their feet in the playhouse. Over Coriolanus they seem to have been excited to corybantic excesses. Let me quote an apposite passage from a somewhat inaccessible book, " The Old Playgoer," written by one William Robson in 1845—a passage which seems to me to warm up our colder mood with a gush of hot air from the old playhouse :—

Hark ! the creaking door gives notice of opening—on goes the crush of that crowd that has been so impatiently waiting it. Some shorn of coat-tails, some hatless, some shoeless, squeezed to mummies, and "distilled almost to jellies"; here, at length, we are and draw a long breath to set the lungs playing freely again. But the desired object is gained—the favourite seat, about the centre of the fourth row from the orchestra, in the pit; mind, sheer, thorough playgoers never went into the boxes then, and we would not change places with the Lord Chancellor on his woolsack, for to-night John Kemble plays Coriolanus! With a smile of self-gratulation we turn to admire the fulness of the house; and we feel a chuckling kind of delight that our favourite can draw so many more than can possibly either sit, see, or hear. . . . The overture over, up goes the curtain. There is little Simmons, as first citizen; there is Munden, as Menenius; and, after a little sketch of a discontented rabble, and one of Æsop's fables delivered just as the old Phrygian would have wished, all eyes and ears are turned towards the right-hand wing, and amidst shouts, bravos, cheers, waving of hats and handkerchiefs, we can just catch—

. . . What would you have, you curs, That like nor peace nor war? . . .

and there stands "the noblest Roman of them all!"

Can you not smell the oranges? And hear the clinking of Charles Lamb's pot of porter? And see the "fat Adonis of fifty" leering from the Royal box? It was a splendidly demonstrative, jolly, vulgar age.

We live in tamer times; but even the sluggish blood of our playgoers is stirred by a Lyceum first night. It is something to see Sir Henry Irving attempting the arduous part of Coriolanus at sixty-three—an age at which Kemble and Macready and Phelps had long done with it. Whatever we may think of him as an actor, he is a great institution. By sheer force of character he has established an absolute domination over the theatrical crowd. That a gallery-boy should venture to "boo" him is unthinkable. You might as well make faces at the Sphinx or damn the Equator. This personal dignity and over-aweing authority appoint him the very man for Coriolanus. Admirably made up, he moves, poses and gesticulates "in the grand style." The sweep of his toga in the banishment scene, by which as it were he blows the mob, like leaves, from his path, is superb. So is the expression of humorous contempt in his "mildly," when persuaded to "climb down":—

Cor.—The word is 'mildly.' Pray you, let us go;
Let them accuse me by invention, I
Will answer in mine honour.

Men. Ay, but mildly.

Cor.—Well, mildly be it then. Mildly!

Admirable, too, is his quiet dignity in the hall of Aufidius. Throughout, he fills the stage, keeps something of the majestic about him, gratifies the eye and the mind's eye.

To the ear he is, perhaps, less completely satisfying. We do not ask for the thunderous declamation with which our great-grandfathers liked to be deafened; nevertheless, the force of Coriolanus must not be all "reserved force." Sir Henry, on the first night, at any rate, was a little indistinct and a little prone to let gesture supersede, instead of supplement, words. He reminded me occasionally of the lady celebrated by little Marjorie Fleming—

But she was more than usual calm,
She did not give a single dam.

There are several "dams" in Coriolanus—among others, the "I banish you" and the "Alone I did it"—and here Sir Henry was more than usual calm. Coriolanus, after all, is not the Statue of the Commander. Nevertheless, this is, on the whole, a highly impressive performance, classic in breadth and simplicity, the proper interpretation of a part which belongs to what De Quincey would call the literature of power.

The Volumnia of Miss Ellen Terry is rather the "womanly woman," homely and humorous, brisk and petulant, than the somewhat awful matron of the Siddons tradition. It is permissible, by the way, to guess that Sarah Siddons, in her later years, would strike degenerate moderns as what the Americans call a "holy terror." It was the period of imposing females, not all of whom were so amusing as Lady Catherine de Bourgh. Perhaps the turbans had something to do with it. I, for one, am content to revere them in their portraits and to contemplate a living woman of quite another sort in Miss Terry. Mr. J. H. Barnes is an excellent Menenius, human, genial, garrulous—and, in the scene of his rejection by Coriolanus in the Volscian camp, sincerely pathetic. Mr. James Hearn and Mr. Laurence Irving give a distinct individuality to the two Tribunes, and the Roman mob has been skilfully disciplined to represent indiscipline. To see these citizens leaping and yelling when Coriolanus has turned his back upon them—is to get hold of at least one clear fact about the man Shakespeare. He may have been Bacon, or, as some maintain, a Scotchman, but it is quite certain that he was not a democrat. With stage-pictures by Sir L. Alma-Tadema (the best is that of the assembled Senate) and music by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, nothing is lacking to make this revival of Coriolanus a valuable addition to the Shakespearean repertory of the Lyceum.

A. B. WALKLEY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

"GEORGE, BE A KING!"

Such was the constant admonition of the Dowager Princess of Wales to her son, afterwards George III., and the young man's earnestly fatuous attempts to act up to his mother's advice, with the stupendous and fatal consequences of such action, are set forth by Mr. Justin McCarthy in the third and fourth volumes of his HISTORY OF THE FOUR GEORGES AND OF WILLIAM IV. (Chatto and Windus, 12s. each). First we have a picturesque account of how the news of the demise of the Crown was brought to the new King at Kew. Messengers had arrived in swift succession telling him his grandfather was sinking fast, that he was dying, that he was dead.

George resolved to start for London. On his way, and not far from Kew, he was met by a coach and six, which from the blue and silver liveries he knew to be that of Mr. Pitt.

He received the formal news of his accession to the Throne from the lips of the foremost Englishman then alive, and the two fell into a "supreme ironic procession," the foolish, illiterate young man of twenty-two going first, and the great Minister following meekly after. As Mr. McCarthy says, the whole range of human intellect lay stretched out between these two, and exhausted by the living contrast. There was a very dramatic moment at the coronation,

When Dymoke, the King's champion, rode, in accordance with the antique usage, along Westminster Hall, and flung his glove down in challenge to any one who dared contest his master's right to the Throne of England. It is said that someone darted out from the crowd, picked up the glove, slipped back into the press, and disappeared, without being stopped or discovered.

Rumour averred it was Charles Edward himself, the Young Pretender—now forty years of age—who made this last protest on behalf of his lost fortunes and his fallen House. Henceforward, the Stuarts were to trouble the Hanoverian dynasty no more, although an interesting reminder of the fear they once inspired lingers to this day in the regulation that finger glasses may not be laid at any table where Royalty dines. Most people know the fact; few remember the reason, which is that in Jacobite days secret adherents to the cause who found themselves obliged to drink the reigning King's health would save their consciences by passing their wine-glass across the water. Hence, before the moment for the toasts arrived, all water was removed from the King's table.

But in 1760 George III. had nothing to fear from outside foes. All his foes came from within. Provided by heredity with a poor intellectual capacity and an obstinate character; with an education that was nil, and so poor a taste that he could say in all sincerity "Was there ever such stuff as Shakespeare?" he had but one notion—to prove himself a King by having his own way in everything; and he came, thereby, within an ace of losing his kingdom. To us, however, looking back from this distance of time to his reign, it is interesting and consoling to see how, ultimately, his very tyrannies and blunders worked for good. Three immense benefits owe their origin to George III.—an independent America, the freedom of the Press, and the growth and power of public opinion. Under a wiser ruler these inestimable possessions might not have been won until much later.

The especial claim to fame or infamy, whichever way you like to take it, of the reign of George III. is the loss of the American colonies, an often-told story, but one which it is worth while to recall. Up to the passing of the Stamp Act in 1765 the colonists, Dutch and English alike, had been essentially loyal, although there had been many grievances inseparable from the administration of a Crown Colony governed from London. But this Act produced such violent resentment, that the next year, 1766, it had to be repealed, to the King's undying regret. Incapable as any Stuart of learning from experience, eight years later, when he was taking more strenuous methods for crushing the colonists than by illegal taxation, he could write to Lord North of this Repeal, as "a fatal compliance" which had encouraged the Americans to aspire to absolute independence. To make any concession, to display in any measure the spirit of conciliation, was abhorrent to him. The rebels were to be brought to sue for mercy on their knees. With such a temper in high places, it was to be expected that Benjamin Franklin, delegated by Massachusetts in 1772 to present a petition to the Privy Council for the removal of Governor Hutchinson and General Oliver, should be received with flouts and jeers. He was received, however, but he gained little by the audience save the painful pleasure of standing before the Privy Councillors "in his gala-suit of spotted Manchester velvet," and being violently rated by Wedderburn—

With a fluency of invective, a fury of reproach which was almost splendid in its unbridled savagery. The Privy Councillors rocked with laughter, and revelled in applause as the Solicitor-General pilloried the Agent from the colony of Massachusetts Bay as a thief, well-nigh a murderer, a man lost to all honour, all decency.

Some tutelary spirit surely whispered hope to Franklin that night when he took off his unfortunate gala-suit, brushed it carefully, and laid it by in wrappers and lavender, not to see again the light of day until eleven years later when its wearer was one of the signatories to the Treaty of Paris by which England fully acknowledged the Independence of America.

But between these two occasions a great deal had to be lived through by the King and the country, not to mention the colonists themselves. There was the tea made with salt-water in Boston Harbour in 1773, and the punitive closing of the Port of Boston in the following year. And then, in 1775, as the "rebels" still proved stiff-necked, the King resolved on subduing them by force of arms. The prevalent opinion concerning the colonists among the "King's friends" was that they were a set of braggarts and cowards, who would run at the first sight of a red coat, and George wrote exultantly to Lord North when their subjection was determined on, "The die is cast. The colonies must either triumph or submit," for never again should they know the weakness of a concession. It was considered that four regiments would be sufficient to effect their subdual in less than as many months, "for the Americans will be lions only while we are lambs," declared the sapient King. "If we take the resolute part they will undoubtedly be very meek." In spite of the despicable character given to the enemy there was as much rejoicing in London over Howe's earlier successes as though he had vanquished a superior foe, and any man who dared to say with Chatham a word in favour of the colonists became himself "a rebel" and a "trumpet of sedition," was branded as a traitor to his country and his King. But presently came news of the surrender by the British at Saratoga, followed by numerous other little surrenders elsewhere, and culminating in the great surrender of Cornwallis at York Town in 1781. The rebels had won the day, and the independence of America was achieved.

And if it was bitter to George to be beaten by the united colonists across the seas, his ill-success at home in his contest with the insignificant and plebeian Wilkes must have been bitterer still. All the tyranny he could bring to bear failed to suppress the popular demagogue, who, in the teeth of every form of opposition, managed to establish the liberty of the Press. But, in truth, the long reign of the youth who set out so firmly determined "to be a King" is a long record of his personal failures and of the successes of his subjects. He was not King even in his own domestic circle, and there are few more painful stories than that of the treatment he received, as his infirmities increased, from most of his fifteen children. Yet in private life he was an example of the domestic virtues which England justly admires.

But virtue without wisdom is, in those who hold positions of wide responsibility, almost as bad for its possessor and for all who come within its influence as wisdom without virtue. What a man needs, and above all what a King needs, is a firm grip on both. Even George IV., who had neither, nevertheless did less harm, constitutionally, than did George III. Even William IV., described by the sprightly Greville as "one of the silliest old gentlemen in his own dominions," came to no such well-merited grief.

Mr. McCarthy, who has been assisted in the production of these volumes by his son, Mr. Huntly McCarthy, is as easy to read as ever, and knows how to make even dry themes entertaining. He gains, thereby, the ear of the general reader, and the book is likely to be as often asked for at the libraries as any novel. On the other hand, thanks to an excellent index, the student will find it a very useful book of reference to the events and opinions of the times.

FRENCH CRIMINALS.

In his STUDIES OF FRENCH CRIMINALS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY (Heinemann, 10s. n.), Mr. H. B. Irving does not write in the cold, scientific temper of the criminologist, but in the gay sensational style of the picturesque reporters of France and the United States. His stories of such notorious murders as those associated with the names of Troppmann, Pranzini, Prado, Ravachol, and Henry are remarkably well told; and the only objection that can be taken to them is that they pander to a morbid curiosity. Such interest as the book has for readers who are not contented merely to revel in gore lies in the light which it throws on the peculiarities of French criminal procedure. In view of the strong comments lately passed by an English Judge on the journalistic tendency to assume the guilt of accused persons, it is interesting to see how the high-class Press of Paris conceives its responsibilities in such cases. We get a good instance in the comments of the Figaro on Pranzini's appearance in the dock, thus translated by Mr. Irving:—

When he is not astonishing the Court by the recital of the most extravagant falsehoods, he is posturing in a self-satisfied fashion, displaying his shirt cuffs and striking attitudes for the benefit of the fair ladies in the reserved seats. It is his eye alone that betrays the true nature of the man—a blue eye, cruel and shifting, occasionally lighting up with a wild, fierce glance, but generally hidden beneath long eyelids of the Chinese type. The dandy cannot altogether mask the wild beast that is in him.

There could be no more characteristic illustration of the French view that every suspected person is to be regarded as guilty until he has proved that he is innocent.

The report of the same case affords many examples of the ferocious levity of French criminal Judges :—

Two of Marie Regnault's lovers were called. One, a gentleman of fifty years of age, who had known her some sixteen years, was playfully hailed by the Judge as the doyen. Then we get this characteristic bit of dialogue :—

President.—You're embarrassed, Pranzini, you change colour.

Pranzini.—I! not at all! I am perfectly calm, my conscience is pure.

President.—Hadh't we better leave conscience out of the question? You went and paid a visit which your conscience prevents you from divulging because it concerns your head.

. . . Where were you during the early hours of the night?

Pranzini.—I repeat, I cannot say.

President.—What gentlemanly delicacy of feeling!

And, finally, we have the President, at the end of the first day of the trial, before the case for the defence had been presented, addressing the prisoner thus :—

And so, Pranzini, you appear always the same—deceitful, cunning, and hypocritical, and if you have ruined yourself, it is by the excess of your devices to save yourself.

To an English jurist nothing could seem more atrocious. It is almost enough to make one believe Pranzini's dying protestations of his innocence. Yet the French jurists defend their system. Mr. Irving quotes a striking defence of it from M. Guillot's "Les Prisons de Paris" :—

The Judge (says M. Guillot) who thinks that he will extract a confession by pure reasoning, by the clever accumulation of proofs, by mere force of logic, deceives himself strangely; the only use of this kind of argument is to put a prisoner on his guard. The brain is far less vulnerable than the heart; it is by appealing to the latter that the citadel may be stormed. A tear is of more service to justice than the closest reasoning. The criminal, who has denied his guilt in the face of all evidence, confesses at last, because his mistress begs him to tell the truth for her sake, or because his feelings are stirred by the gentleness of his victim's mother.

But why this anxiety for a confession? Even in France a prisoner is not acquitted because he refuses to confess. The object of the prosecution should be not to make the prisoner look a fool, but to prove its case without taking unfair advantages. In so far as it is a study of the methods of the French police and lawyers Mr. Irving's book is valuable; but to most readers it will only appeal as a collection of horrors—an unworthy subject not quite worthy of the author's very considerable skill in narrative.

MR. CHILDERS.

We should hesitate to call the late Mr. Childers a statesman, preferring to restrict that particular word to men of greater political importance; but he was undoubtedly a good official, a sensible colleague, and a useful "Parliamentary hand." If he was not a genius, or an orator, he was at any rate one of those honest public servants who have formed the back-bone of many successive Administrations. His son, Colonel Spencer Childers, has written his life extremely well (A LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF THE RIGHT HON. HUGH C. E. CHILDERS, 2 vols., Murray, 16s.); and the only criticism we have to make is that there are places, though these are not very numerous, in which the book would have been the better for compression. Mr. Childers had a long public career, and became one of the veterans of the Liberal party. He was in turn at the Admiralty, the War Office, the Exchequer, and the Home Office, always laborious and conscientious, but not on the whole favoured with much good fortune. South Africa, and especially Majuba, the disturbed state of Ireland, the loss of the Sudan and the death of Gordon, and finally, Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule failure, brought discredit on Liberal Ministries, though they did not affect the personal reputation of Mr. Childers. As the head of a department he showed great capacity for business, and especially for finance. He did well at the Admiralty, where, unhappily, his tenure of office was saddened by the loss of H.M.S. Captain, with one of his own sons on board; and he did better still as Minister for War, and as the introducer of the territorial system into our Army. When the Egyptian war broke out, his forethought and hard work contributed to the completeness of Lord Wolseley's expeditionary force. After Tel-el-Kebir, and again in 1885, he was offered the G.C.B., but refused it, because he wished to remain plain Mr. Childers as long as he sat in the House of Commons. His next post was the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, for which, after Mr. Gladstone, he had greater qualifications than any man on his side of the House. His third Budget, however, was the luckless production of 1885, over which a harassed and disunited Ministry were defeated and left office. He writes :—"It is certainly remarkably odd that a Government which survived its South African and Egyptian, to say nothing of its Irish, policy should have apparently fallen on a question of spirits. But the Tory opposition was really roused by the Death Duties." Then, after a brief interval of Conservative Government, came the Home Rule Ministry of 1886, in which Mr. Childers was Home Secretary. On the very day on which he took over the duties of his new office occurred the riots, thanks to blundering orders given to the police, in which half Mayfair was damaged and plundered. Almost his first official act was to accept the resignation of the Chief Commissioner of Police, and to offer the vacancy, strange as it now seems, first to Sir Redvers Buller, and next to Lord Charles Beresford. But his official acts were few. It was a short Ministry, and after six months the question of Home Rule proved fatal to it. Mr. Childers, impressed by the course of events in Ireland since 1880, had already advocated a very moderate measure of Home Rule. He was pained to find that Mr. Gladstone, instead of consulting him on the subject, had drafted a Bill which, in its financial and fiscal provisions, went far beyond his own proposals. On his threatening to resign, the obnoxious clauses were modified, and he was able to support the Bill. On the defeat of the Government, he was again returned to Parliament, but for the rest of his life, except as Chairman of the Irish Financial Relations Commission, he took no prominent part in public life.

Colonel Childers claims for his father all the credit that was justly his due, but nowhere speaks of him in language of exaggeration.

He never experienced any difficulty in mastering a subject to which he directed his attention; he could bring his mind to bear in an impartial manner on the minutiae of War or Home Office routine, just as in the old days on the questions of Immigration and Customs in Australia. But the continued mental strain eventually exhausted his strength. He was unable to take the rough knocks of public life philosophically. He took up questions with such eagerness, obtaining the fullest information on them, and, having formed his policy, identified himself so earnestly with it, that hostile criticism was galling to him, and the failure of a scheme which he had adopted would be converted into a deep personal disappointment. When engaged on any particular matter, he would have its success so much at heart that any check to it would cause an undue amount of despondency and depression.

What is this, after all, but the picture of an able and honest man who regarded the public service as something more than a political game? The country will be fortunate if it continues to be served in this spirit. The book contains a number of interesting letters, but none from Mr. Gladstone. The preparation of Mr. Gladstone's own biography has precluded their appearance in these volumes.

In one point Colonel Childers' book, which, of course, does not aim at throwing new light on history, does help the biographer of Mr. Gladstone to get at his facts. As we pointed out in reviewing Lord Selborne's "Memorials," the chief new item of political information to be found in them was the explanation given of Gladstone's dissolution of 1874. Gladstone justified it by the defeats of the Government at the by-elections. Lord Selborne asserted that it was really due to Gladstone's doubt as to whether, having accepted the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, he was or was not actually still member for Greenwich. Mr. Childers (as a correspondent in The Times has pointed out) distinctly corroborated this explanation of Gladstone's action, although no true Gladstonian of the time would admit it for an instant.

ASTRONOMY.

MODERN ASTRONOMY. By HERBERT HALL TURNER, F.R.S., Savilian Professor of Astronomy, &c. (Constable. 6s.)

Professor Turner has developed the three lectures which he delivered at the Royal Institution about a year ago into an interesting account, for general readers, of the advances made in astronomy during the last twenty-five years. "During the last quarter of a century," he says, "there has been a revolution in almost all departments of Astronomy, theoretical and practical. Before 1875 (the date must not be regarded too precisely), there was a vague feeling that the methods of astronomical work had reached something like finality; since that time there is scarcely one of them that has not been considerably altered, or is not on the point of alteration; and entirely new departures have been taken." The reason why 1875 is adopted as the epoch of this new era is, of course, the invention in or about that year of the dry-plate process in photography, which resulted in giving a new and more powerful eye to the astronomer. He had previously been quite dependent on the merely human organ of sight, which Helmholtz was fond of describing as a piece of apparatus so badly made that no respectable instrument-maker would think of sending out such poor work. The early methods of photography were not well adapted to the uses of the observatory, owing to their complexity and the impossibility of using wet-plates for exposures of any length. Sir William Huggins has said that "the great and notable advances in astronomical method and discoveries by means of photography since 1875 are due almost entirely to the great advantages which the gelatine dry-plate possesses for use in the observatory over the process of Daguerre, and even over that of wet collodion."

One of the peculiar merits of the "photographic eyes of science" is that the gelatine plate can be exposed for an indefinite period, with an effect that is always cumulative. Its exposures "are not limited by the duration of a single night; when dawn or cloud comes, it is only necessary to put the cap on the telescope and wait for the next fine night, when the exposure may be resumed. Plates have been left in the telescopes for weeks or even months. Hence the very faintest objects can be photographed—and it is a common experience now to photograph objects too faint to be seen in the biggest telescope." The advantages of the photographic eye are two-fold; it enables us to see what was previously invisible, and it eliminates the personal factor which was apt to cause even the most accurate of observers to colour his drawings with some preconceived ideas of phenomena that did not really exist. Professor Turner gives us interesting examples of both these advantages. The first is well illustrated by a photograph of the Pleiades in which the portrait-lens has revealed the existence of a nebulous structure all through the constellation, where only a few faint traces of nebulousity had ever been seen by the strongest telescope. This discovery may have important bearings on future theories of the constitution and genesis of the stellar universe. Again, the greater exactness secured by the camera is strikingly shown by the comparison of two drawings of the solar corona made at one eclipse with two photographs of it taken at another. In the former case two observers at different places drew the corona in shapes so different that it was hard to believe that they referred to the same original, and it was supposed that rapid changes in the shape and structure of the corona must be taking place in order to account for such a discrepancy. But the photograph shows, with almost complete certainty, that no such changes take place during the short time in which an eclipse passes over the earth. The discrepancies in the drawings must therefore be attributed simply to the personal equations of the two observers.

Other instrumental changes, scarcely less momentous, are expounded by Professor Turner, and he goes on to describe the corresponding changes in the methods of the modern astronomer. In the third section of his book, he groups together the most remarkable of modern results. Among these we may mention the discovery of the tiny satellites of Mars, so nearly predicted by the star-gazers of Laputa two centuries ago; of the fifth satellite of Jupiter and the ninth of Saturn, which showed the power of the great modern refractors; and of the minor planet Eros, which is our nearest neighbour after the moon and Venus, and should help us to measure more exactly the sun's distance from the earth, though the present "probable error" is not greater than the difference made in a man's stature by his socks. We also read with interest about the motion of the North Pole in the earth, which has been proved by the persevering Mr. Chandler; the confirmation of the Nebular Theory supplied by photographs of certain nebulae; the discovery of helium on earth and of oxygen in the stars—and so on. The last and shortest section deals with advances in the mathematical theory of astronomy, a matter which the non-mathematical reader can only understand when its outline is put before him in the lucid and convincing manner adopted by Professor Turner, who fitly closes his book with an account of the classical researches by which Professor G. H. Darwin has added new lustre to a great name and shown how the moon was probably separated from our planet some fifty or sixty million years ago.

It is gratifying to take up one of the books of higher education such as the LECTURES ON THE LUNAR THEORY, by Professor John Couch Adams (Cambridge University Press, 5s.), which Professor Sampson has edited, and to see how rapidly the presentment of a subject so difficult as that of the Moon's disturbed motion has improved during the last quarter of the last century. Nor is this any solitary instance, but of the many which could be cited there are few in which the advance is so striking. Books on subjects such as the Lunar Theory are of two very different kinds. One is purely professional, treating the subject simply to form a basis for the preparation and improvement of tables for astronomical calculation. Here the only form of advance contemplated is one of greater accuracy, and such a book may not unreasonably be deterrent in style even to the more eager student. The other type of work is that which puts the subject for the first time before a student, and in it the mode of presentment ought to be such as to make the special methods of investigation clear, and, as far as possible, attractive. In Adams' lectures both these qualities are displayed in so remarkable a degree that one is tempted to compare them with Newton's brilliant sketch of the subject in the Principia. Most astonishing of all, within a space of eighty-eight clearly printed pages, the accuracy of the results is almost as great as is obtained in the most lengthy Theories, while room is found for an introductory sketch of the newer methods of Professor Hill. The editor is to be congratulated upon his decision to make the contents of the book more accessible than they were in Adams' Collected Papers.

There is no accounting for the way in which a man may choose to spend his leisure. Mr. A. W. Bickerton, who is Professor of Chemistry in Canterbury College of the New Zealand University, prefers to devote his to the elaboration of cosmogonies, though an elementary study of physics would do him more good. In his ROMANCE OF THE HEAVENS (Sonnen-schein, 5s.) he sets before us an instalment of his results, with special reference to such a phenomenon as that of the "new star," which recently appeared in the constellation of Perseus. The value of Mr. Bickerton's meditations, as he here expresses them, may be gauged by the scientific reader from the early statement that "oxygen moving at a mile a second would be

. . . 2,927 degrees Centigrade." Most of Mr. Bickerton's ideas are expressed in this slovenly manner, but from the context it is clear that, if he means anything, he means that a body of oxygen moving at this rate would assume the temperature named. As our atmosphere is constantly moving through space with a speed of seventeen miles a second, it is not clear how Mr. Bickerton supposes that we can live. So far as we can understand his foggy language, he is unable to distinguish between the speed of the molecules of a gas, according to the Kinetic Theory, and the speed of the whole body of the gas. After this evidence of incompetence in his first or introductory chapter, it is hardly necessary to examine his theory of the universe, in spite of the allurements of the preface, which assures us that it "finds Astronomy a chaos of facts and converts it into a classified system," and vaunts it as "the car of an intellectual mountain motor."

RECENT THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.—I.

The tone and style of Canon Gore's book, THE BODY OF CHRIST (J. Murray, 5s.), are worthy of its subject. The discussion is calm, candid, and admirably lucid, and the clearness with which some disputed points such as the nature of the eucharistic gift, or the "objective" presence, are stated will do much to further a better understanding between different parties. The early Fathers show considerable, and perhaps, intentional diversity in their statements concerning the Holy Communion, and Canon Gore's insistence on this point is perhaps the most important feature of his book :—

The inquiry [he says] has disclosed appreciable differences in the eucharistic teaching of the ancient fathers ; a different tone of teaching in the early Alexandrians, Clement and Origen, as compared with Irenaeus and Cyprian ; and in the great Greek theologians St. Gregory and St. Chrysostom, as compared with St. Augustine. It has disclosed variation and ambiguity, and one-sided tendencies in opposite directions in certain early schools of thought ; but, on the whole, and behind these differences, a clear tradition of belief about the eucharist has been apparent which has the best title to be called catholic.

Canon Gore freely criticizes the defects of the Anglican rite, so far as it falls short of ancient language. In particular he regards "the omission of any clear prayer for the departed" as "a grievous departure from primitive and universal practice," and no doubt many Churchmen agree with him in regretting that dislocation of the "continuous eucharistic action" which is a peculiar feature of the Anglican liturgy. This book ought to be carefully studied by those clergy who are inclined to take the Roman rite, and Roman popular practice as the standard of their eucharistic teaching. It is a very timely plea for deeper study, clearer thinking, and less impulsive practice.

WHAT IS CHRISTIANITY ? (Williams and Norgate, 10s. 6d.) is a vigorous translation by Mr. T. B. Saunders of some lectures recently published by Professor Harnack under the title "Das Wesen des Christenthums." In many respects this is the most notable work of Professor Harnack's. It is marked by a kind of massive simplicity and a breadth of view not always associated with first-rate scholarship. It is also of unusual interest as a survey of the history, essential characteristics, and prospects of Christianity. It savours strongly of the Ritschlian theology, which may broadly be described as an attempt to go back to the primary facts of Christian experience, to discard metaphysics, and to ignore the supposed claims of dogma. Professor Harnack's Christianity "means one thing and one thing only, Eternal life in the midst of time, by the strength and under the eyes of God." He does not like the prominence given to "Christology" in the history of the Church. "The Gospel," he maintains, "as Jesus proclaimed it, has to do with the Father only and not with the Son. This is no paradox, nor, on the other hand, is it 'rationalism,' but the simple expression of the actual fact as the evangelists give it." We do not intend to criticize this point of view, but only to point out the striking feature of Professor Harnack's book—viz., that though he regards the history of Christianity as to some extent a history of misdirected energy and speculation, yet he has a most keen and sympathetic insight into the real genius of different religious types. His survey of Catholicism, Greek and Latin, is brilliant and powerful. He takes his stand on the broad principle that if a great institution is to be rightly judged, the historian "must first and foremost inquire into the work which it has accomplished, or, as the case may be, into the problem which it solved." His lectures on Catholicism, as a piece of historical criticism, are masterly, and the reason is that he is penetrated by a sense of the greatness and solidity of that which he investigates. He is able, too, to detach himself from the system to which he gives his own adhesion. Witness his free criticism of Protestantism, his sense of its present dangers, his recognition of certain ideals which it has allowed to disappear—e.g., some form of monasticism. Yet it is in his study of the Gospels that Professor Harnack is at his best. His account of the history and message of Jesus Christ glows with moral enthusiasm; he distinguishes with a very clear sense of proportion between the different spheres of Christian obligation; he speaks of the realities of Christian experience with earnest religious feeling, and all this compensates to some extent for a view of the "Essence of Christianity" which must be regarded as defective. Professor Harnack says, perhaps rightly, that the message of Jesus is "simpler than the Churches would like to think it." But he himself allows that among the great questions to which Jesus directed men's attention was the serious inquiry, "Whom say ye that I am?" Nevertheless, these lectures are most remarkable, both for the historical insight they display and for their elevation of tone and purpose.

THE SOOTHSAYER BALAAM, by the Very Rev. Seraphim, Bishop of Ostrojsk, which has been translated by friends of the author (Rivingtons, 10s.), is of some interest as illustrating the extent to which theological studies are pursued in Russia. It was written as a thesis for the degree of Bachelor in Theology in the Academy of St. Petersburg. The Bishop has read widely, and he discusses linguistic, literary, and archaeological questions with learning and acuteness. Among English writers referred to is Bishop Lowth, who in his "De Sacra Hæbræorum Poesi" speaks warmly of the poetic excellence of Balaam's "parables." In the main, however, the Bishop's essay is based on the somewhat old-fashioned works of De Geer and Hengstenberg. It shows a want of acquaintance with the results of the literary criticism of the Hexateuch. Bishop Seraphim regards Balaam's prophecies as "one of the most convincing proofs of the authenticity of the Pentateuch," and in an appendix he tries to vindicate the traditional view that the narrative of Balaam was written down, if not by the hand, at least in the time of Moses. The most characteristic parts of the book are those which discuss the moral significance of Balaam's history, and the question how far his prophecies have been fulfilled. The name "Israel" is to be understood to include "not only the faithful children of Jacob according to the flesh, but all those akin to him by the Spirit." The Bishop has a fair knowledge of Hebrew, and he has certainly taken great pains to illustrate from Semitic sources the "magical" elements in Balaam's history. But he does not clearly perceive the relation in which archæology stands to literary and textual criticism. The value of the book is impaired by the want of an index.

Zwingli was a stalwart and splendid man, and well deserves a place in the "Heroes of the Reformation" Series. HULDREICH ZWINGLI, by Professor Jackson of the New York University (Putnam, 6s.), is a little dull, it must be confessed, but it is done with admirably scholarly completeness, and is lightened by excellent illustrations and some facsimiles of Zwingli's writing. Two other American professors, Mr. John Martin Vincent and Mr. Frank Hugh Foster, provide additional chapters on general Swiss history and on Zwingli's theology.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Old Anglo-Indian Life.

The readers of the JOURNAL OF MRS. FENTON (Arnold, 8s. 6d.) must not expect to find anything sensational in it, but must be content with a simple account of the life of an English-woman in India and Tasmania more than seventy years ago. It will be especially interesting to those whose knowledge of the India of to-day enables them to contrast their own experience with that of Mrs. Fenton. Others, however, will find it readable in a leisurely way, and will appreciate the mingled sense and sensibility which, as Sir Henry Lawrence's preface says, mark the author's style of writing. The journal was not originally intended for publication, and this, perhaps, is one of its principal merits. It is an unaffected description of the hardships, the home-sickness, the gossip, and the amusements of Anglo-India long ago. Mrs. Fenton was the wife of an officer in the Army, and after a few years in India settled in Tasmania, where she died as lately as 1875. In Tasmania, then called Van Diemen's Land, we hear a good deal of the convicts, many of whom were domestic servants. "I asked the housemaid yesterday, while I was giving her some work, what she had been sent out to this colony for; 'please, mam, for house-breaking'; a very pretty, neat, dark-eyed girl." Near to the Fentons, unknown and alone, lived an escaped convict, who grew tired of freedom and solitude, and surrendered himself. Captain Fenton, grateful that the man had abstained from murdering him and his wife, good-naturedly procured his pardon. But these Tasmanian reminiscences are not the liveliest part of the book. The writer is at her best in describing every-day life in India before steam and electricity had reduced the distance between India and England; and in this respect her diary, though quite unexciting, is of historical value.

Lady Granville.

The letters of Harriet, Countess Granville, written during her married life, were published a few years ago. THE LATER LIFE OF HARRIET, COUNTESS GRANVILLE (Longmans, 10s.) has been compiled by her granddaughter, Mrs. Oldfield, and consists of letters and extracts from Lady Granville's commonplace book from 1846, when her husband died, to 1862, the year of her own death. During her widowhood, Lady Granville lived in almost complete retirement among her intimate friends and the members of her own family, so that, if her papers describe no events of public importance, they serve to illustrate a life withdrawn from the great world, but still interested in it. Except as material for a portrait of a lady of the last half-century, sincere, religious, well-educated, and perfectly well-bred, we do not find much of general interest in the book. It is too fragmentary and too discursive to furnish consecutive reading, and the extracts from Lady Granville's commonplace book show the extent, not of her mind, but of her reading. There are references to many persons of whom Lady Granville's own estimate would have been worth having. It is provoking to find that, instead of writing of them herself, she usually prefers to quote such passages from other writers as the person or the occasion recalls to her memory. One of the rare instances in which she records her own impressions is in connexion with Macaulay. She met him at Castle Howard, and says of him:—"Macaulay is an (almost) never-ceasing talker, and pours out the prodigious stores of learning, wit, and eloquence with such an absorption in his subject that I doubted when I heard him if he would not go on just the same if everybody left the room. Somebody asked the Duchess of Sutherland (after a dinner at Stafford-house) if he liked the society of women, and whom he seemed to prefer. She answered, 'Oh, he only looks upon us all in the light of interruptions.'" And this, after all, is not a new view of Macaulay.

The Gordon Highlanders.

The story of a regiment such as the Gordon Highlanders cannot, of course, be told in a few pages. Colonel Gardyne, however, who writes THE LIFE OF A REGIMENT: THE HISTORY OF THE GORDON HIGHLANDERS (Edinburgh: David Douglas, 28s.), from its formation in 1794 to 1816, might have done more in a volume of this size—it runs, indeed, to 525 pp.—than merely deal in it as he does with the first twenty-two years of the corps' history. As a natural consequence of this prodigality there is more chronicling of regimental small beer in the book than is altogether advisable. In the same way several lists that it contains of non-commissioned officers and men who fell in different campaigns a century ago or so might have been omitted without detracting in any material way from the interest of the volume as a whole. Still, these are but minor blemishes in a book that is on the whole a well-written one. In compiling it the author has drawn largely upon the official papers of the corps, and the volume is thus of a more authentic nature than is usually the case with works of its class. Some of the old regimental orders which are quoted read rather quaintly. Thus, in 1805, the commanding-officer of the 1st battalion promulgated the following:—"On account of the irregularities allowed by Private McKean, his hut is to be burned down by the pioneers, and if Mrs. McKean continues these disgraceful scenes she will be drummed out of the regiment." On the subject of the soldier's life at this time it will probably come as news to most people to learn that only one meal a day was authorized up to 1808. In this year, however, instructions were issued by the Commander-in-Chief to all Colonels "to turn their most anxious attention" to the provision of a breakfast meal (porridge being officially recommended for the purpose) in their respective corps. The new generation of Gordon Highlanders have a good deal to be thankful for.

For the Scientific Gardener.

Professor Marshall Ward has written DISEASE IN PLANTS (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.) with a very clear intention of meeting the needs of the cultivator who has little time to study the life-history of the fungi, insects, or other organisms to which plant diseases are due, and who therefore asks men of science somewhat impatiently to give him guidance as to what is wrong. Many parts of this volume strike us as too deep for the ordinary head gardener, if not for the squire and the rector, to fathom, but every page deserves the earnest attention of any man who wishes to undertake forestry or gardening in a scientific spirit. Professor Ward does not hesitate to give simple instances of the manner in which cultural errors retard success in hothouses and gardens, although the mass of his matter is a well-arranged outline of disease causes and health principles rather than a conspectus of farming and gardening duties. He mentions the common mistake of injuring ferns by keeping their roots and the soil wet, and the air and fronds dry, "whereas the natural habitats provide for wet and shaded fronds and well-drained soil." Another point of general interest dealt with is the delusion of gardeners that certain plants die from the "drip" of trees (let us say beeches or sycamores) when the harm is really caused by the shade, which dooms the plants to death by "inanition because their leaves are not able to provide sufficient carbohydrates." "Disease in Plants" contains several chapters, such as that on "Life and Death," which should be read by many students of science besides those who are officially or commercially concerned with land and gardens; indeed the first part of the book, "Some Factors" (in the life and health of the plant), may be commended to all persons who can enjoy straightforward scientific exposition. Professor Ward is an instance of the fact that men of science often write better English than men of letters; we should like to see a student's manual of botany proceed from his pen. "Disease in Plants" has no illustrations, but it is rich in bibliographical references, and carefully indexed.

book is one to read on the spot rather than at home. It supplements, but does not supplant, Baedeker on the one hand, and such books as those in the Mediaeval Towns Series on the other; and no doubt it will find a considerable and grateful public. In addition to the information about pictures, sculptures, and buildings, there are some hints on the practical aspects of travelling, and an appeal to travellers to treat Italians with the courtesy to which they are entitled by the fact that, in the fourteenth century, they already ate their food with forks.

The author of PLAY AND POLITICS IN MALAYA (Wells Gardner, Darton, 3s. 6d.), to which we referred a week or two ago, has unquestionably the gift of narrative. He was engaged in business and had an official position at Singapore, and his short sketches of the men and things which came under his personal observation make very bright reading. He tells us about Siam and its King, about the French in Cochin China, about Rajah Brooke, Sir George Jacob and Sir Henry Keppel, about Consular work, Chinese secret societies, the opium trade, and many other things. The sketches are slight enough; but they are told with humour and they are all first-hand.

We have received the new (1901) edition of the HANDBOOK OF JAMAICA (Stanford, 7s. 6d. n.). It is compiled from official sources by T. L. Roxburgh and Jos. C. Ford, of the Jamaica Civil Service, but it is not an official publication.

Reprints.

James Thomson has this advantage that you can reprint him in the Winter, the Spring, the Summer, or the Autumn; he is always apropos. THE POEMS OF JAMES THOMSON (Walter Scott, 2s), edited with an appreciative introduction by Mr. William Bayne, contains only the better known works. The tragedies are not here, and some of the poems, e.g., the ode to Liberty, which Johnson failed to finish reading, are omitted. But most readers will be sufficiently employed in renewing their acquaintance with the "Seasons" and "The Castle of Indolence," the best work of the poet who sings to us of the shepherd of the Hebride Isles

Placed far amid the melancholy main.

One often fails to realise that the romantic movement, of which Thomson was a pioneer, began so early in the eighteenth century. He died in 1748.

Among other reprints which we have not previously mentioned are LAVENGRO, PENDENNIS, and PRIDE AND PREJUDICE in Messrs. Methuen's Little Library. Mr. Hindes Groome, who edits the first, gives a highly interesting and very long list of Romany Ryes or "Gypsy Gentlemen," from Andrew Boorde (1490-1549) to Sienkiewicz, but he puts Borrow, as a writer, above them all. On Thackeray and Miss Austen it is not easy to say a new thing, but Mr. S. Gwynn and Mr. E. V. Lucas respectively write pleasant little introductions to the volumes; and Mr. G. T. Bettany does the same for Carlyle's SARTOR RESARTUS (which includes "Heroes" and "Past and Present") in Messrs. Ward, Lock's Minerva Library, though he lays more stress on the present value of "Sartor" than we should. Thackeray appears also in two new volumes of the "New Century" edition (Nelson, 2s. n. each)—one containing miscellanies in the shape of Essays, Reviews, &c., and also the Ballads, and the other the contributions to Punch arranged chronologically. Mr. Walter Jerrold edits EMERSON'S ESSAYS for the Temple Classics (Dent, 1s. 6d.). In Messrs. Methuen's excellent "Library of Devotion" Canon B. W. Randolph edits the PSALMS OF DAVID (2s.) and is severely cautious and conservative as to the question of Davidic authorship. In the same series a reprint of much interest is the LYRA APOSTOLICA, the collection of poems, largely by Newman himself, which breathes the spirit of confidence, even of defiance, which marked the rise of the Anglican movement. Mr. Beeching edits it, and Canon Scott Holland contributes a very interesting introduction. A reprint of a modern book is an acceptable third edition of Mr. Maurice Hewlett's EARTHWORK OUT OF TUSCANY (Macmillan, 5s.). Its merits are too well known to need a re-introduction, and, as Mr. Hewlett says in a new preface, "I cannot be for ever explaining why I wrote this book." Lastly, we are glad of a well-printed reissue of Black's novels, coming from Messrs. Sampson Low.

ART.

THE NEW GALLERY.

If we were to believe the fourteenth summer exhibition at the New Gallery to be in any important way representative of the best English art of to-day, we should be compelled to admit that English art just now is at a low ebb. The very conditions under which the pictures for the gallery in Regent-street are collected precludes the possibility of their being the best that the painters can do. The New Gallery is not, in the sense that the Grosvenor under the direction of Sir Coutts Lindsay used to be, a gallery of protest—the one public exhibition to which strong, irreconcilable men preferred to send; a collection in which exhibitors were sure to find confrères who, however well they painted, and however much they were in public demand, yet refused to send their best canvases to become an inharmonious part of a kaleidoscopic mosaic of newly-varnished mediocrities. Burne-Jones is no more; Stott of Oldham and Whistler have either ceased to exhibit or to think in a new way; and the result is that, whereas the Grosvenor had a following, the New merely follows. Very few of the men who now find their pictures placed in Regent-street will fail, unless they are singularly unfortunate, to receive a ticket for varnishing day at Burlington House. The result is natural enough, and the pictures shown this year at the New Gallery are, for the most part, painted upon well-worn, familiar lines by men who could easily supply a dozen similar ones upon receiving reasonable notice. We can gauge the level at which the New Gallery now stands by having to make the confession that so weather-beaten a theme as "The Casket Scene from the Merchant of Venice," by Sir J. D. Linton—memories of Mr. Frith in his prime and G. D. Leslie notwithstanding—gives pleasure and stands out well from its commonplace surroundings. Practically the only originality shown is to be found either in the technique of comparatively few, or in the balcony, to which not many penetrate. There is a general feeling of unreality and of paint, no atmosphere of art, and, excepting some of the landscapes, very little poetry. The Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society overshadows the walls even after an interval of two years, and the pictures rise but little above the standard of expensive wall furniture.

Let us take the portraits. Here is Sargent, Shannon, Collier, Hacker, Glazebrook, Constant, Harrington-Mann, Llewellyn, Jack, Sir George Reid, Brough, and half-a-dozen others reinforming us with sad insistence of the fact that they paint portraits for a livelihood. We may smile at the pseudo-classic Dianas, Nymphs, Bacchantes, Niobes, and Graces of Sir Joshua Reynolds, of Gainsborough, and of Romney; but we can forgive the artificiality of an half-classic period more readily than the brutality of an unpicturesque modernity. The older men knew that a portrait to live must be something more than a very "painty" likeness; and it is indeed a pity that so many uninteresting people can so well afford to have their portraits painted. It is doubtful whether Reynolds or Gainsborough painted plain people. If they did, their friends have considerably destroyed them.

It may serve some useful purpose to consider the portrait of "The Earl of Stair," by Sir George Reid. The earl is an excellent landlord and has enough sense of beauty to allow the ivy to run unrestrained over his well-groomed residence. But he is not the type of subject that justifies an artist in honouring him with a very full length. The size of the canvas bears no proportion to the interest of the subject. The work, as a painting, is quite respectable, but no one can imagine a body of connoisseurs keenly competing in the auction room a hundred years hence for this respectable commonplace. The picture is totally devoid of pictorial interest. Then there is the even longer full length portrait of "The Duke of Portland," by Mr. Sargent. It is big and shows plenty of paint. It is true—and we have much regretted to hear it—that Mr. Sargent has been in indifferent health of late. That is no good reason why he should kill the Duke's pet dog; it would have been more sportsmanlike to have merely painted him. The concentration of the light upon the Duke's forehead is a trick which is most disturbing. The same abrupt brutality of handling which has marred more than one of Mr. Sargent's admitted successes reduces his portrait of "Mrs. Garrett-Anderson" to the level of an unfinished and incomplete attempt. It is a good likeness, but this is a merit of the humblest kind and a mere necessity for the portrait-painter's trade. All that has made the great portrait-painters famous is in addition to this. In particular, the precious and necessary quality of repose is absent. It is this quality which renders "The Countess of Wilton," by Mrs. Eva Cowell, a picture, in which all but the face is wrapt in mystery, a much more pleasant possession. Mr. Shannon, also, timid and emasculated as he sometimes is, has a nice sense of decorative effect and shows it to advantage in the somewhat coldly painted group of "Lady Carbery and her children." It is, indeed, very much open to question whether the influence of the downright school is good for art. Let us look, for instance, at Mr. Robert Brough's portrait of "Mrs. Milne of Kinaldie." We refuse to believe Mr. Brough's assertion that his subject is wholly devoid of feminine softness of character. The painting is of the broad assertive type of portraiture of which we have had far more than enough of late years, and it is not a pleasant picture. It will find its way into the garret one of these days, along with some of its betters. Not that we wish portrait-painters to become sugared over with the pink and white prettinesses of "An Offering from the Hills" or mannered into the unreality of Benjamin Constant's shoulderless head of "Wentworth Beaumont," but we can admire the freedom without brutality of Melton Fisher's "Dreams," the dainty grace of Miss Gow's "Daughters of Charles Mitchell," and the careful technique of Jacomb Hood's "Judge Lumley-Smith." If we were to choose the one portrait which shows character pictorially we should be tempted to select Maurice Greiffenhagen's "Mrs. Pickford Waller," a thoroughly well painted picture which should not be idly passed by because, at a first acquaintance, the subject appears to be, what it certainly is not, unsympathetic. It is one of the few pictures in the gallery which is a good deal better than it looks. One's sense of fitness is much more likely to be ultimately satisfied by such a portrait as this than it is by the canvas which thrusts the sitter into a momentary notoriety.

Taking the subject pictures in some sequence, W. Dacres Adams is curious rather than successful with "The Black Knight," Mr. Strudwick as conventionally decorative as ever, and Mr. Watts most unequal. "Trifles light as air" provokes comparison with the amorini of many an old painter whose very name has been forgotten, and suffers in the process; but his "Greed and Labour" belongs to that group of powerful pictures which helps us to retain our pride in the band of artists who assisted so conspicuously to raise the standard of art in England thirty years ago. A picture also which deserves to rank high is "The Pool of Diana," by George Wetherbee, full of clever contrasts of ruddy light and subtle shadow, with none of the restlessness of Byam Shaw's not too graceful huntress. W. G. von Glehn's "L'Enchantement de la Forêt" is a remarkably colourful design well fitted to decorate its colder architectural surroundings.

In the north room there is an astoundingly dexterous painting of a Persian girl by William Wontner, and a large canvas by Austen Brown which is possibly the most original contribution to the exhibition. Both title—"Sunshine and Shadow"—and subject are simple enough, but it is an attempt to get out of the ruck of "Goods according to invoice." In spite of a tendency to dirtiness, or rather heaviness, of colour, it is a very acceptable, reposeful, and decorative contribution. The clouds suggest a too ready assimilation of classic exemplars rather than a direct appeal to nature, but when the quaintness is granted as essential to a picture of peasant life in an easy going, unprogressive, well contented country, the picture remains full of passages of singular charm, conceived in a broad and open manner and unflinchingly painted. We must not omit to mention "Goldfish," a most interesting study in colour and careful drawing from Mr. Henry.

The landscapes occupy small space in comparison with the works we have already mentioned, but they are the redeeming feature of the exhibition. Among the best is a typical, shimmery "Old Canal, Flanders," by William Padgett; a "Winter Sunset" by Alfred Hartley, which is so manly an attempt to arrest an extremely difficult effect as to deserve high praise; "A Winding Stream," by Bernard Harrison, full of quiet charm; a good example of Bertram Priestman; a seascape by Arthur Ryle; some convincing work from M. R. Corbet and Moffat Lindner; and an "Estuary of the Nith," a very much better picture than we would expect from one so bound up in the old masters as Mr. J. J. Orrock. Mr. Edward Stott's "A Winter's Evening" is far better than his other effort in which the white blossoms are quite out of the picture.

It remains to refer to the paintings in tempera by Walter Crane, Arthur Gaskin, J. D. Batten, Joseph Southall, Mrs. Marianne Stokes, Graham Petric, Bernard Sleight, and Henry Ryland. The "Fountain of Youth" is perhaps, in point of size, the greatest curiosity of the show, so dull in colour, scattered in composition and transparent in allegory is it. Smaller in size, but even greater in daring is "New Lamps for Old," by Mr. Southall, a subject in which a very clean gentleman in an Oriental turban appears to be offering Birmingham-made "duplex" lamps to young lady tourists of to-day masquerading in sixteenth-century costumes. It is not clear whether it is only that the Primitives affected the tempera medium or the medium suggests the Primitives. The result is a certain quaint inconsistency, which, if it was not so obviously affected, might reconcile us to a totally unnecessary stained-glass-window way of looking at our neighbours which would assuredly become uselessly tedious. That the medium does not compel a return to the sixteenth century, the free use of it in a purely modern way by Mr. Batten quite sufficiently proves.

FICTION.

The Red-Shirt Romance.

The collection of short stories to which Mr. Bret Harte attaches the title UNDER THE REDWOODS (Pearson, 6s.) is one more example of his uninterrupted power of giving us pleasure. Such a tale as that which tells how Reuben Allen—a "forty-niner" of the true red-shirt brand we loved when all was young—"saw life" in San Francisco, has the freshness, apt characterization, quick humour and sympathy that the author of "The Luck of Roaring Camp" commands to-day with as little effort as when he was thirty years younger. What does it matter if the hero suffers from that well-known stage complaint "valvular disease of the heart," and can die just at the moment when he most desires, for love's sake, to make his exit. He can still hold a prize-fighter or "chucker out" with a single arm if his friend need the service, and he is in every way the noble, simple, foolish, touching figure we have welcomed many a time with accumulated affection. "Jimmy's Big Brother," or any other of the ten stories in the volume, possess the old charm, but in "Bohemian Days in San Francisco" we get a peep into the mind of the man who has delighted us for so many years. He recalls his earliest recollections of the city of the Golden Gate. Not quite the period of '49, when it was a straggling beach of huts and stranded hulks, but just as it was growing into the metropolis of California—when the business men were serious-minded and determined to make their city great; when the Chinaman began to come in and the Mexican to rub shoulders with the Puritan; when there was a Spanish Quarter where "three centuries of quaint customs, speech, and dress, were still preserved, where the proverbs of Sancho Panza were still spoken in the language of Cervantes, and the high-flown illusions of the La Manchian Knight still a part of the Spanish Californian hidalgo's dream;" and when the author of "The Heathen Chinese" was himself building up experiences which have enabled him to present to us so many amusing and pathetic stories. "Under the Redwoods" is as good as its predecessors, and we cannot praise it more.

Selma Lagerlöf.

FROM A SWEDISH HOMESTEAD (Heinemann, 6s.) is a remarkable collection of romantic stories by Selma Lagerlöf, the Swedish authoress who first made her fame with "Gösta Berlings Saga," and "Miracles of Antichrist." The first part of the book, some 130 pages, contains "The Story of a Country House," a piece of work rich in beauty and instinct with a fragrant poetic feeling. The nature of the demented Gunnar Hede, won back to life by Ingrid, whose life he has in his turn saved, is wonderfully depicted; the story is a delight to read purely for its mystic atmosphere, its fantasy and emotional beauty. "The Queens at Kungahälla" is the alluring title of three tales—"The Forest Queen," "Sigrid Storrade," and "Astrid," which tell the history, in three periods, of the old city of Kungahälla. Sigrid Storrade is, in part, the story of a pagan queen who summons the Norwegian King Olaf Trygvesson to meet her at Kungahälla, in order to settle about her marriage. The Christian Olaf is to drink from the wedding-cup with the Pagan Sigrid Storrade:—

That night the ferryman who conveyed people over the Göta River was busier than he had ever been before. Time after time he was called to the other side, but when he crossed over there was never anybody to be seen. But all the same he heard steps around him, and the boat was so full that it was nearly sinking. He rowed the whole night backwards and forwards, and did not know what it could all mean. But in the morning the whole shore was full of small foot-prints, and in the foot-prints the ferryman found small withered leaves, which, on closer examination, proved to be pure gold, and he understood they were the brownies and the dwarfs who had fled from Norway when it became a Christian country, and who had now come back again.

In this realistic kind of fairyland does Selma Lagerlöf place her romantic histories. One may say to the reader of the book what the author says of Kungahälla, "this is the ground that will enable him to breathe the air of the land of dreams, and show him the visions of bygone days." Miss Jessie Brochner has done her work of translation with no small skill.

Extravaganza.

To conceive of Charing-cross levelled to the ground by an agency yet undiscovered by science because the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not hand over to a nameless individual a hundred million pounds; and of the Chancellor himself being kidnapped to a remote island peopled by beings of the same genus as those who made their habitat on the Island of Dr. Moreau, is to plunge into the world of extravaganza. Yet Mr. J. S. Fletcher, in his THREE DAYS' TERROR (John Long, 6s.), gives it all a kind of plausibility; and though he is capable of better things, the book reveals as pretty a touch in the gruesome as the "Harvesters" showed him to possess in the mildly rural. It is pleasantly written despite its horrors. Mr. Fletcher can dabble in horrors without any attempt or desire to make your flesh creep. It is simply a story of very curious happenings, with many agreeable people in it, and written in an agreeable style.

Mr. Guy Boothby.

Mr. Guy Boothby is so honest and industrious a labourer that it seems almost unfair to judge him by the ordinary standard of art. MY INDIAN QUEEN (Ward, Lock, 6s.) is an admirable example of the commonplace, uninspired, pseudo-historical novel beloved of "the general reader" a few years ago. The time is that of the early Georges; the scene of the most exciting adventures is the India of an extremely wicked Rajah. The English girl, Lady Cicely Helderston, "daughter, and indeed only child, of that notorious old roué, the Earl of Castlefield," shares with the "Indian Queen" the honour of the hero's admiration. But the home-bred lady wins by waiting.

Those who ask for a touch of Attic wit in their novels may pass by "My Indian Queen," but those who love a fluent, exciting story, well-costumed, lively, and large, should read it.

Life of a Prima Donna.

There is something really fresh and spontaneous about MADAME MARIE, SINGER, by Ester Dale (Leadenhall Press, 3s. 6d.). It is true there is nothing particularly new about the construction, and we have had plenty of other stories dealing with concert-room and opera-house, but few so naturally and with so firm and quiet a grasp of character. So far as we know, this is a first book, and it is so unassuming in appearance that it will probably be passed over unnoticed in the crowd. But it is distinctive, fresh, and interesting enough to merit a better fate. It is not a work of genius, but—many infinitely worse novels have sold their thousands, even their tens of thousands. The lady who writes under this curiously spelled pen-name may some day do better work. Some of her characters betray inexperience; the humour is too often painfully thin, particularly when dealing with the ladies of Slowton (a name which suggests no very fine sense of the ridiculous). But the musical element is well done, from Herr Direktor Franz down to Mr. Sampson. The author is not entirely unacquainted with the scenes she has chosen to draw—and this is not always found in a musical story. On the whole, a little book that deserves a kindly word.

The Drink Habit.

HIS FAMILIAR FOE, by E. Livingstone Prescott (Grant Richards, 6s.), is the best novel its author has written. As a temperance tract, it ranks with Mrs. Stannard's "A Name to Conjure With"—but that is by the way. Its literary side is not sacrificed to its "purpose"—if it has one. The title-page says that the book is "the story of the degrading inheritance of Captain Robert Ducie of H. M. Silver Lancers, his struggles, defeats, victory, his marriage, fatherhood, and love." This is comprehensive. But it gives the reader no idea of the interest of the study. Young Ducie is sympathetic from first to last. He begins as a gilded youth, son of a low-born millionaire, and pathetically anxious to show no cloven hoof to his fastidious companions in the Silver Lancers. An inherited craving for drink and a disastrous marriage with an almost impossibly callous and brutal woman, set him on the way to the "struggles" and "defeats." About the "victory" and the "love" the book should be allowed to speak for itself. There is a charming child in it, and, for once, infant pathos is really pathetic. Freddy intoxicated, Freddy trying to bring his poor young father in the way he should go, and Freddy dying, are touching to a painful degree. The book is well constructed and brightly written.

It would be easy, by a few quotations from her early pages, to produce the impression that BALLAST (Longmans, 6s.) was not one of Miss Myra Swan's happiest efforts. In fact, the book begins in an irritatingly spasmodic manner; a series of short, staccato sentences—some of which contrive to be hopelessly involved in spite of their shortness—and much feminine talk about nothing in particular do not promise well. But it improves considerably as it goes on. The author has a good store of various information, and is not averse from displaying it; and she has an eye for the good-natured type of "impossible" character. Cousin Septimus and his household are well drawn, and not unkindly. And as the plot of the story develops, and the difficulties arise, there are opportunities for pulling out the pathetic stop of which Miss Swan avails herself to the full. Grey Alison is one of those girls who are doomed from the start to self-sacrifice; her sister, Firenze, is one of those butterfly natures made to play with fire and singe not only themselves but others. Among other things "Ballast" might serve very well as a temperance publication, for it is the "drink habit" that comes near to wrecking the heroine's happiness. It is, however, a better book than most novels with a purpose. The preaching is not obtruded. Miss Swan would probably write better if she were not quite so anxious to display the extent of her reading, and her sentences are apt to show a straining after effect. But there is more in her work than we often discover in the novels of the day.

American College Life.

Anything that Mr. Sheldon writes is sure to enjoy a wide circulation. EDWARD BLAKE (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.) is a story of college life in America, and the life it depicts is interesting from its novelty to us on this side of the Atlantic. In Edward Blake himself it is difficult to feel an absorbing interest. To put it briefly, his conscience is a little too morbidly acute. How he would have fared at an English University we can make a shrewd guess, but the young men of Hope College seem to have treated him with a mildness that we are not accustomed to associate with students in the States. Mr. Sheldon has much to say on the burning question of college athletics, some of which is no doubt very much to the point. The athletic scholarship is not confined to America, and it is possible, though not very likely, that his sermon may reach the ears of those in authority at Oxford and Cambridge. As for his story, it is not worth considering seriously. The career of Edward Blake affords Mr. Sheldon another opportunity of re-stating his views on several subjects. Among other things, he introduces a college debate on "the present war in the Philippines." But we look in vain for literary grace as for psychology; the characters and the language are alike wooden.

Walsingham's Chronicle.

Miss Bramston's book THE BANNER OF ST. GEORGE (Duckworth, 3s. 6d.) deals with the Peasant Revolt in Essex and Herts—with Richard II. and Wat Tyler, and more particularly with the struggle between the burgesses of St. Albans and their Abbot. The chief figure in the story is a historical character—one Grindecobbe, the leader of the townspeople against the unjust claims of the abbey—in whom the monkish chronicler, naturally enough, detected nothing but sacrilegious insubordination. In Miss Bramston's hands he becomes the noble leader of a people rightly struggling for freedom. Those who like the historical novel of the old school will welcome this story, which is carefully written in what has to pass with novelists for mediæval English. The picture of Richard himself has some merit as an original presentation of a character not much handled by novelists.

THE GAMBLERS, by Mr. W. Le Queux (Hutchinson, 6s.), centres round a murder mystery at Monte Carlo, the unravelling of which through the latter part of the book serves to keep one's interest alive. The two ladies in whose company we start on the journey to Nice are much too effusively "smart" to please. One of them undertakes to unravel the mystery, and signally fails to do so. Yet she apparently possesses the gift of being invisible, and also of overhearing and reporting with exactness conversations carried on "in a low tone" in the next room, on the other side of a partition in an express train travelling at full speed, and also inside a ship's cabin when her own exclamations of dismay are "swallowed up by the noises of the boisterous night." These exceptional gifts, however, enable her to tell us the story, which is supplemented by a great deal of guide-book gossip about Italy and the Riviera.

PRO PATRIA (Ward Lock, 6s.) is one of Mr. Max Pemberton's "all-alive" romances of peril and adventure. This time, the danger comes from across the Channel. A tunnel is discovered, steadily boring its way across to our shores, with the object, of course, of a stealthy, underground invasion. Mr. Pemberton's hero attains the eminence of being the discoverer of this nefarious tunnel, with results disastrous to himself, but full of opportunities for the most choice heroism. Of course the invasion is prevented by his means. There are complications with a charming little Frenchwoman and a half-crazy adventurer. The tale goes with a capital swing.

Is it a sign of the times that so many novels nowadays are concerned with maidens who pine for reluctant lovers and do not hesitate to meet them more than half-way? Miss Mary E. Mann's charming Barbara in AMONG THE SYRINGAS (Fisher Unwin, 6s.) is one of these. There is every excuse for her, a beautiful girl in unspeakably dreary surroundings, with her vigorous life going to waste. The story has charm, like all by the same author. The character of Emma—the poor, warm-hearted, under-bred wife—is admirable, and so is Sheba, the maid of all work. There are some attractive but rather eerie children, over whom Miss Mann ruthlessly harrows our feelings. The book is a little depressing, but well above the average.

Mr. Fred. C. Smale has made a noble attempt to combine the supernatural with the material in THE MAYOR OF LITTLEJOY (Ward Lock, 3s. 6d.). The idea of giving a commonplace Mayor of a country town a strain of the blood of Puck and Oberon appears likely to be fruitful, especially as a lady of his family, who is considerably more than half a fairy, comes to complicate his life. But all this is difficult to make convincing, and Mr. Smale is not quite as clever as Mr. Gilbert, nor as ingenious as Mr. Anstey. Nevertheless it will beguile an hour and bear a little graceful skipping. Mr. Will Owen's drawings are very amusing.

We presume that Mr. "Morice Gerard" is of the sex that writes so often under masculine names without a masculine style. THE SHADOW OF GILSLAND (Marshall, 3s. 6d.) is very womanly and simple. Can simplicity of humour go further than to say of a tavern called the "Chequers," "The inn was appropriately named, for the lives of the people, men and women, who entered its doors were chequered," and to impress upon us at intervals that it bears a "not too honoured name" or a "none too creditable name"? Some of the people are very, very horrid, and they suffer a good deal, and some are very, very nice, and they are going to be very happy. The author's vivid insight into the mysteries of life is displayed in epigrammatic sentences, of which we have marked many, but will only quote one:—"Man's understanding of woman's nature, at its best, is singularly limited."

Very simple, and yet not altogether unpleasing, is Mr. Jenner Tayler's little story MARY BRAY—HER MARK (John Long, 3s. 6d.), which is chiefly taken up with a journey through an Oregon forest undertaken by the lady in question and an English cavalier engaged in the lumber trade. The love affair that is the necessary outcome of this expedition is handled with more originality than might have been expected, and the result is a pretty little volume—easily assimilated in the course of an hour or so—with just a touch of excitement towards the finish. It is not badly written—although it does display a page of errata at the beginning.

Mrs. Meade's DADDY'S GIRL (Newnes, 3s. 6d.) is a book difficult to classify. It is certainly not for children, in spite of the title, as the story deals chiefly with the conjugal squabbles of the conventional weak husband and the equally conventional wife, pretty, heartless, and extravagant. It is astonishing how many of those heartless mothers we meet in English literature; we are glad to say we do not meet them in real life whether in England or elsewhere. "Daddy's Girl" is one of those impossible children of the "Misunderstood" type, and we are not even spared the "East Lynne" deathbed. There is plenty of sentimental talk for the people who like it.

The Rev. Sydney Mostyn is not one of your subtle humourists. He goes very straight for his point, and is not ashamed to use the most obvious traps for laughter. In MISS SPINNEY (Leadenhall Press, 2s. 6d.), he takes an elderly maiden lady—these funny men are never happy without an old maid—and makes her found the customary Society for the Suppression of Sweethearting, which behaves much in the customary fashion. Being a clergyman, too, and a humourist, he must needs introduce his missionary bishop—the kind of bishop that humorous clergymen love to draw. For the rest, Mr. Mostyn writes in boisterously high spirits, and not always in the best of taste, and his book becomes inordinately tiresome before we reach the conclusion. It is a farce, and a dull one—and the most remarkable part of the volume is the warm praise given to a former work in a collection of Press notices thoughtfully printed at the end.

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

One paper in the Quarterly is of an importance to dwarf all the others. The new number contains the best article on Queen Victoria that has appeared in any of the magazines—a character-sketch at once grave and light, and written in a tone which is not the less loyal because it is reasonably critical. Her late Majesty's limitations are recognized no less frankly than her high qualities. Those limitations, as the reviewer candidly recognized, included an indifference to literature and a hostility to clever women :—

She saw a vast and growing work being performed by her subjects, and she did not feel that she was in touch with it. She accordingly left it alone, and had the wisdom not to attempt to patronize what she was not sure of comprehending. . . . The Queen had no real feeling for poetry, although she professed a cult for Tennyson, founded upon her emotional interest in his "In Memoriam." More modern authors received little attention from her ; and the stories current of the Queen's particular interest in this or that recent writer may be dismissed as the fables of self-advertisement. She would sometimes begin a book at the earnest request of one of her ladies, who would immediately write off to the author :— "I am happy to tell you that the Queen is now deep in your 'Prodigies of Passion'"; but the correspondent would fail to mention that her Majesty had tossed it away when she reached the fifth page.

With this characteristic of Queen Victoria's mind may be compared her attitude towards modern thought :—

When the creed of the Positivists was first brought to her notice she was extremely interested. "How very curious," she said, "and how very sad ! What a pity somebody does not explain to them what a mistake they are making. But do tell me more about this strange M. Comte."

With music, of course, it was different. Her Majesty's musical criticisms were often admirable. Here is an instance :—

A piece of very modern music had been performed in the Queen's presence, manifestly not to her approval. "What is that?" she asked. "It's a drinking song, Ma'am, by Rubinstein." "Nonsense," said the Queen ; "no such thing. Why you could not drink a cup of tea to that !" "Handel," she said, "always tires me, and I won't pretend he does not."

The Queen's taste in jokes is another topic on which the reviewer is outspoken :—

The jests in which the Queen delighted were not of the very subtle kind. But a rather primitive kind of fun, when she was in the mood for it, would amuse her almost beyond her own endurance, till she was simply breathless and could bear no more. Her rather prominent blue eyes would positively beam with entertainment. Sometimes she was taken, and at very awkward moments, with what the French so aptly term le jou rire.

But she was fully capable of self-control, and an excellent illustration of it was given at the reception of certain Oriental ambassadors, whose salaams were of an unaccustomed character.

When, at last, the ambassadors suddenly bowed themselves, apparently as men struggling with acute internal pain, and squeezed their hands together in passionate deprecation between their knees, the English Court quivered with merriement like aspen leaves. The Queen alone remained absolutely grave. If anything betrayed emotion, it was a deepened colour and a more intense solemnity. The envoys withdrew at last, with salaams the most exquisite imaginable, and then, but not till then, the Queen broke down, saying through her sobs of mirth, "But I went through with it. I did go right through with it."

The Queen's smile "played a very large part in the economy of her power." . . .

No smile was in the least like it, and no shadow of it is preserved for posterity in any one of her published likenesses. . . . It came very suddenly, in the form of a mild radiance over the whole face, a softening and a raising of the lines of the lips, a flash of kindly light beaming from the eyes. Then in another moment, it was gone, leaving behind a suffused softness, something that was the antidote to embarrassment or fear.

And of her manner :—

Without pedantry, her scheme of manner was distinctly more vieille cour than that of any one else in Europe. In itself beautifully finished, it offered positively an antiquarian interest. . . . She had no "manners" at all in the self-conscious or artificial sense. Her charm was made up of spontaneous kindness and freedom from all embarrassment, built upon this eighteenth century style or manner, which she had inherited or adopted. She acted as a great lady of 1790 might have acted, not because she set herself to have good "manners," but because that was how great ladies, trained as she had been trained, naturally behaved, with a perfect grace based upon unsuspecting simplicity.

Of her last visit to Ireland we learn how she characteristically refused an escort of cavalry, and how—

She desired, almost passionately, to be loved by the Irish ; and when she went to Dublin in 1890 she believed that they did love her. She felt the stimulus of success in pleasing, but she acknowledged that the work required of her was twice as great as it had been on her earlier visit. She did her very best to win the affection of the Irish, but the effort fatigued her much. She was carried through it all by her enjoyment of the wit and gaiety of the crowd. She kept on saying, "How I delight in the Irish !"

The whole paper is a fine analytical study of an intensely interesting and lovable character. The Quarterly is a good number in other respects which we have not space to touch on. A "Kumassi" article brings into relief the points at issue between the rescue party and the besieged, represented respectively by the books, already reviewed by us, of Captain Biss and Lady Hodgson.

Two articles in the Edinburgh arrest attention. In one of them the reviewer discusses certain unimaginary love letters, from those of Abélard and Héloïse to those of Balzac and Prosper Mérimée, in order to lead up to a criticism of "An English-woman's Love Letters." It is a strong criticism, and unfavourable :—

They lack the reserve of the artificiality of form which enables the poet to do all, and more than all, which is here attempted, without outraging what Charles Lamb would have designated as "decorum." They lack the lightness of hand—"la légèreté est sa décence," a critic says somewhere in connexion with another art—which might have excused the want of emotional drapery. They lack most of all the elementary perception of the force of reticence as the only possible suggestion of passion at its supreme height. Of the uses of silence—

Silence, thou that art

Floodgate of the deeper heart—

they know nothing.

The other notable article is on "M. Maurice Maeterlinck, Moralist and Artist," and has some striking remarks on Maeterlinck's sadness :—

As an artist he has penetrated his dreams—his art—with sadness. But his sadnesses are not, any more than those of a Verlaine or a Villon, the sadnesses of the Salve Regina, of the exiles filii Hæve, who, if they regarded themselves as prisoners in this vale of tears, yet held in secure hands of faith the key of their prison-house. Sadness—M. Maeterlinck himself has reiterated the lesson—even the greatest, does not mould the strong man, but is moulded by him. It is as clay to the potter; out of it he fashions the weights or the wings of life. M. Maeterlinck has fashioned the weights. His shield of life is a field sable; its flag floats for ever at half-mast high. The escutcheon of love is a twilight emblazoned with dying flames; Death might be imaged as a gateway into the mist; the record of Time is marked as the hours of the dial only by the shadow that passes until the shadow itself is lost in the night. M. Maeterlinck is so great an artist that it is impossible to forgive him for not being a greater.

Actualities are represented in the number by articles on "Our Naval Position," "Ministers and Directorships," and "The Nation and the Army"—an examination of Mr. Brodrick's plans.

The article in the English Historical Review which makes the widest appeal is devoted to the memory of the distinguished founder of the Review, Mandell Creighton, Bishop of London. It is written by Mr. Richard Garnett, and is an article of grave criticism, not of personal reminiscences. The especial virtue which Mr. Garnett claims for the Bishop as an historian is naturally that of impartiality; and what he says on that head is excellent criticism:—

We may well claim for the Bishop that he has, beyond all the historians of his day, exemplified the virtue of impartiality. Whether this should always be made as much the pole star of the historian's course as he has made it is a question admitting of some discussion. It is impossible in the case of an epical history, when some stirring theme like the revolt of the Dutch against the Spaniards or the rebellion of 1745 is conceived in the spirit of a poem; nor is it easily practicable when the centre of the historian's canvas is occupied by some commanding figure like Gustavus Adolphus or Peter the Great, to whose renown everything else inevitably becomes subservient. Throughout Bishop Creighton's period, however, there is, in so far as his special theme of religious reform is concerned, no such commanding personage until we arrive at Luther. His incapacity for hero-worship has rendered his treatment of Luther the least satisfactory part of his work; but the defect is more than compensated by his success in dealing with the crowd of miscellaneous figures in whom an ordinary historian might have taken no interest. It is not too much to say that there is no one of the multitude, ecclesiastic or statesman, warrior or scholar, devoid of some touch to show that the Bishop understood and appreciated him—not in virtue of a creative imagination, which Creighton did not possess in any eminent measure, but by the endowment of a lively sympathy with human nature, the same gift which made him beloved and efficient as the ruler of a diocese.

It would be hard to beat the Pall Mall Magazine for May as an example of an illustrated monthly. The pictures are as varied as possible and all of excellent quality. Mr. Baumer's Academy types, set in an article by Mr. Spielmann on "Behind the Scenes at the Royal Academy," and the illustrations by various artists to an amusing parley by Mrs. E. T. Cook on London noises are full of delight. And Mr. Halkett (the editor) is at his best in his political caricatures. Some of the letterpress—Mr. Meredith's Poem, Mr. Leslie Stephen on "Romance and Science," Lady Cork on "Etiquette," for instance—we did not find quite so attractive as it looks; and we are not sure we were not more interested in an article on submarine boats. Mr. William Archer seems lately to have had tea with Mrs. Craigie and to have talked with her for half-an-hour about women novelists, Shakespeare's female characters, and other things. They both thought the conversation had been so brilliant that the world ought to know of it. So Mr. Archer has written it all down, and Mrs. Craigie has helped him with the loan of two photographs of herself. There is also much fiction and poetry (besides Mr. Meredith's) in the magazine, and we forgot to mention a capital article on "The Earth's Earliest Inhabitants." In its get-up this is a most seductive magazine.

Correspondence.

THE LATE BISHOP OF OXFORD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In June, 1879, it was my privilege to present for an honorary degree at Cambridge the late Bishop of Oxford, who at that time had recently been appointed to succeed Dr. Lightfoot as Canon of St. Paul's, and Mr. E. A. Freeman as Professor at Oxford. The Bishop was, I believe, the last survivor of the ten distinguished persons who received honorary degrees on that occasion, the list including Sir Frederic Leighton, Mr. Browning, Professor H. J. S. Smith, and Professor Huxley. Before selecting suitable points for eulogy in the case of Professor Stubbs, I naturally consulted Mr. Henry Bradshaw, and I also ventured to write to Mr. Freeman. It occurs to me that the hitherto unpublished letters, which I then received from the latter, may be welcomed at the present time by the many admirers of Bishop Stubbs, while they may also have an incidental interest as giving Mr. Freeman's views on Latin versus English as the appropriate language of academic laudation, and on Willelmus versus Gulielmus as the correct Latin equivalent of the Christian name of the late Bishop.

Yours faithfully,

Merton-house, Cambridge.

J. E. SANDYS.

Somerleaze, Wells, Somerset, May 15th, 1879.

My dear Sir,

The life of the Great Master has not been an exciting one; he lives mainly in his works. I have watched him ever since he succeeded me in my Fellowship in 1848, and I think I found out what was in him before anybody else did; so that I have sometimes said that, if I were to change my name, I should take that of the Puritan divine Knewstubs. I don't know what "Men of the Time" says; but surely you know (May 17th), besides the Select Charters, the Constitutional History and the great Prefaces. Suppose you expand into your best Latin my epigram in the note, at vol. v., p. 652, of the Norman Conquest. You may add that nobody else ever did so much work with so little fuss, and that I don't believe that he could make a mistake, if he tried. It is said that he has caught himself in mistakes; but I never caught him in one; once or twice when I had thought I had done so, I found that what he said was said advisedly, and that he could give a reason for it. He just knows everything, and has it all at his fingers' ends. When I was travelling with him in Germany, I thought it something if I knew my Emperors right; but at each place he could tell the Dukes and Bishops and Landgraves, and I believe the Burgermeisters to boot. Then, nobody knows how he gets his knowledge, as he is not commonly seen getting it. Some think it is revealed to him in his sleep, like Eadward the Confessor, the more so as he sleeps more than other men. Read some of his portraits, say, Henry II., in the Prefaces, and judge whether he does not flog us all round.

I said that I knew Stubbs. I found him out one Trinity Monday evening, walking in the Collège garden. I knew he was a clever fellow, but I did not know that he was anything more than a hundred other clever fellows. But he began to talk of Henry V., so that I perceived that he was some great one, and blew his trumpet ever after. Men mocked much for a while, but I fancy they have come to believe in the end.

He is of Yorkshire, and fond of it and proud of it; you can see it in his books; he would have liked of all things to be Dean of Ripon. He got a first class from Christ Church in 1848, and was elected Fellow of Trinity that year. In 1850 he took the living of Navestock in Essex, and hid himself for a season. The Chichele electors thought him a less light than Captain Burrows; but the late Lord Derby was wiser and gave him the Regius Professorship. He was for a good while Archbishop Longley's librarian at Lambeth. Oriel made him a Fellow; now (May 18th), he is Canon Residentiary of Saint Paul's. He is a wonderful man; he seems to have no kind of ambition; but just does a thing when he has to do it better than anybody else. You may add that he is the greatest master of irony since Sokrates the elder.

Here is, perhaps, enough to put into Latin, and wind up "duco ad vos Willelmum Stubbs." Don't offend his ears with the hideous "Gulielmum," which has no business out of Sicily, and was never heard in England or Normandy. But "Stubbs" might be, according to some analogies, not unfittingly enlarged into "Estubium"; but in my character of Knewstubs, I like the original better, and I know by experience that the great monosyllable comes down well at the end of a sentence. "Procumbit humi bos."

But what fine Latin you and Jebb both make. It is almost as fine as Cassiodorus. I don't mean that I ever could make Latin as fine as that: but I once could do something nearer to it than I can now. I believe I could make a Latin speech, if I were allowed the use of "videtur quod," &c., not if, according to a rule given me by Robinson Ellis, I am forbidden to say "episcopus" and "imperialis," because, forsooth, Cicero, who never saw the things, never used the names. But I can make a Saturnian rime now and then, and I believe that Cornelius Lucius Scipio Gnaivod patre prognatus would have understood Walter Map, as well as he would have understood Lucan—which last I can't.

I am not quite sure whether to put Rev. or Esq., and nobody likes to be called wrong either way, so I put an evasion.

Believe me yours truly,

(Signed) EDWARD A. FREEMAN.

The Public Orator, St. John's College, Cambridge.

London, June 19th, 1879.

My dear Sir,—Many thanks for your λόγια πανηγυρικοί. I gave the other copy to Bryce, who had to go through the same work yesterday. But the papers say that you were there. 'Twas pity to lose the parallel with St. Edward, which might have been enlarged to take in St. Edward's one vision of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus. But please remember another time Willelmus—all those l's. They say I am a pedant in spelling—I never found it out myself. I always go in for bad spelling, like Lindprand, and then one learns something. So I always go in for barbarous Latin, Universitas to wit, rather than Academia. The only evil is that so many have fancied that Universitas means πανπιστημόνιον. I once saw a degree-conferring at Durham. It was in English. Now for that purpose our blessed mother tongue does not do. The Warden had no manner of issimus for the new Doctor. You can't say "most learned, most valiant, most harmonious man," and he had nothing to call him but "Sir."

Yours very truly,

SHAKESPEARE'S "EXCRESCENCES."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—A propos of Mr. Walkley's remarks, in a recent issue of Literature, on what he calls the "excrecences" of Shakespeare's plays, will you permit me to express a little astonishment, and a good deal of incredulity—mingled, I confess, with some admiration for the ingeniousness of the theory which he puts forward?

His explanation of everything which he finds contradictory in the characters, or extraneous to the plays, is shortly this: that Shakespeare, happening on some thesis or problem which interests him, pours out his whole "say" on the subject, regardless of its fitness or unfitness in the mouth of the character to whom he assigns it. He instances as an example the famous "advice" of Polonius to his son; and suggests that Shakespeare here pushes Polonius from his stool, and pours out, from the treasury of his own mind, the last word on the matter. Of course, there is a difficulty in reconciling, at first sight, the fatuity of Polonius with the proverbial perfection of his counsel to Laertes; and critics and commentators have written volumes on it. But I have never seen nor heard of any explanation at all resembling Mr. Walkley's. To most of us Shakespeare is the one dramatist of the world able to turn out men and women who live, move, and have their being, almost, if one may say so, outside the control of their creator. They live out their lives to the full—with all the follies and contradictions, the flaws and starts, the grandeur and littleness that have for ever constituted the puzzle of life and the theme of the dramatist. But we always believed that amid these changes and contradictions they preserved a special unity and truth to themselves; and that this, in fact, was the essential point of Shakespeare's, I had almost said, divinity of power, that he created and breathed life into real human beings and that there was nothing of the puppet about his creatures. If this be so, can any one believe that such a dramatist should so far forget the end of playing as to make his characters the mouthpiece of his own views or convictions—and not merely so, but that he should thrust these views and convictions on a character in whose mouth they may be pointless or grotesque? According to this theory, Osric, had the chances of the play brought the painful riddle of existence before him, might have spoken "To be, or not to be"; for we are to take it that, the occasion presenting itself, Shakespeare could not resist the temptation of exhausting himself on the theme, whether an Osric or a Hamlet was to be his spokesman.

There are no doubt passages (mostly descriptive) in Shakespeare, which every one sees to be "excrecences" and as such indefensible. To go no farther than "Hamlet," the Queen's speech is a glaring example. But Mr. Walkley's theory of the imperious need of self-expression does not apply to these.

Reverting to the character of Polonius, I know that most people accept Coleridge's version—that he is the personified memory of wisdom no longer actually possessed. But are the precepts which he gives Laertes so perfect a proof of wisdom as is usually assumed? Are they really the golden rules of life for a noble and chivalrous youth entering on the stage of the world? Or are they rather the base, worldly, commonplace counsels which one would precisely expect from an old courtier—a Chesterfield or a Polonius? And does not Laertes, bred on these counsels, come to show himself worthy of them? With this view of the character and of the precepts, does not the difficulty disappear?

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

R. CASSAN GREER.

ADAPTED QUOTATIONS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Two other unintentional misquotations have occurred to me. In Genesis, iii., 19, the words are, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." But the vox populi has improved the vox Dei into "the sweat of thy brow." So, also, when we use the apologetic phrase "'Tis their nature to," we are apt to forget that "too" is the final word in the original. The ascription of this elliptical vulgarism to Dr. Watts is certainly hard.

But I agree with you in thinking that, when the quotation does not purport to be exact, and especially when the original author is unknown, a free range should be allowed to the not altogether seruum pecus of adapters. In a world of change and generally of improvement, why should witty sayings be left in stagnation? I think it was Hayward who pointed out the gradual process by which the New Zealander visiting the ruins of London assumed the artistic shape into which he has been thrown by Macaulay. So, too, what was originally said of fire has been applied to religion by Mark Pattison—it is “a good servant, but a bad master.” Bright’s dictum to the effect that the Whigs had a place for every man and that every man was in his place gave, as it were, a new edge to an old saw.

One of your correspondents complains that the popular phrase “Money is the root of all evil” is a misquotation. No doubt the adapted saying is inaccurate, more demonstrably so even than Horace’s condemnation of

Aurum irreperitum, et sic melius situm
Cum terra celat.

But, after all, even the love of money cannot fairly be taxed with “all that human hearts endure.” And of the exaggerative utterance the more concise form is handier and, so to say, more circulable, and thus in a sense more proverbial, than the original form. In view of such examples as the foregoing, I am tempted to adapt yet further the adapted quotation, and to describe sundry saws and proverbs as embodying “the wisdom of many and the wit of a few.”

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

LIONEL A. TOLLEMACHE.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE GUNPOWDER PLOT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your reviewer of Father Taunton’s “History of the Jesuits in England,” who appears to think that the reference to Father Garnet of a passage in Macbeth—which dates back at least to Malone—is a new discovery, goes on to observe that “This is worth comment, because one of the chief arguments employed by Father Gerard to demolish the ‘traditional story’ was that no reference to the Plot is ever made in the plays [of Shakespeare.]”

May I be allowed to say that this “argument” of mine makes its sole appearance in a brief note, which runs thus?—

It is somewhat remarkable that the universal Shakespeare should make no allusion to the Plot, beyond the doubtful reference to equivocation in Macbeth (ii. 3). He was at the time of its occurrence in the full flow of his dramatic activity.

The epithet “doubtful” appears to be amply justified. In the first place, the authenticity of the passage has been questioned or denied by eminent critics from Pope and Coleridge onwards. Secondly, whosoever the author may be, the reference to Garnet is by no means so sure as might seem from the version furnished by Father Taunton and reproduced by your reviewer, which expedites the argument in a manner considerably more ingenious than convincing. I subjoin the original, the portion here placed within square brackets being represented in Father Taunton’s version by three dots.

“Here’s a knocking, indeed! If a man were porter of hell-gate, he should have old turning the key. (Knocking without.) Knock, knock, knock! Who’s there, i’ the name of Beelzebub? Here’s a farmer, that hanged himself on the expectation of plenty; [come in time; have napkins enow about you; here you’ll sweat for ’t. (Knocking without.) Knock, knock! Who’s there, in the other devil’s name?] Faith, here’s an equivocator. . . . &c.”

According to Father Taunton, the “farmer” and the “equivocator” are here the same person; and “Farmer” being an alias used by Garnet, he must be supposed to be referred to. It is clear, however, that the three dots very inadequately represent the hiatus which they bridge. The “farmer” is no more to be identified with the “equivocator,” than is the “English tailor” next introduced after a fresh bout of knocking.

Nor can it be said, as the reviewer has it, that “Farmer” was Garnet’s “favourite alias.” He was far better known as “Walley” or “Darcy.”

I remain, Sir, your faithful servant,

JOHN GERARD, S.J.

“ST. OR S.?”

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Allow me to add to what has been said by “Oxonian” that at the time the Bible was first published in English, while it was the case, as urged by Mr. Hutton, that S. was the usual abbreviation for Saint, it was also the case that D. and M. were commonly written for Doctor and Master.

This practice has led Froude (History, ch. 43, ed. 1870, v. vii. p. 261) into a curious blunder. He represents Archbishop Parker writing of “my predecessor Cranmer of blessed memory.” In a note he explains that “Parker’s words are, ‘my predecessor D. Cranmer . . . &c.’ D. is Divus, and the expression in the text is its nearest English equivalent!” Of course, “Dr. Cranmer” was all the Archbishop meant.

Yours obediently,

April 22.

ANOTHER OXONIAN.

JOHN WESLEY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In correcting one error Mr. Hood has made another. “Four hundred thousand sermons” is no doubt a mistake for “forty thousand,” but what does your correspondent mean by saying that the number of hymns John Wesley wrote “is so great as to tragically depress the student of poetry”? I believe that about twenty hymns translated from the German form the whole, or nearly the whole, of his contributions to our hymnology. Mr. Hood must have mistaken John Wesley for his brother Charles.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

Winston, Crowborough, April 22.

JOHN DENNIS.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The rush of sixpenny reprints continues unchecked, the latest publishers to swell the flood being Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co., who are making up a series from their most successful copyright novels. The first two are Lord Desart’s “Lord and Lady Piccadilly” and F. C. Phillips’ “Little Mrs. Murray.” Messrs. Chatto are making an experiment in their sixpenny series next month by including Sir Walter Besant’s “Orange Girl,” which was only published last year. This week “No. 5, John Street” has appeared in sixpenny form.

A short biography of James Chalmers, whose murder by natives in New Guinea has just been reported, was published in 1887 by Messrs. Partridge; but is now out of print. It has been brought up to date by Mr. Frank B. Broad, of the London Missionary Society, and will shortly be republished. Chalmers has himself told the story of his work in two or three books published by the Religious Tract Society.

Mr. B. H. Blackwell, of Oxford, will publish shortly “The Book of the Horace Club,” a small collection of poems by residents junior and senior of the University. The club began its existence about three years ago under the auspices of Mr. Arnold Ward, of Balliol, and his friends and contemporaries, such as Mr. John Buchan, Mr. Raymond Asquith, Mr. H. T. Baker, Mr. C. Medd, and others, and many of the pieces contained are their work, with some by older hands.

“The Lover’s Replies to an Englishwoman’s Love Letters” are to be published on May 9 by Messrs. Sampson Low, who also announce “Sketches of Booksellers of Other Days,” by Mr. E. Marston, reprinted from the Publishers’ Circular.

An anthology of poems about animals is promised by Messrs. Bell in their shilling Life and Light Series, entitled “Kith and Kin; Poems of Animal Life,” and edited by Mr. H. Salt.

Messrs. Methuen are about to issue a complete manual of horticulture by Mr. William Williamson.

The Spring Season in America.

The spring announcements of the New York publishing houses show that the list is strongest in biography, history, and general literature, and it is noticeable that as the result of a poll taken by the New York State Library among the Librarians of the State and others as to the best fifty books to be added to a village library fourteen only of the fifty are novels. In the seven which head the list the only English book is "Eleanor," by Mrs. Humphry Ward. Among works other than fiction the most popular books in the United States, to judge from the reports of twenty-one of the most important circulating libraries, seem to be the "Life and Letters of Phillips Brooks," Huxley's "Life and Letters," books on China and the Boer war, and Lord Rosebery's "Napoleon—The Last Phase." Among the new books announced from the United States are "American Poets," Bret Harte; "The Crisis," Winston Churchill; "The Fanatics," Paul Laurence Dunbar; "The Crow's Nest," Sarah Jeanette Duncan; "The Life Everlasting," John Fiske; "Diary of Hugh Gaine," Paul Leicester Ford; "The Gaze of Youth," Gelett Burgess; "Hall of Fame" (the Official Record); "French Dramatists of the Nineteenth Century," and "The Historical Novel and Other Essays," Brander Matthews; "Nineteenth Century. Review of Progress during the past 100 years," by various writers.

An effort has been made in America to remedy some of the evils of the book-trade by organization of the publishers and booksellers, and their agreement is to come into force on May 1. The plan was inaugurated at a meeting of the American Publishers' Association held on February 13. All copyrighted books first issued by American publishers after May 1, 1901, are to be published at net prices, and a recommendation is made that the retail price of a net book be printed, marked net, on a paper wrapper covering the book. The publishers undertake to sell their books only to booksellers who will maintain the retail price for one year at least, and who will not resell to other booksellers and so cut down the prices. The amount of discount to be given to booksellers is left to the individual publisher, but a general discount of 25 per cent. is suggested as a fair one. After the year has expired the publisher is allowed to buy his books back at the purchase price from any dealer who may be selling—as he might then do—at a price below the net amount. Publishers, however, are often booksellers—Putnam's, Scribner's, and Macmillan's, for instance—and where this is the case they are to sell at retail price plus the cost of postage.

Some books are not included in this scheme—school books, for instance, subscription books, and other books not published through the regular trade channels. As to books of fiction, which form about 40 per cent. of the total output in the country, and on which more than on any other class of books prices have been cut, a compromise has been effected. Individual publishers can determine each for himself whether or not he will include fiction; and he may bring some novels and not others into the scheme. It is rumoured that the majority of the association wished to include fiction in toto, but the decided stand made against this course by two or three leading publishers led to a compromise to prevent the whole scheme being wrecked. Many booksellers have protested against excluding fiction, and if the system succeeds on other books no doubt the reform will be made general. The only case in which a discount on the net price is permitted is on the sale to libraries, and for them it is not to be greater than 10 per cent. But this does not include book clubs and similar devices for obtaining books. The department stores, who do a very large bookselling business and who often make a specialty of underselling the regular houses, have been, of course, one of the chief difficulties. They are not specifically referred to, but it may be presumed that they come under the general definition of a bookseller.

Another good work accomplished by the Association is its undertaking to aid in the formation of booksellers' associations in important centres in the United States. The object of these is to secure honourable and uniform methods of business throughout the country, and a scheme has been promulgated for an "American Booksellers' Association." This is to co-operate with the Publishers' Association in adopting and maintaining some satisfactory and harmonious system of business. Upwards of 600 retail booksellers have sent in their application for membership at a fee of $2 per annum.

PROBLEM No. 161. by D. MAROTTI, Italy.

BLACK. 8 pieces.

WHITE. 7 pieces.

White to play and mate in three moves.

PROBLEM No. 161.—Competing in La Stratégie. White (7 pieces), K at K Kt 7; R at K R 8; pawns at Q Kt 4, Q Kt 5, K B 4, 5, 7. Black (8 pieces), K at Q 2; Kt at K Kt sq; B at Q 4; pawns at K Kt 4, Q B 2, Q B 3, Q Kt 3, Q R 7. White to play and win.

NOTES AND NEWS.—This year's cable match proved very attractive and even exciting. It was the sixth for the Newnes trophy, and by winning it America would have gained the trophy outright. They telegraphed that, having gathered in Aguinaldo, this chess trophy was the only thing in view. Two young players for America—Marshall and Howell—failed to take advantage of their opportunities. Mason played very brilliantly; Blackburne for the first time failed. In the result the score stood 5 all, and the match was drawn.

A grand chess congress is being organized for Whitsun holidays at Folkestone, May 27 to 30. A great variety of amateur tournaments, &c., are promised, including one open to first-class players with prizes of £10 and £6 at least. The services of several masters have been secured and one of the best of amateur meetings may be confidently expected.

Mr. Hoffer remarks of this:—"A lively and interesting game, as in the majority of cases with the counter attack 2.—P-K 4. Closer investigation is necessary to determine whether White could not have brought a sacrifice with B-B 6, pointed out below. Black's 11.—B-R 2, was not a good move, the bishop becoming imprisoned; this move was the primary cause of the loss of the game. For White, instead of 14. K-R-Q sq. 14. B-B 6, or Kt-B 6 might be considered. This must, however, be examined at leisure. Black's combination to capture the K P was faulty. Having the inferior position for the ending he should not have exchanged pieces. After 29.—B-R 7, Black's game was practically lost. White might have concluded it quicker with 32. B-B 7, followed by B-Kt 6, winning the exchange. His modus operandi was safe, but laborious. At move 63, White could have played at once B-Q 8. B-Q B 8; 64. K-Kt 7, R-Kt 8, ch; 65. K-B 8, winning easily. However, time was called on the 64th move, and Black resigned. We may add that we think the American had a winning game in the position shown in the diagram or just before. To exchange at once was ruinous.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week the first of a series of "Literature Portraits." These portraits are original photographic studies of the chief writers of the day, English and Foreign, and represent them with the surroundings in which they work.

The portraits will be accompanied by an account and appreciation of the literary work of the writer in each case, written by a critic of authority. The series will embrace not only those authors who have long achieved a recognized position, but also those younger writers whose merits and promise of achievement render them worthy of inclusion in a representative series.

There will thus be presented to the readers of Literature an original and comprehensive review of the chief figures in the literary life of the day, and of the work which they have performed. The efforts which have been made to give a unique character to the series—as regards pictorial treatment, the critical consideration of the literary work of the authors presented, and the comprehensive character of the collection—justify us, we believe, in anticipating that this announcement will be received with considerable interest. The first of the series, which will appear on May 11, will be VOL. VIII. No. 18.

Mr. W. E. Henley. Those immediately following will be Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins, Mr. Rider Haggard, Mr. Thomas Hardy, and Mr. Owen Seaman.

The proof of the excellence of a theatrical company lies in its versatility, its power of undertaking exceptional tasks without obvious effort. Mr. F. R. Benson and his company entered upon a very heavy labour when they engaged to perform twelve plays in a fortnight at Stratford-on-Avon, and the result is a striking testimony to the thoroughness of their training. The Shakespeare Festival has been an immense success. The poet's birthplace was full of visitors, the theatre was crowded, never were so many flowers laid on the grave, never have the walls of the memorial building witnessed greater enthusiasm than on last Saturday evening, when the Festival fortnight came to an end.

* * * *

The cycle of historical plays was given for the first time, it is believed, in this country. The York and Lancaster dramas, Richard II., Henry IV Part II., Henry V., Henry VI Part II., and Richard III., unroll rich pages of our history and give striking pictures of social life—of Elizabethan social life at any rate—with Shallow and Silence, Hume and Southwell and their accomplices in witchcraft, Jack Cade and his followers, the trial-by-battle scene in Richard II., Falstaff, Pistol and his roystering crew. King John was added as a kind of prologue to the later plays, for which it served acceptably, though many would have preferred to see the first part of Henry IV. in its stead. The great thing, however, is that, thanks to Mr. Benson, we have made a beginning with the method in which the histories ought to be acted, and made some advance in a real appreciation of Shakespeare's genius.

* * * *

No one who knows his "In Memoriam" well can fail to remember the splendid lines (canto cv.) beginning:—

To-night ungather'd let us leave
This laurel, let this holly stand:
We live within the stranger's land;
And strangely falls our Christmas eve.

Our father's dust is left alone
And silent under other snows:
There in due time the woodbine blows,
The violet comes, but we are gone.

This is not good enough for Mr. Robinson, B.D., who, encouraged by the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press, undertakes, in a new edition of the poem, to "explain" each canto. He gives us Tennyson rechauffée thus:—

It is some gain that change of place justifies the abandonment of the old and somewhat incongruous festivities. Let the petty cares of life be kept in abeyance for a while on a night that should be sacred to the memories of the past; but for the rest let there be a stillness in which the mind may turn unhindered to the glad thought of the great future with its slowly coming good.

This is to murder poetry with a vengeance. It is melancholy to watch the beauty of the lines vanishing under the burden of these unctuous periods. Few poems have been more ruthlessly "explained" than "In Memoriam." It is a depressing practice, but it may be useful for a school exercise, or in the case of really obscure writers like Browning. Tennyson is not obscure, and, moreover, if any poet ever did, he thought in verse, and it is cruel to drag him into the mire of pretentious prose. Mr. Robinson forgets that you cannot "explain" a work of art; but he seems quite satisfied that the public are looking to him to find out what Tennyson in his halting attempts to express himself in verse really meant. Our pedagogic commentator is at his best, perhaps, with canto vi. :—

One writes, that "Other friends remain,"
That "Loss is common to the race"—
And common is the commonplace,
And vacant chaff well meant for grain.

Letters begin to arrive [remarks Mr. Robinson], but the conventional consolations singularly fail. To say that others also suffer is only to increase the tragedy; while to hint that substitutes may yet be found to fill the vacant place is utterly to misunderstand what we were to one another.

This is, we suppose, "well meant for grain"; and it is certainly amusing; but it is not the way to treat "In Memoriam." A pretty little edition, by-the-by, of the text of "In Memoriam" has just been published by Mr. Brimley Johnson, with Watts' Love and Death as a frontispiece.

The doom of another batch of literary landmarks has lately been sealed. First the old Black Bull tavern in Holborn, where Mrs. Gamp nursed Mr. Lewsome in partnership with Betsy Prig—"Nussed together, turn and turn about, one off, one on." Then the "Red Lion," at Henley-on-Thames, in which Shenstone was said to have written familiar lines which Dr. Johnson quoted to maintain his thesis that "there is nothing which has yet been contrived by man by which so much happiness is produced as by a good tavern or inn"; though other authorities have claimed that honour for the Red Lion Inn at Henley-in-Arden. Lately, too, Burford Bridge Hotel, near Box Hill, where Keats finished "Endymion" towards the end of 1817, has been in the market—whether for demolition or not, we cannot say. Over the coffee room is a window with ivy creeping over it; and an auctioneering paper is responsible for the statement that the poet sat in that window "many a summer morning and evening, and there it was that he wrote the larger part of his poem." The Summer of 1817, however, was a thing of the past when Keats settled at Burford Bridge to finish the poem which he had begun in the Spring, and to make a special study of Shakespeare's Sonnets; for in a letter to Benjamin Bailey, dated November 5th, he wrote :—"At present I am just arrived at Dorking—to change the scene—change the Air, and give me a spur to wind up my Poem, of which there are wanting 500 lines. . . . Direct Burford Bridge, near Dorking."

With the sixth volume of the history of the Royal Navy, now nearly ready, it is time to congratulate Mr. Laird Clowes and his publishers, as well as the eminent naval writers who have collaborated, on the approaching completion of what Captain Mahan—in writing to wish Messrs. Sampson Low "all the success your nation ought to give you as a matter of patriotism"—described as a "tremendous undertaking." The work is a modest enterprise compared with the great "Dictionary of National Biography," yet the two have several points in common; they are both of national importance; they are the only comprehensive works of their kind in the kingdom, and they have had similar difficulties to contend with.

The historians of the past fought shy of the brilliant record of the British Navy, and the few attempts made to tell the whole story were failures. Pepys designed such a history but only succeeded in collecting some of the materials for it. Captain Schomberg's "Naval Chronology," published in five volumes in 1802, gave a summary of events from the time of the Romans to the Treaty of Peace in 1802, but it is untrustworthy. Captain Brenton's "Naval History of Great Britain, 1783 to 1837," published in two volumes in 1837, is too prejudiced to be of much value, and Sir Nicolas Nicolas only lived to bring his ambitious work—which was to give the history of the British Navy in about eighteen or twenty volumes—down to the year 1422. Mr. Laird Clowes has taken up the work upon different lines, and has brought it to a successful issue in spite of ill-health and enforced residence, during most of the year, in the high Alps. He has received invaluable assistance from his American and English collaborators, and useful help at times from many other authorities, including Mr. Goschen and Prince Louis of Battenberg. Mr. R. B. Marston, too, as the editor says, "has combined the good offices of a friend with those of a publisher, and has been indefatigable in keeping me informed of all fresh publications, newly-printed correspondence, and out-of-the-way entries in booksellers' catalogues." The forthcoming volume carries the story down from Waterloo to the present day, and includes an account of the part played by the Naval Brigade in the defence of Ladysmith. The first volume was published just four years ago.

CUCKOO SONG.

BY THE LATE R. D. BLACKMORE.

[The MS. of the song was given by Mr. Blackmore to his sister, the late Mrs. C. E. Faunthorpe, whose family kindly allow us to publish it.]

In the Spring morning early,
When the light glistens hazy,
On the meadow gold pearly
With celandine and daisy;
I sit and sing "Cuckoo,"
And echo rings "look, ho!"

In the gentle noon shower,
When the branches hang dew bells,
And the wet hazels bower
My cuckoo-pint and blue bells;
By the echo forsook, oh,
I sit and sing Cuckoo!

In the afternoon splendour,
When the white cloud reposes,
And the May wind is tender
To the hawthorns and roses;
I sit and sing Cuckoo,
In the cool ingle nook, oh!

When the calm evening wooeth,
And the thrush sings "Adieu, love,"
And the turtle-dove cooeth
Of a thing he calls "true love";
Their tale if I brook, oh,
I reply with a "Cuckoo."

Till the gay smile and motley
Of the Spring cease to beckon,
And the stern sun looks hotly
For the fruit he shall reckon;
Then it doesn't suit Cuckoo
To be brought so to book, oh!

But away to the far lands,
Or a quiet tree hollow;
Till the Spring hath fresh garlands,
And the new echoes follow
The egg I forsook, oh,
A mellow young Cuckoo!

R. D. B.

Among the classics redressed which come to us in so copious a stream, the book of Gilbert White, which has run into well over eighty editions, occupies a notable place; and a new issue of it appears in our book-list this week. The Bookman in the Fields. This is just the season of the year when one will like to handle a freshly-issued White's "Selborne," whether it be, like the one just published, a "pocket Classic" or a stout and sumptuous work like Mr. Bowdler Sharpe's or Grant Allen's. White began the modern literature of the fields; but the poetry of the spring echoes through English song from the first Nature Lyric of the twelfth century—
Summer is a-coming in, loudé sing Cuckoo.

Groweth seed, and bloweth mead, and springeth the wood new,
Ewé bleateth after lánb; loweth after calvé cow;

Bullock sterteth, bucke verteth, merrie sing Cuckoo—down to the song of that true country lover, Mr. R. D. Blackmore, which may be read on the opposite page. We much fear, however, despite the popularity of White's "Selborne" as an English Classic, that the echo of nature poetry is becoming a faint one. In a land like this, so full of colour and pleasant rustic life and fashioned in such gentle harmonious outlines, a love of the country is not likely to die out; but there are certainly indications that it is not so keen as it was. The ease with which one can get out of England makes one forget the fact that nature is in no part of the world so sympathetic, and the bicycle and the golf links, though they take their votaries into the country, do very little to teach them its charm. It is refreshing to meet so pleasant a writer as the author of a book just published called "Romantic Essex," who understands how English country should be explored, and is prepared for a succession of revelations and interesting experiences in a common field path—"two villages," he says, "with a footpath between them—that for me is England." The vogue of country life was, we are aware, until recently a very marked one in the publishers' lists. It has been a little interfered with by the war; and perhaps that is not wholly to be regretted, for it was becoming a trifle artificial—the wild flowers were being sedulously cultivated into conservatory specimens. The enthusiasm for the woods and the birds was in danger of becoming a literary one only. In the heyday of Richard Jefferies we were overwhelmed with it. Richard Jefferies, if the expression is not irreverent to his memory, struck oil. The public wanted more, and no daily or weekly or monthly periodical could afford to dispense with the regulation "Country article." The great daily organs of political opinion, whether Liberal or Conservative, found it necessary to publish leading articles beginning after this style;—"A green beetle is crawling up a blade of grass close to my elbow. The yellow reflection of the sun's rays on his armour-plated back is extremely curious." Still for our part we regret the change of fashion. William Black did as much as any one to cultivate in his readers an eye for landscape, and hardly one has carried on his tradition. In the last century the poets opened a new world to all who had an eye for nature. There is little of this to be found in the Classic and introspective poets of to-day. Mr. Kipling is not Classic or introspective; yet we do not picture him versifying on a vernal wood, rhapsodizing over a skylark or a cloud, or developing a tranquil and remote Wordsworthianism. It is to the credit of the Laureate that his best utterances have been inspired by a real love and knowledge of nature. We doubt whether Wordsworth is much studied at the present moment; the public do not seem to want him reprinted. But he undoubtedly has left his impress on the view taken by the English mind of natural scenery; just as Ruskin has for thousands given a new significance to natural forms, and taught a new method of observation. If there is less ostentatious worship of nature among the writers of the day, and if there is much in our social life which interferes with such a worship, yet there is in our best writers (as, for instance, Mrs. Humphry Ward and Mr. Maurice Hewlett) a true feeling for nature as the background of human life, and the love of the country is, we would fain hope, far too deep-seated in the English heart to suffer any permanent or serious diminution.

Personal Views.

THE TEACHING OF LITERATURE.

The republication of some essays* by Mr. Churton Collins, who has fought long and hard for the establishment of Chairs of English Literature at our older Universities, has once more raised the interesting question, Can literature be taught? Mr. Andrew Lang has given us his view of the matter in a recent number of the Pilot, and given it with his usual trenchancy and humour. Mr. Lang's view is that literature cannot be taught. It seems to me, I confess, that bating the humour and the trenchancy Mr. Lang's case might be stronger; and as his name on such a subject must carry weight, it may be worth while for those who hold the opposite view to get people to look behind the humour to the arguments. The arguments may be summarized as follows:—

- (1) Mr. Lang himself was not taught literature, and yet knows it.
- (2) Shakespeare, Spenser, Milton, Herrick, Shelley, Thackeray, Tennyson were not taught literature, and yet were successful in producing it.
- (3) The poems written since literature began to be taught—e.g., the works of Messrs. Binyon and Phillips, are not better than those of the poets above rehearsed.
- (4) Mr. Lang's own writings are neither worse nor better in consequence of his never having been taught literature.
- (5) When Mr. Lang was at school, no one was needed to say "Observe, this is very fine," and nobody was so fatuous as to do so.
- (6) A man is born to appreciate literature or to detest it; and teaching can make no difference.

Now, with all respect, I should like to point out that the second, third, and fourth of these arguments are beside the mark, because by "teaching literature" neither Mr. Collins, nor any one else, means teaching the art of making literature, but teaching an appreciation of literature already in existence. Mr. Lang would not, I think, maintain that the classical teaching in our schools and colleges is for the purpose of begetting a new race of Greek and Latin writers. Why, then, should the teaching of English literature be supposed to aim at producing English writers? Perhaps I have entirely missed the point of Mr. Lang's references to Shakespeare and Mr. Binyon; but as I understand them they are beside the question. The first and fifth arguments would have weight only on the supposition that Mr. Lang's intelligence was not above the average; which is a plain absurdity. There remains, therefore, only number six, which by implication divides humanity, so far as literature is concerned, into incapables and geniuses; those who cannot, and those who need not, be taught. The bearing of Mr. Lang's dichotomy upon the question of teaching literature will best be seen by transferring it to some other branch of human study, such as natural science, or mathematics. "A man is born to appreciate mathematics or to detest it; and teaching can make no difference." Abolish, therefore, all mathematical professorships, and exclude the subject from all curricula, from the Board school up to the Universities. The practical answer would be that teaching is required for that large section of the community who are neither geniuses nor incapables, but something between. Why should it not be so with literature?

* "Ephemera Critica" (Constable).

That there is a very large body of people with some taste for letters, but very badly in need of teaching, is shown by the popularity of certain novelists whom people whose taste has had more training find intolerable. The readers of Miss Corelli, to take an obvious instance, do not detest literature; they love it; but their love is not according to knowledge. If these persons had been taught, like Mr. Lang and Mr. Collins, in the Oxford school of Literæ Humaniores, they would know better than to pin their faith where they do. But the Oxford training, argues Mr. Lang, consisted in "reading the best literature, and reading for human pleasure." That is true enough; but were there no teachers involved in the process? When I was an undergraduate there were teachers at Oxford to whom that generation owed more than it would be easy to acknowledge. Perhaps the very best men would have done what they did, and been what they were, unaided, but with the rank and file it was not so. And even the best men would probably own their debt to such teachers as Mr. Lewis Nettleship, Mr. Arthur Sidgwick, and Mr. Henry Butcher.

That taste is really modified by teaching we may convince ourselves by observing what great changes in taste have come about in literary matters, and how they have come about. How did Wordsworth, Keats, Browning win their way into such popularity as they have achieved? In each case it was by the effort of a few men who took the pains to teach public opinion; who were "fatuous" enough, in Mr. Lang's phrase, to say "Observe, this is very fine," and to keep on saying it. And consider how uncomfortable the position would be if teaching could make no impression upon taste; if a man was born to appreciate a certain kind of literature, and teaching could make no difference—how uncomfortable both for authors and for critics. No author who was a person of genius and left the beaten track could ever get recognition; the first unsympathetic judgment of contemporaries would remain the final judgment of posterity. And the critic's case would be even more deplorable. If his function in the commonwealth is not to teach appreciation, he has none; and if appreciation cannot be taught, criticism becomes an idle ploughing of the sand, which no sane and self-respecting man should indulge in. But if Mr. Lang has, as I am convinced, performed times without number the important task of forming and correcting opinion as to the merit or demerit of contemporary authors, sometimes by the despised process of saying, "Observe, this is very fine," why should he deny to criticism a similar function in regard to our older authors? Young students need directing to what is good; they need showing why it is good, as far as this is possible; and they want some help in realizing and revivifying the work before them, so that the impression it makes on their mind may be as near as possible to what the author intended. It is, speaking roughly, in this triple process that the teaching of literature consists.

Of these tasks, the second and third are far from easy even for persons of taste; and that is why professed literary criticism so often resolves itself into amiable or picturesque prattling about and about a subject, and why school teachers seek refuge in philology or some apparatus of parallel passages, or the like. Both Mr. Collins and Mr. Lang point indignant fingers at the editions of Shakespeare's plays edited by Mr. Aldis Wright, of Cambridge, and published at the Oxford Press, because the comments they supply are almost wholly philological; and most people would agree, even those who, like myself, think a dictionary good reading, that these editions are quite unfit for schoolboys, whom they could only disgust. Perhaps Mr. Collins overrates their present influence. Mr. Lang, however, tells us that a young friend said to him lately—"We don't learn Shakespeare, we learn Clarendon Press notes"; and he adds that it is in the notes and not in the plays that boys are examined. The charge is too sweeping. It would be interesting to know for what examination Mr. Lang's young friend was preparing himself. I am told that the authorities of the Cambridge Local Examination prescribe the Clarendon Press edition for their examinations; and if that is the fact, I should rejoice to hear that their candidates had taught them in return with (more material) "thorns of the wilderness and briers," as Gideon taught the elders of Succoth. But if the boy in question was a public school boy, making ready to present himself, as the custom is, for the Universities' certificate in English, I should like to have seen his face when, after a diet of Clarendon Press notes, he found himself face to face with the paper. Speaking from a dozen years' experience I should estimate the marks he would gain at five per cent. Not content with casting universal reproach upon examinations, Mr. Lang proceeds to attack the Oxford teachers. "People at Oxford," he says, "compelled by the public to teach literature, and not caring for literature, knowing too that literature cannot be taught, teach some literary history, some philology, and prose about Polacks and Petards." As Mr. Lang has made some quotations about Polacks and Petards from the Clarendon Press Shakespeare, it looks as if he had forgotten that these editions of Shakespeare are made in Cambridge. If not, one wonders what definite information lies behind his very injurious statement. From my knowledge of the lecturers in the Oxford school of English literature, I can assure Mr. Lang that they both care for literature, and believe that it can be taught; and if in a "personal view" it is permitted to be egotistical, I can also assure him that whenever I have lectured for that school myself I have found more important things to prose about than philology or literary history, or even Petards and Polacks.

Apart, however, from the particular charge, which is unfounded, I do not wish to deny that there is a danger of these things being allowed to interfere with the teaching of literature. The danger is real and great, and Mr. Lang and Mr. Collins deserve our thanks for so emphatically calling attention to it. There are other enemies too, not one of the least being the pedantry of the parallel passage. A typical offender here is Mr. Collins himself. Whether he was hypnotised by the Clarendon Press, or whatever was the reason, his edition of "Samson Agonistes," published by those bold, bad "people at Oxford," is about as bad a book for teaching purposes as I have seen. To give a single example of the note pedantic. Milton writes quite simply and intelligibly of the blind Samson—

Thou art become (O worst imprisonment!)
The dungeon of thyself; thy soul,
Imprison'd now indeed,
In real darkness of the body dwells.

Upon which Mr. Collins thinks it judicious to comment as follows:—

The idea of the body being the prison of the soul was common with the Platonists of ancient times. So Virgil, Æn. VI. 733-4, thus speaks of men while in the body. "Hinc metuunt cupiuntque, dolent gaudentque, neque auras Pros-piciunt, clausi tenebris et carcere cæco." Cf. also what Porphyry says of Plotinus, Life of Plotinus, Cap. 1, "ἐπεὶ μὲν αἰσχυρομένην ὄρεν ἐν σώματι εἶν."

Now, even allowing that the poor wretch of a schoolboy ought to be able to construe the Greek, what is Porphyry to him, or he to Plotinus? But the very sight of that piece of learning in the notes will make him give it an attention it does not deserve; and all the attention given to the notes is so much diverted from the text.* The instinct, therefore, of the teacher of literature is to avoid all such irrelevancies, which both distract and disgust his pupils, by putting into their hands a plain text without notes. All words that need explanation he will explain; any parallel that is really illuminative he can supply; but he will not consider that in either of these things lies his main task. His task, when a poem or a play is before him, is to make it live in the imagination of the student as it lived in the imagination of the writer. He will never be ashamed of saying again and again—Observe, observe. And he will find that his pupils learn to use their eyes by practice in the field of literature, just as a soldier learns scouting on the veldt.

H. C. BEECHING.

*This remark has an application to commentators as well as to their victims. I am not reviewing Mr. Collins' edition of "Samson," but considering the whips and scorpions with which in his "Ephemera Critica" he chastises Mr. Gosso for inaccuracies, it is, perhaps, not unduly vindictive to point out that the critic should come under his own lash, for the notes contain two blunders in paraphrase so amazing that only Mr. Collins himself could find epithets to qualify them. The worst comes in the note on "Thought Extinguished" in line 1,689. "This—the Latin ablative absolute—thought having been extinguished. Milton is fond of this idiom." "Of course," as Mr. Collins would say, "a fourth form boy would know" that the right paraphrase is "supposed to be extinguished"; thought being not a noun, but a past participle.—H. C. B.

THE CULT OF FINE BINDINGS.

[See Plate of Designs for Book Covers presented with this number.]

An illustrated article on the modern tendencies of case binding, or "cloth work," appeared in Literature at the beginning of December last; this week we propose to deal with the more interesting branch of the industry—binding in leather.

The cult of fine bindings in England has made remarkable progress since William Morris and Mr. Cobden-Sanderson roused the first signs of the new enthusiasm on the subject. Previously the study of bookbinding had been comparatively neglected, but in recent years so much has been written upon the art and its history that everybody who knows anything about books can hardly help knowing something about fine bindings too—a welcome change from the ignorance and indifference displayed in the past. "In the last century," writes Mr. Gordon Duff in his "Early Printed Books" (1893), "no regard whatever seems to have been paid to old bindings; the very fact of their being old prejudiced librarians against them; if they became damaged or worn they were not repaired, but destroyed, and the book rebound." One occasionally hears of similar instances even now, and there is at least one binder to-day who boasts a private collection of rare old bindings which he has been instructed at various times to rip off and replace with something more modern. But this rarely happens nowadays; the excellent lectures and writings on the subject by Mr. Cyril Davenport—who, by the way, is contributing an important article on bookbinding to the supplementary volume of the "Encyclopædia Britannica"—and the works of other authorities, have not been published in vain. Bookbinding it is almost superfluous to explain, has preserved its rank as a fine art in England ever since Roger Pain raised it from the low position into which it had fallen in the latter half of the eighteenth century; it is the widespread appreciation of fine bindings that is of comparatively recent growth. Booklovers, who did not dream of such a thing ten or a dozen years ago, now like to have at least a few books bound with unique designs, richly tooled and often elaborately inlaid. You can easily spend fifty guineas in this way upon one volume, which means, perhaps, £2 or £3 for materials and the rest for workmanship—the work, of course, being all done by hand. New books, as well as old, find their way into these sumptuous covers—the publications of the Kelmscott and Vale Presses, for instance; the charming reprints of the classics in limited editions which the publishers so frequently issue nowadays; and belles-lettres generally. The cost naturally varies according to the amount of labour involved; but a simple, yet elegant design—and some of our binders are more successful where least ambitious—is not a very expensive matter.

This revival of interest has had a far-reaching effect upon the art in England; and also in the United States, where book-binding has made great strides during the last ten or twenty years. The French binders are still masters of the art so far as technique is concerned, but they appear to have altogether lost their skill as designers. There seems to be no soul in their work, as one expert put it, but their finish is perhaps better than ours. In England to-day we have in Mr. Cobden-Sanderson and Mr. Douglas Cockerell at least two binders whose work is fit to rank with that of any period. For grace and individuality their bindings are not to be surpassed in any country. Mr. Cobden-Sanderson's work is done at the Doves Bindery, Hammersmith, not far from the house whence the Kelmscott Press took its name, and here, as, already announced in Literature, Mr. Cobden-Sanderson, with Mr. Emery Walker—both friends of the late William Morris—has just started the Doves Press, with the object of preserving the traditions of fine printing left by Morris. Mr. Cockerell was trained under the same influence—he studied under Mr. Cobden-Sanderson—and has a gift of originality which he knows how to exercise with exquisite taste and rare restraint. He also has charge of a book-binding class which is doing thoroughly good work at the Arts and Crafts School. It is to the credit of the more important firms of binders in this country—like those of Messrs. Rivière, Mr. Morrell, and Mr. Zaehnsdorf—that they too have done their best to bring their work up to the present artistic standard. Their technique is almost all that it could be, and their designs are generally excellent.

In many cases the bindings are copies of the old masters, British, French, German, and Italian, but mainly French. Even forgeries are not unknown in this connexion. One of these spurious bindings—a modern French imitation of an old binding of Francis I., prepared to look like the original in every respect—is included as a curiosity in Messrs. Pickering and Chatto's new catalogue. The most striking work that has been done of late years in the way of copying has been shown on the covers of the Anglo-Saxon Review, under the binding editorship of Mr. Cyril Davenport. True there is not the nobility of the hand-tooled work in these stamped covers, but Mr. Leighton (of Leighton, Son and Hodge), who has taken immense trouble and exercised great skill in the matter, has bound the Anglo-Saxon with an effect which is far in advance of anything that has been done in the way of block work before. Given good leather, in better gold, and Mr. Cyril Davenport considers that it would take a good judge to tell that some of these stamped bindings were not hand tooled. It is only within the last few years that the old English binders have received anything like the appreciation they deserve, but Mr. Fletcher, formerly Assistant-Keeper of Printed Books in the British Museum, proved by the handsome volume of "English Bindings in the British Museum" (published in 1895) "that though they may not have been able to quite equal the refinement and finish of contemporary work in France, they have not only possessed the necessary love for their beautiful art, but have been able to give expression to it by many admirable examples of which their countrymen may justly be proud."

To-day the English craftsmen are making a bold bid for the sceptre of binding which their neighbours across the Channel have held since it passed to them from Italy after the decadence of Venetian printing in the sixteenth century. Take some of the English bindings at the Paris Exhibition—Mr. Turbayne's designs for example, in the fine collection shown by the Oxford University Press. They were a revelation to many Continental connoisseurs, although the University Press had gained a gold medal at the International Exhibition of 1889. Last year the Oxford Press gained a greater success by securing the only Grand Prix awarded for English bindings. The volumes with specially distinguished bindings were valued at sums ranging from £4 for an Oxford Miniature Milton to £150 for "A Century of Oxford Almanacks,"—which, it should be added, included some valuable old line engravings. Many of the bindings found Continental purchasers, and not a few went to join the collections of various science and art museums. Great attention is paid at the Oxford Press Bindery—as at other binding houses—to inlaid work, the binders using the leather in much the same way as cabinet-makers employ their wood materials.

The many fine designs by Mr. Turbayne in the Oxford Press collection is only one of many signs that a new profession is springing up—designers for bindings; for there is no doubt that designing for book covers has a great future, both for cloth and leather work. Decorating a book cover in cloth is a comparatively simple matter; it needs little technical knowledge of bookbinding; but in gilt work the designer ought to be something of a workman as well, or at least to have a thorough knowledge of the technique of the art. Mr. Turbayne, for instance—perhaps the best book-binding designer we have—not only designs the ornamentation, but also the tools themselves, a great point in work of this description being to get the richest effects with as few tools as possible. Artists are specially retained by the leading firms to design the more elaborate bindings, but the workmen themselves often carry out their own designs. As an example of the skill displayed by some of these men we reproduce the design for a copy of Dr. Fortnum's historical treatise on "Maiolica," bound in marone Levant morocco and vellum. This is the production of a workman at the Oxford University Press Binding House in Aldersgate-street, and was exhibited at the Paris Exhibition. It is now being shown at Glasgow with the other exhibits from the Oxford Press. The cover has the additional merit of being in keeping with the subject of the book, the idea for the design having been taken from one of the "Maiolica" plates. Ladies, it is also worth noting, are taking to bookbinding seriously nowadays, and they are even coming from America to learn the art in the studios of our leading craftsmen. It is an art in which there are many possibilities for women workers, as Nicholas Ferrar proved more than two centuries and a half ago in his "Protestant nunnery" at Little Gidding.

"As no person in decent circumstances would put on his table confessedly bad wine or bad meat without being ashamed," wrote John Ruskin, "so he need not have on his shelves ill-printed or loosely and wretchedly stitched books. . . . Every man who honestly exerts himself may, I think, still provide for himself and his family good shoes, good gloves, strong harness for his cart or carriage horses, and stout leather binding for his books." But that is just the trouble; complaints of the rapid decay of modern bindings are heard on every hand, and a committee of the Society of Arts is at present inquiring into the matter. The trade in general hold that the decay must be due to the damp surroundings of the books, or to excessive heat, or the fumes from the burning of coal fires, maintaining that the leathers used are as good as they were fifty years ago. But the reply to this is that most of the leather for bookbinding is nowadays ruined in the process of manufacture by the employment of sulphuric acid, which, eating away the fibres, causes the leather to become rotten. Moreover, only fugitive colours are obtained for the leathers by the use of aniline dyes in place of the old but perfectly safe vegetable dyes. It appears, as Mr. Douglas Cockerell said in his paper on the subject before the Society of Arts last year, "that in order to get a uniform colour, a great variety of shades that are acknowledged to be fugitive, and a wholly useless finish, much leather is destroyed in the process of manufacture, and that the boasted improvement in the appearance of modern leather for bookbinding is obtained at the expense of durability." One of the few leathers that are trustworthy and free from sulphuric acid is the Nigeria leather, brought from some hundreds of miles up the Niger by the Royal Niger Company; and a few of our more advanced manufacturers have lately, at their own expense, produced, by the old and safer methods, leather which is guaranteed to be free from anything injurious. We understand that the work of the Society of Arts committee has made excellent progress, and that the investigations are likely to lead to important results. Much work has still to be done, however, and the report will not be ready for some months.

A VOICE FOR ENGLAND.

THE "BIBLIOTHEQUE UNIVERSELLE."

The minority of men and women who think for themselves has in all ages been a small one; yet it might reasonably be expected that the spread of enlightenment would change that small minority into a large majority. Such a consummation is yet to seek; indeed, it would seem that the minority itself is rapidly decreasing. The explanation is, no doubt, to be found in the power of the Press. To adopt opinions imposed by the autocrats of the daily and weekly newspapers involves less trouble than the formation of an individual judgment. Thus it happens that a large number of people on the Continent are at this moment blindly adopting the opinions of a Press which assures the world that England has reached the final stage of her decadence, and will soon have no place in the councils of Europe. Similar statements, supported by series of cleverly-manipulated untruths, fill the columns, not only of important political organs, but of less ambitious publications that form the staple reading of middle-class households throughout France and Germany. For instance, Les Annales (April 14) contains a most laudatory review of "En pleine Épopée," a book that ignores truth in its glorification of the Boers and its abuse of us; while notices follow, in the same tone, of five other similar books or pamphlets. Then come columns of verse repeating these sentiments, accompanied by stories to the discredit of our officers that would be laughable if only they did not receive such implicit credence. The Frankfurter Zeitung of the same date reviews in a similar strain five German effusions on the Boers. But perhaps the most astonishing publication that has come before us is a sheet emanating from Geneva, under the direction of M. F. de Spengler, entitled "La Lutte pour l'or." It is frankly devoted to the most shameless abuse of everything and everybody English from the King downwards; and undoubtedly its statements gain a wide credence.

To regard all this with indifference no doubt shows wisdom, but if we ignore our foes we must be careful to acknowledge our friends. One French paper alone, of any wide circulation, ventured to range itself on England's side. With what result? Despite the fact that Le Siècle was directed by a sound thinker like M. Yves Guyot, it could not obtain support in its own land, and recently narrowly escaped collapse from lack of the necessary funds.

There remains, however, a foreign publication of some antiquity and of high standing that is faithful to England and to independent views. This is the Bibliothèque Universelle et Revue Suisse, a monthly magazine that deserves to be better known and more widely circulated in this country. For that reason we wish to direct attention to its peculiar merits and to give a brief record of its history and statement of its aims in the hope of arousing the interest of fair-minded Englishmen. It was in 1796 that MM. Marc-Auguste Pictet, Charles Pictet de Rochemont, and Frédéric Guillaume Maurice, disheartened, not to say disgusted, with the turn of affairs taken by the Revolution.

conceived the idea of publishing a review that should exercise the wholesome influence particularly needed in times of anarchy. England was the only country which had remained unshaken by the prevailing revolutionary ideas, and it was therefore decided to call the new periodical the Bibliothèque Britannique. Two numbers, published at Geneva, one literary the other scientific, appeared every month. We are here concerned with the former, which at first contained only translations, extracts, or résumés of English works calculated to spread sane and moderate views on the questions of the day. The first six numbers (1796-97) present a complete example of what the French call a "tableau" of the more important books being read in England during that period. Among the authors whose books are reviewed and quoted are Arthur Young, William Godwin, Bryan Edwards, Blair, Bentham, Dugald Stewart, Mary Wollstonecraft, Mrs. Radcliffe, Miss Burney, Mrs. Inchbald, and Mrs. Chapone. By 1816 the review had obtained some notoriety. While not neglecting England, its directors determined to extend its scope and turn their attention to other countries. Its name was then changed to Bibliothèque Universelle. Under various editors it went through many phases, but always preserved its independent and liberal attitude. Soon after 1860 it was combined with the Revue Suisse. Every publication that appeals to a minority labours under difficulties of a material nature, and the Bibliothèque Universelle has been no exception to the rule. Its support of Dreyfus alienated a great number of its French readers; its support of England's policy in South Africa has alienated a large portion of its subscribers in all the countries of Europe where it circulates. John Stuart Mill once said that a man who has a conviction is a greater social force than a thousand men who only have interests. It is, therefore, the more incumbent upon those who have convictions to use the force they wield for good ends. This is what the Bibliothèque Universelle has been trying to do for the last 106 years. It has sought, and it still seeks, to defend principles, to uphold moral ideas, to act as a bond between those who wish to accomplish the changes that time and progress render inevitable, not by means of revolution, but by the sounder method of peace, justice, and liberty.

The general contents of the Bibliothèque Universelle have an educational value that makes it peculiarly suitable for younger readers. This is worth mentioning, because, so far as we know, it is the only review in the French language of high literary character and serious interests that can unhesitatingly be placed in their hands. The longer articles deal with politics, literature, and art. During 1900 it printed eight admirably-written articles on the war in South Africa—three by M. Tallichet, the editor, and five by M. Villarais. M. Tallichet is a brilliant writer, always earnest, truthful, and judicial; his political articles are models of exposition. In the five papers by M. Villarais, entitled "Les Boers d'Afrique Australe," the writer gives one of the most impartial and informing narratives of the events that led to the war we remember to have seen. We ought surely to be grateful to those who take the trouble to show a hostile public that the question of the South African war has two sides.

But perhaps the most original feature of the review, which ought to give it great value in this country, where even persons of culture are singularly ignorant of what is going on in foreign lands, is the series of "chroniques" that appear every month from the chief countries of Europe—France, Italy, Germany, England, and Russia. They deal with social questions and events, with literature, art, and the drama; indeed, with anything and everything of interest that is going on. These are followed by a "chronique politique" and a "chronique scientifique," dealing with the whole world. Although the articles are packed with information, the style is so clear that they offer a model of the way in which such a record should be written. In most of the numbers there is also a "Bulletin Bibliographique," in which an excellent choice is made of books to review. Thus two recent most important works on Calvin receive attention—"Jean Calvin, Les hommes et les choses de son temps," by Jean Doumergue, and the "Histoire de l'université de Genève, L'Académie de Calvin." Notices of books of this kind, interesting as their contents must be to students of English literature and life, somehow fail to find their way to English journals, and thereby the public are the poorer. They may be glad to make up the deficiency by reference to a foreign publication. The review of the latter book appears in the April number, in which there is also the first part of an article entitled "L'or est-il une chimère?" which is to deal with modern gold discovery, beginning with California and coming down to the Transvaal. We must not forget to mention that fiction forms part of the contents, that the whole is extremely well printed, and that the annual subscription is £1. Indeed, we doubt whether anything better exists in the way of a French review for the general reader.

THE EXCAVATIONS IN CRETE.

The chief interest of the sixth "Annual of the British School at Athens," 1899-1900 (Macmillan, 10s. 6d.), lies in the remarkable discoveries of Messrs. A. J. Evans and Hogarth in Crete, the account of which fills the greater part of it. Mr. Evans' success is the more distinguished that it came not from luck but from reasoning. The purchase of a few engraved seals, which nobody could understand, suggested to him that there might have been a mode of writing peculiar to Crete. Following up the clue, he unearthed part of a sacrificial table engraved with characters of the same sort; and when the political ferment in the island was quieted, he set to work excavating a site where similar signs had been noticed carved upon gypsum blocks. He was rewarded with the discovery of a prehistoric palace of great magnificence, older, and in many respects different from the palaces of Mycenae and Tiryns. A few fragments of fresco were found in Argolis, but Mr. Evans unearthed a large part of a frieze, including one human figure, life-size and almost complete, and enough besides to give a great deal of information as to the costume and customs of the Cretans in those far-off days. Other pieces present the most varied scenes, men and women in groups talking, in crowds worshipping or making merry; one can see what the cities of those days looked like, can even assist at a vigil before a prehistoric shrine. No less remarkable than the matter is the style of these drawings. The firmness of outline, the grace and finish, remind one of nothing so much as Athenian vase-paintings of the best age.

No objects of gold or silver were found, but a number of alabaster vases or carvings which show a high state of material civilization. There were found also, besides a world of common pottery, a number of huge store-jars, some of them containing charred cereals. Most of these stood in a series of store chambers, opening out of a paved corridor, once covered by a roof. A curious fact is the existence of cists in the floors of these chambers, sometimes one row below another, built with the utmost care, and often lined with lead. Nothing has been found in them so far, and their object is unknown. Mr. Evans thinks they were meant for treasure, perhaps for oil, and it is worth mentioning that in some parts of Greece oil is still kept in lead. But the most remarkable find of all was a thousand or so of bars and tablets inscribed in two new and distinct scripts—one of a pictorial, and one of a linear character. Some of these Mr. Evans regards as catalogues of horses, chariots, arms, or the like, because they bear on them ideographic pictures of these besides the writing. Many of the letters or symbols occur on the seals already discovered, and there is no doubt that Mr. Evans has found what he set out to find, the ancient Cretan writing. He hopes in another place to discover bilingual inscriptions, such as have been found elsewhere, in Cyprus for example, and then to read the records. Mr. Hogarth's discoveries are of another kind. He excavated the sacred cave of Zeus on Mount Dicte, and there found a great number of votive offerings—needles, spindles, knives, axes, shields, animals, vehicles, even human figures, which had been deposited in the stalactites of the cave.

But, whilst we cannot too highly congratulate the explorers on their success, or the interest of the account they give of it, we regret to see that Mr. Evans, at least, is somewhat rash in his interpretations. There are square pillars in the palace of Cnossos, one at least of which he regards as an object of worship, supporting his theory by the fact that a double axe is engraved on the faces of the blocks, and that the double axe is the "symbol of the Cretan Zeus." He thinks these pillars are specimens of the Phœnician baetuli, or oblong rounded stones, one of which he sees in the picture of the shrine aforesaid. Setting aside the question whether the baetuli could be square pillars, which they do not appear ever to have been, the argument from the axe-symbol is illusive. There was a Zeus at Labranda in Caria, who held an axe of this sort, called in the local dialect labrys; but there is no evidence whatever that he was worshipped in Crete, or anywhere but in Caria, or that the axe was used as a symbol of him. Axes were found in the Dictæan cave, but so were knives, spindles, and hairpins, and one cannot be chosen arbitrarily and called a divine symbol. Axes, again, were a unit of currency in early times, as Ridgeway has shown ("Coin and Weight Standards"). Further, if the axe is carved on the pillars and on some other blocks of the building, there are several other signs carved on other blocks; and all these signs, the axe included, are used in the Cretan script. We hope Mr. Evans will not wear his double axe blunt with theorizing. He actually accepts the fantastic theory which explains the Labyrinth as the House of the Double Axe; and thinks that a magnificent palace, with broad courtyards and rectangular corridors, inhabited by a King, could have suggested the legend of a tortuous maze haunted by a man-eating monster with a bull's head.

There is no room to do justice to the other papers in the volume—Mr. Welch on the "Influence of the Aegean Civilization on South Palestine," and Mr. Lawson on "A Beast-dance in Scyros." The latter of these is interesting enough in itself to make the volume worth buying, and should be read by students of folk-lore.

PHILLIPS BROOKS.

The subject of the two goodly volumes entitled "The Life and Letters of Phillips Brooks," by Alexander G. V. Allen (Macmillan, 30s.), was almost as widely known in England as in his home, the United States. For he paid several visits to our country, where, his fame as one of the greatest of American preachers having preceded him, he was received with open arms by a large circle of admirers who had read his published sermons and lectures and to whom his name had become a household word. Not the least interesting part, therefore, of Mr. Allen's admirably written biography, whose only fault is its inordinate length, is the account of Phillips Brooks' stay in London and his impressions of our national life and character.

His experiences in our midst were varied and pleasant. He made the acquaintance of our foremost men in politics and letters—Gladstone, Bright, Matthew Arnold, Browning, and Tennyson. What struck him most in Browning appears to have been the poet's enjoyment of the humours of the passing hour. "One would have thought from his conversation that intellectual problems did not exist for him." Tennyson, on the other hand, seems always to have felt the burden of life pressing upon him. In the intervals of reading and appraising his poetry, which he regarded with a curious sense of detachment, he indulged in all manner of philosophical speculations. Of dignitaries of the English Church, the one who chiefly attracted the American divine, was Stanley, the Dean of Westminster, for whom he entertained a feeling of affection as well as admiration. Of the rank and file of the English clergy he had not a very high opinion.

A settled trust [he writes] in ecclesiastical machinery and sacraments and sacred duties on the one hand, and a splendidly devoted but unthinking and superficial spirit on the other, are becoming more and more the temper of the English Church. You will get more live talk in either our Boston or your New York club in an hour than from any gathering of London clergy in a year. You could hardly get them to talk about anything but the Deceased Wife's Sister, who was convulsing England during most of my visit. For the present we must not marry her. But in the end she will get her rights.

But whatever the character of the clergy as a whole, individuals from the Bishop of London downwards readily welcomed the ecclesiastical guest and freely offered him their homes and pulpits. He had the honour of preaching before the Queen, who was deeply impressed by his sermon. He was heard from the pulpits of St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, where he preached his noted sermon "The Candle of the Lord" (which so greatly affected Dean Stanley that it moved him to tears), and various other cathedrals as well as the principal parochial churches in the land. Wherever he appeared, the popular verdict endorsed the tribute paid to him by scholars and critics.

For Phillips Brooks was essentially a preacher. No one who ever saw or heard him in the pulpit could by any chance forget the messenger or the message. A striking personality, a very king of men, of tall, commanding stature, with keen yet kindly eye and mellifluous voice, he possessed a magnetic charm, which made itself felt the moment he appeared. The sermon was a tumultuous rush of thoughts in a torrent of words—Dean Stanley compared him to an express train going with majestic speed. From the professional point of view, the chief points of interest were the technique of the sermon and the ingenuity with which, to use a phrase of Renan, the preacher "sollicitait le texte." The most noteworthy features of these discourses—they stand midway between the sermon and the essay—were their culture and their intense humanity. No one ever possessed more of the "enthusiasm of humanity" than Phillips Brooks. "Humani nihil alienum" might have been written over the portals of Trinity Church, Boston, where for twenty-two years he exercised his ministry, among an overwhelming congregation composed of the wealthy and intellectual aristocracy of a city which claims to be par excellence the abode of thought and culture. He was at once the Bourdaloue and the Massillon of the American pulpit. Addressing himself like the former to the thoughts and above all to the wills of men and, by the pitiless logic of his reasoning, compelling submission, he excels with the latter in subtle analysis of human nature, tenderness of heart, and that spiritual fervour which makes religion appear as morality touched with emotion.

The outer life of Phillips Brooks was somewhat uneventful. He was born in 1835 at North Andover, educated at the Boston Latin school, Harvard College, and an Episcopal seminary. He began his ministry in Philadelphia in 1859. After having received several calls from churches in the country he was invited by the Church of "The Trinity" of Boston to become its pastor. He declined the offer. He remained ten years in the Quaker city, then yielded to the pressure of his friends and removed to Boston to become rector of Trinity Church, which had long been looked upon as one of the strongholds of Episcopacy in the place. Under his pastorate the Church rapidly grew, till it became the first in the land. He resigned his post in 1891, after "twenty-two years of the happiest ministry which it has ever been given to any minister to enjoy." The following year he was consecrated Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Massachusetts. But he did not retain his office long, for twelve months after he was seized with a fatal illness and peacefully passed away.

Phillips Brooks was not a theologian. Though he respected theology and did not begrudge it what one may describe as a succès d'estime, he left dogma severely alone. Broad Churchman in the English sense of the word, he had been greatly influenced in his earlier days by Maurice, whose mysticism, however, fortunately, he did not share. He disliked all shibboleths, "ologies," and dogmatism. Hence, "Evangelicalism" was for him too narrow-minded and literal ; what he thought the huckstering spirit of religious Puritanism found no favour in his eyes. The Church was to him co-extensive with humanity ; it was simply the ideal world. A perfect Church would be a perfect world. There was no mystery for him about religion or its rites. Baptism was the declaration of the universal fact of the sonship of man to God ; the Lord's Supper was " the declaration of the universal fact of man's dependence upon God for supply of life." The essence of theology, if the name is to be retained, was the humanity of God, and therefore the divinity of man. Christ, eternally full of humanity and of divinity, came into the world to complete humanity. Religion is not an external agent ; it is " the awakening of the truth inside of a man's life." Redemption disencumbered from formulæ means not escape from the consequences of sin, but " opening up of the celestial possibilities of man."

THE FRASER SALE.

Judging by the results obtained at the sale of the library of Sir W. A. Fraser, which ended last Tuesday at Messrs. Sotheby's, the conquest of the American collector is complete. Over and over again in the course of the eight days during which the sale lasted the best books fell to the bids of the American representatives, and at prices, too, which left their English competitors far behind, for in almost every instance the underbidder was also a dealer representing firms or commissions from the other side of the Atlantic. The eighteen hundred and odd lots brought the high aggregate of over £20,000 ; but this was largely owing to the extraordinary proportion of richly illustrated works which the library contained. When one takes such a book as the Foulis edition of Pope's works and extra illustrates it by the insertion of a number of rare mezzotints it is not surprising to find it fetch a price which has little or no relation to the value of the work as literature. But of books pure and simple the collection contained some fine examples, the most notable being :—

Chapman, the " Iliad " and the " Odyssey," original editions, £23 10s.
W. Collins, " Odes," first edition, 1747, £30 10s.
Davies, " Dramatic Miscellanies," Horace Walpole's copy, with his autograph notes, £41.
Goldsmith, " Traveller," first edition, £20.
" The Vicar of Wakefield," first edition, £80 and £65.
" The Deserted Village," first (quarto) edition, £30 10s.
Gray, " Odes," with numerous notes by the author, £370.
" London and its Environs," 1761, Gray's copy, £53.
" Designs by Mr. R. Bentley for six poems by Mr. T. Gray," the poet's own copy, £400.

THE DRAMA.

"THE MAN FROM BLANKLEY'S."

Mr. Anstey is, of course, to be cordially welcomed among the playwrights. He produces brainwork, not carpentry or mere stodge. And he helps us to laugh at our neighbours, to feel superior to them. How can we avoid liking a man who is so adroit in persuading us to like ourselves ? The Man from Blankley's is one continuous appeal to our self-love. For that is the appeal which always underlies the satire of snobs and bores. It is the trial and condemnation of one class of society by the standards of a superior class. The necessary implication is that we, who are invited to laugh, belong to the superior class. What Mr. Anstey, in effect, does is to take the spectator by the hand and congratulate him on his manners, taste, and knowledge of the world. " You, my dear sir, are a gentleman. You wouldn't brag of your horses and your cellar and your cigars, like Uncle Gilwattle, or drop your h's, like Montague Tidmarsh, or retail jokes from low comic papers, like young Mr. Poffley. You, my dear madam, are a gentlewoman. You wouldn't bully the governess, like Mrs. Tidmarsh, or maunder about your sick parrot, like Miss Bugle, or put on absurd airs of kittenish coyness, like Miss Cecilia Flinders." And it is quite true that the spectator would do none of these things. For though it is certain that a theatrical audience contains as many snobs and bores as any other chance crowd, it is always possible to strike a lower level, to present them with types to which they can feel themselves superior, if only you take care to lay on the colours of snobbery and boredom thick enough. It will be seen, then, that Mr. Anstey's method, in order to obtain the laughter it seeks, must involve systematic exaggeration. A minutely realistic, absolutely just study of snobbery and boredom would not be laughed at, for it would be presenting to a large proportion of the audience an accurate portrait of themselves, and they do not go to the playhouse to be told unpleasant truths.

To please his public, then, indeed to get his piece played at all, Mr. Anstey must be unreal. That is the disadvantage under which the playwright who satirizes snobbery always labours. And that is a reason why the theme is necessarily a sterile one. Again, it is terribly unfair to the snobs. We all have our snobbish side (a fact which Mr. Anstey carefully conceals from us), and, on the other hand, all snobs have their human, decent side. Nemo mortalium omnibus horis snobit. The assumption—necessary to Mr. Anstey's method—that it is not so, that the guests at Mrs. Tidmarsh's could be snobs "sans intermission," as Jacques says, throughout a whole evening, is obviously false and a little cruel. The cruelty, I confess, ends by getting on my nerves. It drives me to a mood of revolt, to a wild longing to see the imperturbably well-bred Lord Strathpeffer "taken down a peg" and shown to have his little weaknesses, which, I dare swear, are quite as ridiculous in their way as Uncle Gilwattle's bragging or Montague Tidmarsh's dropped h's. Why worry ourselves so much about snobs? A liberal Rabelaisian view of life takes no account of them. There is something pettifogging in the theme. When Mr. Anstey writes his next play I hope he will disdain these superficial trifles and go straight to our fundamental human nature.

But this, I fear, is not giving Mr. Anstey that cordial welcome of which I spoke. The great thing after all is that his work is, as I have said, brain work. He comes fresh to the stage, with no superstitions about technique, about what is or is not du théâtre, as Sarcey would say, and freshness of that sort is very agreeable to the jaded playgoer. The whole of his second act—a dinner party carried through from hors d'œuvres to coffee—is a novel stage-effect and a successful one. My only objection is that there is a little too much of it; I suggest that the curtain ought to rise on a dinner half over, on the joint, say, or the bird. After watching the prolonged banquet I began to feel, like the gentleman in Stevenson's "Providence and the Guitar," that I had myself "the relaxed expression of the over-eaten." Even the famous dinner in L'Ami Fritz is a mere snack by comparison. Then Mr. Anstey has the gift of nimble dialogue. It is not exactly sparkling with wit (how could it be in the mouths of snobs and bores?), but it has the quality of fun, it makes you laugh. As to the characters, I prefer the bores to the snobs. Mr. Jeremiah Ditchwater and Mr. Nathaniel Bodfish are enormous, monumental bores, "massive and concrete" as Mr. Wopsle's Hamlet. Mr. Toomer is the tame, insipid bore. I recognize them all three, and delight in Mr. Anstey's treatment of them, because here he is not cruel, he handles them tenderly as though he loved them. If only he had been a little kinder to the snobs! He should have remembered that snobbery is only an aspect of that imitative instinct upon which, as M. Tarde and other philosophers have demonstrated, the whole social fabric depends. Further he should have remembered, with one of the speakers in Françillon, that "nous sommes tous comiques"—even smart young peers and pretty governesses. What is it that Mr. Meredith says? "If instead of falling foul of the ridiculous person with a satiric rod . . . you laugh all round him, tumble him, roll him about, deal him a smack, and drop a tear on him, own his likeness to you and yours to your neighbour, spare him as little as you shun, pity him as much as you expose, it is a spirit of humour that is moving you." There you have it. "Pity him as much as you expose." Mr. Anstey should have pitied the Tidmarshs and dropped a tear on Uncle Gilwattle.

Never mind. There is brilliantly comic acting to be seen in this play at the Prince of Wales's—not, for once, from Mr. Charles Hawtrey, who merely has to be cool and "good form" as the peer who is mistaken for the hired guest from Blankley's, but from Miss Fanny Brough—an actress whose existence is in itself a crushing refutation of that old libel that women have no sense of humour—and from Mr. Henry Kemble as Uncle Gilwattle, and from Messrs. Holman Clark and Lyston Lyle as the heavy bores, and from Mr. Aubrey Fitzgerald as the imbecile youth who recites jokes from Comic Cagmag. Mr. Fitzgerald is one of the drollest young men on the stage, modelling himself apparently on a grotesque type to be seen in the illustrations to Ally Sloper. . . . But hush! I must not let it be supposed that I have ever seen such a publication as Ally Sloper, or Mr. Anstey will be including me in his gallery of middle-class grotesques.

A. B. WALKLEY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

DREYFUS.

Opinions will probably differ as to Captain Dreyfus' "taste" in publishing the letters which passed between himself and his devoted wife at the time of his trial for high treason and his imprisonment on the Ile du Diable. The French Nationalist Press, in fact, has already begun to denounce him as a mountebank for doing so. Our own view is that the whole story is on such a plane of tragedy that no question of taste can profitably be discussed in connexion with it. As well might one discuss the taste of the lamentations of the victims of destiny in the old Greek drama. It is impossible to treat a man as Captain Dreyfus has been treated—to make him the symbol round which party passions rage, and to discuss the most intimate details of his agony in the newspapers—and then to expect him to be reticent, to hug his sorrows, to discuss only the rights and wrongs of his case, and to refuse the world admission to the sanctuary of his heart. His case belongs to history, and his emotions are an important part of the matériaux pour servir. More especially is this the case in France, where the appeal to the emotions is a recognized part of the machinery for the administration of justice. In part, no doubt, the book FIVE YEARS OF MY LIFE (Newnes, 6s. n.), though it is as little argumentative as may be, is published as an appeal for justice, and as an attempt to stir up strife until justice is obtained. This last object, at any rate, will probably be achieved, in spite of the desire of the Waldeck-Rousseau Administration to wipe up the mess and say nothing more about it.

The salient characteristic of the book is its patient moderation. There is no indignant rhetoric; there is very little complaint of the conduct of individuals—even of those who behaved most atrociously. Bertillon's evidence is, indeed, described as "the ravings of a madman," and we read of the "heinous deposition" of Du Paty, and the "lying deposition" of Henry; but the other protagonists are not denounced, and are hardly even referred to. Mercier, and Gonse, and Boisdeffre, and Esterhazy get off very lightly. The only persons against whom the writer shows that he bears malice are Le Bon, the Colonial Minister, who ordered him the "double boucle," and Deniel, by whom Le Bon's orders were carried out. For the rest the book is merely a diary of suffering—a long-drawn wail.

Naturally, it is a painful book to read, far more poignant than anything to be found in fiction, so painful, indeed, that to read it continuously is hardly possible. It begins with the arrest and it ends with the pardon at Rennes. Where the letters and the diary do not tell the story clearly, simple narrative is added; and we get, for the first time, the absolutely authoritative statement of the superfluous brutalities inflicted by Le Bon upon his prisoner. We get, for instance, the truth about the palisade:—

The hut was surrounded by a palisade, about seven feet high and about five feet distant from the hut. The palisade was much higher than the little barred windows of the hut, which were not quite four feet above the ground, consequently I had neither light nor air in the interior of the hut. Beyond this first palisade, which was completely closed, and which was a palisade of defence, a second palisade was built, also completely closed and of the same height, and which, like the first one, hid everything outside it from my sight. After about three months of the strictest confinement, I received permission to walk between these two palisades, which thus formed a narrow walk, under a burning sun, with no trace of shade, and always accompanied by a warder.

We get the truth, too, about the other discomforts:—

My books were in a pitiable state; vermin got into them, gnawed them, and laid their eggs in them. Vermin swarmed in my hut; mosquitos as soon as the rainy season began; ants, all the year round, in such large numbers that I had to isolate my table by placing the legs of it in old preserve boxes filled with petroleum. . . . The most tiresome insect was the spider-crab ; its bite is venomous. I killed many of them in my hut.

That a man should have lived this life and survived it is perhaps not marvellous. Some men are very hard to kill. But that Captain Dreyfus should have endured the persecution without ever losing faith in the establishment of his innocence does indeed seem wonderful. The Government kept him in ignorance of the efforts being made at home on his behalf ; and yet, quite at the end of his imprisonment we find him writing thus :—

I have lived in order to sustain you, to sustain you all, with my indomitable will ; for it is no longer a question of my life, it is a question of my honour, of the honour of us all, of the life of our children.

I have borne everything without flinching, without lowering my head ; I have stifled my heart ; I curb each day the revolts of my being, urging you all, again and again, to demand the truth, without lassitude as without boasting.

Truly it was no ordinary man whose faith withstood such trials ; and it will be strange if this revelation of the man's nature does not at last bring that revulsion of feeling in France for which we have waited so long. The book is well translated by Mr. James Mortimer.

MR. STILLMAN'S LIFE.

Mr. Stillman describes his two new volumes as the AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A JOURNALIST (Grant Richards, 24s. n.). Let us amend his description of himself, and say that he has been, at one time or another, an artist, a foreign correspondent, an archaeologist, a politician, an official, and, in early days, a revolutionary agent ; and then we shall have some idea of the multitude of subjects and adventures of which he writes. Part of his life has been spent in the United States, where he was born, part in Italy and Greece, and part in England, which he has now made his home. Notwithstanding his austere Puritan parentage, he was able as a young man to follow his own bent. His inclinations led him to art, which he studied in America, England, and Paris. Liberalism and art do not go badly together, and while he was an art student he accepted a dangerous mission for Kossuth, which came to nothing, and afterwards, as United States Consul in Rome and in Crete, and as The Times Correspondent in Montenegro, Italy, and Greece, he always remained true to the Liberalism of his youth. He has seen men and cities—the most famous men and the most famous cities ; and, what is more to the present purpose, he is able to interest the reader in every phase of his life. As he looks back upon it all, Mr. Stillman comes to the conclusion that it was as a journalist that he found his highest utility, and rendered his best services to humanity ; “all the rest was fringe and failure.” As a journalist, that is, as a correspondent, he served The Times exclusively for more than twenty years, and he says that he was never refused a hearing if there was a good cause to defend or an abuse to attack. Mr. Stillman was known and valued as the friend of the oppressed, and as the champion, not of lost causes, but of causes that are not yet won. His letters to The Times covered a period of about twenty years from 1875, years which have seen great changes in the South-East of Europe.

But we cannot agree with Mr. Stillman's regretful remark that “all the rest was fringe and failure.” His art studies may have led to nothing very great, his knowledge of the principles of art being far in advance of his executive skill ; but these and his other occupations, such as his Consulship at Rome, brought him into contact with eminent men, many of whom became personal friends. In America, he knew Bryant, Emerson, Agassiz, Longfellow, Lowell, and Holmes ; in France, he knew artists like Rousseau, Troyon, J. F. Millet, and Jacque ; among his English friends were Tom Hughes, Clough, Owen, Ruskin, the Rossettis, and William Morris. Of these and others, Mr. Stillman has a good deal to say. He does not record trifles about them in order that their names may appear in his book, but he writes, in most cases, critical estimates of character. Of Agassiz he says :—

I am convinced that there was no bitterness in him, and that all personal feeling was overshadowed and minimized by his absolute devotion to scientific truth, with his loyalty to which nothing ever interfered. . . . He was always too hurried in his work, as if he knew that his life would not suffice for its completion ; if, indeed, completion were possible in such work, and he persisted in accumulation of material without pause either to co-ordinate his ideas or to rest and reflect. I one day said to him that I was intending to write a little book, and he exclaimed “Oh, I wish I had time to write a little book ! All my books come large, and I have not the time to condense them ?”

As to D. G. Rossetti, there is more than we can conveniently quote. Mr. Stillman describes him as a fascinating character, and as very dependent on the companionship of others :—

Whatever was to his hand was made for his use, and when we went into the house at Robertsbridge, he at once took the place of master of the house, as if he had invited me, rather than the converse, going into the rooms to select, and saying “I will take this,” of those which suited him best, and “you may have that,” of those he had no fancy for. He was the spoiled child of his genius and of the large world of his admirers ; there was no vanity about him, and no exaggeration of his own abilities, but other people, even artists whom he appreciated, were of merely relative importance to him.

. . . In my opinion he understood himself and his merits justly, but he was to himself the centre of his own system ; other stars might be as great, and probably there were many such, but they were remote, and judged in perspective.

We may take another instance, almost at random, to show Mr. Stillman's insight into the nature of men with whom he had to deal. Of Crispi, Prime Minister of Italy, he says :—

Crispi is extremely reticent and reserved in his personal relations, and has very few intimate friends, and those, so far as I know, entirely among the faithful few who were his intimates in the days of insurrection and conspiracy ; but I know him as well as any one out of that circle, and I believe him to be an absolutely honest and patriotic statesman, the first of Italy, since Cavour. It is my opinion, too, that he is the ablest statesman not only in Italy but in Europe, since the death of Bismarck. In 1893 he was urged to assume the dictatorship, and the King in the general panic was willing to accord it ; but Crispi refused, saying, “I am an old man with few years to live, but I will not give my countrymen an example of unconstitutional government.”

No doubt, there have been greater travellers and greater critics than Mr. Stillman, but not many men have had wider experiences, or have related them better. Whether he is on a secret mission for Kossuth with cipher papers in the heel of his boot, or among the literary men and publicists of America, or in Switzerland with Ruskin, or in Crete during the insurrection, or in Montenegro in war time—in short, wherever he finds himself, all is faithfully described. He is frank without egotism—a great virtue in an autobiographer ; and he has excluded all tedious trivialities. In truth, there is not one tedious page in these volumes. Before we leave them we must mention the author's contributions to art criticism and archaeology. He writes, as it seems to us, with justice and sympathy, of Turner, Ruskin, Rossetti, and the French Barbizon painters, and writes with knowledge of the men themselves, except in the case of Turner, whom he saw only once. In Italy and Greece, he had a wider field, but speaks mainly of politics. In Crete, however, where important discoveries, of which we say something in another column, have lately been made, his proposed excavations might have had remarkable results. The refusal of a firman prevented him from attacking a ruin on the Acropolis of Gnosus, which had a "curiously labyrinthine appearance," and he prophesies that the cave known as the burial place of Zeus, on the summit of Mount Yuctas, will, when excavated, throw much light on early Cretan myth. But it matters little, after all, whether Mr. Stillman writes of politics, or art, or archæology. Nothing comes amiss to him, and he divides his allegiance between all the many subjects that interest a cultivated man of the world. If there had been no oppressed nations struggling to be free, he would perhaps have remained an artist; if his love of art had been less, he might possibly have devoted himself to politics and diplomacy. In any case, he has done well to act on the advice of his friend, the late Mr. Houghton of Boston, that he should write his life. The work needs none of the modest excuses made for it in the preface. It should be added that admirable portraits of the author precede each volume. The earlier one, dated 1870, is by Rossetti; the second drawing, thirty years later, is by Mr. Stillman's daughter.

MR. BUCHANAN'S POETRY.

ROBERT BUCHANAN: THE POET OF MODERN REVOLT. An Introduction to His Poetry. By ARCHIBALD STODART-WALKER. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

It is difficult to see what purpose, either literary or educational, is served by the sort of "study" which Mr. Stodart-Walker has here devoted to Mr. Robert Buchanan's poetry. We do not, of course, quarrel with the book for not being what it was never intended to be. "It neither presumes," says the author himself, "to be of the nature of a criticism, nor of an estimation. It was conceived with the view of indicating the significance of Robert Buchanan as a poet, in the sense of the poet defined as an impassioned philosopher." This has a modest sound; but the difficulty is that it is impossible to indicate a poet's "significance" without either "criticism" or "estimation," and the result of trying to do so is that Mr. Stodart-Walker's study resolves itself into desert-wastes of description and quotation, relieved by oases of pretentious but tawdry verbiage.

We have seldom, indeed, encountered a writer with such a faculty for wordy and superfluous digression. When once he is fairly under way, his trick of phrase-making grows by indulgence till it sweeps him off his feet. He wants to say, for example, that different men view life from different standpoints, and he says it in this way:—

The poets may not have strong enough wings to fly upwards to the golden gates, and then they are content to be mere birds, singing in the ears of the flowers or chanting an inspiring note in the bright beams, which, flashing from the gates above, are spent on the earth below. But to others, Life is viewed on none so inspiring levels. To some it is "vanitas vanitatum," philosophising on it, unworthy of the higher energies, the higher mentality of man. To others, the whole Book of Life is already writ under the eye of Authority and Tradition, and there is no Truth beyond its age-worn bindings. To the cynic, "the world is a bundle of hay, mankind the asses that pull"; to the mere man of muscle, it is a vantage-ground for physical struggle; to the weak, only a place where sooner or later one has to die.

This is a very debauch of platitude; though what the sentence about "vanitas vanitatum" means or how it is constructed we are unable to divine. Again Mr. Walker approaches his main thesis, the significance of Mr. Buchanan's poetry, with the following preamble:—

What is the special significance of Robert Buchanan as a poet? To understand what we mean by the word significance, let us glance at any of the great men who have drunk deep at the well of life, and have heralded some sort of dawn for the night of human darkness. What is the significance of Æschylus but his supreme power of foreseeing great eternal truths, and realizing them in terms of the noblest passion in immortal drama. Of Victor Hugo the same may be said, with the difference that here the medium is the poetical novel. Where lies the significance of Goethe but in his supremacy as the analytical critic of human competition and human emotion—the first poet of the new evolutionary movement, and primarily the apostle of egoism. Carlyle has his significance in his unique power of applying ethics to political speculation and action, and in his enormous capacity to rouse; Ruskin, in his capacity of giving his readers the sense of sight, of showing new wonders in the world that is ever before our eyes. Walt Whitman is "supreme in his power of conveying moral stimulation"; and the significance of George Meredith is his almost isolated power of expressing personal passion, together with his marvellous insight into the spirit of comedy, that nimble god who watches over all. Herbert Spencer, the recording angel of the newer evolutionary spirit, derives his significance from his power of unveiling the mystery of human responsibility in the face of a society based not on ideas, but on pure economics; Huxley, by bringing to bear on historical and theological criticism the deductions of the biological and other sciences; and David Ferrier, by applying his own experimental researches to the amelioration of suffering humanity. The process might be extended to infinity.

It might, indeed; once embarked upon, it might be made to include the name of every considerable writer from Homer to Mr. Stephen Phillips. But why "to understand what we mean by the word significance" should it be necessary to parade these arrays of shallow implication? "Significance" is a simple word; Mr. Walker's amplification of it is complex, and his exposition, one need scarcely add, is indistinct and blurred. To conjoin Æschylus to Victor Hugo, to ascribe a scarcely differentiated quality to both Carlyle and Whitman, and to apply to Goethe terms almost synonymous with those used to describe Mr. Meredith is scarcely to elucidate "significance." And this passage is representative of the whole book, which is uniformly turgid, pretentious, and unilluminative. It really does nothing for Mr. Buchanan which Mr. Buchanan has not already done for himself.

We are sorry to find Mr. Walker's volume so unsatisfactory; because, although we doubt whether Mr. Buchanan's poetry is of sufficient importance to justify an entire monograph, we are quite of opinion that it has not received the attention which its qualities deserve. And unfortunately, as so often happens in the case of indiscriminating admiration, Mr. Stodart-Walker gives prominence and praise to the very phases of Mr. Buchanan's talent which are most open to criticism. There are, indeed, many Buchanans, for there are few sides of literature which his restless talent has not touched; but in poetry his work has two principal and conspicuous facets. There is, on the one hand, the Buchanan of the ballads and "London Poems," a spectator of concrete life, humane and sympathetic, strong in dramatic instinct, and nervously sincere in his display of human suffering and ambition. On the other side, there is the Buchanan of "The Book of Orm" and "The Wandering Jew," who proceeds from the fact to the idea, and occupies himself with an attempt to reconcile the problem of human suffering with some sort of faith and optimism. This is the Buchanan whom Mr. Walker, with characteristic magniloquence, describes as "attempting to grapple with the unseen," "face to face with the mysteries of life and death," "dreaming of an uplifted veil," and "seeing with the eye of the poet the lonely God who neither can nor will help the human sufferer." These are, of course, great themes; and they demand a great genius. But when Mr. Buchanan becomes entangled in them, he is the prey of his favourite shortcomings. His talent, both in fiction and poetry, is always rather of a theatrical than a purely dramatic complexion; it is his foible to view the mysteries of heaven and hell from a standpoint perilously near to those of the stage-manager and the scenic artist. His lurid colouring, his incorrigible diffuseness, and his melodramatic over-emphasis are at the mercy of a subject far too large for his grasp; and to talk of him, as Mr. Stodart-Walker does, as "discerning great truths behind the cloud of conventional belief" is merely to do a disservice to the poet by making claims on his behalf which provoke retort and obscure in controversy the real sincerity and humanity of much of his work. Mr. Buchanan is in no way a profound thinker, but he feels, and feels intensely. His most sincere utterances are to be found in his poetry, and many of them are touched by the sweet, sad music of humanity. As a young man he suffered much himself, and something of what he learnt in suffering he has taught in song of spiritual beauty and power. But his talent is always untutored and unrestrained. Much of his verse is formless, many of his emotions are expressed with a turbulent petulance which is neither persuasive nor impressive. Melody of a certain sort wells up in him; but the harmonies are often superficial, and sometimes they degenerate into the tinkle of a piano-organ. And as his expression is, so is his thought. Mr. Stodart-Walker calls him "the poet of modern revolt"; but the phrase is somewhat overworn. It used to be the special property of Mr. Swinburne, upon whose shoulders it sits more easily than upon Mr. Buchanan's. For the revolt of "The Book of Orm" and "The Wandering Jew" is a very moderate sort of revolt after all. It amuses itself with big words and superficial menaces; but it ends in a very simple and not altogether unconventional return to morality and hope. As a matter of fact, it has not the force behind it to generate innovation. It expresses no more than the common doubt and hope of the ordinary, sympathetic spectator of existence.

The truer and more valuable portion of Mr. Buchanan's poetry is to be found, to our judgment, unquestionably in the ballads and the short dramatic poems. Here there is true emotion, together with more capacity for condensation. The fine line, of which there are many scattered through his work, has not here to be sought for so assiduously amid waves of otiose mediocrity. Here he is occupied with a field that ranges within the limits of his own emotion; here, in a word, he is not posing as a thinker, but feeling as a man. It is a great fault of current criticism that it must always be claiming for the subject of its admiration the faculty for a sort of bird's-eye view of the whole system of creation. The modern scientific movement has conduced to this foible, which is really both mischievous and confusing. In particular, it leads young authors to assume airs of profundity which come in time to conceal and obliterate real and worthy gifts. The high-flown rotundity of such diction as Mr. Stodart-Walker's and the pretension of his outlook are in their way a kind of menace to the moderation of criticism. Believing that such books ought to be discouraged upon principle, we have given to this one, perhaps, more attention than its qualifications actually invite.

SCIENCE AND SOCIALISM.

Mr. A. R. Wallace ranks with Darwin, Huxley, and Tyndal among the brilliant literary scientists of our time—a group of writers whose influence over all classes of readers it would be difficult to over-estimate. Most of our great scientists have prudently abstained from extending their investigations into the domain of social and political philosophy. Mr. Wallace has not thought fit to follow their example, and he is so charming a writer that his readers will perhaps scarcely regret it, though most of them will probably attach little weight to his opinions on subjects foreign to those fields in which he has won his reputation. In any event, when a man of his standing takes the trouble to revise and enlarge the scattered essays and reviews of thirty-five years, and to give them to the world as a part of his published works, it is no ordinary case of collecting literary odds and ends; and his STUDIES, SCIENTIFIC AND SOCIAL (Macmillan, 18s.), have something of the character of an organic whole. Beginning with a few essays on geological subjects, entitled "Earth Studies," Mr. Wallace passes from the globe to its inhabitants. "Descriptive Zoology," "Plant-Distribution," "Animal-Distribution," "Theory of Evolution," and "Anthropology" make up the first volume.

The second consists of essays on social questions, grouped under the headings "Educational," "Political," "The Land Problem," "Ethical," and "Sociological." Fresh value has been added to the scientific essays by some excellent wood engravings, and the whole forms an unusually interesting miscellany. No writer of the same class has given his studies a wider range, and none has set forth his opinions and conclusions more clearly and attractively.

In his first essay Mr. Wallace discusses Inaccessible Valleys. Before the Yosemite was discovered it was understood that these existed only in the imagination of story-mongers like Sinbad the Sailor, whose Valley of Diamonds has its modern parallel in the Doone valley, as described by that delightful romancer the late Mr. Blackmore. The latter valley, it seems, is, and always has been, as easily accessible as any other in the British Isles, and the tourist who has vainly searched for the precipice up which John Ridd is fabled to have clambered, with the deep black pool below, turns from the very commonplace "water-slide" he finds in place of it with a feeling akin to indignation. There are no Inaccessible Valleys, so far as we know, in any of the old Continents; only two besides the Yosemite have as yet been described, and these are in New South Wales. It was once supposed that the walls of deep gorges, such as the Yosemite valley, were rent asunder by earthquakes, and this opinion is countenanced by some modern authorities. Mr. Wallace derides the notion, and assures us that they have invariably been formed by the slow erosion of the streams which traverse them. Other geological articles are "The Permanence of Oceanic Basins," "Our Molten Globe," "The Ice Age and Its Work," and "The Gorge of the Aar and Its Teachings." The old theory of a molten globe, having a crust averaging 18 miles thick, is not, in Mr. Wallace's opinion, irreconcilable with the recent and widely-accepted hypothesis which regards the earth as the result of meteoric accretion. Beneath the crust there may well be a molten interior of unknown depth, enveloping a denser core, probably of imperfectly aggregated matter, permeated by liquids and gases. Possibly the separate oscillations of this central mass, in the midst of its molten envelope, may have some bearing on the phenomena of earthquakes.

The discoverer of "Wallace's line"—the boundary between Indo-Malaysia and Austro-Malaysia, with their distinct fauna and flora—is on his own ground when he treats of the geographical distribution of plants and animals; and in discussing the theory of evolution and anthropology, together with the fascinating problems of instinct and heredity, he speaks with an authority only second to that of Darwin, with whom, indeed, he is commonly ranked, in respect of the doctrine of species-variation by natural selection, as a co-discoverer. No doubt Mr. Wallace's paper on "The Tendency of Varieties to Depart Indefinitely from the Original Type," written in 1858, occasioned the publication of Darwin's views in their complete form; but Darwin had long been mentally maturing his celebrated theory, and Mr. Wallace's "progression by minute steps, in various directions, but always checked and balanced by the necessary conditions," can hardly be said to anticipate Darwin's masterly enunciation and application of the doctrine of "survival of the fittest." But Mr. Wallace will always be associated with the Darwinian theory, and his intimate investigation of the orang-outang, described in his "Malay Archipelago," qualifies him to speak as a first-hand observer when discussing the relation of the primates to the rest of the animal kingdom, and that of the human species to the other members of the order of primates. Cuvier's distinction of Bimana and Quadrumana must, of course, be given up; but to do so is to raise a new difficulty. Man was placed at the head of the mammalia in virtue of his acquired rank as the master of the world and all that therein is; the Quadrumana were ranked next because of their unmistakable resemblance to man. But how is it possible to leave the primates, made up of man and the Quadrumana, at the head of the mammalia? This group is widely isolated from other orders—a fact of itself indicating great antiquity; and it is thought to have branched off from the great mammalian stock as far back as the Secondary period, for in the Eocene we find lemurs and lemurine monkeys already specialized. At this time, according to Mr. Wallace, they were probably not separable from the insectivora, perhaps not even from the ancestral marsupials, among whom, alone among the mammals, we find hand-like feet with opposable thumbs. How, then, can the name (Primates), which claims for the group to which man belongs the first place in the animal creation, possibly be justified?

This relationship to the lowest of the mammalian tribes seems inconsistent with the place usually accorded to these animals at the head of the entire mammalian series, and opens up the question whether this is a real superiority or whether it depends on the obvious relationship to ourselves. If we could suppose a being gifted with high intelligence, but with a form totally unlike that of man, to have visited the earth before man existed in order to study the various forms of animal life that were found there, we can hardly think he would have placed the monkey tribe so high as we do. He would observe that their whole organization was specially adapted to an arboreal life, and this specialization would be rather against their claiming the first rank among terrestrial creatures. Neither in size, nor strength, nor beauty would they compare with many other forms, while in intelligence they would not surpass, even if they equalled, the horse, the elephant, or the beaver. The carnivora, as a whole, would certainly be held to surpass them in the exquisite perfection of their physical structure, while the flexible trunk of the elephant, combined with his vast strength and admirable sagacity, would probably gain for him the first rank in the animal creation.

It is provoking enough to know that we are first cousins to the monkeys without being told that we are second cousins to the ant-eaters and opossums. Ought we to abdicate the rank we have assumed, yield the primacy to the carnivora or the ruminants, and take a back seat from henceforth among the baboons and kangaroos?

The second volume brings us to Mr. Wallace's "social" articles. More properly they might have been entitled "socialistic," for here Mr. Wallace drops the character of an evolutionist and figures as a revolutionist. It is curious that he does not recognize the inconsistency in this attitude which an opponent might urge against him on the ground that, if human society be part of the scheme of nature, it cannot be exempt from the inexorable struggle for existence which rages everywhere else. We are reminded by his poem entitled "A Description of Javita," printed in his "Travels on the Amazon"—his earliest work—that his socialism is a survival of the generous enthusiasms of his youth. Almost fifty years have passed since that volume was published, and as many since Mr. Wallace was converted by Mr. Herbert Spencer's "Social Statics" to Land Nationalization. Mr. Spencer, we know, has disowned a doctrine which Mr. Wallace tauntingly describes as his "legitimate offspring." We turn with some curiosity to the group of essays entitled "Ethical," and are not greatly edified. One of them is entitled "Why Live a Moral Life?" Here is the answer which Mr. Wallace assures us is the only rational one for those who have not "obtained conviction of the reality of a future life through modern spiritualism":—

First, that we shall thereby generally secure the good opinion of the world at large, and more especially of the society in which we live; and that this good opinion counts for much, both as a factor in our happiness and in our material success. Secondly, that, in the long run, morality pays best; that it conduces to health, to peace of mind, to social advancement, and, at the same time, avoids all those risks to which immoral conduct, especially if it goes so far as criminality, renders us liable.

After remarking that these reasons in reality form only one—a fact which would have led most writers to remodel them in a single sentence—Mr. Wallace concedes that they are "of a somewhat low character." They are indeed, for they imply that man owes no duty to conscience, to the social state in which he lives, or the human nature which distinguishes him from the ape.

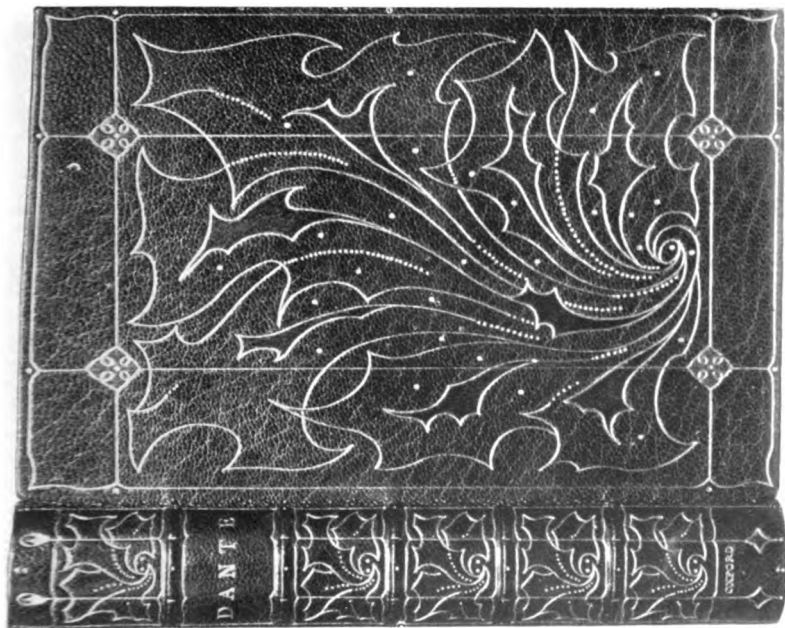

RECENT BOOKS ON THEOLOGY.—II

BOOKS ON THE OLD TESTAMENT.

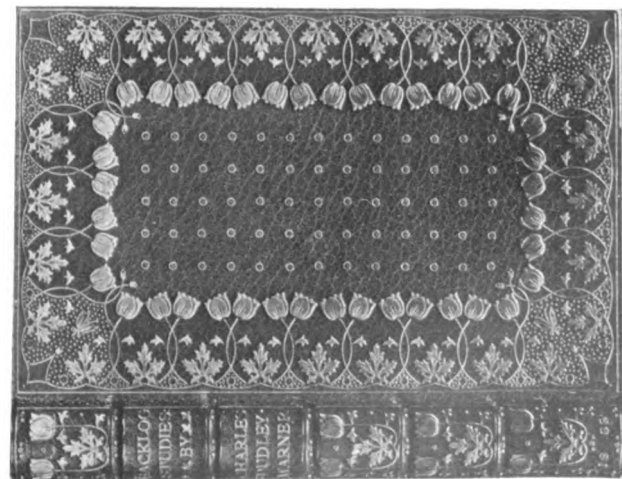

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT IN GREEK, by Dr. H. B. Swete (Cambridge University Press, 7s.6d.), is a first-rate and most valuable piece of work. Dr. Swete has compressed into one handy and finely-printed volume an enormous mass of information about the different Greek versions of the Old Testament, and he thus completes his careful edition of the Septuagint by an introductory volume showing the true relation of the famous Alexandrine version to the various versions and recensions of the original text, which appeared in later times. He thinks that "experience only can show whether the help here provided is precisely such as the student needs." Anyhow, he has collected, especially in the third part of the volume, a great deal of information interesting to others besides theological students. The chapter on "The Influence of the LXX. on Christian Literature," or that on "The Literary Use of the LXX. by Non-Christian Hellenists," though necessarily short, indicate very fruitful lines of inquiry. As regards the more technical part of his subject, Dr. Swete has used well his special knowledge of the literature bearing on the history of the Greek Old Testament, and he has been, to some extent, aided by Professor Nestle, of Maulbronn, and other scholars. Mr. H. St. J. Thackeray, the author of an excellent work on St. Paul's relation to contemporary Jewish thought, contributes an appendix containing the text of the celebrated letter of the Pseudo-Aristeas, with critical introduction and textual apparatus. Dr. Swete speaks modestly of "larger and more adequate treatises" as likely to follow his own; but we can scarcely imagine that any future work is likely to be more serviceable to students than this handy "Introduction."

Professor G. A. Smith, the author of MODERN CRITICISM AND THE PREACHING OF THE OLD TESTAMENT (Yale Lectures) (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), employs a skilful metaphor to describe the relation of the Old Testament to the New. The Old Testament, he says, "is the 'Hinterland' of the New; part of the same continent of truth, without whose ampler areas and wider watersheds the rivers which grew to their fulness in the new dispensation could never have gained one-tenth of their volume or their influence." No writer has done more to vindicate the true position of the Old Testament and the claims of criticism than Professor Smith, and his book is worthy of most careful study. One of his most effective points is the answer to those who cry "Remember Tübingen," and who predict a violent reaction from the conclusions of criticism. He shows that, while the Tübingen theories were largely deductions from the principles of a certain philosophy of history, the methods and proofs of Old Testament criticism are not a priori, but inductive, and are based on the facts presented by the Old Testament itself. Again, he gives an admirable summary of the present state of the conflict between archaeology and criticism, as to which so much misapprehension exists. In his fourth lecture he pleads convincingly for the reality of a Divine revelation to Israel, insisting that the Hebrews actually received "through their national God real impressions of the character and mind of the Deity." He naturally dwells with special emphasis on the preaching of the Prophets, and their influence upon Christian thought from the earliest times. His seventh lecture ends with some good practical advice to preachers on the study of Prophecy, in order to catch something of its spirit—its courage, its "down-right realism," its passion for civic and social righteousness. This is a valuable book and will bring a real word of consolation to many perplexed minds. Moreover, its style is so fresh and so buoyant, yet so reverent, that even the most prejudiced conservative will probably read it with pleasure.

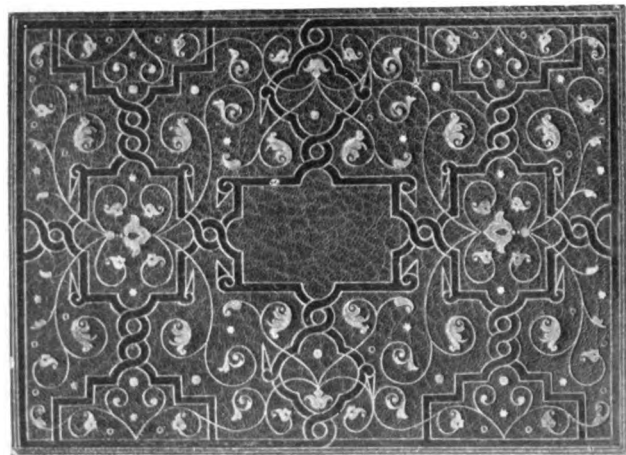

A HANDBOOK TO OLD TESTAMENT HEBREW, edited by Dr. Samuel G. Green (Religious Tract Society, 10s. 6d.), is an attractive if somewhat expensive handbook for beginners in the study of Old Testament Hebrew. Dr. Green has been well advised to spend special pains on the orthography of the language. A student, once interested in the reading and pronunciation of Hebrew, is likely to be less repelled by the dry details of the grammar and syntax than if he first devoted his attention to these. The book includes some capital reading lessons, including passages from the New Testament rendered by different scholars. Dr. Green points out that "the necessity of frequent periphrasis instructively illustrates the difference between the language of the Old Testament and that of the New; while the renderings occasionally bring out the meaning of a passage with striking force." He has compiled a very serviceable and well-conceived manual of Hebrew study.

The first part of THE ANCIENT SCRIPTURES AND THE MODERN JEW, by David Baron (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.), consists of expositions of various prophetic passages in the Old Testament. They are based on a rather old-fashioned conception of prophecy as "history written in advance." We observe also that Mr. Baron totally rejects even so moderate a view as that of the dual authorship of the Book of Isaiah. He laments the defection of the venerable Dr. Delitzsch, "who, to the grief of many, finally gave way, in a measure, to the rationalistic pressure around him, and accepted the theory of a later authorship" of Isai. xl.—lxvi. More important, however, is the second part of Mr. Baron's book, which professes to give an "all-round view of the Jewish question." Dr. Max Nordau's survey of the general condition of the Jews at the close of the century is full of painful interest. (It is given by Mr. Baron in extenso.) It appears that the prospects of Judaism from a religious point of view are very discouraging. While there is a certain revival of national feeling, there is a decided, and apparently increasing, defection of the Jews from their ancestral faith. The chapters on "Anti-Semitism" and on the Zionist movement are also worth reading. In a letter addressed to an inquirer Mr. Baron gives his reasons for rejecting the Anglo-Israelite theory, which he evidently deems a worthless and even dangerous speculation. The book is of great interest, but Mr. Baron is not strong as a biblical expositor, and his work would be more widely useful if in a future edition the expository portion of it were curtailed or even omitted.

The magnificent series of FACSIMILES OF BIBLICAL MANUSCRIPTS in the British Museum, edited by Mr. Frederic G. Kenyon, has been produced by order of the trustees, and is intended to "illustrate the history of the transmission of the biblical text before the invention of printing." The typographical work has been admirably executed by the Oxford University Press. Among the twenty-five facsimiles several are of unique interest. Plate I. reproduces a leaf of the oldest biblical MS. possessed by the museum, a fragment of a third century papyrus from the Fayûm. This is followed by a leaf of the Codex Alexandrinus, and specimens of the palimpsest codex Nitriensis, and Codex N (Purpureus), of which four leaves exist in the museum. The minuscule period of Greek writing is illustrated by some fine examples, notably a page from a Greek psalter of the eleventh century, decorated with drawings (richly coloured in the original). Then come specimens of the Vulgate Latin version and some illustrations of early English versions. Last of all are placed two examples of the Bible produced by Wycliffe and his followers, belonging to the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. It will be seen that the selection of specimens has been very judicious. Dr. Kenyon is a careful and thorough editor, and his brief descriptions of the different MSS. are full of interest. Apart from the intrinsic value of these facsimiles, the book will be of real use to students of palaeography. We hope that the trustees of the British Museum may be induced to publish other volumes of the same kind.

Mr. Elliot Stock announces for immediate publication "A New Translation of Isaiah," with explanatory notes and a History of the Life of Isaiah by Rev. E. Flecker.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Soldiers at Play.

During the long halt at Bloemfontein four of the war correspondents with Lord Roberts' army—Messrs. Landon, Ralph, Gwynne, and Buxton—edited a paper, at Lord Roberts' suggestion, for the entertainment of the troops. The title of this curiosity of journalism was the Friend, and the story of its fortunes is told, with copious extracts from its columns, by Mr. Julian Ralph in WAR'S BRIGHTER SIDE (Pearson, 6s.). It is unquestionably the most unique newspaper ever published in South Africa. Lord Roberts contributed plenty of proclamations; General Colville contributed an acrostic; Mr. Ralph wrote those Letters to Miss Bloemfontein which have already been so widely quoted; Mr. Gwynne discussed the military lessons of the war; Mr. Kipling bestowed both verse and prose abundantly; there was some lyric impressionism from the pen of Dr. Conan Doyle; and soldiers of all grades dropped their little offerings into the editors' box. It is the sort of book that one can only review satisfactorily by quoting from it. Among other things it contains an interesting note on a new word which the war has added to the language:—

It had long been noticed that whenever an officer was prominently connected with a losing battle, or exhibited marked incompetence in any field of military work, he got a billet at Stellenbosch, a bowery village deep down in the Cape Colony, where was established our base camp of supplies. The name, therefore, attained a deep significance and common usage in the Army, and to say that a man had been "Stellenbosched" was but the ordinary polite mode of mentioning what might otherwise have had to be said in many harsher-sounding words.

Among the prose contributions by Mr. Kipling, referred to above, are certain kopje-book maxims, of which a few examples should be extracted:—

Two Horses will shift a Camp if they be dead enough.
Forage is Victory; Lyddite is Gas.
Look before you Lape.

When in doubt Flank; when in force Outflank.
Take care of the towns, and the tents will take care of themselves.

Spare the Solitary Horseman on the sky-line; he is bound to be a Britisher.

Raise your hat to the Boer—and you'll get shot.

Some pages further on we find Mr. Kipling's tribute to the memory of our gallant, though not very capable, enemy, General Joubert, which is worth quoting again:—

With those that bred, with those that loosed the strife,
He had no part whose hands were clear of gain;
But, subtle, strong and stubborn, gave his life
To a lost cause, and knew the gift was vain.

Later shall rise a People, sane and great,
Forged in strong fires, by equal war made one—
Telling old battles over without hate,
Not least his name shall pass from sire to son.

He shall not meet the onswep of our van
In the doomed city where we close the score;
Yet o'er his grave—his grave that holds a Man—
Our deep-tongued guns shall answer his once more!

So much for the professionals. We must also glance at the contributions of the amateurs. At first the editors received the amateurs with derision. "Your verses are execrable. See for yourself in print," they wrote on one occasion. Afterwards they welcomed it more respectfully, and poetry flowed in in a steady stream. It is somewhat crude in quality. Among other original poets, such as Trooper Simes, of Roberts' Horse, and Mr. James L. Watson, of the First Scots Guards, Mr. Fred

Eyre, of the Yorkshire Green Howards, unfolds some grievances :—

But what of his wife and baby,
That he's left far behind at home ?
Where is their love's protection ?
Where is his heart to roam ?
Urged on by a stern Commander,
Pushed by a Sergeant there,
Bullied by bits of Lance Corporals,
No wonder the poor soldiers swear.

And then comes a rattling "Song of the Household Brigade," by Mark Thyme, in the best Tivoli style :—

It ain't a fatigue to see him,
'E's a taller than usual man,
As 'e struts down the road 'e's as smart as be blowed,
And 'is swagger would stop Big Ben,
'E's a fair take-in for the ladies,
For, of course, it's a maxim trite,
When a cove's in the Guards, why it's just on the cards,
'E's a bit of the best All-Right.

Chorus.

Whether 'e wears a 'elmet,
Or 'airy 'at on 'is nut,
When all's done and said, 'E is 'ousehold Brigade,
Whether 'e 's 'Orse or Fut.
(Shouted ad lib.) : That's Right
Whether 'e 's 'Orse or Fut.

And so forth. Only the fact that it is considered desirable to review some other books in this issue of our paper hinders us from quoting more. This is certainly one of the most entertaining of all the war books.

China.

Mr. Chester Holcombe, who was for many years Secretary of Legation and Acting Minister of the United States at Peking, endeavours in THE REAL CHINESE QUESTION (Methuen, 6s.) to show "how certain events and certain lines of Western policy must have appeared to and affected the Chinese." He adds that he "appeals not for China, but for fair play." The same intention has doubtless animated a good many of the other writers on the subject—though we must perhaps except those whose vision of the true inwardness of things is clouded by their earnest desire to open the country up to trade. Mr. Holcombe, however, writes well and with intimate knowledge, though it is probable that, so far as political results go, his book will be in vain. In the choice of Western policy other considerations will, rightly or wrongly, count for more than the susceptibilities of Celestial minds. At the same time it is right that the Celestial mind should be dissected and the Celestial point of view set forth, and this task is admirably discharged by Mr. Holcombe. The history of the diplomatic relations of the West with China is well told by him, and he supplies abundant, trustworthy, and interesting information about the litterati, the secret societies, the army and navy, the missionaries, the opium traffic, and other important matters. The opium habit is his great bugbear. He says :—

An opium-smoking Buddhist priest has been known to steal the very gods from the altar and pawn or sell them for a supply of the drug.

And he holds that the one essential condition of reform in China is that the public offices should be purged of opium-smokers :—

Not merely responsible heads of departments, boards, and offices must be removed, but the lowest and most menial subordinates. It will not be safe to leave an opium-smoking door-tender or floor-sweeper in any public office.

It is a pessimistic view—more pessimistic than Mr. Holcombe apparently perceives. For if the vice be so deeply seated as Mr. Holcombe represents, what prospect is there that it will be eradicated by a decree ? What prospect is there, indeed, that any decree for its abolition will be issued ? These are questions which Mr. Holcombe omits to answer ; and the omission impairs the value of what is, on the whole, a very valuable and a very instructive book.

Those who want a simple, unaffected narrative of the blockade of the Legations in China will find it in Miss Jessie Ransome's STORY OF THE SIEGE HOSPITAL IN PEKING (S.P.C.K., 1s. 6d.). There is no fine writing and no politics, but there are plenty of the trivial details and personal touches which make pictures of such scenes convincing. How little the captives realized their peril at first we understand clearly from the statement, dated June 12, that "the lectures on the Minor Prophets are most interesting, and it makes up very much for our captivity to have a chance of getting some really good teaching for ourselves." How differently matters looked by July 17 we infer from the note that "Lady MacDonald has kindly asked me to go there and lie under a mosquito net on a bed, which will be a treat after a month of sleeping on a table." Miss Ransome's contribution to the looting question is to the effect that "the Russian soldiers are behaving disgracefully, like savage marauders more than anything else. . . . Our boy managed to get a few eggs for us, but the Russian soldiers took them from him."

HOW TO READ THE WAR NEWS FROM CHINA (Unwin, 1s.) is a little book to which we have not hitherto called attention, forming a vade-mecum of notes and hints to readers of despatches and news from the seat of war. It contains a map and a glossary giving the meaning of such expressions as Yamen, Taotai, Likin, Compradore, and such biographical details as will assist students to distinguish between the Chings, and Changs, and Shengs. It should be useful.

A Stanhope Essay.

Mr. Robert Rait's essay THE SCOTTISH PARLIAMENT BEFORE THE UNION OF THE CROWNS (Blackie, 5s. n.) has been already published, for the greater part, in the English Historical Review, after winning the Stanhope Essay prize at Oxford in 1899. It now appears in a more complete form, but in one which makes us wish that the author would enlarge it considerably. In 120 pages it is really impossible to write a serious constitutional study of an institution whose history is extremely difficult to trace to its origin and also involves many side issues and legal problems of much complexity. Nor is Mr. Rait's style adapted to telling a difficult story rapidly and clearly. He is far too much inclined, as in his introduction, to summarize well-known results in a somewhat commonplace way. On the other hand he knows a great deal about his subject, and if only he would refrain from digression and treat it in full detail, we feel sure that he could give us a most valuable book. And it is high time that a constitutional history of Scotland were written. There could be no better proof of popular ignorance and indifference than the fact that the present Sovereign is apparently to be known in Scottish official documents as Edward VII. Some years ago the Bishop of Oxford lectured on Scottish constitutional history, when he was Professor at Oxford. We fear it is hopeless to expect him now to publish the lectures ; but, incomplete though he would undoubtedly consider them, they were of the highest value to students. And they were, it is needless to say, constitutional in the strict sense of the word, and did not concern themselves with commerce and furniture and the poverty of house-building, as Mr. Rait is tempted to do. But our chief complaint against Mr. Rait is that he writes of so great a subject so briefly ; and we hope he may be encouraged by a favourable reception of his essay to undertake the work in earnest. His faults, indeed, are entirely those of a beginner. He is too much impressed by his masters to be able to restrain himself from quoting them relevantly or irrelevantly, and he does not always see the difficulties that arise in the course of his progress.

Briefly, we may note that Mr. Rait dates the Scottish Parliament in its completeness from 1326, that he is careful to point out that no right of strictly popular representation was ever enjoyed (though he speaks for some time of "freeholders" without explaining that it is only "the King's freeholders," i.e., tenants-in-chief, who are meant), and that he shows that the burgesses were not summoned before the date which he fixes as that of the "model Parliament." He sketches the position of the great officers of state and that of the committees which play so important a part in Scottish history. An interesting portion of his essay is devoted to the comparatively humble part played by the Parliament in the Reformation and the establishment of Calvinism. When Mr. Rait returns to his subject we would suggest to him that he will find interesting parallels in the history of the Cortes of the different Spanish kingdoms, and that an examination of the Modus tenendi Parliamentum might be worth making in relation to special points of Scottish constitutional history, and would possibly reveal that the author of that curious tractate was a Scot.

Medical.

In WILLIAM HUNTER (8vo., H. K. Lewis, 4s. 6d. n.) Dr. R. Hingston Fox gives an interesting account of a man who was one of the best-known physicians and collectors of his day, yet whose memory has always been eclipsed by the greater fame of his more celebrated younger brother John. The two brothers both entered St. George's Hospital as surgeon's pupils, and both were trained, lived, and worked in London. Ample justice has been done in recent years to John Hunter, surgeon and anatomist; but it has been left to Dr. Fox to show clearly how much he owed to the training and influence of his brother William, who was ten years his senior, and to how great an extent the various branches of medical and surgical art are indebted, not to the younger and more brilliant brother alone, as is commonly supposed, but to both of them. The book is illustrated with portraits of William Hunter and of several of his medical friends and contemporaries, and a short notice is given of the most valuable coins, books, pictures, and anatomical specimens collected by him, and now exhibited in the Hunterian Museum at Glasgow.

A little knowledge is a proverbially dangerous thing, but the possible dangers to the injured of the "first aid" offered them should be reduced to a minimum by a carefully-written book like FIRST AID TO THE INJURED, by Dr. H. Drinkwater (The Temple Primers, Dent, 1s.). Dr. Drinkwater describes clearly how each of the common accidents of life—broken or dislocated bones, cuts, fits, burns, &c.—is to be treated, and is very successful in giving brief but sufficient explanations of the physical causes of the injuries and illnesses, the special dangers they involve, and the particular actions of the remedies or treatment to be applied, in popular language that is readily intelligible and at the same time accurate. The book is well illustrated, and may be cordially recommended to all who are in search of a short and lucid compendium of the emergency treatment of accidents.

How we Won Canada.

Mr. A. G. Bradley's pleasantly-written volume, THE FIGHT WITH FRANCE FOR NORTH AMERICA (Constable, 15s.), deals with a subject which has met with less attention on this side of the Atlantic than it deserves. Fort Duquesne, Ticonderoga, Fort George, Fort William Henry, Oswego, Louisbourg—places now almost forgotten—are names which rang portentously in men's ears when George the Third was yet a youth, and the destiny of North America remained undecided. How many of us could point out their places on the map? In the lumber-room of a country house or the back of a picture shop one may yet, perchance, discover a dusty canvas representing a hard-featured warrior in a laced waistcoat, and displaying in one corner the ground-plan of a fortress à la Vauban, bristling with bastions and sally-ports, and the simple legend "Louisbourg." This can be no other than Sir Jeffrey Amherst, who in 1758 captured the famous fortress built by the Grand Monarque in 1720, less with a view to the defence of New France than to the recovery of Nova Scotia and the subjugation of New England. That event was the turning-point in the struggle, for it assured the safety of the Anglo-American seaboard and left the St. Lawrence defenceless against the English fleet. The disastrous effort of "brave, blundering Braddock" to capture Fort Duquesne, Johnson's and Loudon's unsuccessful campaigns on Lake George, the surrender of Fort William Henry, with the massacre which ensued, and the repulse of Abercromby before Ticonderoga, news of which reached England shortly before that of Louisbourg, were forgotten in the frenzy of rejoicing which followed. Wolfe had served under Amherst in the taking of Louisbourg, and to him was committed the task of following up this great success by ascending the St. Lawrence to attack Quebec, while Amherst marched towards the same point by way of Lake Champlain. The taking of Quebec was followed by the surrender of Montreal to Amherst, and the fate of Canada was finally decided. Mr. Bradley's book is adapted for popular reading, and the story is told in a spirited and interesting manner. The printing is exceedingly good, and there are some useful maps.

Glimpses of the Obvious.

Judged by his collection of essays, EXPLODED IDEAS (Longmans, 5s.), the anonymous writer, author of "Times and Days," does not appear to be a highly original thinker nor a very exquisite and enterprising writer. He is a little inclined to reveal anew what was already fairly conspicuous, to re-discover the palpable and distinct. In his paper "On the Essay" he does not mind telling us of Montaigne, Hazlitt, and Lamb that "their essays are examples for all time of how essays ought to be written," and he uses the word which describes this particular form of literary work some fifteen times on two small pages. He also feels that we shall like to know the fresh, inspiring fact that "some of Robert Louis Stevenson's best work is done in this direction." It would seem that a certain book was not written, "virginibus puerisque," in vain and that youth will still have its fling in essay form. "On Love" our author is blandly and pleasantly moral. His dictum:—Man has two destinies, to keep himself alive, if he can; and to bring others into the same perilous position that he is himself—is among his more brilliant attempts. On "Lying," "Cycling," "Success," and "Anger" there is not much new light, but in the paper, "Taste," there are wise considerations and some hard words for the uninformed critic. We regret not to have seen this author's previous work which from the Press opinions herein quoted appears to have been a more successful collection. Of "Times and Days," for example, the Boston (Mass.) Literary World succinctly says "Full of meat as a nut," and it might be added in the same manner that "Exploded Ideas" contains as good a store of wit and wisdom as one could expect to find of meat in a nut.

A NEW WAY AROUND AN OLD WORLD (Partridge, 2s. 6d.) narrates the journey of the Rev. Francis E. Clark up the Amur in a steamboat, and on to Europe by the Siberian railroad. His style is agreeable and his photographs are interesting, though his book is of no particular importance. He does not think the route he took has anything but its cheapness to recommend it, and he doubts whether the line would stand the strain that would be put upon it in, say, a war with Japan.

Mr. H. R. Fox Bourne's BLACKS AND WHITES IN WEST AFRICA (King, 1s.) gives an account, from the point of view of the Aborigines Protection Society, of the past treatment and present condition of natives under European control or influence.

SUNNY DAYS AT HASTINGS AND ST. LEONARDS (St. Bride's Press, 6d. n.) is a Homeland Handbook, and quite keeps up the reputation of this satisfactory series.

CORDINGLEY'S DICTIONARY OF STOCK EXCHANGE TERMS (Effingham Wilson, 2s. 6d. n.) explains not only such technical terms as "allotment," "account," "industrials," "interim dividends," but also such slang expressions as "Brums," "Knackers," "Obs," "shake out," and "squeeze." It would be a useful supplement to the same author's Guide to the Stock Exchange.

HOW TO AVOID PAYMENT OF DEBT (Simpkin, Marshall, 2s.) is a pamphlet written to show the need of fresh legislation to strengthen the hands of creditors. It proves to demonstration that it is almost impossible to bring a debtor to book if he has no better use for his time than to dodge the process server, and would just as soon be an undischarged bankrupt as not. This is not new, but perhaps it wants emphasizing.

ART.

CAMEOS.

Of all the delightful vanities that lie about the world waiting for the collector there is no such seductive or difficult quarry as the antique gem. Originals are rare and imitations are exquisite. The well-known "Notes et Souvenirs d'un Vieux Collectionneur" alone contains enough stories of the chances of this chase to show that the hunting of the antique cameo and the intaglio is the "big game" among the sports of connoisseurs. Like tiger shooting in Bengal, it is an expensive amusement that few can follow, but with the aid of Mr. Cyril Davenport's excellent monograph CAMEOS (Seeley and Co., 5s. n., or cloth 7s. n.) there is no reason why even the poorest of us should not form a cabinet of gems—in imagination. "Cameos," says Mr. Davenport, "may, to some extent, be defined as small sculptures executed in low relief on some substance precious either for its beauty, rarity, or hardness," and he proceeds to inform us with the greatest lucidity and fulness of knowledge of the various materials used for cameos in all ages and of the processes employed in cutting them, adding an illuminative account of early cameos and glass pastes, of Græco-Roman and mediæval examples, and of the Renaissance and later engraved stones.

Mycenæan civilization produced some of the earliest cameos; and, if it eventually did something towards forming the race known as the Etruscans, its art was ably sustained, for the Etruscans were splendidly Attic in feeling and their early work approximates to that of the Greeks, who were the cameo-cutters par excellence. The taste for carven gems is said to have been brought into Rome by Pompey on his return from the wars with Mithridates, and it flourished nobly in the soil in which he planted it. Greek artists came to the Imperial city and a great period was begun. There have been ages when the art has been neglected or lain idle; but the workers of the Renaissance, who retouched all beauty with their magic, produced some wonderfully successful work—worthy, indeed, to carry on the Greek ideal. Among the sixteenth-century work, of which Mr. Davenport gives some exquisite examples, the most engaging is the well-known dark onyx cameo portrait of Lucius Verus (now in the British Museum) of Italian workmanship and the finely cut Nicolo, said to be French, of Queen Elizabeth. These pictures are particularly valuable reproductions of the originals, but, as Mr. Davenport says, there is some difficulty and always will be as to the proper representation of a fine cameo by any known process. Although all of his reproductions of gems are interesting and clear, it must be owned that the coloured photographic process he uses is not invariably successful. Cameos do not make good pictures, and if they are to be produced with the printed page the best result is perhaps gained by the unambitious method of their being drawn by an artist in simple line. Such a picture as that of the Græco-Roman sardonix cameo of an Emperor and Empress in the characters of Jupiter Ammon and Isis cannot be said to possess any beauty, while the reproduction of that most beautiful gem, the head of Medusa cut in an amethyst, gives but a poor idea of the glories of this cameo as seen in its place of honour in the Gold Room of the British Museum.

But the gorgeous lights and translucent colouring of so rich a stone, the exquisite surface of the graven face, are perhaps beyond all the arts of those who would make a picture of what is almost a sculpture, and, after all, Mr. Davenport's method at least recalls the beauties which the process he adopts cannot hope to reproduce. In many cases the monochrome illustrations are more satisfying. The "Tazza Farnese," once in the collection of Lorenzo d' Medici and now in Naples, gives a perfect idea of the original; the Ptolemy II. and his wife Arsinoë, a sardonix of nine layers, is also admirable, and indeed many of the simple Græco-Roman onyx cameos can be given by the photographic method with good results. It is the translucent gems, emeralds, amethysts, and crystalline varieties of quartz, whose very brilliancy makes them suffer, whose gorgeous lights and shining surfaces confuse the issue and give, where all should be lightness and beauty, a blotched and flawed appearance. But Mr. Davenport's book will send his readers to view the originals for themselves and will also, we trust, incline art craftsmen to try their skill upon a branch of—should one say sculpture or carving?—that asks so much of the workman and gives such glorious, such immortal rewards for his labours. Now that the finest Temples of Athens lie shattered and the dynasties of Byzantium and Egypt have crumbled away, the engraved stones that jewelled their sacrificial vessels or added lustre to their desecrated crowns remain in perfect preservation and clearly tell the story of glories that have been. Mr. Davenport's well-informed but yet popular book would greatly serve the cause of art should it encourage in those who can buy jewels the taste for such as are engraved or cameo-cut. The modern cut sapphire is an agreeably coloured stone, but compare it with, say, a carved gem of the best Egyptian period of the same material and the dignity, the distinction, of the jewel wrought by the hand and art of man are at once apparent. Such a book should do much to revive a taste for beauty in jewelry and a return to classic forms. For Mr. Davenport is gifted with so pleasant a style and agreeable a method that all who see his book will become interested in the subject and help to spread its message of antique æsthetics.

EGAN MEW.

OLD WATER COLOURS.

Old lights are certainly being exchanged for new in the exhibitions of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours. The old lights, S. J. Hodson, Henry Wallis, E. T. Bownall, W. Collingwood, John Parker, W. M. Hale, Sam Evans, S. P. Jackson, and Herbert Marshall, for example, fail on this occasion to arouse the interest of the onlooker without principles—or prejudices. The newer lights attract attention and provoke criticism. To Edwin Alexander, R. Anning Bell, Robert Macbeth, James Paterson, and Arthur Melville belongs the interest of the present exhibition. The old lights lose ground through their own inability to appreciate the change that is coming over public taste. Only a few minds retain their affection for landscape in which the water suggests the New River Company, and the rocks which surround the stream suggest the stage carpenter. The trivial, as Millet said, may minister to the sublime, but we cannot accept the trivial without sublimity. The society has apparently recognized this, for they spring "Craigleith," a remarkable study of subtle tones and violent perspective, upon the visitor very early in the collection. Then there is "A Jacobite Gathering," a sort of chastened Monticelli, by Robert Little, and "A Cairo Street" and "A Highland Autumn" by Arthur Melville. Of Mr. Melville's colour problems, which are so acceptable as spots of colour, "A Cairo Street" as a subject is quite intelligible. It only remains for Mr. Melville to disguise his method a little more to render his scheme a little less obvious for us to accept him without question. It would do no harm to his art to remember that the simplest objects, when truly painted, gain in dignity under partial concealment by aerial effects. Mr. W. Callow has understood this message in "Stirling Castle." He has a perfectly clear conception of what he sees, but since there is an idea with every touch the scene is realized without hard insistence and dull portrayal. This quality of suggestion is lacking in "Goatfell, from the Sea, Arran," by Sir Francis Powell. E. A. Waterlow also disdains the grace of mystery, and his "Hemingford Mill," is only another "picture" of a much painted subject treated with the freedom learnt by much practice, but lacking in atmosphere or luminosity. It has neither the plein air of Millais' "Chill October," the consummate skill of Alfred Parson's small but powerful "Dairy Bridge on the Greta," nor the cleverness of Clarence Waite's "A Buttress of Snowdon." It is better partially to fail at a poetic idea like Miss Smythe's "Winter Gleanings," or to realize an easily accessible effect as has been done by Charles Davidson in his piece of well-seen nature at "Hastings—Early Morning." A. H. Marsh has seen with a surcharge of purple rays in his well-drawn "Evening," and Robert Little misses the sunlight in "Faslane, Gareloch." These and Tom Lloyd's greatly daring "Evening in June" contain much of the work of the practised hand, but they lack the tenderness of so simple a picture as "The Gate of the Apothecaries' Garden," by Miss Rose Barton, and the charm of style shown once more so convincingly by Miss Clara Montalba. No one of the æsthetic tests that we have so far applied serves us in the presence of E. R. Hughes' "The Princess out of School," of Mr. C. E. Fripp's "Seven Ravens," or of Anning Bell's "Blind Man's Buff" and "A Flight of Fairies." We are simply content to admire Mr. Hughes' picture. The subject is well chosen without being all-absorbing; it is drawn with exquisite care; the colour-scheme is rich, harmonious, and well balanced. It occupies what may be regarded as the place of honour in the gallery, and it is a tribute to the intelligence of the hanging committee that it is so well placed. There would appear to be less certainty in the minds of the committee in the case of Mr. Anning Bell's contributions; and yet they also are hung very much according to merit. "Blind Man's Buff," being less real and more decorative than the fanciful and subtly humorous "A Flight of Fairies," is skied; but Mr. Fripp's satisfactory illustration of "The Seven Ravens" has received that recognition which good draughtsmanship must always compél. But surely painters in water colours must be in some danger of forgetting the traditions of their art when we find ourselves ungrudgingly praising the subject pictures painted in the landscape painter's particular medium.

The Artist for May has two specially interesting features. It gives us a foreshadowing of the Royal Academy in the shape of some reproductions of studies by artists for their exhibited pictures. Some of these are worth careful attention, especially those by Mr. Herbert Draper, Mr. Macbeth, and Mr. Harold Speed, which are fine examples of drawing. The other feature is an article by Mr. Wentworth Huyshe on the lately recovered Greek statues, with a full account of the history and character of the discovery made near the Island of Cerigo (Cythera) and some most interesting photographs of the statues themselves—"the most important, most interesting additions to the scanty remains of Greek art which have come down to our time since the memorial days, twenty-five years ago, when the Germans, working at Olympia, revealed to our astonished and delighted eyes the Hermes of Praxiteles and the Victory of Paionios."

FICTION.

Northborough Cross.

The somnolent atmosphere of the cathedral town, which becomes electrified when the wings of scandal are heard fluttering in the Close, is presented with almost cruel truthfulness by L. Cope Cornford in NORTHBOROUGH CROSS (George Allen, 6s.) There is a cynical tone in the treatment of the Dean and Chapter, notably by Gilbert Thornhaigh, the bluff world-roamer and financier, who is at once the unwitting agent of financial ruin and the ingenious saviour therefrom. He fell, to be sure, amongst a baddish lot of clerical specimens—his easy-going epicurean brother, "the Rev. Charles," the self-seeking Dean, and Canon Glossop, whose unctuous rectitude did not prevent him from gross indiscretions, from shameful neglect of his invalid wife, and from becoming the hopeless victim of a drug. If we grant the possibility of an ecclesiastical cesspool like this, then the story must be accounted a strong one. There are lovable characters that redeem it from being unreadably cynical. Chief of these is Lancelot, the boy, whose early waywardnesses, so humorously and sympathetically related, recall at times the excursions of Richard Feverel, just as some scenes in the book suggest the work of Anthony Trollope. Everything centres about the cathedral. We share in the enthusiasm of old Thomas Inkpen, the cathedral surveyor, for the sacred building; we follow him in his patient loving study of its archives; we watch the dawn and spread of a similar interest in the mind of Lancelot; we listen attentively to the drone of the gossips that spring at a reputation as a trout at a fly. It is a story written with care and sympathy and humour.

The Heart of a Dancer.

The ladies are the best part of Noel Ainslie's novel THE SALVATION SEEKERS (Methuen, 6s.)—a fact which compels us to leave out for the time any prefix to that writer's name. It is a capable novel, dealing with the always interesting subject of a young girl's development, after a sudden change from poverty to wealth. For Valentia, a thirteen-year-old dancer in a strolling troupe, is adopted by an heiress, marries an Irish politician and editor, by name Lawrence Burke, and finds in time that politics and the editing of a Radical paper are bad for the conscience. She leaves her husband in consequence. Incidentally we have a strike in a mining district, with some rioting; and a good deal of speculation as to the best way of reconciling a tender conscience with an eminently practical world. The book is rather patchy; its construction is not exactly masterly; and the title is hardly justified by the matter. But it is not difficult to read, and it has, at all events, the merit of variety.

A Naval Farce.

Mr. Charles Gleig knows something about the workings of a man-o'-war, and he has contrived an interesting and farcical plot in BUNTER'S CRUISE (Methuen, 3s. 6d.). The central idea is not absolutely novel, but it is carried further than usual—so far, indeed, that the author has some little difficulty in extricating his hero from the false position in which he has placed him. For Ned Bunter, A.B., escaping from the dock police—he has overstayed his leave—manages to change clothes and identities with the Hon. Roger Laxdale, the newly-appointed captain of his own ship. The sufferings of the aristocrat, thus suddenly reduced to the level of a common bluejacket, and the scarcely less unpleasant position of the new-made captain afford scope for a good deal of amusement. Mr. Gleig handles his situation very brightly, and extracts a considerable amount of humour from it; but it must be confessed that there is hardly sufficient material here for a full-sized book. Sir Thomas Tipping and his daughters belong to the domain of very broad farce indeed.

Among the Stars.

A HONEYMOON IN SPACE (Pearson, 6s.) will no doubt have admirers. Mr. George Griffith knows how to weave love and pseudo-science, European wars, and American beauties into a story as well as any man alive. To us it seems that there is no romance quite so tedious as that which deals with people whirling through space in some sort of air-ship propelled by some unknown but fully-detailed force. In the present case the splendid Lord Redgrave and his American bride visit many planets and go through many nerve-shaking adventures. It is all very exciting and, if one could only be convinced, very splendid. But Jules Verne did it all when we were most of us in the nursery and could appreciate it. And even nowadays it has been better done than in "A Honeymoon in Space," and, but for the fact that Mr. Griffith knows his public better than we do, we should be inclined to recommend him to "leave 'Wells' alone."

An Aristocratic Detective.

THE SENTENCE OF THE COURT (Pearson, 6s.) is run upon familiar lines, a murder, the arrest of the wrong man, and his subsequent triumph—a simple prescription which seems capable of endless permutations. Mr. Headon Hill has invented one or two novel details—thus the convict is sentenced to death by the father of the girl he loves; the real criminal is the man who moves, by way of a bluff, for a coroner's inquest on the body of the murdered man; and a hastily-planned exchange of names with a medical friend lands the unfortunate George Malden in the shoes of Cyril Bathurst, and eventually in the cells of Portland Prison. Also there is the London Detective Bureau, run by the Hon. Mark Taverner (whose prefix of "The Honourable" on his visiting card gains him instant admission, as the author puts it, to the presence of important men like Sir Henry Selwood). There is a comic villain, in the shape of Durke, a rural policeman ; a heavy villain in Leger Vipan, the millionaire. It is a machine-made story, told in the customary fashion.

Mild Sentiment.

It is hardly fair of the nameless author of TIME'S FOOL (David Douglas, Edinburgh, 6s.) to label her story "An English Idyll." The word means so much to some of us, and idyll making, in literature, at least, is no light work. Although not especially Theocritean in feeling, the story gives a pleasant picture of Cornish country, and develops an interesting theme of the young man of fortune who marries for love in a lower stratum of society. The style is good but the story is rather obvious. Perhaps that is what the author thinks an idyll should be, but there we join issue with her. If the title be borrowed from the phrase "And Life, Time's Fool," we must own that the author does not write up to her title. Life is not such as she depicts ; uncles do not die at the right moment, nor for that matter wives either, and the sons of phthisical mothers are not always jolly and strong. The book has charm and can be recommended to those who like their fiction in a mildly sentimental form.

Among the Eskimo.

NORTHERN LIGHTS AND SHADOWS, by Ralph Graham Taber (Greening, 3s. 6d.), hardly needs the deprecation of its author, who prints an encouraging letter from the Marquis of Lorne (he was not then Duke of Argyll) by way of apology for his book. The stories of Eskimo romance and folklore are fresh and uncommon enough to stand on their own merits. Mr. Taber really gets the Arctic atmosphere and feeling into his work. He makes us see the little muffled men, steering their boats among the ice-peaks by the light of the aurora, on their hunting or courting expeditions. "The Courtship of Pierre Meshu" is full of humour and life. Pierre was as wary as the wooer who chose his bride because of her admirable method of eating cheese ; but Mr. Taber makes him sympathetic. The chapter unpronounceably headed "Nusuwyualuk Discourses" is, perhaps, the best. Some of the tales have appeared before in magazines, chiefly American, but they are worth reprinting.

A Patched-up Affair.

Novels on similar subjects have the habit of appearing simultaneously, and just now it would seem to be the fashion to write of young ladies who marry under protest, as it were, and learn afterwards that they have not done so badly after all. This is the gist of Miss Florence Warden's volume A PATCHED-UP AFFAIR (Pearson, 6s.). It is not one of the author's best books—in fact, it might be called dull, which is not usually the fault of the lady who made her reputation by "The House on the Marsh." Lovers of sensation will not find much to their liking here, and the more delicate graces of literature were never much in Miss Warden's line. Briefly, the book is thin, trite, and sentimental ; and the title, which was presumably intended to refer to Mrs. Cumberland's heart, would serve quite adequately as a description of the story itself. The cover is rather engaging.

Gyp.

Gyp has not improved by becoming a rabid anti-semiter. Her latest work LE FRIQUET (Flammarion, 3f. 50c.) is there to prove it. In trying to tackle the serious question of anti-semitism she has produced a novel which reminds us too much of the romans-feuilletons of Emile Richebourg, where the "filles du prolétaire" remains virtuous surrounded by a whole gang of disreputable aristocrats. Gyp, however, not being satisfied with aristocrats, has added a few disreputable Jews, and the result is not pleasing. The actual story is of the slightest, and wholly unconvincing ; the end is nothing less than melodramatic. A young circus-rider, nick-named Le Friquet, about fifteen years old, has been adopted by the aristocratic wife of a Jewish millionaire. Instead of giving the girl a good sound education, which would enable her to gain a decent position in the world, she merely dresses her up and takes her out in her carriage and on horseback, all the time allowing her to talk the "argot" of Belleville. Gyp knows well that no French lady of that class would do this, in however fast a set she was living. The whole character of the girl is unreal, and the perpetual argot gets on one's nerves. Of course, through the whole book Gyp airs her anti-semitism especially by calling people "youtre" and "youpin." One of the characters gives her views concerning the marriages contracted by lovely aristocratic, but poor, French girls with Jewish millionaires. But what are they to do when the smart young men of the Hubert de Ganges type refuse to marry them ? Gyp tries to persuade us that this young man, who prefers to pay his attentions to the lady after she has married the rich Jew, rather than to marry her himself, is as sympathetic as he is good-looking. Which of the two adopts the more honourable course ? The book is entertaining, but we prefer the earlier Gyp who did not dabble in politics.

LIBRARY NOTES.

A new building is urgently needed for the Bethnal-green Library. How to supply it and at the same time clear off existing debts were the problems discussed at a recent meeting at the Mansion-house in aid of the Library. In all £25,000 is required, and those present pledged themselves to do all in their power to secure this sum. With such a spirit of determination at least a sufficient income should be obtained. We trust that some genuine philanthropy will be awakened on behalf of this hard-pressed institution. The King continues the support which he gave as Prince of Wales.

Belfast still retains Scottish sympathies, and we could not have a better testimony to them than the collection of Burns and Burnsiana formed by Mr. William Gibson, one of the governors of the Linen Hall Library. The report of the Library is very encouraging. Its income is increasing, and its contents have been brought up to date by discarding many obsolete works.

The growing interest in county history is an agreeable tendency of the moment, and we hope the appeal made by Mr. F. G. Kitton, as Hon. Curator of the Herts County Museum, for further subscriptions towards the purchase of a collection of Hertfordshire prints, books, and pamphlets will meet with response. The owner of the collection, Mr. Lewis Evans, is willing to dispose of it for the enrichment of the county.

It is hard that the nursemaid that wheels the perambulator with a novel under her arm should be held up as a warning against the misuse of public libraries. Yet such was the picturesque vision conjured up the other day by a member of the Enfield Library Committee. The outcry against fiction is, of course, absurdly overdone. Novels form a tremendous percentage of our literary output, and so long as librarians exercise discrimination in selecting them, their perusal may surely be a wholesome recreation for the nursemaid after her arduous duties. It is not suggested that an enthralling passage in her favourite novel will endanger the life of her infant charge.

Of all week days Saturday is the most precious to working people. This should be remembered in the management of libraries established solely for their benefit. A decision to close the lending and reference departments of the Aberdeen Public Library at 1 p.m. on Saturdays, and the reference department at 8.30 on each evening appears to be a cause of genuine grievance. It is to be hoped that the authorities will see their way towards modifying their decision.

The ultimate success of the library movement in Accrington will encourage people elsewhere, who, "faint but pursuing," still carry on oft defeated efforts. After prolonged agitation the Acts were adopted in Accrington in 1899 ; and now the library of the old Mechanics' Institution, supplemented by a newer collection acquired by public subscription, is thrown open to the public. At the opening one of the principal speakers recalled the beginning of the agitation as a memory of his boyhood.

The late Mr. Robert Stockil has left the sum of £500 to the Doncaster Public Library for the purchase of high-class literature. It does not always fall to the lot of a librarian to be able to choose his new books entirely from the standpoint of their literary value.

The Borough Council of Bermondsey have adopted the Library Acts in the three parishes of St. Olave, St. Thomas, and St. John, Horselydown. These, before the passing of the London Government Act, were independent and without the library privileges of which they will now take advantage.

Mr. Frank C. Nicholson has been appointed assistant librarian at Aberdeen University Library. Mr. Nicholson was a scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge, took a first-class in the modern language tripos, and a second in classics.

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—II.

The most interesting literary article in the Nineteenth Century is Mr. Walter Frewen Lord's on "The Novels of Anthony Trollope," which shows with ability how our social life has been transformed from that depicted by Trollope in four points. His "characters live under the domination of four leading ideas—the supremacy of the House of Commons in the government of this country," which has, since the Franchise Bill of 1885, so Mr. Lord thinks, yielded to a government on purely aristocratic lines, "the authority of the Press," now far less than it was, "the grip of the Church on the life of the nation, and the prestige of the marriage tie." The changes on these points have been so great that Trollope's photographic picture has already become of great value to the social historian. Mr. G. F. Watts' paper on "Our Race as Pioneers," and our mission in Africa is conceived on the broad abstract lines which characterize his art. "The Costs of the War" and Army Reform are dealt with by Lord Camperdown and Mr. R. Yerburgh. Mr. Harold Gorst has a trenchant attack on our educational system as a nursery of "machine-made human automata." Mr. G. A. Barnett discusses Housing in a singularly sensible and moderate spirit. Another interesting article, though rather vague in its practical proposals, is Mr. F. R. Benson's on a National Theatre.

In the Fortnightly Sir Robert Hart continues his discussion of Chinese affairs. He is much impressed by the latest reform edict, and predicts that "with the Emperor at the helm and the Empress-Dowager supplying the motive power prestige conserves, the Ship of State will take a new departure, and the order of the day will be Full Steam Ahead!" In the meantime Count Waldersee is also going full steam ahead, and so are the Boxers; and as they are not going ahead in the same direction as the Dowager-Empress, the danger of collision is hardly to be eliminated. Mr. Edward H. Cooper writes of Charlotte Yonge, and bears witness to the endurance of her popularity in the schoolroom and the nursery. Mr. Cloudesley Brereton, discussing "A National System of Education," insists that "State control should not be established at the expense of all our freedom, elasticity, and variety, otherwise the solution will not even be a temporary modus vivendi, but rather a cause of national decay"—a proposition with which we emphatically concur. "International Literary Copyright" is the subject of a well-informed and thoughtful paper by Mr. G. Herbert Thring. Mr. Brodrick's scheme is debated by Major Arthur Griffiths and Mr. Gerard Fiennes. Mr. H. Hamilton Fyfe argues in favour of a national theatre; and the purely literary contents of the number are very strong, including a sonnet by Mr. William Watson, a short story by Mr. Maurice Hewlett, and a play in three acts by Björnsterne Björnson.

Longman's gives us a good article on the Card-playing Age by Mr. Bruce Angier—the age which (roughly) began with Charles II. and went out with George IV., after ladies of high position had been haled before the Judge for excessive gambling, and, as the Morning Post of Jan. 12, 1800, remarked, "Society has reason to rejoice over the complete downfall of the Faro Dames who were so long the disgrace of human nature. Their die is cast, their odd tricks avail no longer. The game is up, and very few of them have cut with honours." Mr. W. H. Hudson has one of his charming nature studies—a class of writing on which we say something in another column—called "A Summer's End on the Itchen"; and, besides poetry and fiction, there may be found in this number an amusing and sensible criticism of Mr. Churton Collins' "Ephemera Critica" from the pen of Mr. Andrew Lang. We are afraid that Sir Walter Besant, who was hardly satisfied with our comments on Mr. Churton Collins' indictment of the honesty of the reviewer, will not be pleased with Mr. Lang's remarks on the same subject; yet Mr. Lang writes excellent sense:—

It must often happen [he says] that what is thought to be mutual and insincere adulation is not so really. You may praise a man's work because he is your friend, but you may also have become his friend because you admired his work and said so, without any hope or even possibility of receiving a return in kind. Arthur Hallam and Spedding and the rest of the Cambridge set applauded Tennyson's beginnings, most justly and most fortunately, for there were very few to praise and the poet needed encouragement. Whoever reviewed Coleridge's poems in the Edinburgh (Hazlitt probably) accused of log-rolling—Byron and Scott! They had said kind, but far from extravagant, things of Coleridge, and the reviewer said that they desired to be praised by S. T. C. in the newspapers!

There may be businesses better done than reviewing, but there are few in commercial England more honest.

Cornhill has much that is interesting:—Mr. Leslie Stephen on the late Mr. G. M. Smith; Mr. Sidney Lee on "Shakespeare and Patriotism"; Mr. Worsfold on Agricultural Settlements in the new African Colonies, and so on. To us the best reading is Urbanus Sylvan's account of Lichfield in the days of Johnson, in which he produces some unpublished letters by Miss Seward, "the Swan of Lichfield," who seems to have used her imaginative gift largely in writing about her neighbours, and by Miss Porter, on whom the great Doctor lavished an almost pathetic amount of affection. Mr. G. S. Layard continues his studies of Family Household Expenditures with "A Lower Middle Class Budget."

There is a fresh instalment, in Blackwood, of the anonymous reminiscences of "Editors and others." The chief celebrities reviewed are Chenery, John Blackwood, Chesney, Kinglake, Lawrence Oliphant, and Henry Reeve. It is interesting to read that Henry Reeve discovered the merits of "The Window in Thrums" before Mr. Barrie was popular. The "Musings without Method" form a characteristic tirade on the iniquities of those candid friends who, mainly in the half-penny Press, but also occasionally in books, proclaim that the country is going to the dogs, that our military organization is a burst bubble, and that our trade is being taken from us by America and Germany. "History," says Maga, "cannot show a more dastardly episode than that which has lately disgraced us, and the sooner we cease to groan about competition the sooner shall we tackle it with address." A true bill on the whole, though the case is stated with unnecessary violence. That excellent writer Zack contributes a short story to this number.

A favourable view of "The Free State Boer" by an Imperial Yeoman, lately a prisoner of war, is the best thing in Macmillan. The writer is convinced that "here is a people with whom the task of making friends ought not to be extraordinarily difficult." A new serial begins this month—"Princess Puck," by the author of "The Enchanter."

The New Liberal Review, in accordance with its mission in life, deals largely in questions of practical politics. The Progress of the Session and the Stagnation of Business are discussed by Mr. A. Kinnear and Mr. Lloyd George. Mr. Macnamara deals with "Cockerton," and there are articles on Liberal Organization, the future of Home Rule and Army Reform, and Workmen's Compensation, while Sir Charles Dilke urges that any inquiry into the war must be conducted with closed doors. In a little symposium on the rage for sport, the best paper, we think, is Mr. C. B. Fry's, who adduces many good reasons for thinking that things are not quite so bad as they seem. Lady Jeune shows that the note of modern society is decentralization, the revival of social life in the country; and literature is well represented by Mr. W. P. James in an excellent article on the fame of George Borrow, which in this little summary of the contents of the magazine we are glad to unearth from the "&c." to which it is relegated in the list of articles on the outside page.

The North American Review has some interesting Tolstoy matter including a "Message to the American people" by the Count himself, and an article on "Resurrection," by Constance and Edward Garnett. Mr. Howells discusses at length Professor Wendell's "Literary History of America." He affords a curious illustration of the present decadence in the appreciation of prose style by the assertion that "the writer of the most distinction now writing English is Mr. Henry James." Distinction in style, if it means anything, means unflinching elegance and clarity. Could Mr. J. G. Fraser, to choose the first name that occurs to us out of many, have written "She was the absolute wreck of her storm, accordingly, but to which the pale ghost of a special sensibility still clung," or "Have you really such a fund of indulgence for Gilbert Long as we most of us, I gather—though, perhaps, in our blunders—seem to see it stick out again that he supposes?"?

The Caxton Magazine, of which the first number appeared in April, is announced as the Official Organ of the Institute of Printers and Kindred Trades of the British Empire. It is luxuriously got up, and has some interesting general notes in addition to its trade and technical articles. The artistic taste of America in the matter of magazines is held up to our admiration. "British experts who have studied the matter in the States tell us that the American public would not tolerate the cheaper class of article which sells in millions on this side." We wish the Caxton Magazine a prosperous career.

Correspondence.

THE LATE BISHOP OF OXFORD.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In sending Mr. E. A. Freeman's letters on the late Bishop of Oxford for publication in Literature on April 27, I see that I made the mistake of describing Professor Stubbs as having succeeded Mr. Freeman in his Professorship. Even in my haste I ought to have remembered that he preceded Mr. Freeman as Professor from 1866 to 1884. It was solely as Fellow of Trinity that he succeeded Mr. Freeman (in 1850). Owing to the exigencies of the press, I had no opportunity of correcting the proof. May I therefore add, in the interests of accuracy, that, in Mr. Freeman's letters, Burgermeisters is a misprint for Bürgermeisters, and Lindprand for Lindprand?

Yours faithfully,

Merton House, Cambridge.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE GUNPOWDER PLOT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your issue of to-day, Father John Gerard, S.J., ventures to assert, "Nor can it be said, as the reviewer has it, that 'Farmer' was Garnet's favourite alias. He was far better known as 'Waley' or 'Darcy.'"

In reply to this criticism, I can only say that a further examination of original authorities bearing upon his career leaves no other course open except for me again to record my opinion that "Farmer" was the favourite alias used by Henry Garnet. Moreover, this Jesuit was as well known by the names of "Roberts" or "Philips," as by "Waley" or "Darcy."

With all respect for Father Gerard's position as a critic of a subject upon which he has written much, he can hardly expect, nevertheless, to be accepted as possessing an exact knowledge with regard to the aliases employed by Garnet, since on referring to a copy of the Weekly Register of May 27th, 1899, I find that he volunteers, in its columns, the following information, the inaccuracy of which will be revealed by a reference to Volume 2 of the "State Trials" (page 218, &c.) :—

It is true that "Farmer" was an alias of Father Garnet's, but it was not one by which he was much known, not coming before the public at his trial, when he was frequently described as "Walley," sometimes as "Darcy," and sometimes as "Meaze," never, I think, as "Farmer."

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

April 27, 1901.

YOUR REVIEWER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Fr. Gerard and I have met before on this subject, and I had little difficulty in proving that Garnett's alias, "Farmer," was a well-known one and comes in his trial. I see he has forgotten this. Had he paid more attention to my "History of the English Jesuits" he would have seen on page 288 a letter of Sir Everard Digby to his wife in which he says, "Before I knew anything of the plot I did ask Mr. Farmer (Garnett) what the meaning of the Pope's Breve was," &c. I am sorry I only put three dots. In case of another edition I will put as many more as Fr. Gerard wants. If we do not understand the allusion to the "English tailor," that is no reason why we cannot understand the "Farmer" and the "Equivocator."

I am yours truly,

April 30, 1901.

ETHELRED L. TAUNTON.

MISATTRIBUTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The tracing of quotations to their originators is more interesting than the question of their accuracy. Does any one know the author of the saying that "No man can be in two places at once, unless he is a bird?" It is invariably attributed to Sir Boyle Roche, born 1743. Now Horace Walpole, writing to Sir Horace Mann in 1746, says, "I am in great pain for my eagle, now the Brest-fleet is thought to be upon the coast of Spain; but what do you mean by him and his pedestal filling three cases? Is he like the Irishman's bird, in two places at once?" It seems that Sir Boyle was merely quoting a well-known bull.

Yours faithfully,

April 25.

BUNGALOWS AND BUNGALOWS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—They say "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery." I ought to feel intensely flattered by Messrs. George E. Clare, M.S.A., and Walter G. Ross, A.R.I.B.A., architects. In their work entitled "Ideal Homes for the People," lately published in a second edition by Messrs. J. H. Clark and Co., Chelmsford, they have largely borrowed, without any acknowledgment to me, from my work "Bungalows and Country Residences," published by Mr. Batsford in 1891. I enclose some extracts, from which you will note the startling similarity of thought and expression.

Extracts from Preface of BUNGALOWS & COUNTRY RESIDENCES, by R. A. Briggs.

Extracts from Chap. III. IDEAL HOMES, by Messrs. George E. Clare, M.S.A., and Walter G. Ross, A.R.I.B.A.

What is a Bungalow?

Our imagination, if we have not travelled beyond Europe, immediately transports us to India, with its glaring sun and arid soil, to low, squat, rambling one-storied houses with wide verandahs, latticed windows, flat roofs

But this is not the kind of bungalow suitable for our climate, neither is it necessary that it should be a one-storied building or a country cottage. A cottage is a little house in the country, but a bungalow is a little country house.....

On this account bungalows are getting very popular, and appeal especially to people of moderate means in a city like ours, where the grime and the smoke, the bustle and the hurry make us long for the country and its freshness, where at a small expense we may pass a quiet week-end "far from the madding crowd" to strengthen us for the next week's toil.

What is a Bungalow?

Most people's minds, at the sound of the word, at once fly to India, and a picture is formed in which a squat building with only a ground floor, and covering a large area, with sun shutters and wide projecting eaves, verandah, and low-pitched roof forms the centre, a bungalow.

This, indeed, may be an Indian bungalow, but such would be altogether unsuited to the climate of this country.

It has been well said, "a cottage is a little house in the country, but a bungalow is a little country house," and this is the sense in which we use the word.

And what more necessary or delightful for the jaded city man, or the habitually over-worked professional man than to have a quiet retreat in the country, or on the seashore, to which to escape from the turmoil and worry of business for week-ends, there to gather fresh energies for the arduous and exacting work of the coming week.

I am, yours &c.,

R. A. BRIGGS.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

A collected edition of Mr. Robert Buchanan's poems is being published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus in two volumes. The same publishers issued a collected edition some ten or a dozen years ago in one volume, but Mr. Buchanan took this over when he started publishing on his own account. Now the collection has come back to Messrs. Chatto. The second volume of the new edition is made up of Mr. Buchanan's later poetry. Next week one of Mr. Buchanan's novels is appearing in a sixpenny edition—"Effie Hetherington," published by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

The new edition of Professor Skeat's "Concise Etymological Dictionary of the English Language" will be published almost immediately by the Oxford Press. It has passed through several editions since its first appearance in 1882, but the book has now been re-written and re-arranged from beginning to end, and words, hitherto relegated to a constantly increasing supplement, have been introduced into the body of the work. Another work which the Oxford Press will publish shortly is "The Legal Procedure of Cicero's Time," by Mr. A. H. J. Greenidge, whose "Infamia in Roman Public and Private Law" is also published by the Clarendon Press. Mr. Greenidge's deals first with civil procedure in the courts of the Monarchy and early Republic, and in the courts of the Ciceronian period; and in the second volume with criminal procedure—and concludes with appendices, notes, an index of subjects, and an index to passages in Cicero.

Mr. Arthur Machen, who is at present a member of Mr. Benson's theatrical company, has a book of literary criticism coming out shortly called "Hieroglyphics." His "Great God Pan" has been translated into French and recently appeared in Paris. Mr. Machen's work has a warm admirer in M. Maeterlinck.

The next volume to be published of the "Periods of European History" (Rivingtons) will be by Professor Lodge, of Edinburgh, and deals with the close of the Middle Ages, 1273-1494.

Last autumn Sir Michael Foster delivered the "Lane Lectures" at the Cooper Medical College, San Francisco, on "The History of Physiology during the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Century." They will be published by the Cambridge University Press in the Cambridge series of natural science manuals. Another volume in the same series is by Professor Marshall Ward, on "British Grasses," which is intended as a handbook for use in the field and laboratory. From the same house is to come the essay which gained the Sedgwick Prize for 1900—"Geological History of the Rivers of East Yorkshire," by F. R. Cowper Reed, assistant to the Woodwardian Professor of Geology.

"Our Country's Shells," which Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co. announce, is a new volume in the "Our Country's" Series, of which Flowers, Birds, Butterflies, and Moths have already appeared.

Canon Benham ("Peter Lombard") is preparing his recollections of men and affairs during the last half-century. The book will be published by Mr. George Allen.

Mrs. Brown Potter has acquired the sole London rights of Sudermann's Johannesfeuer, and will shortly produce the English version by Miss Alice Greeven and Mr. J. T. Grein.

In "Her Majesty's Minister," by Mr. William Le Queux, to be issued next week by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, the scenes are laid in Paris during the weeks just before the outbreak of the war in the Transvaal.

Mr. John Long has ready for immediate publication a new story by Mr. G. B. Burgin, entitled "A Son of Mammon."

NOTES AND NEWS.—The match by cable between Oxford and Cambridge and the Colleges of Yale, Princeton, Harvard, and Columbia was played on Friday and Saturday last. On the first day America won two games, and the match seemed as good as over. Then Mr. Colman (board 1), Mr. C. C. Wiles (board 2), and Mr. J. E. Wright, the Cambridge Senior Wrangler, played up well for England, and a drawn match was proposed by each side simultaneously and in identical terms, the telegrams crossing each other.

The promoters, or, perhaps, more correctly speaking, those responsible for the working arrangements, are getting tired of cable matches, especially when two come close together. And on the face of it there seems little utility in spending a lot of money to telegraph the moves of such matches several thousand miles. The representative contest is another matter and is no doubt useful in various ways. It appears that since the match suggestions have been made on the other side to somewhat modify the conditions of these inter-University matches. Eligibility to take part may be extended in any way by mutual agreement. But there is no promise of abandonment.

A good meeting of the Sussex Chess Association has just been held at Hastings. Yorkshire met at Leeds.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

In the present issue we begin, with Mr. W. E. Henley, the series, already announced, of "LITERATURE" PORTRAITS.

Next week considerable space will be devoted to recently published fiction. The Portrait to be published with this number will be that of Mr. Anthony Hope.

The Portrait will be accompanied by an account of Mr. Anthony Hope's literary work, written by Mr. Arthur Waugh.

Space will also be found in our next issue for the consideration of some recent Educational works.

Another of Dickens' favourite haunts has come into the market—his retreat on the edge of the forest of Hardelet, near Boulogne. Dickens loved Boulogne and its people—especially the excellent M. Beaucourt, his landlord—and in Forster's Life we have a delightful sketch of the three summers which he spent there, in 1853, '54, and '56. He returned in 1856 to begin the ninth part of "Little Dorrit," but spent the first few days working in his garden in the French farmer garb of blue blouse, leather belt, and military cap—which he declared was the only dress for complete comfort. Then, however, he wrote to Forster that he must "Now to work again—to work! The story lies before me, I hope, strong and clear. Not to be easily told; but nothing of that sort is to be easily told that I know of." It became his custom to work on until the afternoon, and then to lie down among the roses reading until after tea ("middle-aged Love in a blouse and belt" he called it), when he would go down to the pier. "The said pier at evening is a phase of the place we never see, and which I hardly know. But I never did behold such specimens of the youth of my country, male and female, as pervade that place. They are really, in their vulgarity and insolence, quite disheartening."

The house in which Dr. Johnson was born at Lichfield has been bought by the Corporation and is to be turned into a Johnson Museum. The lexicographer's life at Lichfield is not the best known or the most important period of his career, though it was there that he kept the school which George and David Garrick attended, and there that he composed the greater part of Irene. Some interesting light upon Johnson's personal relations with his Lichfield friends is thrown in some letters printed for the first time in this month's Cornhill, and noticed in our columns last week. The Mayor of Lichfield invites donations of Johnson relics.

Mr. George Gissing's introductions to the Rochester Edition of Dickens are excellent criticism, full of penetration and of fresh points of view, and all the better because he is thinking wholly of doing justice to his author and not of his own reputation as a wit or a phrase maker. We have read with delight his remarks on the "Old Curiosity Shop," just published. Three points particularly he states well—the effect produced, by sheer simplicity in Dickens' nature pictures; the limitations of Dickens' "radicalism," which was purely moral, not social—he did not wish to raise the poor, only to make them happy and good; and the real meaning of the alleged mawkishness of Little Nell's approaching end, which after all made Jeffrey weep and made Macready plead for her life "as for that of a loved relation."

* * * *

This is what Mr. Gissing says:—

The sentiment of Little Nell is that of "The May Queen." Towards the middle of our century poets, no less than inarticulate men, found pleasure in a pathos which now seems to us excessive. It was pursued to the utmost end of tearfulness; we see the May Queen reprieved from death that we may weep anew, and conventional piety lends all its aid to the emphasizing of a most approved emotion. Tennyson, of course, redeems his subject by the exquisite quality of his verse; Dickens is justified by the profound sincerity of his feeling and by his true sense of the picturesque. One would like to find a place, in literary criticism, for a pathos below the universal, a pathos which is relatively true; under such a head would fall these pictures of gentle and fading childhood. To dismiss with a scoff pages which came from the hearts of Tennyson and of Dickens is something worse than dullness. This pathos was true for them and for their day; it had nothing of affectation, nothing of conscious extravagance; and if the ends of art were imperfectly served, none the less did such work tend to civilization.

Mr. Kitton's topographical notes and Mr. Brimelow's topographical pictures also give great interest to this volume.

G. K. C. in the Daily News rather cleverly undertakes to prove that Lord Rosebery wrote the poems of Mr. W. B. Yeats. "The title of Mr. Yeats' chief prose work, 'The Secret Rose,' is an almost clumsily transparent disguise; it indicates at once 'the shy or modest rose'—hence 'Prim-rose,' and, again, the Rose which is Buried—hence Rosebery, and the word 'secret' itself, suggests that there is a mystery in the matter. When once we had so clear a nucleus as this, the rest might legitimately be more indirect. 'The Wind among the Reeds' would be held to mean the perturbation which Lord Rosebery's Imperialism would produce in the mind of Sir Robert Reid, while the remarkable selection of the rank in the peerage for 'the Countess Cathleen' deserves serious attention." Our readers will at once see what this is driving at, and it is really not a travesty of Baconian methods. Mr. Francis P. Gervais, who writes "Shakspeare not Bacon" (Unicorn Press, 7s. 6d. n.), is perhaps a little inclined also to work from a theory instead of to it, but his study of the annotations in Shakespeare's copy of Florio's Montaigne (now in the British Museum) is very useful, particularly in its admirably reproduced facsimiles from the fly-leaves of that book. The reader can form from them his own idea of the genuineness of the Shakespeare autograph, even if the evidence which connects the annotations with passages in the plays be not always convincing.

Mr. Leslie Stephen, in his article on "Romance and Science" in the Pall Mall Magazine, is disposed to attribute the ineffectualness of the present day in literature to the fact that the varying impulses characteristic of a rapidly-changing epoch are too distracting to be harmonized. But, after all, is the present epoch one of more rapid changes than the Elizabethan or that of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, which produced Dante? It has long been the fashion to speak of our own as an age of transition; but the difficulty really is to find an age that is not an age of transition. The supposed stability of past ages is an idea which is usually due to popular ignorance or theoretic generalization. When the historian comes to study these stable epochs carefully for himself he generally finds precisely those varying impulses and continual changes which the unhistorical person supposes to be a peculiarity of his own day.

The fashion of publishing biographical editions of the greater novelists, on the plan of Mrs. Ritchie's Thackeray and Mrs. Humphry Ward's Haworth Series, has been adopted in the United States, and Messrs. Doubleday, Page, and Co., of New York, have just issued—strictly, of course, for American consumption—a complete George Eliot, styled the "Personal Edition," in twelve volumes. The introductions, which are biographical and elucidatory rather than critical, are written by Mrs. Esther Wood, whose name is of frequent occurrence in the English art magazines. The volumes are rather liberally illustrated, with portraits and photographs of places identified with scenes in the novels. Among the former, the most interesting is the reproduction of a sketch of George Eliot by Mrs. Charles Bray. It was drawn in Marian Evans' Coventry days at the time of her intimacy with the Brays and Hennells, and has not hitherto been published.

A Bill for the Suppression of Small Type is at present before the New York State Legislature. Evidently the Americans do not approve of the maxim De minimis non curat lex, or have struck out some new translation of it. In a country in which the faddists clamour for laws to put down everything that they disapprove of, from cigarette smoking to kissing, there is nothing astonishing in the proposal, though the opposition which it encounters from the trade is not less natural. It is the thin end of the wedge, cry the publishers. Presently there will be laws against inferior paper and poorly reproduced pictures; but to put down these things would interfere with some of the most widely circulated of the American daily papers. Newspapers in difficulties, by the way, should start branch offices in the Greater City of New York. By an amendment to the Charter recently passed by the Legislature eight newspapers are to be subsidized to the extent of £5,000 a year each. Four are to be named by the Republicans and four by the Democrats. The ostensible object of this clause is to provide for city advertising.

AT THE BURIAL OF A DOG.

Small friend, of faithful heart and liquid eyes,
We give thee to our Mother Earth again,
And thank thee for thy friendship. We are men
Who pride ourselves that we are very wise:
We throw our glances upwards to the skies,
Yet cannot tell what death is. Even when Thy little spark of life escapes our ken,
We're left to grope in sad and blind surmise.
Dear dead companion! Would that thou could'st know
What human tears are shed above thy grave!
How humanlike we felt thy love to be!
How much to us thou wast, in weal and woe!
Thou merry, curious, willing little slave,
Half-human, wondrous, wond'ring mystery!

ARTHUR RANSOM.

Some high prices were reached at Messrs. Sotheby's at the beginning of this week. A copy of Sidney's "Astrophel and Stella" (1591) went for £200, and the same writer's "Defense of Poesie" (first edition, 1595, with curious marginal notes by a contemporary hand) fetched £120. Four other high prices were £74 10s. for probably the only copy in existence of Milton's tract on education (8 pp., 1644); £76 for "The History of Friar Rush" (1649); £67 for Higden's "Polychronicon" (a fine copy of De Worde's print of 1495); and £65 for Burns' "Poems" (a presentation copy from the author, 1794). Among other interesting books sold were Ben Jonson, "Q. Horatius Flaccus: His Art of Poetry," first edition, 1640, £36; Marvell, "S'too him Bayes," 1673, £14 10s.; Braithwaite, "The Arcadian Princesses," 1635, £21 10s.; Milton, "Poems, &c., upon Several Occasions," 1673, large paper copy, £6 15s.; "Areopagitica," a good copy of the first edition, £24 10s.; John Taylor, "An Englishman's Love to Bohemia," first edition, 1620, £15; Brome, "The Northern Lasse," 1632, £6; Greene, "Menaphon Camilla's Alarum," 1589, a slightly defective copy, £21; "A Briefe Unvailling of God and Man's Glory," 1641, a hitherto unknown volume, £10 10s.; Burton, "The Anatomy of Melancholy," first edition, 1621, in excellent preservation, £42; Ravenscroft, "A Brief Discourse on Music, &c.," 1614, £58; Montaigne, "The Essayes," 1603, a very fine copy of Florio's edition, £51; Denham, "Poems and Translations," 1668, £4 18s.; Cotgrave, "Wits Interpreter," 1671, £14 14s.; La Fontaine, "Contes et Nouvelles en Vers," Fermiers' Générax edition, 1762, £33 10s.; Shakespeare, "Macbeth," 1731, first Edinburgh edition, £30; Marmion (S.), "Cupid and Psyche," 1637, £39; Nabbes, "The Unfortunate Mother," 1640, Scott's copy with his autograph, £17; Rich (B.), "Fautes," 1606, £37; Beaumont and Fletcher, "The Wild-Goose Chase," first edition, 1652, £14 10s.; Munday, "Amadis de Gaule," 1619, £19; Killigrew, "Comedies and Tragedies," first edition, 1604, £29; Dryden, "Of Dramatic Poesie," first edition, 1668, £15; "The Conquest of Granada," first edition, 1672, £23; Porter, "The Scottish Chiefs," first edition, 1810. Thomas Campbell's copy, with his autograph, £27; Scott, "Peveril of the Peak," first edition, 1822, £2 5s.; Burney, "Evelina," first edition, 1778, £45; Rossetti, "Poems," 1870, large paper copy, £18; Allot, "England's Parnassus," first edition, 1600, £50; Painter, "The Palace of Pleasure," 2 vols., first edition, 1566-7, an exceptionally fine copy, £170; and "Henry VIII. and Luther" (1528), a very fine though slightly stained copy of Pynson's extremely rare print, £50.

The announcement that Mr. Murray's Handbooks are to be transferred to Mr. Stanford evokes memories and invites retrospect; for the name of Murray occupies in

The Growth of the Guide-book. the history of guide-books a place hardly less important than that of Fielding in the history of fiction, or that of Shakespeare in the history of the drama. There were guide-books before Murray's, and there have been guide-books after Murray's, which have, for certain purposes, supplanted them; but no other name marks an epoch so distinctly. Under our "Authors and Publishers" column will be found an account of the origin of these Handbooks. Let us here for a moment glance back—not troubling about Pausanias, but merely mentioning him to save any one the trouble of writing to us to draw attention to the omission—and see how matters stood before John Murray II. came into the field. What we find is not merely that the earlier guide-books were inadequate, but that they were very imperfectly differentiated from books of other sorts—from books of travel on the one hand and from gazetteers and topographical dictionaries on the other. To take the case of Switzerland, for example, the first guide-book, which appeared in 1684, Wagner's "Index Memorabilium Helvetiæ," is very much the same sort of book as Merian's "Topographia Helvetiæ," which is usually classed with gazetteers. With the publication of the "Délices" series—of which Abraham Ruchat's "Délices de la Suisse" (1714) is, perhaps the best known—a step forward is made by the abandonment of the Latin language, and the inclusion of introductory essays conveying instructive information. But the author is still bound by the traditions of the lexicon, and is more anxious to teach political geography than to give "tips" to tourists. The same may be said of the guides of Reichard (1785) and of Heidegger (1788-1794). Then we come to Ebel, whose guide, rendered into English by Daniel Wall, was the subject of an article in Literature not very long ago, and Mrs. Starke, and Bourrit, the so-called Historian of the Alps. They, at all events, were on the right track. In both Ebel and Bourrit we find the method of the itinerary and the method of the gazetteer combined. But they, still, were only feeling their way and learning their business. Taking up their work to-day one recognizes it at a glance as prentice work. In the case of John Murray, who started on his three years' travels in 1829, we feel, for the first time, that the work is structurally correct, and that all that is needed is to keep it up to date in the light of fresh discoveries and requirements. And this, as the world knows, has been done with all due diligence by thoroughly competent authorities. Not merely have the new hotels and railroads and steamboat services been promptly recognized, but changes in the tastes of travellers have been provided for. Here again we may take Switzerland for the purposes of illustration. In the first edition of the Swiss Handbook (1838) the climbing of mountains is pooh-poohed as a coarse, ungentlemanly habit. The latest editions are edited by the Rev. W. A. B. Coolidge, an ex-President of the Alpine Club, who tells you all the ways to the tops of all the mountains. It seems strange that handbooks displaying such elasticity should have had anything to fear from competition; but the needs of the modern traveller are manifold, and two particular kinds of competition must have made themselves felt. In the first place there arose the traveller who was more anxious about the satisfaction of his material needs than about the cultivation of his mind; and Karl Baedeker, with his marvellously accurate knowledge of the price of everything, spread his net for this traveller successfully. In the second place the demand arose for the specialized guide-book, dealing with a subject or a district with a particular attention which conditions of space made it impossible for the familiar red handbooks to give. Some of the best of these specialized guide-books have, indeed, been published in Albemarle-street. Mr. Whympers' Guides to Chamonix and Zermatt are instances. But, whoever published them, books like these—and books like Grant Allen's Historical Guides, and the Medieval Towns series—were bound to dispute the field with the excellent Series which first showed how guide-books ought to be put together.

Literature Portraits.—I.

W. E. HENLEY.

A gallery of "Literature Portraits" makes an apt, indeed an inevitable, beginning with Mr. Henley. In days when the empty amateur jostles the meticulous specialist for the publisher's favours, the figure of a man of letters in the true, wide-ranging sense hangs, deservedly, on the line. Mr. Henley—to escape from allusion to an institution he holds in some contempt—has cultivated his garden with care, but the parterre stretches afar. He has never directly essayed romance, preferring rather, as the Stevenson Letters convey, to be the wise counsellor of another. To conceive of him perpetrating "tushery," as Robert Louis Stevenson called it, is impossible; a regret that he has never tried to revitalize an age when the language had assumed a modern turn—the swelling times of Lord Chatham and General Wolfe, for example—is legitimate enough. But, romance excepted, Mr. Henley has created for himself a name in every accepted class of pure literature. A charity performance given recently at Her Majesty's Theatre reminds me that he was part-author, with Robert Louis Stevenson, of an admirable comedy of manners, Beau Austin. Why would the British public have little of it, as of their other essays in drama, Deacon Brodie, Admiral Guinea, and Robert Macaire, while it stertorously struggles for admittance to the "sound acting plays" of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones? The only explanation can be that that public is British. To round off the list of Mr. Henley's achievements, however, I may further define him as a poet, scholar, critic, and editor; a various man of letters indeed.

The classification may be adopted for convenience' sake, as giving, perhaps, the most naturally graduated view of Mr. Henley's individual genius. As poet, then, the custom is to rank him among the minors, with the admission, sometimes reluctant, more often enthusiastic, that he excels them all. But why a minor? Because few slim volumes contain his verses, not many fat tomes? That is a linendraper's reason. Because in much of his poetry the delicacy of the workmanship appeals rather than any manifest stroke for effect? To belittlement of that kind there comes the obvious rejoinder that in many of the forms affected by Mr. Henley—the rondeau, for example—robust handling would be as much out of place as a pom-pom upon a Chippendale chair. Taken for what they were intended to be, his less studied efforts, "We'll go no more a roving by the light of the moon," or "You played and sang a snatch of song," are perfect in their styles. Has that familiar topic, the transitoriness of the actor's art, ever been more cunningly developed than in the ballade beginning "Where are the passions they essayed?" I know not where to find it. Let me pass, however, to the poems in which Mr. Henley is more conspicuously himself—those, namely, through which throbs the suppressed cry of physical pain, of retrospective passion, or of absolute horror. You get it in "Clinical," the most arrestive of the series entitled "In Hospital," placed in audacious contrast, as a part of a whole, with "Staff Nurse: New Style." It grips you, again, in "Or ever the knightly years were gone," of the series called "Life and Death (Echoes)"; a flawless creation in rhythm besides. Once more it makes you turn cold in that Hogarthian address to the gallows, "Tree, old Tree, of the Triple Crook." And in the power of juggling with the emotions at will consists, upon reflection, the conjuring art of Mr. Henley's most sustained accomplishment, and his best; the "London Voluntaries." That descriptive of the Strand on an October afternoon, "golden, all golden," is the most admired perhaps; but the Spirit of the town beckons, too, from the inspired survey of London at sunrise:—

And behold.

A rakehell cat—how furtive and acold,
A spent witch homing from some infamous dance—
Obscene, quick-trotting, see her tip and fade
Through shadowy railings into a pit of shade.

The greatest of the Elizabethans would surely not have disdained that gesture of concentrated strength. In the "Song of the Sword," lastly, is to be discovered Mr. Henley's grand manner, biblical, Joblike; and the grand manner, too, informs his last volume, "For England's Sake." He has never scaled the heights of metre more triumphantly than in the first of the two; the collection seemed, somehow, to be too much the boisterous offspring of the occasion to be quite successful, and in the allusions to "God" and "the Law" there are sounded an unconscious echo of Mr. Kipling. But to confess to preferences in a poet's work has never been held inconsistent with a belief in his uncommon greatness.

As a scholar Mr. Henley is distinguished by taste rather than laborious research. He does not belong to that molelike class which routs among parish registers to prove the early biographer of some Elizabethan to have been out in a date of birth by at least a fortnight. He would probably deny to the literary detective the title of scholar altogether. But he has assuredly equipped himself with a knowledge of English literature, since it became a literature, as broad as intimate; a knowledge confined to no period, nor restricted in subject, though history would always interest him most on the side of manners. Sometimes he has been content to plan, as with the "Tudor Translations" and their masterly introductions, such as Mr. Charles Whibley's notable appreciation of Rabelais. His private catholicity of judgment guided him through his anthologies—the "English Lyrics" and "A London Garland," "A Book of English Prose," selected in conjunction with Mr. Charles Whibley, and the "Lyra Heroica," an incomparable book of verse for boys. Mr. Henley is pontifical in his wrath; it pleased him, for example, to deny to De Quincey the title to write English prose. Yet sanity of criticism, combined with a downward stroke of a phrase into the heart of things, are the impressions to be carried away from a reperusal of his "Views and Reviews." Their author described them as "the shot rubbish of some fourteen years of journalism." They are perfect cameos, with the features drawn by a humorous, yet not unkindly, hand. Herrick's eye for a milkmaid, Izaak Walton's nose for his dinner: such are the human weaknesses upon which Mr. Henley delights to dwell awhile. Now that Borrow has been edited and biographed to weariness, the freshness of the estimate of him in "Views and Reviews" comes like a whiff from one of his own wood fires. Mr. Henley's crowning accomplishment as a critic of modern letters was, however, to reveal Mr. George Meredith to a generation that knew him not. The courage of that essay—a courage perfectly compatible with alertness to demerits—is hardly more remarkable than the complete acceptance of the verdict nowadays. One remembers the outcry, nevertheless; "Oh, he would have us believe that 'Rhoda Fleming' is equal to Webster and 'The Egoist' to Tartuffe"—a most stupid misreading of Mr. Henley. But then Mr. Henley rejoices in literary combat, like any member of that prize-ring on which he waxes so enthusiastic. He lustily smote the "common Burnsites" in his terminal essay to Mr. T. F. Henderson's centenary edition of Burns, and the pack bit back. The worthy bailies who regard the bard as an excuse for copious potations on Burns night were sorely scandalized. He gave them withal the true Burns, and the Burns that Scotland will one day recognize. As Professor of Literature at a Scots University Mr. Henley would have exercised a most wit-sharpening influence on his class. He might have scandalized it, but young men do not really mind that; he would also have made it, in his own phrase, much to perpend.

Literary fortune has so willed it that Mr. Henley has been another Dr. Johnson, surrounded by a set of young writers who have worshipped him, and whom he has formed or, at any rate, inspired. London, the Magazine of Art, the Scots afterwards the National Observer, the New Review—that is a list of his journals as given in the reference books. If the discovery of talent be the chief merit of an editor, then Mr. Henley is certainly a great editor. Mr. Charles Whibley, Sir Herbert Stephen, Mr. Harold Parsons, Mr. Vernon Blackburn, and the late G. W. Stevens wrote week by week in the National Observer. His staff gave him of their best; Mr. George Street has never quite touched his "Autobiography of a Boy" again, nor Mr. Arthur Morrison his "Tales of Mean Streets," nor Mr. Marriott-Watson his collection of stories entitled "Diogenes in London." In the National Observer, too, Mr. Kipling's "Barrack-Room Ballads" first appeared. If the paper never attained a wide circulation, it never aimed at that valuable commercial asset. The British public flinches from cleverness, more particularly when it suspects that cleverness to be directed at itself and its most revered institutions, the Royal Academy, the Lyceum Theatre, even—the impiety of it!—the City Temple. Yet those capable of appreciating fine wit, seasoned with sound Toryism—for Mr. Frederick Greenwood contributed the first leading article for some time—read their National Observer, despite its "Observerese"; while those who affected discrimination talked about the journal. And quite the wittiest sallies were Mr. Henley's own; parody in verse composed at top-speed to fill up a corner, or fugitive essays to which their author never paid a second thought. In the New Review there appeared "The Nigger of the Narcissus" by Mr. Joseph Conrad, and many excellent pieces such as Mr. Stevens' "The New Gibbon." Mr. Henley conducts no journal for the moment; but it is difficult to believe that his talent for literary direction will long remain idle, and when the opportunity comes he has but to summon his friends about him. He must always remain, in any case, a great literary personage, recalling Drayton's eulogy—with due translation from the past into the present—of Kit Marlowe, who—bathed in Thespian springs

Had in him those brave translunary things
That your first poets had: his raptures were
All air and fire, which made his verses clear;
For that fine madness still he did retain
Which rightly should possess a poet's brain.

LLOYD SANDERS.

So far as circulation is concerned Mr. Henley can take rank as one of the most successful poets of the day. His friend and publisher, Mr. Nutt, issued his "Book of Verses"—beginning with the "Rhymes and Rhythms" written while in hospital—in 1888, and the collection still finds a ready sale both in its original form (now in a fifth edition) and bound up with his later volume, "London Voluntaries, and Other Verses," which includes his "Song of the Sword." These, with his patriotic series of war-songs, published and reprinted last year, give him an average of close upon 1,000 copies a year for the past ten or twelve years—a steady sale which few of our present-day poets can command. Yet in the personal preface to his "Poems" (1898)—the six-shilling edition of his "Book of Verses" and "London Voluntaries," bound in one volume, which includes a photograph of the author's bust, by Rodin—Mr. Henley confesses that, after spending the better part of his life in the pursuit of poetry, he found himself (about 1877) so utterly unmarketable that he had determined to devote himself for the next ten years to journalism. The turning-point came, in 1888, with the appearance, in a little book of "Voluntaries"—produced in aid of one of the East-end hospitals.

Mr. Henley has himself described its contents:—"those unrhyming rhymes in which I had tried to quintessentialize, as (I believe) one scarce can do in rhyme, my memories of the old Edinburgh Infirmary. They had long since been rejected by every editor of standing in London—I had well-nigh said in the world; but as soon as Mr. Nutt had read them he entreated me to look for more. I did as I was told; old dusty sheaves were dragged to light; the work of selection and correction was begun; I burned much; I found that, after all, the lyrical instinct of the poet had slept—not died; I ventured (in brief) 'A Book of Verses.' It was received with so much interest that I took heart once more, and wrote the numbers presently reprinted from the National Observer in the collection first (1892) called 'The Song of the Sword' and afterwards 'London Voluntaries.' If I have said nothing since, it is because I have nothing to say which is not, as yet, too personal—too personal and too afflicting—for utterance."

Mr. Nutt now has another volume of Mr. Henley's poems in the press, entitled "Hawthorn and Lavender." In other departments of literature he has long been associated with Mr.

Nutt—as editor of the magnificent series of “Tudor Translations,” as well as with his volume of essays, “Views and Reviews” (second edition, 1892), and his well-known selection of verse for boys, entitled “Lyra Heroica,” which, in its library and school editions, has run into 25,000 or 30,000 copies. A little volume of “Notes and Elucidations” to Mr. Henley’s Anthology, by W. W. Greg and L. C. Cornford, was published by Mr. Nutt last year. It was with the same publisher that the three plays of W. E. Henley and R. L. Stevenson—“Deacon Brodie,” “Beau Austin,” and “Admiral Guinea”—were originally published; but these were taken over by Mr. Heinemann, who issued Henley and Stevenson’s “Macaire: A melodramatic farce in three acts and in prose,” in 1895. The plays can still be bought in their original form, bound together in the half-guinea volume, or separately. Mr. Henley also figures in Mr. Heinemann’s list with “The Poetry of Wilfrid Blunt,” which he selected and arranged with Mr. George Wyndham—besides writing the introduction—and with the quaterzains which he supplied to Mr. William Nicholson’s album of “London Types,” published in the same year, 1898. Mr. Henley, by the way, is to have his portrait painted by Mr. Nicholson, who was one of his discoveries while editor of the New Review. With Messrs. Methuen he issued his selection of “English Lyrics,” from Chaucer to Poe, now out of print in six-shilling form but obtainable in a cheaper edition; and the “Book of English Prose,” collected with Mr. Charles Whibley, and forming a sort of companion volume to “Lyra Heroica”; he has also edited for them a short series of English classics which includes “Tristram Shandy,” Congreve’s Comedies, Walton’s Lives, and Johnson’s Lives of the Poets. With Messrs. Macmillan he is represented by his “London Garland” (1895), selected from five centuries of English verse, with pictures by members of the Society of Illustrators; and with Messrs. Constable by the critical essay to their handsome library edition of Smollett’s works, the last volume of which will be published within the next few weeks.

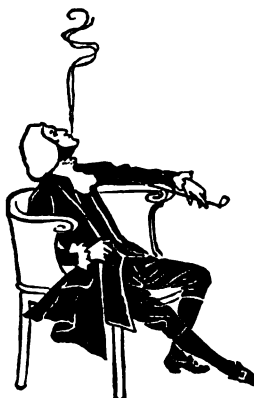

It would take up considerably more space than we could afford to complete the list of Mr. Henley’s works, but mention must be made of the splendid “Centenary” Burns, in four volumes, which he edited with Mr. T. F. Henderson for Messrs. Whittaker and Co.; the “Memorial Catalogue of the French and Dutch Loan Collection, Edinburgh International Exhibition,” in which he gave an account of the rise of Romanticism, biographies of the principal masters of that school, and a description of each of the pictures (published by David Douglas, Edinburgh); and “A Century of Artists: A Memorial of the Glasgow International Exhibition,” to which he supplied a history and biographical notes (published in 1898 by Messrs. Maclehoose and Sons, Glasgow).

One can imagine how the paragraphist would sharpen his wits at the suggestion of an English “Poets’ Congress.” In France they take the interests of literature more seriously, and such a congress is to be held in Paris on May 27, under the double presidency of M. Sully-Prudhomme and M. Leon Dierx. The questions to be dealt with will be “literary decentralization,”—we may expect a curious struggle between the academic spirit and that of the felibriges—“the diffusion of poetry,” “the new schools and classical poetry,” &c. The main discussion will, no doubt, turn upon M. Sully-Prudhomme’s ideas recently expressed in the apology pro domo, which he has brought out under the title “Testament Poétique” (Lemerre). This book contains the academic view of poetry and the problems of versification; and has been constantly attacked in the Mercur de France, which is the tribune of the apostles of the vers libre. It is not an ars poetica, but an attractive little treatise on the nature of poetic expression.

The Thrush this month contains one real poem among its meritorious exercises in verse. Lady Margaret Sackville’s “Harmodius and Aristogeiton” is imitative, no doubt. Here and there it is astonishingly like Mr. Swinburne—and Mr. Swinburne not far from his best. But it is strong and not weak imitation. And the form is, after all, well suited to the matter. One of the tests of great poetry is—Does it make you want to read it aloud? Does it awaken emotion which must find an outlet? These stanzas certainly demand to be read aloud, and they bear reading aloud. Lady Margaret Sackville has shown a pretty knack of versifying (a poem by her appeared in Literature not long ago), but nothing she has published before now suggested that she had such a fine talent as clearly went to the making of “Harmodius and Aristogeiton.”

THE UNDERGRADUATE PRESS.

A “Personal View.”

To those who know how many are the multifarious occupations of the transient Oxonian undergraduate it may be at first sight surprising that he should have time, in his harassed life, for amateur journalism or the writing and editing of magazines. But the time, after all, is not taken from his amusements: and, what with the normal cacoethes scribendi and the modern necessity for representative organs, it was some time ago obvious that studious youth, like the rest of the world, must have its own academic mouthpieces. Hence the remarkable number of newspapers which have appeared at Oxford during the past quarter of a century. Twenty-five years ago or more the melodious bursts of modern academic journalism were preluded by the occasionally brilliant “Shotover Papers,” and a very inadequate publication entitled “The Oxford and Cambridge Undergraduates’ Journal,” which was not calculated to leave any abiding traces in history. With the early eighties a new era began: the spring of 1883 witnessed the birth of the Oxford Magazine (which does not really fall within the scope of the present paper, as its managers have never intended to appeal to undergraduates alone, and have consistently recognized the existence of Dons): two years later came the shortlived Oxford Review—which had nothing in common with its modern namesake—edited for a time by one of the “Shotover Papers” band. After these there appeared from time to time a host of publications, sometimes enduring, more often ephemeral—Isis, X., J. C. R., Blue, ‘Varsity among others: not to mention occasional jeux d’esprit like the Rattle of agreeable memory, which used to enliven the Eights and Torpids.

But whatever its name, the purely undergraduate paper, even when, as is sometimes the case, it is managed by men nearer middle age than youth, retains the same strongly-marked characteristics. It relies largely on the little jokes of little cliques, and on a curious kind of hero-worship: every week the public is provided with a description, often illustrated, of an “idol” who is usually an athlete of more or less distinction, much less often a prominent Union orator. On the whole the model is the “Society” paper, English or American; and just as, at any rate in England, the social chronicle is compelled by public opinion to stop short at the line which separates the spicy from the libellous, so the academic organ is generally controlled by the fear of bodily assault—a kind of wild justice which, as the annals of an ancient and honourable House will bear witness, has at least once been meted out with salutary effect. But with these limitations personalities hold the field. Here, in fact, these papers find their reason of existence: for indeed they are at present sadly to seek in some other respects. They do not generally add much to the discussion even of those burning questions which periodically agitate the athletic world. Matters of real interest to their special clientèle are seldom noticed in their columns and still less frequently treated with any ability: their leading articles are slight and not usually well written. It is too much to expect wit and humour, which cannot be commanded: at present (the falling-off is, one hopes, only temporary) the first is non-existent, and the second is not conspicuous. Undergraduates are generally light-hearted, but seldom humourists: they joke "with deeficulty": and among their many versifiers the meritorious are few and far between. But the "Man" likes to chaff his friends in print as he does in ordinary conversation. That is, generally speaking, his idea of a joke. His journals are full of obscure paragraphs and esoteric allusions which will one day be the despair of history: "Ask Mr. * * * how much he lost at loo": "He thought he had, but you know he really hadn't": "So it was the Proggins, after all!" These coruscations, φωσφάντα συγγραμμάτων, are written with gusto and read apparently with avidity: for more than one undergraduate paper—not only the deservedly admired Granta, which has really very high claims to popularity—has been, I believe, quite a financial success in a small way. It certainly argues a peculiar condition of public taste.

But it must not be supposed that young Oxford when it puts pen to paper is always aping the modern Society Press. Juvenility has other and more enduring phases: there are other ambitions, perhaps more congenial and proper to the young. It is a new thing for the undergraduate to dabble in amateur journalism: literature, not journalism, is his real mistress: as long as youth is youth, so long will it entertain serious literary aspirations, and so long will its essays be prompted by periodical attacks of "Welt Schmerz" in one form or another, and modelled on whatever master is the favourite of the time—be it Byron or Carlyle or Arnold or Pater. Just now there is apparently a "boom" in high-toned literary effort. Neither of those two recent Oxford publications, the Quad and the Pipe, appears to have anything in common with the sober Oxford Magazine and the still sedater Cambridge Review—let alone such undergraduate organs as have been mentioned; nor, indeed, except for a certain youthful crudity of style which characterizes most of their articles, have these periodicals anything specially Oxonian about them. They appeal rather to the world of educated men. The Pipe is a pretty and unassuming little collection of harmless verse and entirely innocuous prose, appearing, it would seem, twice in each term. It is evidently well-meaning: its articles have the crowning merit of brevity: and its gentleness and simplicity disarm "the Critic in his hideous hardihood" (I quote from the fervid pages of the other publication). In short, the Pipe is the pipe of peace.

The Quad, on the other hand (yet why Quad? in what happy quadrangle may such delightful discourses be heard?), specializes in hammering the British Philistine: and, except when Professor York Powell and Mr. Edmond Holmes "oblige" with some very charming verses, it is largely redolent of youthful "superiority," like that most superior of all papers, the Cambridge Observer. Some of its young men are simply steeped in Culture. They sit in serene tranquillity cultivating the Beautiful and the Precious: "holding no form of creed but contemplating all," if one may quote Tennyson, whom they despise. They have got a long way beyond him, and Browning: beyond Wagner, and Ibsen, and Anthony Hope, and Mr. Tree's Julius Cæsar: in fact, beyond everybody and everything, even the poor old Æsthetic movement, which is really responsible for this kind of chatter. At their best, they parody Pater—some part of whose work they appear to have read—with considerable cleverness: "A Surrender" looks serious, but is perhaps only an elaborate joke: if so, it is a very good one. At their worst, their criticisms of Art and Life (which are frequent, and painful, and free) glitter with all the wealth of epigram and paradox and rhetorical embellishment in general which usually adorns an undergraduates' Essay Society. Hear, for instance, this very gracious fooling:—

But to proceed. The "In Memoriam" is perpetually referred to as the final word on religion, on ethics, on morals, on personal immortality and most other serious problems: it is hailed as typical of the nineteenth century. It is. And can one say a worse thing for it? Characterized by the rapid hesitation of knock-kneed Agnosticism, and the strange helplessness of scientific ignorance, it is a pitiful illustration of the truth, that, if the blind lead the blind, they both fall into the ditch of Darwin.

It is [replies the superior critic]; but so is the Satyricon of Petronius Arbiter: but I would give neither to the young person: yet, better Petronius than Tennyson, as moral miasma is less deadly than spiritual paralysis.

To write like this, yet not, as one hopes, to be irreclaimably foolish, is the delightful privilege of the young. It will not last long: they will go out into the cold world, or at least read something more than what they now regrettably describe as "That little epilegomena of Pater's": and they will become reasonable and quite uninteresting persons, and cease to contribute to the gaiety of nations. But for the present, sunk as they are in the "Deep pessimism of all Oxford undergraduates of thought and culture," they are often exceedingly entertaining: as the undergraduate generally is,—when he is serious.

A. D. GODLEY.

BOOKSELLING A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

Old-time publishers—who were booksellers as well for the most part—had little need of the societies which these later days of keener competition have called forth to protect trade interests. The Publishers' and Booksellers' Associations did not exist in 1801. This week, however, the publishers and booksellers have, in modern fashion, cemented at the dinner table the union of hearts which has resulted from the success of the "net system." This is in accordance with the traditions of the book world a hundred years ago, when "trade sales" were the order of the day, and catalogues included such alluring baits as "there will be a glass of good wine and a handsome supper," or "the whole company will be entertained with a breakfast; at noon with a good dinner; then proceed with the sale, to finish the same evening." New books as well as old were sold under these pleasant conditions; and no doubt the nuts and wine helped to settle many a delicate commercial question. This amiable custom is said to date from the days of "Good Queen Bess." It was still in vogue not more than thirty or forty years ago, but has latterly become virtually extinct.

A hundred years ago, too, booksellers and publishers had their literary clubs—haunting the Chapter Coffee House in Paternoster-row and other convivial meeting places, just as lawyers and authors frequented the Fleet-street taverns, and there planning partnerships which led to the production of many an important work. It was thus that Johnson's "Lives of the Poets" came to life at a yet earlier period. The "Lives" were the outcome of the famous meeting of forty members of the London book trade—alarmed by the invasion of the cheap 1777 edition of the British Poets issued by John Bell of the Strand. Donaldson of Edinburgh was the pioneer of cheap reprints of popular authors, but it was John Bell of "Bell's Messenger"—"the very Puck of booksellers," as Charles Knight calls him in his "Shadows of the Old Booksellers"—who seems to have been the chief renegade from the trade point of view. "He was a plain man," wrote Leigh Hunt, "with a red face, and a nose exaggerated by intemperance; and yet there was something not unpleasing in his countenance, especially when he spoke. He had sparkling black eyes, a good-natured smile, gentlemanly manners, and one of the most agreeable voices I ever heard. He had no acquirements, perhaps not even grammar; but his taste in putting forth a publication and getting the best artists to adorn it was new in those times, and may be admired in any." The custom of dividing the expense of a book among different publishers is not altogether unknown to-day, though practically obsolete. Years ago the publication of an important work would sometimes be divided into as many as 100 or even 200 shares—each partner being liable for his portion of the cost—and the shares were frequently sold by auction. Early in the last century, for instance, there was a sale of nearly 1,000 of these shares, one 26th "Tom Jones" fetching £8; one 100th Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," £11; one 160th "Johnson's Dictionary," £5, and so on. The golden age for publishers, when books were few and costly, and the "remainder" man was unknown, was little more than a memory even in 1801. The first half of the eighteenth century had yielded an average of but 93 new British books a year; for the first twenty-seven years of the nineteenth century the annual output had grown to 588—modest enough when one remembers the 5,000 odd volumes published in this country last year alone, but sufficient to introduce more of the speculative spirit into the business.

A band of "Associated Booksellers" had just been formed when the year 1801 was born, and Thomas Hood—father of the poet—and James Lackington were among its members. Lackington, having made his fortune by "remainders," went on long bookselling tours of inspection, and in his curious autobiography has left us some valuable sketches of the book-trade as he found it in different parts of the country. Travelling from London to Edinburgh by way of York and Newcastle-on-Tyne and returning through Glasgow, Carlisle, Leeds, and Manchester, he states that he

Was much surprised, as well as disappointed, at meeting with very few of the works of the most esteemed authors, and those few consisted in general of ordinary editions, besides an assemblage of common trifling books, bound in sheep; and that, too, in a very bad manner. It is true, at York and Leeds, there were a few (and but very few) good books; but in all the other towns between London and Edinburgh nothing but trash was to be found; in the latter city, indeed, a few capital articles are kept, but in no other part of Scotland.

A year or two later he tried the West of England and found matters just as bad; London was "the grand emporium of Great Britain for books, engrossing nearly the whole of what is valuable in that very extensive, beneficial, and lucrative branch of trade." Lackington had been a journeyman shoemaker at Bristol and other places in the West of England, and he amused himself when he made his tour as a successful bookseller by calling on his old masters and addressing each with "Pray, Sir, have you got any occasion?" which, he explains in his autobiography, was the term then used by journeymen shoemakers when seeking employment. "Most of these honest men had quite forgotten my person, as many of them had not seen me since I worked for them; so that it is not easy for you to conceive with what surprise they gazed on me. For you must know that I had the vanity (I call it humour) to do this in my chariot, attended by my servants; and on telling them who I was all appeared to be very happy to see me." Had Lackington postponed his tour a year or two he might have been more favourably impressed with the bookselling work that was being done in at least one of these West of England towns, for it was within the next few years that Joseph Cottle, of Bristol—who was something of a poet himself as well as a bookseller—became acquainted with Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, and Lamb, and assisted them on the road to fame when they stood most in need of a helping hand. In his "Biographia Literaria" Coleridge refers to Cottle as "a friend from whom I never received any advice that was not wise, or a remonstrance that was not gentle and affectionate." But Cottle undid much of the good he had done when he published his volume of recollections a year or so after Coleridge's death, giving to the world his distressing details of the poet's opium mania. In the year 1800 the house of Longman bought the copyrights belonging to the Bristol bookseller, but made him a present of the "Lyrical Ballads," and Cottle, in turn, handed on the copyright to Wordsworth. Although the "Ballads" were then set down as being of little pecuniary value, Cottle describes the gift as having been made with Thomas Longman's "accustomed generosity." Cottle, after giving up his Bristol business, devoted more of his time to writing indifferent verse—one of his volumes of poems appeared in 1801—and drew upon himself in consequence the bitter satire of Byron.

A word in conclusion as to the publishing houses of 1801. The house of Longman—then Messrs. Longman and Rees—was already seventy-six years old when it took over Cottle's copyright. It stood, as it stands to-day, on the site occupied by the two ancient bookselling houses bought by Thomas Longman the First in 1724—"The Ship" and "The Black Swan"—which had been amalgamated by William Taylor through the profitable returns of "Robinson Crusoe." "Rivingtons," however, can trace their publishing pedigree back to an even earlier date, having been founded in 1711. The house of Murray was little more than thirty years old in 1801; John Murray the second had not long attained his majority and the firm was still known as Highley and Murray, Mr. Highley having been admitted to a partnership by the executors of the founder of the business. Two years later, however, the partners agreed to separate, but in a perfectly friendly manner, and drew lots for the old house in Fleet-street—"No. 32, over-against St. Dunstan's." The old home fell to the younger partner, and here it was in 1812 that Byron used to drop in while "Childe Harold" was being printed, his great amusement being to make thrusts at the "spruce books," as he called them, which Murray had arranged upon his shelves. Murray moved to Albemarle-street ten years later, and Highley, who had taken a shop at No. 24, Fleet-street, returned to No. 32. Archibald Constable, the Edinburgh potentate, had begun his publishing career seventeen years before. In 1800 he started his Farmer's Magazine; a year later he took over the Scots Magazine—first edited for him by Leyden—and in 1802 came his first number of the Edinburgh Review. Scott had but lately taken to literature, but it was not long before he joined the brilliant band of contributors to the new Review. The house of Blackwood was then unknown. William Blackwood, the founder, was compiling book-catalogues in London at the time, but he returned to Edinburgh in 1804, and started publishing on his own account six years later. Another famous old Edinburgh house which still continues its prosperous career is that of Messrs. A. and C. Black, which dates back to 1807—the year in which Henry Colburn, for whom Coventry Patmore's father for some time acted as Reader, founded the firm of Hurst and Blackett.

THE SWORD IN FACT AND FICTION.*

Black and lean, gray and cruel,
Short-hilted, long-shafted
I froze into steel.

—The Song of the Sword.

The bibliography of serious works on Swordsmanship is almost as interesting reading as those many chapters in ancient and modern romance in which the duel forms a natural crisis in the hero's fate. It has hitherto appeared almost impossible to get the breathless author to interest himself sufficiently in the accuracies of Fence. The triumphant issue is his main pre-occupation; that, and the lust of single-combat or the feverish thirst for honour:—

Making death beautiful,
Life but a coin
To be staked in the pastime.

But his readers are now in a position to ask for something more. They will no longer be content with twentieth-century Fencing in a sixteenth-century combat, or even with a "colichemarde" when the rapier was your only blade. Theatrical managers have, indeed, begun to recognize their obvious duty. Their chance came when the public was revelling in that mighty quartet of swashbucklers, D'Artagnan and his Musketeers. For once we really saw the old long rapier correctly used. There is even hope that when next the play of Hamlet makes its reappearance, the foils will not be the usual four-sided anachronisms with a style of fence that would be as unsuitable to Shakespeare's days as to any Prince of Denmark, and that a due observance will be given to the use made by Elizabethan fighters of the left hand. This was evidently well-known to the writer of the duel-scene, as the finale is incomprehensible without it. An equal care may be expected when next the gallant Mercutio makes a pass with Tybalt, and reckless Romeo avenges him. After the publication of Captain Hutton's comprehensive and interesting volume, errors in swordsmanship, whether in fiction or on the stage, can be no longer tolerated. Every critic will have the right guards and lunges at his fingers' ends—even literally so, it may be hoped, in these days of the Renaissance of the Sword—and authors or acting managers will be duly scourged for inattention. Captain Hutton has chosen the best method possible for enlisting the interest both of that bugbear "the general reader" and of the more negligible expert. His enticing chapters are not merely a dry catalogue of the weapons appropriate to every age of single-combat, but illustrate each development of the sword by a description of some actual contest in which it was employed. The book makes an epoch in the literature of the Sword as clearly as that immortal little volume, by the Baron de Bazancourt, did in the history of Fencing.

What a fascinating literature is this! To go far outside English writings were impossible here. But from the legends of Excalibur to the tale of Durandana, the blade which dying Roland broke in the fatal defiles of Roncesvalles, and on to that "Song of the Sword," which our modern English poet has sung, the theme has appealed to every great writer in every age of literature and action:—

Stripped and adust
In a stubble of empire,
Scything and binding
The full sheaves of sovereignty, the swordsmen of the centuries when villainous saltpetre had not beclouded every battlefield stand out against the skyline of many an historic sunset. Then man had to hew and thrust with man, the mailed knight bludgeoning his armoured adversary, the light-clad man-at-arms wielding a blade that was as much his protection as his means of attack. Nor was it on the set fields of Chivalry alone that the prestance of the sword was paramount. Then, and in many centuries afterwards, a man carried his honour in a sheath at his side, and saw that it was kept untarnished from the world. The very sight of those ancient weapons inspired Don Quixote to that most pathetic of all humorous pilgrimages. "First of all," writes Thomas Shelton, the translator, "he caused certaine old rusty armes to be scoured, that belonged to his greatgrandfather." The Spanish original was first printed in 1605, just at the time when that long series of works connected with the name of Don Luis Pacheco de Narvaez had begun the literature of Spanish fencing in the seventeenth century. True, other ponderous Aristotelian treatises had appeared some forty years before in the "Filosofia" of Carranza, and there is a publication (in Perpignan) as old as 1474, by one Jayme Pons. But Narvaez is sufficient for our purpose, and his juxtaposition with Don Quixote in the preceding lines will be found excusable enough by any one who cares to investigate the encyclopædic artificialities of his elaborate tomes.

No greater contrast can be imagined than the practical advice published for Englishmen by those stanch Tories George and Toby Silver at the end of the sixteenth century or by Joseph Swetnam at the beginning of the seventeenth. It is a characteristic fact that the earliest treatise in this language on the subject is a poem on the use of the two-handed sword, described so truly by Scott in "Anne of Geierstein," which is to be found in one of the fifteenth-century Harleian manuscripts. But the ire of the Silvers and their compatriots had been chiefly aroused by the volumes produced in London in 1594 and 1595 by two "finicking Italians," called Giacomo di Grassi and Vincentio Saviolo. The resentment of our hardy Elizabethan ancestors was seldom confined to literary methods of controversy, and we find that the unlucky foreigners have "their legs strake from under them," and "their bodies soundly jumped on," during the course of various heated arguments between the masters of the rival schools. When, in that epitome of life and knowledge which is Shakespeare, Italians show their skill of fence, the playwright displays as great a knowledge of Di Grassi or of Saviolo, as of Silver, and seems equally well acquainted with the principles on which were founded the magnificent volumes by Marozzo and Agrippa of some twenty years before. There is, indeed, the same extraordinary combination of wide theoretical learning with profoundly accurate observation and experience in Shakespeare's fencing that there is in all his work. Silver had described how Austen Bagger, "carrying the valiant hart of an Englishman," had addressed Signor Rocco, the Italian, as "thou that takest upon thee to hit anie Englishman with a thrust upon anie button . . ." (Paradoxe of Defence). And what do we find in Romeo and Juliet? Not merely a definition of the Art of Fence that has never needed to be extended or improved, but the very echo of this same ringing scorn of all new-fangled "frog pricklers."—Here is the passage:—

O, he's a courageous captain of complements: he fights as you sing prick-song, keeps time, distance, and proportion; rests me his minim rest; one, two, and the third in your bosom: the very butcher of a silk button; a gentleman of the very first house, of the first and second cause: ah! the immortal passado! the punto reverso, the hay!

It may be noted that the Aristotelian flavour of "the first and second cause" is an addition to the English and Italian sources of knowledge already suggested; for it is obviously taken from the Spanish theories which I mentioned above. After 1617, the century comes to a brilliant close with Sir William Hope's elaborate publications, in which the wisdom of the Stuart schools was sublimated, and the days of Queen Anne were ushered in with a complete system of gentlemanly fencing. Donald McBane, a fine fighter with the broadsword, as Captain Hutton proves by extracts from his autobiography, cannot be taken as typical of the "dimicatorial authors" in the eighteenth century; and indeed, it is only with the luxurious editions of the courtly

* "The Sword and the Centuries, or Old Sword Days and Old Sword Ways, being a Description of the Various Swords used in Civilized Europe during the last Five Centuries, and of Single Combats that have been Fought with Them." By Alfred Hutton, F.S.A. (Grant Richards. 15s.)

Angelo that the art of the smallsword, at a time when it was a vitally necessary accomplishment, can be said to have received its final and appropriate illustration. The last of these, according to Mr. Egerton Castle's indispensable bibliography, appeared with plates by Rowlandson in 1798.

An extension of our survey of European authors would only complicate unduly the simpler question now before us; and I may take for granted a knowledge of German literary swordsmanship from the manuscripts of Burgmaier to the copperplates of Saint-Martin, and of French fencing books from Saint-Didier the Provençal (whose precepts Pantagruel watched in practice at Toulouse), or the gorgeous folio of Thibault d'Anvers, to the treatises of Danet or Demeuse. When I add that the pages of such authors as Brantôme and of all the memoir writers are full of examples of the duels in which the gallants of various centuries put these theories to the proof, I shall have suggested my last word on the surprising discrepancy between the novelist and the swordsman. Of all our great imaginative artists, Shakespeare and Scott alone have treated the fascinating theme of personal combat without forgetting to be accurate. Dumas, that prince of storytellers, has wrapt his readers into so fine a frenzy that I do not wonder they omit to criticise his guards or lunges. Yet, to be plain, beyond the glamour of his pages Chicot could never have moved his heavy and longbladed rapier as his creator makes him. That breathless duel of the Mignons reads very differently in Captain Hutton's serious pages. Neither Paul Féval nor Théophile Gautier fare better in the cold light of scientific criticism, though these were writing for the most critical nation of fencers in the world.

When I approach the modern historical school of English fiction I stand even more appalled at these inexplicable discrepancies, in all instances save one, for in Mr. Castle himself both the swordsman and the "general reader" are satisfactorily delighted. But to distinguish anything of accurate, or even of the merely probable, in the untutored clashings of other modern writers is a hopeless task. Yet what a world of interest they miss! Whenever Captain Hutton lets his authorities tell their own tale, the origin of the combat, the progress of the fight, the fate of the engaged are one continuous drama of surpassing vividness. A pair of lusty young courtiers quarrel over a lady's ribbon. They agree to settle it with swords. A pair of friends step in on either side, and cannot be discourteous enough to stay motionless while their principals are setting so good an example of decorum and fine swordsmanship. So in a trice all six are stamping to and fro upon the greensward, and the original quarrel is totally forgotten in the zest of personal encounter; forgotten also, apparently, by the Chance that presides over the click of steel; for it is usually the man who ran away with some one else's wife who "satisfies the honour" of the luckless husband by pinking him neatly through the fourth button of his doublet, and leaving him to repent his exaggerated sensitiveness on a bit of bloodstained turf. Sometimes it is the ignorant beginner, stung by passion to an unexpected strength, who breaks through every guard that science recommends and plunges an honest blade into the cunning bravo's vitals. But knowledge will tell, even as youth will be served, in that varying struggle of wrist with wrist, of eye against eye, of feint and parry against riposte and lunge; and if only the novelist would believe that a real fight is far more exciting than any imaginary combat, we should get at least a few pages of real interest in our next batch of historical romances.

The budding author may be recommended to peruse in Captain Hutton's chapters the duel between the Baron de Vitaux and the Baron de Soupez; or the splendid fight of the Admirable Crichton with the Italian Bravo; or the real exploits of Rob Roy and his claymore. If these be not enough there is Italian sabre-play galore through all the nineteenth century, and the curious in fence may read in the Life of Miyamoto Musashi the progress of Japanese art contemporaneously with European swordsmanship, or search in back numbers of some ancient "Guardian" for one of the most determined duels of the seventeenth century. I mention these two last because Captain Hutton has had no space to include either. But he has more than made up for any omissions by the backwording and cudgelpay of his last pages. With this book and the volume by Mr. Egerton Castle before them, neither author nor manager can go far wrong. It is small wonder that after such encouragements to action, a specimen of well nigh every form of fence that I have mentioned can be not merely read about but seen in actual practice in many a fencing-room of the London of to-day. There is an armoury now open to the public in Manchester-Square that may well send out many another knight a-tilting after windmills.

THEODORE ANDREA COOK.

A good deal of well-known verse on the Sword, War, and Patriotism is collected together by Mr. Alexander Eagar in "Songs of the Sword and the Soldier" (Sands, 3s. 6d.). It covers all periods and countries, but the list of authors is a little circumscribed; there is no Kipling, and no Browning.

THE TASTE FOR FICTION IN MEDIÆVAL ITALY.

[By W. G. WATERS.]

I.

In glancing at the vast output of the Italian story-tellers it is hard to realize that the early literature of the country was barren of indigenous fiction, and that novel-writing only began in earnest with Boccaccio. There was a time when men managed to exist without novels, and when at last stories came to be written down in a permanent form their number increased very slowly. It is an interesting question how it happened that the Italians, who, when once the fit seized them, poured out novels with such profusion, for the benefit of an ever-increasing band of readers, were, at the dawn of the literary revival, untouched by the impulse which converted the greater part of the clerks in France and Germany into trouvères, troubadours, or minnesingers, and made assemble the unlearned in crowds to listen to narratives of the deeds of the sons of Aymon, or of the madness of Tristram.

The works of fiction at the command of a citizen of Imperial Rome were very few; and in that dismal gulf of time between the collapse of the Western Empire and the resettlement of social order the number was not greatly increased. Indeed, in Italy, there was no sign of activity in the world of fiction until the middle of the twelfth century, when William II., the Norman King of Sicily, gathered round him at Palermo a band of Provençal troubadours, and thus gave an impetus to the growth of a literature of romance—a growth which was maintained after the Normans and their chivalry had vanished and became the central interest in the Court of Frederic II. It even appeared as far north as Florence, but there, as well as in Palermo, it showed all the weakness of a plant of exotic growth. Its life declined apace after separation from its native Provençal soil; it languished even in the sympathetic atmosphere of the Sicilian Court, and it died and left no heirs. The cause of this lack of fiction in Italy is easy to determine. That form of feudalism under which Provençal literature sprang up and prospered had never attained amongst the Italians the dominant position it enjoyed north of the Alps. Bound up with it were those eccentric traditions of loyal service of serviteur to dame, the warped and anomalous fealty of mediæval love, and the absurd jurisprudence of the courts of love, all of which grew up in the cramped and artificial life of a feudal castle. But in Italy there was neither feudalism of this model, nor its concomitant traditions; no congenial soil for the growth of the literature of romance. In the easy unrestrained civic life, and in the democratic ethos of contemporary Italy, a literature of this kind was hopelessly out of sympathy with those whom it addressed. In Florence and the other central Italian cities feudal aristocracy and the honour paid to the same were practically non-existent, the loss of civic rights consequent on ennoblement being a convincing proof of the low esteem in which chivalry was held. The Florentine ladies may not have been irreproachable in matters of conduct ; it need not be argued here whether they were better or worse than the poor creatures doomed to the monotonous round of days in some Suabian or Burgundian castle ; it is enough to remark that they were entirely different. If they happened to go astray they were judged by tribunals vastly more stringent than the courts of love, and their amourettes, gross as they seem often to have been, were not infected with the sugared licentiousness consequent on the recognized adultery in northern lands. If they could have understood what it meant, the jolly matrons of Florence would surely have laughed aloud over the exaggerated sentiment of the Arthurian romances and the early Celtic love stories, which, indeed, found very few readers in Italy. Chastity may have been as much flouted south as north of the Alps, but in Italy its despisers were frankly wicked, and never thought of calling into existence a rococo jurisprudence to devise maxims which might serve to give a legal face to their peccadilloes.

The fact that the chief pioneers of Italian literature wrote in French shows that Provençal romance, during its sojourn in Sicily and in its northward flight to Florence, must have influenced the earliest native writers. Brunetto Latini wrote the "Tesoro" in French, and S. Francis used this tongue for some of his early hymns. Guido Guinicelli and Guittone of Arezzo, the first writers in the materna lingua worthy of notice, included love amongst the themes they considered, but they, unlike the Provençals, treated the passion with seriousness. Their style bears evidence of the stern surroundings amidst which the national life of Italy was being moulded. The existence of the famous schools of Salerno and Bologna, and of the great commercial cities where the trade and banking of the civilized world were transacted, denotes a state of society in which men found occupation in other things besides jousting and gallantry. Italy became peculiarly the land of jurists, scholars, philosophers, and traders. There was a sprinkling of poets as well, and these naturally sang now and then of love, but their view thereof was not that of the troubadours. They treated it as a principle, a Platonic abstraction rather than as a passion deeply rooted in man's nature ; as an influence on human character rather than as the manifestation of natural forces working in their finest ecstasy. These scholarly singers, of whom Guido Guinicelli may be taken as the best example—his poem "The Gentle Heart" is exquisitely translated in Rossetti's "Early Italian Poets"—fashioned themselves almost entirely on classical models, and cultivated a style which would have been quite inadequate to deal with the rapturous extravagance of the Provençal poets. The attributes of chivalrous love, which had hitherto been tricked out by the fanciful imagery of the troubadours, were set forth by the Italians in a guise completely different. They were treated as a portion of philosophical doctrine, wherein the soul, and the body as well, of the cherished object were sublimated into the most exalted expression of beauty and spiritual excellence ; the classic instances of this tendency being Beatrice and Laura, and the fainter and belated figure of the fair Geraldine, the object of Surrey's pathetic passion. But these entrancing personalities, fascinating as they were, were barren children of the gay Science who left no progeny.

Had the plant of Provençal romance been one of robust growth, it could scarcely have survived when brought into competition with Boccaccio's great achievement. Boccaccio was one of those lucky mortals born into a congenial environment at exactly the right moment of time. At the beginning of the fourteenth century the popolani in Florence had risen to command the politics of the city, and, their intellectual energies being stimulated by the free life which surged around them, they demanded some literary solace of a character differing entirely from the shams of chivalrous romance which had satisfied the aristocracy and the learned classes elsewhere ; something different from the Cento Novelle Antiche, the first collection of Italian stories made up chiefly of classical anecdotes, and stories taken from the Gesta Romanorum and the Fabliaux ; and Boccaccio was at hand to give them what they wanted. By common consent Boccaccio has been hailed as the writer who transported literature from the closet to the market-place. The era which witnessed the exhibition of his version of the Comédie humaine happened also to be one of these crises of calamity during which society was shaken to its foundations and the recognized restraints of men's actions were relaxed. The Proem of the Decameron describes how Florence ran riot in the social cataclysm consequent on the outbreak of plague, just as the Athenians, teste Thucydides, had been affected morally by the same scourge, and also the people of Lisbon in the last century by the great earthquake. Indeed, there is a whisper that a modified and comparatively innocent manifestation of the same spirit was apparent during those dark days of disaster at the beginning of the past year, when, in spite of mourning for the victims of war, the theatres and restaurants were crowded as they had rarely been crowded before. The licentiousness of the Decameron may have arisen in part from the moral disorder of the times ; but its tone was probably pitched in harmony with the prevailing tastes and ideals of the popolani—as Boccaccio realized them—and it must be remembered that he was the true type of the Florentine popolano. The people were growing tired of the ascetic interdiction of the joys of sense ; all the more because, when they heard reports of the doings at the Papal Court at Avignon and of the standard of life in the monasteries and convents around them, they felt strong suspicion that these ghostly guides of theirs did not practise what they preached. They turned their backs upon the mysticism of the transcendental school in religion, and in literature they would have nothing to say to the unrealities of chivalric romance. The Florentines were realists pure and simple ; concrete facts were more to their taste than the abstractions of allegory, and when Boccaccio presented to them pictures of life delineated with the most consummate literary skill in which they recognized men and women of their own kind, they read him with delight, and each succeeding generation took more to heart the truths of the gospel he preached.

[To be concluded in a second article.]

THE STORY OF THE IRON MASK.

The "Mystery of the Iron Mask" long ago ceased to puzzle students ; but it is only of recent years that the inexpert public has begun to realize that this curious problem of identity has been solved finally and beyond all doubt. For those, however, who wish to have an account of the successive steps by which this result has been reached Mr. Tighe Hopkins' "Man in the Iron Mask" (Hurst and Blackett, 7s. 6d. n.) is, in most respects, an excellent book. The author's extensive acquaintance with the by-ways of French history was proved by his charming little book "An Idler in Old France." We fancy the solution of this remarkable mystery became known on this side of the Channel a little more quickly than Mr. Tighe Hopkins would seem to imply. It is true that Marius Topin did not publish his authoritative, but not absolutely complete, exposition until 1870, while M. Funck-Brentano's final demonstration is very recent indeed ; but even Miss Corner's excellent little school History of France had already in 1867 stated the correct conclusion. We have called the mystery remarkable, because it need never have existed. Indeed, had historians learned a little earlier the importance of independent investigation, the truth would have been known almost before there was time for fable to obtain the upper hand. In 1682, little more than two years after Mattioli's arrest by order of Louis XIV., the clue was given in an Italian pamphlet, which stated that this double-edged traitor was seized by ten or twelve horsemen who "masked him and conducted him to Pignerol." And it appears to have been the persistency of this tradition in the district which at last put early inquirers on the right scent. By that time, however, Voltaire's amazing romance, which made the prisoner a son of Cardinal Mazarin and Anne of Austria, had captured the public imagination, and the adoption of this romantic but grotesque theory by Dumas helped its reception as history. Even so recent a book as M. Emile Bourgeois' "Century of Louis XIV." published long after the mask had been removed from Mattioli's face, treats the matter as still in doubt. The truth, indeed, seems to have been speedily lost sight of, even by those who might have been expected to be its depositories. Thus, although Louis XV. knew it, his successor did not, except in part, while even that most inquisitive of men, Napoleon I. had to own himself baffled. Yet Madame Campan was aware of the facts, with the sole exception of the prisoner's name.

Never has there been a better proof of the difficulty of arriving at the exact truth about historical events; although, since we took to writing history on "scientific" lines, such a problem could hardly have existed for a year. The mere facts are simple and brutal enough, with very little of romance about them. Count Mattioli was a needy favourite of Charles IV., Duke of Mantua, a Sovereign even more needy, in proportion, than his servant. This degenerate descendant of the great House of Gonzaga was also Marquis of Montferrat, and in that Margraviate lay the fortress of Casale on the Po to the east of Turin. To Louis XIV. it seemed that this outpost of Charlemagne's Empire with its great strategic importance would be a delightful pendant to Pignerol, which he already possessed, since the owner of the two would control the passage of the Alps and the high road to Milan. The master of this brace of fortresses might therefore aspire to play a great part in Italy. By a tortuous process of diplomacy Mattioli was bribed—in 1678—to induce the Duke of Mantua to consent to the cession of Casale to France, his urgent pecuniary necessities making him eager enough to finger the price, which Louis' Ministers were constantly reducing. But when the psychological moment came, Mattioli betrayed the French plot to Savoy and to Spain, both of whom were interested in preventing a powerful Monarch obtaining a strong footing in northern Italy. Whether his motive was a tardy awakening of patriotism, or a sordid desire to be bribed by both sides, is more matter of conjecture. The intrigue failed and the flouted Louis was furious—though, in fact, he obtained Casale three years later. Mattioli's love of money, or his poverty, placed him in the power of the relentless enemy he had made. He had only to meet Catinat, he was told, to replenish his pockets. The bait was swallowed; an appointment was made at Pignerol and Mattioli was never again a free man. He disappeared absolutely, even his own family, although they may have suspected much, not knowing what had become of him. For fifteen years he was a prisoner at Pignerol, and when that place was abandoned, St. Mars, who was his gaoler the whole of the time except during the comparatively brief period of his Governorship of the Fort d'Exiles, took him with him to the Isle St. Marguerite where he remained four years. Finally, St. Mars, who accumulated a fortune as the most glorified turnkey of Louis Quatorze, was made Governor of the Bastille, where Mattioli died after another five years' captivity. Almost every detail has, in the course of time, been misrepresented. He was not well, but rather ill, treated. The orders St. Mars received were to give him the absolute necessities of life, but nothing to soften his captivity. He did not wear an iron mask, but a velvet one; he had no love of fine linen; he did not write the story of his woes upon a silver plate and throw it out of window. Many of the picturesque embellishments of the story we owe to Voltaire, and what he did not supply other romancers did. The innumerable writers who treated the subject in the days of its darkness identified the Man in the Iron Mask with a twin brother of Louis XIV., with the Duc de Beaufort, the Duke of Monmouth, the Duc de Vermandois, Fouquet, M. de Butonde, and several other historical personages. But no such character disappeared mysteriously, and the Registers of the Bastille itself settled the matter at last beyond all question. The prisoner's funeral certificate in which his name is spelt "Marchioly" is printed in facsimile by Mr. Hopkins. Moreover the name actually occurs in the Correspondence of Louvois and St. Mars.

Mr. Hopkins' book would have been better for an Index, and his style suffers sometimes from the vice which afflicts so many writers who are constantly reading French—the vice of literal translation. A priest does not pronounce "mass"—he "says" or "sings" it, as the case may be; système means, not "system" in Mr. Hopkins' sense of the word, but "theory"; quinze jours means not fifteen days, but a fortnight; ancien prisonnier does not mean "ancient prisoner"; the English of diplomate is "diplomatist." Nevertheless, Mr. Hopkins is naturally an attractive writer, and knows how to marshal facts without being dull.

THE DRAMA.

"A WOMAN IN THE CASE."—"THE NIGHT OF THE PARTY."

The two latest theatrical novelties, A Woman in the Case at the Court, described as a "light comedy," and The Night of the Party at the Avenue, described as a "farce," might exchange labels. Both have the framework of absurd adventure which constitutes farce, but the people to whom the adventures happen are more real in Mr. Weedon Grossmith's "farce" than in the "comedy" of Messrs. G. R. Sims and Leonard Merrick. The farce-writer of to-day has to satisfy an increasing demand for reality and observation in his personages. We are no longer satisfied with the farce of ludicrous situation et præterea nihil—farce, for instance, of the type of Mamma at the Criterion. We look for character. The great farce-writer of the last century, the greatest farce-writer I venture to think of all time, Eugène Labiche, was sometimes content to produce masterpieces of ludicrous adventure—e.g., Les Trente Millions de Gladiator. But as his best he gave us masterpieces of character and observation, with even a substratum of philosophic idea—e.g., Le Plus Heureux des Trois, Célimare le Bien-Aimé, and Le Voyage de M. Perrichon. Mr. Pinero in his farce-writing days, his "palmy days," some of us are perverse enough to think, had one consistent formula, the plunging of dignitaries (a magistrate, a dean, a Cabinet Minister) into undignified situations, but he never neglected his characters. The farce-writer who relies upon his gift of adventure-spinning alone leans upon a broken reed. There are two leading adventures in the piece of Messrs. Sims and Merrick, an interrupted anecdote and a helter-skelter chase. (1) A tells B about his adventure at a masked ball. "She evidently mistook me for another man and accompanied me to my chambers. She wouldn't remove her mask, but I had had a good deal of champagne and tried to kiss her. She rushed to the door, and then"—B is on tenterhooks to know what happened then, for he is aware that the masked lady is the lady who has since become Mrs. B. The aim of the playwrights is to keep off the (innocent) conclusion of the story till the very end of their play. (2) The lady had left behind her a cigar-case, containing her portrait in a secret compartment. A has never discovered the portrait, and it is the object of both B and Mrs. B to get the cigar-case from him before he does. These are the main adventures which the playwrights do their best to fill out. Thus, B discovers that Mrs. B was the heroine of the masked adventure by telling her that he, B, was its hero. It is necessary here to give a motive for taking A's adventure upon himself, and so we are asked to believe that Mrs. B is a novelist who, in the interest of her art, plagues her husband to tell her the secrets of his bachelor "past." Having no secrets to tell, he bethinks him of A's adventure, and tells that as an adventure of his own. Mrs. B then makes her avowal in return. You now have B wildly jealous of A. Why, think the playwrights, should we not make Mrs. B jealous too? Accordingly, they make Miss C, in love with A, drop a note for him into his (which Mrs. B supposes to be B's) cigar-case. Thereupon ensues a general mêlée for the possession of the cigar-case, in which, for reasons of their own, C's mamma and C's fiancé and a naughty schoolboy also join. These adventures are amusing enough for the first half of the play; then they begin to pall, as mere adventures always do. We feel in the end that we do not much care who gets the cigar-case or what was the conclusion of the interrupted anecdote. The reason for our indifference is that we are not really interested in the people, who obviously only exist to carry on the adventures. Mrs. B has none of the characteristics of a novelist. A is merely the owner of a cigar-case which many people happen to want. B is a husband quelconque, and so on. There is no reality, no character, in any of these people; there is only manner, and that is put into them by the players. Mr. Frederick Kerr and Miss Gertrude Kingston, for instance, who play Mr. and Mrs. B, have each an individual manner; the one is admirably phlegmatic, the other a charming type of the woman with "nerves"; they almost succeed in giving an air of character to their parts. Miss Mabel Terry-Lewis, too, acts very prettily as Miss C; she plays a shrinking, faltering girl, who is strung up to courage by the brisk wooing of the man she loves; nothing could be better done, the actress contriving to express a whirlwind of struggling emotion in a few broken words and halting pauses. Given real characters, here are at least three players who could do justice to them (I will add Miss Esmé Beringer as a fourth); but the playwrights have not been at the pains to supply a single real character. They have been intent all the time upon the ingenious complications of their plot and upon nothing else. The result is disappointment. The play begins brightly and gradually "peters out."

If Mr. Weedon Grossmith had done no more than invent an ingenious plot, his Night of the Party would not be the excellent farce that it is. Servants at high jinks, interrupted by the unexpected return of their master, hide behind curtains and under ottomans—a very old stage story that. But it becomes new, and fruitful in possibilities, when a married lady calls upon the master and offers to elope with him, little suspecting that eavesdroppers are hiding behind every article of furniture in the room. I will not describe the developments of this initial idea; they are many and grotesque, but the real superiority of the farce consists in its characters. The several types of domestic servant—the roguish valet, the heavy body-servant to a Royal Highness, the hall-porter at the "Mansions," even the parlourmaid—are all observed, actual, the very thing. Even without their ludicrous adventures they would be amusing; we laugh at them for what they are even more than for what they do. Mr. Weedon Grossmith "surprises by himself" a whole fund of entertainment. Were he merely to sit in a chair in the middle of the stage and talk from the rise of the curtain to its fall, I think we should find plenty of fun, and never ask for a plot. At the Avenue, however, you get both the drollery of plot and the drollery of observed character. You also, it must be added, get a tinge of coarseness which could conveniently be spared. The fun of High Life below Stairs was surely good enough without the introduction of Doll Tearsheet? As it is, Mr. Grossmith has, quite unnecessarily, diminished the public stock of harmless pleasure. So humorous an actor ought not thus wantonly to deprive one's girls and boys of the chance of a good laugh. I shall be told, I daresay, that I am an old fogey, and that the supposed ignorance of girls and boys as to the ways of Doll Tearsheet is only the illusion of a foolish parent. That may be so; but I shall cling obstinately to my illusion.

A. B. WALKLEY.

A short time ago Messrs. Puttick and Simpson sold a remarkably fine example of the third folio Shakespeare for £385—a record sum for this book with the 1604 title page. Early next week they will offer a no less good example of the second folio, which, unfortunately, is not in its original binding. As far as the volume itself is concerned, however, it is said to be perfect, nor have the pages been washed. In 1895 the Earl of Orford's example, the largest known, realized £540, and the next highest price, we fancy, was £148 for George Daniel's copy. Sir Henry Irving gave £100 for Dr. Johnson's second folio, with marginal notes by Theobald and the lexicographer. This is just one hundred times the amount paid for it by Samuel Ireland, father of the celebrated Shakespearian forger, at Johnson's sale in 1785.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

MRS. LYNN LINTON.

Like most modern biographies, Mr. George Somes Layard's MRS. LYNN LINTON: HER LIFE, LETTERS, AND OPINIONS (Methuen, 12s. 6d.) is long, but we hesitate to say that it is too long. At all events, when one has skipped the pages that some editors' blue pencils would have sacrificed, there remains more than one usually finds in a biography that is intensely interesting to read. Mrs. Lynn Linton wrote letters quite as well as she wrote newspaper articles, and she is here presented to us in all her moods. She lives in the book. In spite of the reticence which discretion has sometimes imposed out of regard for the feelings of the living, she is presented to us so that we really know her—a charming writer, with very pronounced likes and dislikes, with the brain of a man and the heart of a woman, notable even among women for her inconsistencies, but absolutely comprehensible all the same.

Her inconsistency was, of course, most apparent in her attitude towards the higher education of women. Alike as novelist and as journalist, her hostility towards the "advanced" of her sex was bitter and untiring. Yet she had close friends among them—Miss Beatrice Harraden, for instance—with whom she lived on terms of close affection. The fact illustrates, according to Mr. Layard, "the contest that was continually going on in Mrs. Linton between affection for the individual and disapproval of the type"; but the inconsistency was really too deep to be disposed of by any such simple explanation. For the strange thing is that Mrs. Lynn Linton herself resembled the people of whom she disapproved far more closely than she resembled the people whom she approved. The new woman whom she denounced was largely a creature of her own imagination—a fact clearly proved in the course of a furious correspondence in the Ladies' Pictorial about the characteristics of the Girtton girl. Her own life was such that these same new women would have been proud of her if only she had not aspersed them. She, like them, had begun with revolt against the intellectual limitations of a Philistine household. She, like some of them, had lived alone in lodgings to fight the battle of life with editors. She had cultivated her mind in the same way, but more successfully than most of them. Practically the only differences were that she had taught herself while they had learnt from professors, and that they belonged to the generation which bicycles and she did not. Yet she turns and rends them as "the new women who set themselves to blaspheme nature and God and good"; and Miss Beatrice Harraden, whom she was very fond of, "was quite appalled, for her ideas and conceptions of young women were really appallingly false and unjust." It is all as inconsistent as anything could possibly be, and it can only be explained as the consequence of the conjunction of the brain and ambitions of a man with the instincts of a woman who would have made a perfect Mrs. Grundy if she had not found all the other Mrs. Grundys so strangely stupid and unsatisfactory.

To some readers the most interesting pages of the book will probably be those which tell the strange story of Mrs. Lynn Linton's marriage and separation from her husband. She had been in love before she met him, with a gentleman whose name Mr. Layard withholds, telling us only that he was "the Brother Edward," of whom she spoke through life as "one of those who make the honour of their generation, and who help to keep society sweet and pure, because entirely governed by principle."

The bar to their marriage lay in the fact that he was a Roman Catholic, and she was at least a confessed agnostic. He was deeply religious; she was "notoriously unanchored." Do what his director would—for she submitted to the efforts made towards her conversion—she was never, she herself has said, stirred a hair's breadth. Though she should lose all, she could not command belief in what seemed to her mere fables.

from beginning to end—and even against love she must be faithful to truth.

This was early in the fifties. It was in 1858 that Eliza Lynn became the second wife of William James Linton, the wood-engraver. Her common sense was, she says, "over-weighted by religious zeal, by altruistic pity, by affection, by principle, by hope." She felt, in fact, that Mr. Linton required some one to look after his first family, and she sacrificed herself. The marriage was a failure from the first, and the reasons of the failure are given in Mrs. Lynn Linton's words and also in a letter from one of Mr. Linton's daughters. They started house-keeping together in London; but Mr. Linton was so occupied with social schemes for the amelioration of the world that he had no time to work at his profession. Moreover, his irregular and unpunctual habits made it almost impossible for his wife to work either. Her savings were dissipated, and poverty stared them in the face. It was arranged that the husband should live in the country, and the wife in town, coming to visit him when she could. This modus vivendi lasted for some time, and then, the fortunes of the family being still precarious, Mr. Linton went to America, leaving it an open question whether Mrs. Linton should join him there. She did not do so, and though they both lived to be old, and though Mr. Linton once came to London, they never met again. But all this time they were corresponding affectionately. There is something very pathetic in Mr. Linton's letter, written on leaving for America after his flying visit to England. It should have a place of its own in the world's famous love-letters:—

Dear old Love,—We must not lose sight of each other again. Now that I am leaving, and satisfied that we have done wisely by not meeting, I may say that it has been hard for me too. I would have been glad to hold you to my heart again, my lips on yours—but this parting would have been too painful. Dearest, believe me, I would knit our lives together again if I thought it might be; but in some things we have been unsuited, and if in the first fervour of our love this difference could part us, might it not occur again? I could dare to face it, but it would be rank un wisdom. God bless you, darling! It is a happiness that only good thoughts exist between us, that we are, and shall be always, good friends. All that can interest you, you shall always know of from me. Let me know the same of you. I will like to know that you are the one friend to whom I may lay my heart bare, sure of loving sympathy

And now farewell, still dearly loved! You love me too.

Your old lover, W. J. LINTON.

There would be much to add, if space permitted, about Mrs. Lynn Linton's life in London and Paris, and about her opinions of her contemporaries; but most of this has already appeared in Mrs. Lynn Linton's own autobiographical notes, reviewed in our columns shortly after her death. She wrote very tartly of some of them—of George Eliot, for instance, and John Forster, and Mrs. Henry Wood. But she could admire enthusiastically. She admired immensely writers as diverse as Miss Harraden and Mr. Herbert Spencer. On behalf of the latter she wrote an article for the Nineteenth Century, the nature of which may be best explained by an extract from the philosopher's request that it should be written:—

Dear Mrs. Lynn Linton,—I am in the mood of mind of the weather-beaten old tar whose nephew proposes to teach him how to box the compass, and who is prompted to tweak his nose.

The nephew is in this case Professor Drummond, who, in his recently published work "The Ascent of Man," with the airs of a discoverer and with a tone of supreme authority, sets out to instruct me and other evolutionists respecting the factor of social evolution which we have ignored—altruism.

"'Habet'! I exclaim in the language of the arena," was Mr. Spencer's note of exclamation when the article appeared, and he adds that "but for your exposure the thing would have passed without notice, for the critics, when not ignorant, are wanting in all sense of justice and public duty." In conclusion, let us say that the book makes excellent reading, and that Mr. Layard is equally to be congratulated upon his good taste and his literary skill.

THROUGH FRENCH GLASSES.

The only French war correspondent in South Africa has been M. Jean Carrère, of the Matin. His book, EN PLEINE ÉROFÉE (Flammarion, 3f. 50c.), quite justifies his presence there, for it is better reading than any but the very best of the English war books. The gay insouciance of his attitude is a continual delight. He does not seem ever to have known or cared what the war was about, though he professes a general sentimental sympathy with the Boers. He went to see it in the spirit in which he would have gone to the theatre, and he reviews it as if he were analysing a farcical comedy. Such malice as he brought out with him was disarmed by the courtesy he met with. He enjoyed himself thoroughly, and writes in a torrent of high spirits, retailing the camp gossip with all the wit of the boulevardier. He endorses Mr. Treves' complaint of the "plague of women," adding to it the characteristically French complaint that most of them were plain. Many stories are better told by him than by any of the other raconteurs. The story of "James" is new and delightful. M. Carrère professes to have heard it from Mr. Gwynne, of Reuter's, as an explanation of General Buller's slow movements after the relief of Ladysmith:—

Voici : James est un déserteur anglais qui, mécontent de sir Redvers Buller, s'est retiré sur les montagnes, et à lui seul, armé de son fusil, arrête l'armée du Natal, forte de quatre-vingt mille hommes.

Peste ! dis-je, mais c'est un Bayard.

N'est-ce pas ? À vrai dire ce n'est pas tout à fait la faute du général. Vous savez qu'au début de la guerre, Buller subit quelques pertes retentissantes. Alors l'opinion publique s'émut et on manda au général Buller de faire tuer le moins d'hommes possible. "C'est bien," se dit le commandant des forces du Natal avec une logique toute militaire, je n'en ferai plus tuer du tout." Et dès qu'il voyait un homme au sommet d'une colline il arrêta son armée. Si bien que les Boers, renonçant à occuper leurs commandos contre lui, se retirèrent. C'est alors que James, impatienté, à lui seul, tient la campagne. De temps en temps, l'armée de Buller parcourt quelques centaines de yards ; mais, soudain, on voit surgir derrière un kopje le fusil de James, et, aussitôt, on éleve de formidables retranchements.

One naturally looks to see how the French journalist was impressed by our leading men. In the case of Lord Roberts it is not the military genius but the domesticity of the Commander-in-Chief that most impresses him:—

Presque toujours lady Roberts et ses deux filles l'accompagnent, et chaque après-midi, dans le banlieue de Prétoria, il est touchant de le voir errer, commédans une idylle, le chef de l'armée envahissante, pacifiquement entouré de sa famille, ni plus ni moins qu'un rond-de-cuir sentimental s'en allant faire, entre deux écritures, la promenade de digestion.

Cela révolte évidemment la conception militaire des Allemands, des Italiens, et des Français qui sont restés ici, mais comme c'est délicieusement britannique, et pittoresque pour les journaux illustrés !

On the other hand he regards Lord Kitchener as a man to be afraid of, and tells a characteristic story of the reply of the Chief of the Staff to a dandy officer who asked for his autograph on a silk handkerchief daintily embroidered with lace.

Kitchener prend le mouchoir, le tourne, le retourne, et, parlant de profil:—

C'est sans doute le mouchoir de madame votre sœur ? dit-il.

Mais non, fait le cocodés avec une moue charmante, c'est le mien.

Ah ! dit Kitchener, c'est le vôtre.

Et, tendant le mouchoir, sans y rien écrire, il demande :

Quelle est la dimension de vos épingles à cheveux ?

M. Carrère is inclined to depreciate General Baden-Powell, and he thus represents the interview between Lord Roberts and this popular commander :—

C'est très bien, lui dit lord Roberts, quand le nouveau général vint lui présenter ses hommages. C'est très bien d'avoir ainsi défendu Mafeking ! Mais c'est bien inutile et puéril, et cette ville ne valait pas tant de bruit. Votre résistance héroïque, sans doute, a, en tous les cas, été bien gênante pour nous. Allez et ne recommencez plus.

Et le timide B.-P. s'en retournait la tête basse, relégué désormais au rôle de gendarme.

The book is full of stories of this kind. How much or how little truth there is in them does not greatly matter. They are invariably entertaining. Some English publisher should certainly arrange for a translation.

"THE ETERNAL CONFLICT."

THE ETERNAL CONFLICT, an Essay, by William Romaine Paterson (Benjamin Swift) (Heinemann, 6s.), is a book which will please some readers, startle others, and perplex not a few, and not without reason. Clever, abounding in telling, resonant phrases, marked by some distinct merits in style, "The Eternal Conflict" at the outset seems to promise much, and for a time keeps the reader in doubt and suspense as to how far that promise is to be fulfilled. To write in a lyrical strain about the problems of religion and philosophy, to seek to solve them by brusque dicta and other shorter methods than those of the sages of the past, to express oneself in a style which now seems modelled on that of Heine, now on that of d'Annunzio—all this is not exactly novel. It is an easy substitute for hard thinking and precise language. But Mr. Paterson has more to offer than this. Here and there he lets fall a sentence full of insight. More than once we seem to be about to get something distinctive and unique, deeper and better than reminiscence. Once or twice we come on a few words which are more than rhetoric and aggressive paradox. In the first pages, as in the last, there is evidence of considerable literary skill, no small reading, and a keen eye for the effects of ethical creeds on conduct.

But, as a whole, what is performed is somewhat crude—certainly not equal to what is promised. The elements that are Mr. Paterson's own are really few ; he rhapsodizes too much, and the rhapsodist is rarely inspired ; more often he is drawing on discursive reading, and restating with studied exaggeration what has often been said with the simplicity of truth ; and in Mr. Paterson's case, as in many others, we find that there may be a free use of "I," the writer may often come forward to the footlights, and yet present little that is distinctly original. Amid epigrams startling, if not finished, we come upon such sayings as these :—"The infinite is beyond qualitative and quantitative expression." "The eyes of truth are tigers' eyes and full of wild horizons." Mr. Tupper could not surpass these gems. To speak of Nietzsche as "a philosophical bounder" is to sink to a lower stratum of literature than that in which Mr. Paterson aspires to dwell. We do not quarrel with such sentences as these, though they are not to be greatly admired : "Religion at its best is a prolonged emotion and kind of eavesdropping on the unseen." But the context of such grotesque sayings should not make the obscure more obscure. We note an abstinence from simple direct expressions, a hankering after what is strained, a delight in what, to vary slightly one of his expressions, may be called "the fracas" of phrases. Too often, when he has said something weighty and seems about to let fall something still weightier, he gesticulates, hits out wildly, and breaks into words of fervour and obscurity. We do not complain of the absence of close reasoning—that is not promised. The grave fault is that the thoughts want coherence ; the author's own moorings are not fast. Whole pages are little more than unconnected comments on a broken necklace of beautiful quotations. And with reference to quotations, why, by the way, is Mr. Paterson so prodigal with little tags of German, some of which are not very happily or accurately translated ? It is difficult to place Mr. Paterson, not by reason of the subtilty of his thoughts or the obscurity of his language, but rather by reason of the indefiniteness of his reflections. Sometimes a sentence seems prompted by an attractive word in that which preceded it rather than by any logical necessity. The masters whom he delights to quote—and he appreciates the best in literature—were not the slaves of their phrases. Perhaps the message, such as it is, which the writer would deliver is that "the final task of a thinker is a statement of the dilemma between the intellect and the emotions" ; a great theme, no doubt, but one to be handled by the intellect rather than the emotions. "It is an endless and abominable drama which we are compelled to act and to watch." That is one of the sentences which give the key-note to the volume ; a note struck ages ago and more clearly than in this clever little volume. To these criticisms justice compels us to add a word. Once or twice, especially towards the close, the somewhat confused thoughts seem to take order. The writer lets fall sentences which show that he is becoming master of his luxuriant language. Never, however, is the essence of the thought crystallized in one satisfying sentence. The reader who asks for bread will receive a phrase.

L.-B.-W.

Every cricketer is at this moment, to use Mr. W. S. Gilbert's phrase, "either a little liberal or else a little conservative" ; either for or against the alteration in the l.-b.-w. rule proposed by Mr. Alfred Lyttelton last week at Lord's. This being so, on taking up Mr. Robert Lyttelton's new book, OUT-DOOR GAMES : CRICKET AND GOLF, in the Haddon Hall Library (Dent, 7s. 6d. n.), one turns first of all to the two chapters in which he deals with the reform of cricket. His brother's speech last week might almost be called a brilliant epitome of the chief points set down in the present book. The number of drawn matches, resulting from the great superiority of the bat over the ball in present-day cricket, the power of inferior batsmen to make big scores on our splendid wickets, and the danger of dulness and monotony which seems to threaten our national game—these are the chief considerations which have led the committee of the M.C.C. to bring forward a remedy which purports to place the bowler on a greater equality with the batsman. The new rule—as all the world now knows—proposed to draw imaginary parallel lines from wicket to wicket, and to make the parallelogram thus formed the territory of the bowler. Any batsman, who, standing within this territory, intercepts with his body a ball which would have hit the wicket—no matter where the ball pitched—would now be out "leg before wicket," had the new rule been passed. One of the chief objections that has always been made to possible reforms of the l.-b.-w. rule—that the umpire would be put in a greater difficulty in giving his decision—cannot be urged against the particular reform now proposed. It was not suggested that the batsman should be out on all occasions when his body intercepts a ball on its way to the wicket, for he, or the part of him which the ball hits, might be outside the parallel lines aforesaid. A simple rule that the bat and not the body should defend the wicket would, indeed, land the umpire in the greatest difficulty. How could he decide whether a ball which hits the batsman's body when he is not in front of the wicket would or would not have proceeded on its fatal course and bowled him ? The task of the umpire would really be easier under the new rule than under the old. He would have to decide two things only—(1) whether the part of the body struck by the ball is in front of the wicket ; (2) whether the ball would have hit the wicket had it not been stopped by the batsman's body. Under the existing rule he has also a third point to decide—(3) whether the ball pitched on the wicket.

But it is not so easy to dispose of some other objections to the proposed alteration. Mr. Edison argued rather ingeniously that the proposed rule would make the batsman more cautious, and thus defeat one of the chief objects of legislation which is intended to make the game more lively. Mr. A. G. Steel was "dead against" the reform, and urged that all batsmen would be at the mercy of lob bowlers breaking from leg. Also it was officially announced that the new rule had been tried in America, and that the Philadelphians strongly urged the M.C.C. not to adopt it. It would be rash to venture an opinion where so many great authorities disagree. But there would surely be no harm in having the new rule tested at Lord's and elsewhere. Last year a new regulation with regard to boundaries was tried at Lord's with a view to discovering whether it should be generally adopted or not. Why should not the l.-b.-w. rule be experimented upon in the same way? One thing is certain—that cricket is a good enough game to interest a few millions of people for a year or two during which the advantages or disadvantages of the alteration could be thoroughly and widely investigated before any definite step is taken. The M.C.C. would then have facts to go upon in making up their minds.

It is time to return to Mr. Robert Lyttelton's book. This does not pretend to be a treatise on cricket and golf—nor is it a volume of cricket reminiscences, of which we have had more than enough of late. Without burdening his reader with statistics the writer deals in a sensible and humorous fashion with questions which are now uppermost in the minds of cricketers—county qualifications, unfair bowling, the relation between professionals and amateurs, and so forth. Writing about Australian cricket he comes to the same conclusions as the great Australian cricketer, Mr. Giffen, in his book "Bat and Ball." Our bowling and fielding are, on the whole, inferior to that of the Australians; but we have been able to give them more than one excellent lesson in the art of batting. Mr. Lyttelton's remarks on what he terms some of the pettifogging rules of golf are extremely just, and from a sociological point of view his account of the career of the "caddie" as a profession is well worth reading. We have only one fault to find—viz., that he mars a lucid and agreeable style of writing by some grammatical errors. Moreover, C. J. Thornton and Ranjitsinghi should be written C. I. Thornton and Ranjitsinhji. The coloured illustrations of old cricketers are admirable.

THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORICAL SERIES.

The new volumes of the Cambridge Historical Series fully realize the hope, expressed in modest terms by the editor, that "the Series will be useful not only to beginners, but to students who have already acquired some general knowledge of European history." We do not think that any future volume is likely to show a greater mastery of the subject or to contain more valuable lessons for all classes of readers than Dr. Cunningham's ESSAY ON WESTERN CIVILIZATION IN ITS ECONOMIC ASPECTS, MEDIÆVAL AND MODERN TIMES (4s. 6d.). It is the sequel to a previous volume which dealt with the Economic History of the West in the Ancient World. But the problems treated in the present volume are infinitely more complex; and it is really astonishing to find so much information, so fruitfully and suggestively handled, within the compass of a small volume. No living Englishman has thrown more light on Economic History than Dr. Cunningham; and his work is always refreshing for its largeness of view and its complete freedom from the spirit of the doctrinaire. He distinguishes between three broad periods in the growth of our social and economic system. First we have the age of reconstruction, when the fabric of society was rebuilt after the barbarian invasions by Christian influences and, later, under the regis of a central authority at Rome. This was an educative period, when man was learning the true moral dignity of labour, and when the transition took place from natural to money economy and from the household as the economic unit to the city. Next we have the age of discovery, when the ecclesiastical system was broken up, and when the intervention of capital first lessened the importance of civic life, and then, in a vastly extended world, fostered the rise of rival commercial nations. And lastly we have the age of invention, when industrial changes revolutionized the relations between labour and capital and developed so marvellously the resources both of man and nature. Upon the last period—the sphere of political economy as a science—Dr. Cunningham does not dwell at great length, doubtless because, as he says, "the Industrial Revolution has nowhere exerted its full influence as yet"; and his object is rather to show the nexus of cause and effect, which, in the various changes from ancient society, has brought about the present state of things. Incidentally he discusses many subjects, which are of the deepest interest to all thoughtful students, as the influence of the early monasteries, the contact with Islam through the Crusades, the rise of the gilds, the mediæval theory of price, and the ecclesiastical condemnation of usury. On this last point Dr. Cunningham is content to show how the change in moral ideas was gradually effected by the increased power of capital. He does not, like Mr. Lecky in his History of Rationalism, regard the teaching of the mediæval Church in the matter as having "cursed the development of civilization"; he rather demonstrates, as Mr. Lecky omits to do, that the change in question was facilitated by the revival of Roman Law.

His concluding pages on the character and tendencies of modern civilization are among the most valuable in the book; and his remarks on the application of capital to new lands deserve quotation, for they seem to have a special reference to the great question of the day.

It is easy to denounce the "greed" of prospectors and pioneers who open up some new country; but their gains are not merely personal, since their enterprise is only rewarded when they succeed in meeting a general demand by catering for the requirements of the inhabitants of the thickly-populated European countries. We live in times when claims to exclusive privilege are subjected to careful scrutiny; civilized peoples are insisting that the resources of the earth shall be utilized to their fullest extent; they resent the claim of any barbaric or half-civilized people to retain territory when they are careless about turning it to good account. It is in the interest of the race as a whole that the possibilities of life on the globe should be fully enjoyed; and those who prefer to live as hunters or nomads on land that is suitable for tillage will never be able to hold their own in the struggle for subsistence. If any tribe or community refuses to bring its energy to bear in turning the land to the most profitable use it is likely to be ousted by others who are ready to undertake the task.

These observations deserve all the more attention because Dr. Cunningham does not forget to plead on cosmopolitan grounds for the establishment of an effective white police in such backward communities for the benefit of the native races of which they are largely composed.

In THE FRENCH MONARCHY, 1483-1789 (2 vols. 9s.), Mr. A. J. Grant has found a congenial subject for which he is excellently equipped. In these days of compendiums and hand-books history is too commonly written by some learned dryasdust, whose brain is so packed with facts that he can spare no attention to their effective presentation. But Mr. Grant's work is of quite another order. His period affords him splendid opportunities of which he takes full advantage. His style is lucid, easy, and flowing, and rises at times to considerable graphic power, as in his descriptions of the "St. Bartholomew," the siege of La Rochelle, the struggle of the Fronde, the Wars and Court life of the "Grand Monarque." But he seems to us more at home in the fields of war and foreign affairs than in those of religious controversy and domestic policy. He explains, indeed, very fully the causes of the rottenness of the ancien régime—its oppressive and unequal taxation, its neglect of agriculture, its often chaotic finance. He is right, too, we think, in making large claims for the old monarchy.

It had saved France from internal disorder and foreign dominion, and had enlarged her frontiers. It had secured her unity of language, customs, and administration, and had allowed a high form of civilization to spread through the country. It had fostered and stimulated the spirit of nationality. The Revolution was not so entire a break with the "past" as its chief actors imagined; it was not able to tear up the roots of the nation that were embedded in the Middle Ages. In many respects it did but continue under republican forms the work of the Monarchy.

All this is true enough; but in describing the decline of the French power from the truce of Ratisbon—or, as we should rather say, from the peace of Nimeguen—to the eve of the Revolution, Mr. Grant does not lay sufficient stress upon the offences committed by France against the religious sentiment of Europe, or upon the stupidly paternal type of her administration. He strongly condemns—as who would not?—the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and he appraises correctly its evil results for France; but he spoils his censure of the infamous "dragonnades" by a false analogy with the action of the English in Ireland in 1796-98 when menaced by French invasion. Again, in relating the encroachments of Louis upon the Empire in 1683, he barely alludes to the tremendous thundercloud of the Turkish invasion, which hung over Vienna at the very moment of the Diet of Ratisbon. The fact, which Mr. Grant admits, that Louis was in virtual, if unrecognized, alliance with the Sultan for his own ambitious ends at this supreme crisis was a mortal offence to enlightened Christian feeling. But for the sword of Sobieski the progress of Europe might have been stayed for a century.

In the praise which he gives to the domestic policy of Richelieu and Colbert Mr. Grant looks no further than the circumstances of the time; he scarcely seems to realize that the best intentioned measures, even though temporarily successful, may do infinite harm when based upon a radically false principle. Dr. Cunningham, who also speaks appreciatively of Colbert, exactly hits the nail with the remark, "An economic despot had need to be omniscient, and Colbert was not wise enough to play the part of Providence with success." But perhaps the worst example of the over-centralization of the ancien régime was the treatment which it dealt out to the colonies. On this subject Mr. Grant's narrative is meagre and disappointing. He devotes a few pages to the struggle in which France lost her possessions in India and America; but beyond a passing hint of the disadvantage to Canada of autocratic government from home, not a word is said of the deeper causes of these disasters. If, as Mr. Grant thinks, the French are not successful as colonizers, their earliest efforts to found an empire beyond the seas surely call for more detailed notice. Here Dr. Cunningham, though less directly concerned with French history, in part supplies Mr. Grant's omission. He speaks of "a widespread popular ambition" as a phenomenon almost peculiar to England at the time of her first expansion. He also notes such causes as the heavy expense of the French colonies owing to mismanagement, the too paternal regulation of commerce, inadequate means of communication with the mother country, and the scarcity of the best class of emigrants.

In the third work just issued in the Cambridge Series, CANADA UNDER BRITISH RULE, 1760-1900 (6s.), this subject is still further illustrated by Sir John G. Bourinot, a distinguished French-Canadian. Although his principal theme is the history of the British colony, he wisely begins with a chapter on the French régime—already sketched by him at greater length in his "Story of Canada." In reviewing its system he says that the colony was governed simply as a province of France, and that "the people were never taught to depend exclusively on their individual or associated enterprise." But the struggle for predominance in America—in which, according to Mr. Grant, the French colonies were completely overweighed by the English—certainly originated in the encroachments of the former upon the British Hinterland; and their alliance with the more warlike Indian tribes largely discounted the disparity in numbers. But nothing in colonial history has been more remarkable than the thorough acquiescence of the French in British rule, and their loyalty to it in times of special trial, as when France supported the American Revolution, or when war broke out in 1812 between England and the States. Those critical periods are most ably described by Sir John Bourinot; and his history makes a timely appearance at a moment when we are facing a similar racial problem in South Africa. He shows that French Canada has been loyal in spite of occasional jealousy between French and British, because there was no hasty attempt to assimilate the races, and because England had shown no desire to interfere with the just liberties or the cherished institutions of the French. Sir John is at no pains to conceal his doubts whether similar results would have followed the early absorption of Canada by the States. One of his most interesting chapters is styled "The Evolution of Responsible Government"; and he shows clearly what patience was needed on both sides to tide over the difficult problems which troubled British statesmen from 1815 to 1840. The chapters which relate the first efforts at Confederation, its gradual accomplishment, and its practical working will repay the most careful study. They bear witness to great foresight on the part of both British and colonial statesmen; and some of the latter displayed more than once remarkable public spirit in preferring general to party interests. In view of the just completed Federation of Australia, the account of Canada's thirty-three years' experience contains many lessons, and perhaps some warnings. Sir John Bourinot gives some space to a critical comparison of the two Acts; and in an appendix he arranges their chief provisions in parallel columns. He evidently thinks that the guarantees against hasty legislation and democratic impulse in the Canadian Constitution are superior to those in the Constitution of Australia. And he is impressed by the fact that Canada is more influenced by the spirit of English ideas than Australia, "which has copied some features of the fundamental law of the United States." But Australia has not the motive for avoiding all appearance of such imitation, which existed in Canada in 1867. The last chapter reviews the relations between the States and Canada from the beginning of the Republic, and deals at length with questions like that of the Alaska boundary, which are still unsettled. It is interesting to note Sir John's opinion that questions in dispute between the two Powers have been treated with far more regard for Canadian interests since the Confederation was established. The whole book is, in short, one which should be read by every Englishman who is interested in colonial matters. On the political side its account of Canada's fortunes is as ably written as it is complete; but we wish that the author could have found space for a description of the rapid development of the Western and Northern provinces. It should be added that each of the three works is provided with an index and with excellent maps.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Herbert Paul's Essays.

The contents of Mr. Herbert Paul's volume MEN AND LETTERS (Lane, 5s. n.) are already familiar, for few readers who have a taste for scholarly criticism will have overlooked these essays in the Nineteenth Century, where most of them appeared. Mr. Paul has a sound judgment, a pungent style, an extraordinarily retentive memory for facts and dicta, and an intimate acquaintance with the literature of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries—especially the former. On the other hand, we do not find in him the breadth of view or the imaginative faculty of the great masters in criticism; his mind is one of those which are more concerned with particulars than with generals ; and his style, which, to put it at its highest, may be described as a kind of blend of Johnson and Macaulay, abjures too strenuously and ostentatiously the liberal graces of diction which later critics have successfully practised. He is determined to be the "plain blunt man" and to "speak right on." He has always a point to make, and he makes it in what the grammars call a "simple statement," scoring a ruthless pencil through any subordinate sentence or parenthesis which the natural man may in a moment of abandon have introduced into the original draft. So much said, we may warmly commend these studies of Sterne, Swift, Halifax, Selden, Macaulay, Gibbon, and others to our readers, confident that they will enjoy the atmosphere of scholarship, good taste, and allusive wit which pervades every page of Mr. Paul's book.

More Notes from a Diary.

It is a laudable practice to make a note at the close of each day of any thing interesting one may have heard or read, and the more so if the society in which one moves is one of culture and influence. This Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff has done for many years, as an unceasing flow of published volumes bears witness, and he at any rate deserves some credit for the laborious care he has devoted to the task. One cannot, it is true, avoid a lurking suspicion that the high personages with whom, as he tells us, he has breakfasted or dined are not quite fairly represented by the rather laborious epigrams or indifferent puns here recorded. But readers of "tit-bit" literature, spiced as this is by so many social notes about celebrities, will find entertainment in NOTES FROM A DIARY, 1889-1891 (Murray 18s.), and if some of the stories are familiar to-day, they were, perhaps, original when Sir Mountstuart recorded them ten years ago. Here and there one lights upon a tit-bit of real interest, such as this of Browning, of whom we have heard it asserted that he confessed to having forgotten the meaning of some parts of his poems. According to Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff—and the story is well authenticated—Browning, when spoken to about the obscurity of his poems, said, "I have heard that criticism before, and have twice gone carefully through them without being able to detect a single obscure expression."

Venice.

Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt's massive work, THE VENETIAN REPUBLIC, ITS RISE, GROWTH, AND FALL, 421-1797 (2 vols., A. and C. Black), contains over 1,600 pages, closely packed with facts and references, and must weigh several pounds avoirdupois. It has also an excellent index, and forms a wonderful cyclopædia of all matters concerning the famous city on the Adriatic. Like Venice itself, it has grown prodigiously, during many years, from humble beginnings. Inspired by an enthusiasm which seized him he knows not how, Mr. Hazlitt resolved to write a book on Venice at a time when he knew little about the subject, had never seen the place, and knew not a word of Italian ; and it is not surprising that he should now describe his first attempt, published in two volumes in 1858, as a rather weak performance. But it met with an encouraging reception ; and an enlarged reissue, in four volumes, appeared in 1860. Since that time an immense body of material previously unknown or inaccessible has been placed within the reach of students, and for forty years Mr. Hazlitt has amused himself from time to time in bringing his work up to date. Besides a host of monographs and minor works, he has ransacked the Archivio Storico Italiano, the formidable Diaries of Sanuto, which alone extend to over 50 octavo volumes, and the Storia Documentata of Romanin ; he has also profited largely by Mr. Rawdon Brown's invaluable Venetian State Papers in the English Rolls series, which, taken by themselves, in his opinion "reduce to wastepaper the entire corpus of old-fashioned literature produced from time to time in Italy and elsewhere on the history and constitution of the Republic." Mr. Hazlitt's touch is none of the lightest, but he knows how to make good use of his authorities, and the general annals of Venice are now presented in his pages with a fulness which only the conscientious student can properly appreciate. The latter half of the second volume appeals to a wider circle of readers. It comprises an extremely interesting series of chapters on old Venetian life in its various aspects—political, commercial, ecclesiastical, artistic, literary, social, and domestic. Mr. Hazlitt is an accomplished antiquary, and in this section of the work he appears to the best advantage.

What Makes Novels Popular?

COLLOQUIES OF CRITICISM (Unwin, 2s. 6d.) is written in the form of dialogue, and is reminiscent to some extent of the method of Sir Arthur Helps. It contains a good deal of sound criticism. One problem which the writer really gets very near to solving is : What are the principles, other than their literary merits, which determine the popularity of novels ? He perceives that, so long as one is on the plane on which manners matter, the essential thing is that the point of view of the writer should be the point of view of the majority of the readers. Otherwise the readers get angry, think they are being laughed at, and cannot make out why. The author instances the satirical description of the "garrison hacks" in Miss Broughton's "Joan." He might, perhaps, have found a better example in the satirical descriptions of the lower middle classes in a long series of Mr. George Gissing's novels. The class which Mr. Gissing satirises is really the great novel-reading class. They are inclined to treat him as if he were an uncivil tradesman, and take their custom elsewhere. On the other hand, they like Dickens because he gives them genial caricatures instead of portraits in which they recognize their lineaments :—"If Dickens had painted Mr. Pecksniff without any exaggerations at all, the vast number of people in Mr. Pecksniff's own position would have failed to see the moral comedy of his character. By exaggerating him Dickens places him at a distance from such readers. He places him below them ; and he thus enables them to occupy the detached position of critics."

Dickens, that is to say, succeeds, in a large measure, through "social sympathy" ; the novelist of whom the critics say that he "writes like a gentleman" can never win popularity on such lines. If he succeeds, it will be by rising to the plane on which manners do not matter—the plane of the primary passions :—

Under the deepest emotions people of all classes speak far more alike than they do on ordinary occasions ; and even if their manners are not precisely the same, the differences become unimportant. They are accidents ; they mean nothing. When a husband and wife are discussing their daughter's marriage, it is difficult to forget the class of society to which they belong. Every feeling they utter will probably have some reference to it. But when a man is bending over the bed of a wife or son who is dying, all that is essential in his feelings or in his language might as well belong to a man of one class as another. The social point of sympathy is nothing ; the human point of sympathy is everything.

Other problems of criticism are discussed in the book ; but this is the most interesting of them and also the most satisfactorily treated.

SIDE LIGHTS ON THE MARCH, by H. F. Mackern (Murray, 6s.), gives an American journalist's view of the war. He is a sympathetic confrère, Britannis ipsis Britannior, maintaining incidentally that "the natural outcome of international politics must be the unity of the Anglo-Saxon race." Nothing less, in the view of Americans who look ahead, can save the United States from the necessity of fighting for the Monroe doctrine in Brazil, as soon as the German fleet is a little bigger. The book is bright though not in the least literary.

THE LAST OF THE GREAT SCOUTS (Methuen, 6s.) is a biography of the gentleman who is known to the American Army List as Colonel W. F. Cody, and to the rest of literature as "Buffalo Bill." It is written by the eminent showman's sister, Mr. Helen Cody Wetmore, and will suit those who like this kind of reading ; it would be an acceptable present to a boy. We read with a particular interest that "genuine royal blood courses in Colonel Cody's veins." He is descended, it appears, from "Milesius King of Spain, that famous Monarch whose three sons, Heber, Heremon, and Ir, founded the first dynasty in Ireland about the beginning of the Christian era."

JAPAN AND THE COMITY OF NATIONS, by Baron Alexander von Siebold, translated by Charles Lowe (Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d.), relates carefully and accurately the gradual diplomatic recognition of the Land of the Rising Sun as the equal of Europe and the United States. A useful little book of reference.

It is not easy to understand why BENENDEN LETTERS, LONDON, COUNTRY, AND ABROAD, 1753-1821, edited by Charles Frederic Hardy (Dent, 15s.), should have been published. This budget of old correspondence is stodgy and uninteresting; it throws no new light upon public affairs, and lacks entirely the attraction so often possessed by old letters. The editor thinks that the intrinsic quality of the documents is good, and that they are somewhat remarkable from the fact that the connecting thread of a single long life runs right through them. We do not agree with him in either particular. Far more are we in accord with him when he expresses a fear that some readers may find one of the parties to the correspondence tedious and verbose. This is precisely our opinion of every contributor to the collection. Possibly the book may have some antiquarian interest in the Weald of Kent, since most of the letters were written to or from Benenden; the world at large, we fear, will yawn prodigiously and pass by. The two principal characters are one Cox, a person of indifferent morals, who for many years in the latter part of the eighteenth century was a clerk in the Sick and Hurt Office on Tower-hill, and his friend Ward of Benenden, squireen and land agent, who, at seventy-six, was compelled by a combination of injudiciously aggressive politics and slovenly account-keeping to exile himself to France—not an altogether agreeable retreat for an Englishman in the early years of the Republic, one and indivisible. Other personages there are who flit through the book, but they awaken no sympathy and hardly any curiosity. Mr. Hardy's own notes and explanatory matter are the most readable part of the volume, while many a better book has had a much worse index.

ART.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

[FIRST NOTICE.]

If art is anything greater than a badly-paid profession, then painters have a mission. What their mission is depends upon the point of view, and just now, in spite of the famous French cynic's remark that the ugly was first introduced into art when the first portrait was painted, artists appear to regard portrait-painting as their mission. In deciding this, and knowing that success in this direction has most alluring and substantial recompense, most painters forget that the well-doing of portraits is the most difficult of all the phases of artistic expression. It very seldom happens that the portrait-painter is assisted to make a fine picture by the material upon which he works, and to succeed he must draw firmly and unhesitatingly, paint well, and see below the surface; he must be, or persuade us that he is, as introspective as a mind-doctor, as alert as a hunted animal, and as educated as a savant. That this is too much to expect has been proved over and over again. It is because Mr. Sargent has these qualifications in more or less degree that he remains the portrait-painter of the hour. Whether he will ever be anything greater than this remains for the future to decide. Our doubts are based upon some consideration of past methods. We take Rembrandt as an example—the portraits he painted are portraits of men and women that we have met in various degrees of life. He sacrificed the light and colour of five-sixths of his picture, the fascinating, if enervating, qualities of tenderness, to his love of true contrasts of light and shade. It is, indeed, the facts of light that compel admiration in the Dutchman's work. Yet we never fail to recognize the human interest, the mastery, and knowledge which render his most artificial effects everyday realities. And then there is Velasquez—form, expression, beauty of colour, and character. It is impious to contrast Mr. Sargent's "Daughters of A. Wertheimer, Esq." with any great work, just as it may be fruitless to ask why there is an "Esq." after the dealer's name. What can be said of Mr. Sargent's "bravura" strokes, of the hair that is modelled rather than painted, of the lights that are forced and loaded, or of the mental vision which could conceive that such subjects could contribute to the making of a work of art? Can any one say, looking at this picture, what are the personal traits, the characters of these two ladies? Judged by the half-opened lips of the taller of the two sisters, the whole thing is a vast joke, and as such we are content to regard it, save that the accentuation of the ungraceful turn given to the shorter sister's arm by means of the fan, and the inanity of the left hand appear to us to indicate that even the painter had tired of his joke before he was well through with it. But all the diablerie which tempted Mr. Sargent to make this ruthless experiment would appear to have deserted him in the presence of "Mrs. Charles Russell" and of "C. S. Loch, Esq." These two portraits are in many respects alike. The flesh tints are simple and true, the figures shape easily in their frames, the modelling is firm, and there is form and expression in every inch. More than this, there is infinite variety in the pale, umber tones of the flesh. There is the impression that "Mrs. Charles Russell" is a living reality. A warm, breathing, witty personality rather than a painted image comes irresistibly before the onlooker. It is in portraits such as this that Mr. Sargent may live. The life that he gives may give immortality to him.

Little as we had intended, in a preliminary notice, to consider any picture in detail, the prominence of Mr. Sargent's seven portraits has detained us, just as "Her late Majesty Queen Victoria," by Benjamin Constant, must compel our attention at the outset. There can be very few whom this portrait of her late Majesty will satisfy. It is a misreading of character, neither regal nor motherly. The French artist appears to have seen the great ruler as an accessory to an impressive and Gothic piece of furniture. There is little grace and less dignity, and a sadness of colour over all which will deceive no one. The sitter is phlegmatic and the artist uninspired, and the great subject has left the painter unmoved, his "vision" notwithstanding.

It thus happens that two of the pictures that will be most discussed, Mr. Sargent's aggressive sisters and M. Constant's Queen, leave us dissatisfied, and nothing is lost by thus early stating our well-considered convictions. And yet two failures will not make a winter of discontent, and much that is quite equal to the standard of achievement set in former years remains. This, perhaps, is the characteristic of the present exhibition—it is the expected after all that almost always happens. No one who has watched Mr. Arnesby Brown's work of recent years will be surprised at his success to-day, at the absolute sunlight with which he has flooded his "Morning"; and the grace of Mr. Shannon has prepared us to accept with pleasure so complete an illustration of his undoubted merits as "The Flower Girl." The charm of freedom and freshness suffuses the whole canvas. Mr. Abbey again demands our attention with a somewhat unusual subject presented with fine imaginative workmanship, and Mr. Stott, Mr. Clausen, Mr. La Thangue, Mr. Aumonier, Mr. David Murray, Mr. Waterhouse, Mr. Parsons, Mr. Alfred East, and Mr. MacWhirter do not fall below themselves. Why then should we complain? No sane person would expect to find a nation living under the conditions that control human effort to-day producing two thousand masterpieces of art every year; and it is quite as well that it should not be so. The bright and unprejudiced maidens of Suburbia, who, thanks to schools of art, have a very fair standard of criticism, no less than the magnates of Maida Vale, come to Burlington House to see what the painters who have caught their fancy are doing. They never take quite kindly to novelties; and, perhaps, they are right and most of the critics wrong. There is enough and to spare of good work painted quite up to our expectation. For a first visit it should be sufficient to look carefully in the first room at "In the Cotswolds," by Alfred East; "On Lamington Down," by H. H. La Thangue; "Miss Kitty Shannon," by J. J. Shannon; "The River Bank," by Edward Stott; "Sheltered Pastures," by E. A. Waterlow; "Ali Baba," by Albert Goodwin; "The Golden Barn," by George Clausen; and "Fine Feathers," by Helen Cridland. In the second room "The Cloud," by Arthur Hacker; "The River Plough," by David Murray, and "A Breezy Upland," by E. J. B. Taylor. In the third gallery "The Duckpond," by Arthur Meade; "Crusaders Sighting Jerusalem," by E. A. Abbey; "Helen and Hermia," by Sir E. J. Poynter; "Mrs. Charles Russell," by J. S. Sargent; and "Nymphs Finding the Head of Orpheus," by J. W. Waterhouse. In room IV. "The Flower Girl," by J. J. Shannon; a "Provençal Village" and "Gathering Plums," by H. H. La Thangue; and "The Gipsy," by Elizabeth Forbes. In the fifth room "Sons of the Soil," by Geo. Clausen; "Birds of Prey," by C. Napier Hemy; and "Rest! Rest!" by Florence Small. In the sixth, "Morning," by Arnesby Brown, and "The Old Fabrique, Christiania," by Fritz Thaulow. In the next gallery pictures by J. Aumonier (513), David Murray (531), and Sidney Meteyard (543); in the eighth room Herbert Draper's "Tristram and Iseult," and J. S. Sargent's "C. S. Loch, Esq.," in the "gem" room, "December in Provence," by H. H. La Thangue, "A Panic," by Geo. C. Haité, "December," by Fred. Hall, and "A Box at Old Drury," by Talbot Hughes. In gallery X., "In the Venusberg," by Hon. John Collier, "Come Lasses and Lads!" by Young Hunter, "Sir Charles Sitwell," by J. S. Sargent, and "The Finding of Ophelia," by Herbert Gandy; and in the last oil-colour room "The Captive," by Herbert Draper, "Evening," by Arnesby Brown, and "The Steam-Saw," by Lindsay Macarthur. These are more than sufficient, and we shall return to them; for it is a no less interesting Academy than usual, and these pictures, at least, deserve consideration.

W. L. C.

FICTION.

The Rise of the Dutch Republic.

There are, as Mr. Rider Haggard explains in a prefatory note to his new book, two ways of writing an historical novel—"the first, to choose some notable and leading characters of the time to be treated, and by the help of history attempt to picture them as they were; the other, to make a study of that time and history with the country in which it was enacted, and from it to deduce the necessary characters." In LYSBETH (Longmans, 6s.) he has chosen the second method, and to our thinking very wisely. The depicting of "notable and leading characters" of the past is rarely successful in fiction, particularly when they chance to be protagonists of the story. Mr. Rider Haggard takes in "Lysbeth" a few undistinguished burgher families of Leyden, and an equally undistinguished Spanish soldier of fortune, and with their aid succeeds in setting before us something of that terrible life that the Hollander of the New Religion had to lead during the tyranny of Philip and the Inquisition. There are those who will say that they prefer to read of these matters in the pages of Motley. "Lysbeth" is a good book for all that—the best romance, in our opinion, that Mr. Haggard has yet produced—though it is quite possible that it may not prove the most popular. It is well conceived and admirably told. To say that there is not a dull page in it is a commonplace form of praise, and does not necessarily mean much, for the same is said daily of the last detective story, but it is none the less true of "Lysbeth." Not only is the fighting brisk and excellently told—the defence of the shot-tower, the escape from the torture-chamber, and the saving of Hendrik Brant's treasure are admirable—but the men and women are all unmistakably alive and there is an unwonted dignity and pathos in the conception of the story. We knew that Mr. Rider Haggard could paint a bit of fighting prettily enough, but there are scenes in this book informed with a quiet and restrained power with which we had scarcely credited him. Since Charles Kingsley wrote "Hereward the Wake"—and it is curious how many points of resemblance there are between that book and "Lysbeth," in spite of the difference in time and scene—we have had no romance breathing quite this spirit of high courage and strenuous optimism. The subject was a worthy one, and Mr. Haggard has treated it worthily.

Morbidezza.

"Asta Steele, restless, and with the untrammelled walk of a panther, stole to her window and threw open the shutters. Her skin this morning, after sleep, had that peculiar morbidezza which is so marked in those of West African blood. The warmth of sleep had sucked the colour from her cheeks and forehead, and under her eyes the dark stains, seen against the warm pallor of her flesh, appeared a brownish purple." The morbid colouring seen in the face of the heroine of TANGLED TRINITIES (Heinemann, 6s.) gives us the note and sentiment of Daniel Woodroffe's clever, if painful, novel. In a typical dull Kentish village abides a commonplace, rather foolish parson whose well-meaning attempts to help his flock by drawing on his own narrow means are not appreciated. Why? Because the ignorant and borné people of the parish know that he has negro blood and dislike him on that account. Mr. Steele does not know their reason, but his daughter does. The blood that seems to make him tactless and unattractive gives his daughter an exotic beauty and a highly interesting temperament. It is one of the freaks of mixed ancestry, and like many other rather remarkable facts in "Tangled Trinities" is founded on elemental truth. Asta Steele is at odds with the world from the first; the commonplace vicarage does not help her, the principles of Christian life as understood among the people she knows do not console her. The development of this penniless and beautiful girl—on the lines, alas, that descend to Avernus—is extremely interesting. For once in a way we can believe in the characters we meet. They are generalizations of well-known types, but the insight with which they are generalized makes them live. Colonel Skene, the "white officer" who crosses Asta's path and, but for the fact that the Fates are three and Love but one, could have made her happier, is admirably drawn, and like the other people of the story takes his place with the inevitableness of Greek tragedy. Asta's attempts to make her own way by nursing, governessing, and acting are well told, and her final step whereby she places herself under the protection of a Russian Grand Duke is led up to in a way at once convincing and unexpected. The tiny taint of black blood is over the whole; Asta's life is shadowed by it and the main factor in her history is her negress servant, Judith. Judith's is a new and powerful character in fiction. She represents in the complicated sum of our civilization the item of freed West African blood. She can be an obedient servant-slave in an English vicarage, or an influence of savagery, an echo of barbarism, if permitted a wider field. "There was about the woman a philosophy which, if not very deep, was pretty shrewd, and was sound as far as it went. That it didn't go far was because her brain-cells were not constructed that way. For thousands of years Judith's people had been content with the present; for thousands of years they had slept in the shade and giggled in the sun and rejoiced at trifles. . . . Never in all those years had they troubled about morals." With this devoted guide Asta enters upon wrong, but there is no evil in her heart. When at last she believes that Skene has given her up as lost, she may be inclined to quote as the author does on the title-page:—

Look, you have cast out Love! What Gods are these
You bid me please?

The Three in One, the One in Three? Not so!
To my own Gods I go.

It may be they shall give me greater ease
Than your cold Christ and tangled Trinities.

But the reader will feel that if Christianity has failed Asta, her "own Gods" will do no better for her. The book is not one for a governess to read to her pupils, but it is a remarkable study of an exceptional temperament.

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—III.

We are glad that Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet in the Contemporary finds something satisfactory to say about "cheap Literature." One cannot but smile when one hears the penny novelette decry by those who pay six shillings for fiction of about equal merit, and journals of the "Tit-bits" order which, at any rate, impart information sometimes of an instructive kind, laughed at by those who delight in pages of "society paragraphs." Mrs. Bosanquet has made a study of the penny novelette. Its essential foolishness is patent; but it is, so she reports, on the whole healthy in its tone; and it is improving. The author of "Drifting" writes on the "Economic Decay of Great Britain." He is at present in the stage of facts—and startling and uncomfortable they certainly are—but in a subsequent article he will get to conclusions. Among other articles, most of which treat of the subjects with which one expects a magazine to deal at the moment—the war, Army Reform, China, and the Liberal Party—we may call special attention to M. Jules Legrand's article on "Church and State in France since the Concordat."

The most interesting thing in Temple Bar is an extract from an old diary written by one of the train-bearers at Queen Adelaide's coronation in 1831—Lady Georgiana Bathurst. The behaviour of the House of Commons in the presence of Royalty has certainly improved since those days. "When the King put on his robe of cloth of gold as head of the Church and walked towards the altar they (the House of Commons) shouted with laughter."

The Archbishop (we are told) had some difficulty in getting the crown on the Queen's head; there was a large cushion of hair on the top of her head, and the agony of the Bishop of Chichester was great at seeing how very tottering it was, and yet nobody dared touch it; after the prayer was said Lady Brownlow assisted in securing it.

There is an editorial note to the effect that Lady Georgiana's diary was never intended for publication. It was, indeed, too frankly outspoken. "The Queen (it is said) looked remarkably well, much less red and heated in the face than she generally is." May Byron writes in this number lightly and yet learnedly on the burdens of songs.

In the Gentleman's Magazine Mr. Schütz Wilson gives us an intimate account of the career of Rachel Félix, the great French tragédienne. He remarks that "though the genius of Rachel gave temporary life to the French classic drama, she could not restore it to a permanent hold upon the stage." Have the works of the grand siècle really become so out-worn in these days of romanticism and symbolism? Coquelin and Sarah Bernhardt have done something towards keeping them alive. The chief interest attaching to Sir Robert Howard (the subject of a paper by Mr. Herbert M. Sanders) is the controversy in which he engaged with Dryden on the respective merits of blank or rhymed verse in drama. According to modern ideas Dryden, who appeared in his celebrated "Essay on Dramatic Poesy" as the champion of rhyme, was on the wrong side. Mr. Sanders, however, might have mentioned that he afterwards changed his opinion, and wrote his later plays in blank verse.

In the Monthly Review Miss Edith Sichel writes intelligently of "Charlotte Yonge as a Chronicler," and Mr. Erskine Childers has some sensible things to say about "Relations between officers and men on active service." On the whole, however, the number is dull compared with some of the other reviews.

Dr. T. Miller Maguire is always good reading, not the less so because he writes as if he were swinging a shillelagh. "Guerilla or Partisan Warfare" is his subject in the United Service Magazine; and his point is that we err on the side of leniency in our treatment of De Wet and the fighting peasantry of South Africa, and that "no invaders have ever allowed the same man to be a peasant to-day and a warrior the next day and a peasant again the next week except our invaders of the Orange State and the Transvaal." There are also articles on the Ashanti Campaign, and on the waste of horses in the South African fighting.

As usual there is more solid fact than literary distinction in the Empire Review. Lord Thring contributes an authoritative exposition of the law, actual and contemplated, of "Imperial Copyright." Captain H. Acton Blake discusses the advantages of the merchant service as an opening for young men; and Mr.

G. Seymour Fort, in his "Recollections of Government House," has a certain number of good stories to tell. For instance:—

Frequent inquiries reached us from persons in England concerning lost relatives. The geographical ideas of the writers were at times somewhat extraordinary, and the form of addressing his Excellency was often very quaint. Sometimes the correspondent would begin: "Your Almighty Highness." The descriptions of the lost one were usually of a domestic nature, and in one case the inquirer appended to her statement the words: "You will be sure to know him as he has red hair and all his clothes are marked F. H."

The Badminton has a most interesting biography of "the Oldest Living Cricketer"—Mr. Herbert Jenner Fust, aged 95, who played for Eton against Harrow in 1822, and for Cambridge against Oxford in 1827, and in 1833 was President of the M.C.C.; also a good climbing article by Mr. Claude E. Benson, entitled "On the Fells of the Lake District." There are the usual coloured pictures.

In the Universal and Ludgate we may draw attention to Mr. Harry de Windt's illustrated interview with Prince Henry of Orleans. We read that Prince Henry's alleged animosity to England is "an invention of the English Press"; but do we not remember the French Press inventing the same legend? Another interesting paper is that by Mr. J. Hayward on "The Small Trades of Paris." On the whole this magazine is improving.

The Argosy contains a good article on Exeter College, Oxford, with a story of the days when Oxonians, coming almost exclusively from the West Country, had a reputation for provincialism. One of these, being examined in divinity, was asked, "Who was Moses?" "Moses," he answered, "I knows nothing about Moses, but ax me about S. Paul, and there I has ye."

We have also received Good Words, with an article on Sir George Stokes by Mr. R. T. Glazebrook, and the Sunday Magazine with a study of Charlotte Yonge, by Miss Christabel Coleridge.

Other magazines sent to us are the Century, with a fine illustrated character sketch of M. Loubet, the Journal of Theological Studies, with an obituary notice of Canon Bright by Dr. Sanday, the Magazine of Art, the Art Journal, dealing at some length with the Glasgow Exhibition, the Essex Review, the Woman at Home, with short stories by Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick, Miss Edith Fowler, and Miss Adeline Sergeant, the Architectural Review, the House, Cassell's Magazine, Little Folks, St. Nicholas, and the Lady's Review of Reviews, a new publication which comes from Glasgow.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE GUNPOWDER PLOT.
TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Permit me to call your reviewer's attention to the matter at issue between us.

He stated categorically that I had ignored a possible reference to the Gunpowder Plot in Macbeth, and had founded on Shakespeare's supposed silence on the subject a principal argument against the reality of the conspiracy. In reply I showed that both statements are at variance with fact. Though tacitly acknowledging that he has nothing to offer in support of his previous assertion, instead of withdrawing it, he now writes as though the one point in dispute were the relative frequency of Father Garnet's various aliases, which is altogether a subsidiary question, though not without an interest and importance of its own, and one on which he fails to convince me no less than upon others.

Confining myself to what is most to the point, I find that he makes the following statements:—

I can only say that a further examination of original authorities bearing upon his career leaves no other course open except for me again to record my opinion that 'Farmer' was the favourite alias used by Henry Garnet. Moreover this Jesuit was as well known by the names of 'Roberts' or 'Phillips,' as by 'Waley' (sic) or 'Darcy.'

It would be far more satisfactory to have some indication of the "original authorities" which enforce such a conclusion.

In my own experience of contemporary documents it is just the other way—"Walley" is without comparison the most usual of his aliases, "Farmer" one of the least. If, to test the point, we take the Calendar of State Papers covering the period of the Powder Plot, we find the names assigned to Garnet thus distributed. Neither "Roberts" nor "Philips" is mentioned at all. "Farmer" occurs once, coupled with "Meaze." "Meaze," including this instance, occurs thrice. "Darcy" thrice, "Walley" 11 times. The last, moreover, is alone used officially even after his capture instead of "Garnet" itself.

It is, moreover, somewhat of an assumption that these other names, though attributed to him, really denoted Garnet at all. In the letter of Sir Everard Digby, to which Father Taunton in his communication refers me, a "Mr. Farmer" is certainly mentioned, who was clearly a priest. But was he Garnet? This is by no means plain. When elsewhere in the same collection of letters Digby mentions this Jesuit, it is as "Father Walley" (No. 3) and "Wallee or Garnet" (No. 7)—"Walley" being apparently more familiar to him than the true name. It is hard to understand why writing, seemingly to the same correspondent (his wife), he should, if he meant to designate the same person, use on this one occasion only (No. 9) a different appellation.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

SHENSTONE'S "LINES AT AN INN AT HENLEY."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I perceive that in your issue of this week you refer to the question whether Shenstone's well-known "Lines at an Inn at Henley" were written at Henley-on-Thames or Henley-in-Arden. It is at any rate obvious that Boswell thought that Henley-in-Arden was the Henley referred to. In the "Life" he and Johnson leave Oxford on March 21st; they dine at "an excellent inn at Chapel-house," where Johnson repeats the lines; they then pass through Stratford-on-Avon, and "lie this night at the inn at Henley where Shenstone wrote these lines," which they leave early on March 22nd and reach Birmingham at 9 in the morning in time for breakfast. Thus it is clear that Henley must mean Henley-in-Arden, and the opinion of Boswell, who had probably discussed the question with Johnson on the occasion, would seem to be somewhat strong evidence on the point. The situation of Shenstone's seat, "The Leasowes," also favours the claim of Henley-in-Arden.

MISATTRIBUTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I agree with your correspondent "D. P." in to-day's issue that "the first use of quotations is more interesting than their accuracy," but he seems to me to misuse "quotations," for does not this word imply a definite reference to a passage in a writer? He is thinking of the strange or remarkable sayings of eminent men.

The other day I found this passage in a book remarkable in itself—"Historic Studies in Vaud, Berne, and Savoy, by General Meredith Read (Chatto and Windus, 1897)"—the reference is to vol. 2, page 202; the quotation is from an unpublished letter in the collection of the late General, and this collection must be a striking one.

Voltaire writes to M. de Labat on Feb. 6, 1756, "God is usually with great fleets, as He is with great battalions."

Napoleon gets credit for having said "Providence is on the side of the strongest battalions," but the sayings are obviously the same. I can only suppose that Voltaire frequently repeated this as a saying, or that M. de Labat did; and that it came to Napoleon as a saying of Voltaire, or as a common saying.

I am, Sir, &c.,

C. S. OAKLEY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—With regard to the saying "being in two places at once like a bird," the following occurs in a letter written by Alexander Robertson of Strowan, who died 1749. "It seems a difficult point for me to put both orders in execution, unless, as the man said, I can be in two places at once like a bird." The letter relates to the rising of 1745, and was printed in the Jacobite Correspondence issued by the Abbotsford Club.

"A HONEYMOON IN SPACE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It may be good, bad, or indifferent taste for a reviewer to compare one living author with another; it may even be good manners to make puns on their names; but direct charges of plagiarism should not, in common fairness, be lightly advanced. I am sure, therefore, that you will allow me to put the facts of the present case before your readers.

The stories which I have spun into a connected yarn in this book were published under the title of "Stories of Other Worlds" in Pearson's Magazine both in England and America more than twelve months before Mr. H. G. Wells' Moon Story made its appearance. Part of it was written in the island of New Caledonia, whither even the fame of Mr. Wells has not yet penetrated.

Mr. Wells has no greater admirer than myself, but my admiration does not quite extend to "the sincerest form of flattery." In fact when I had the pleasure of making his acquaintance he characteristically remarked that he had always disliked me on account of an unpleasant habit I had of anticipating his ideas. For my own part I can put my hand on my typewriter and solemnly affirm that I am as innocent of appropriating his ideas as he is of taking mine.

As several other reviewers have fallen into the same error as your own, I hope you will grant me an inch or two of your space so that I may remove an impression which, I have no doubt, is as annoying to Mr. Wells as it is unjust to myself.

Yours faithfully,

GEORGE GRIFFITH.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

MURRAY'S HANDBOOKS.—In Murray's Magazine for November, 1889, John Murray the Third wrote an interesting article on the origin and history of the famous Handbooks for Travellers, which are about to change the old imprint of the Albemarle-street house for that of Mr. Stanford. The story—still issued in booklet form by Mr. Murray, we believe—was drawn from him in consequence of an article in the Pall Mall Gazette, which appeared to give to Baedeker the credit of inventing this class of literature; and Mr. Murray took up the challenge with a vengeance. The first of his guides, dealing with Holland, Belgium, and North Germany, appeared in 1836; the first of Baedeker's series, that for Holland and Belgium, written in German, was published three years later, with an acknowledgment of the compiler's obligation to "the most excellent guide-book ever published, 'Murray's Handbook for Travellers,' which has served as the foundation of Baedeker's little book." Mr. Murray had reason to be proud of his achievements. There were no railroads when, in his twenty-first year, he first set foot on the Continent, and the only guides deserving the name were: Ebel, for Switzerland; Boyce, for Belgium; and Mrs. Starke, for Italy.

Sorry was I [he says] when, on landing at Hamburg, I found myself destitute of such friendly aid. It was this that impressed on my mind the value of practical information gathered on the spot, and I set to work to collect for myself all the facts, information, statistics, &c., which an English tourist would be likely to require or find useful. I travelled thus, notebook in hand, and whether in the street, the Eilungen, or the Picture Gallery, I noted down every fact as it occurred. These notebooks (of which I possess some dozens) were emptied out on my return home, arranged in routes, along with such other information as I could gather on History, Architecture, Geology, and other subjects suited to a traveller's need; and, finally, I submitted them to my father. He had known nothing of my scheme, but thought my work worth publishing, and gave it the name of "Handbook," a title applied by him for the first time to an English book.

It was during his travels in this connexion that "Mr. John Murray, Jun.," visited Goethe, at Weimar, and presented him with the MS. of Byron's unpublished dedication of Werner to him. Later on he had personal interviews with Prince Metternich—an acquaintance renewed afterwards when the Prince was an exile in England—and Count Szechenyi, who had just completed his design of steam navigation on the Danube. The first four Handbooks, with the exception of the guide to Switzerland—"in which I was assisted by my good friend and fellow-traveller William Brockedon, the artist"—were written by Mr. Murray alone; but as the series proceeded he secured such able colleagues as Richard Ford for Spain, Sir Gardner Wilkinson for Egypt, Sir Francis Palgrave for North Italy, Dr. Porter for Palestine, Sir George Bowen for Greece, Sir Lambert Playfair for Algiers and the Mediterranean, Mr. George Dennis for Sicily, &c. To-day the foreign handbooks number nearly thirty, and the home ones about the same number. Of late years the series has been under the charge of Mr. Hallam Murray, who is a partner with his brother in the Albemarle-street house, and many of the handbooks have been thoroughly revised and brought up to date.

A preliminary programme has been prepared for the fourth International Publishers' Congress, to be held from the 10th to the 13th of next month at Leipzig. Among the London publishers who have promised to attend are Mr. Murray—who presided over the London congress two years ago, and who is one of the honorary presidents of the Leipzig conference—Mr. Frederick Macmillan, president of the Publishers' Association of Great Britain, and Mr. Heinemann, who is to read a paper on "The Sale-or-Return System." Mr. Murray will second a report to be read by Herr Hermann Credner, of Leipzig, on "The Permanent Bureau of the International Publishers' Congresses." Mr. D. C. Heath, the well-known educational publisher of Boston, U.S.A., who opened a preliminary discussion on "The Need for More Complete Protection of Copyright in Educational Works" at the London Congress, will read another paper on the subject. A report on "Copyright Relations between the United States of America and European States" will be read by Dr. Karl Trübner, of Strassburg, and seconded by Mr. Macmillan. Among the other papers to be read are "Publishers' Interests and the Published Price," by Dr. W. Ruprecht, Göttingen (seconded by M. Le Soudier, Paris); "The Relations between Authors and Publishers on the one part, and the daily Press on the other, with regard to Reviews," by Herr Paul Ollendorff, Paris; and "Duty Charged on Books and its Relation to New Commercial Treaties," by Dr. Alfred Giesecke, Leipzig (seconded by Herr E. Treves, Milan). In the section devoted to the music trade Mr. Arthur Boosey will read a paper on "The Appropriation of Copyright Music by the Manufacturers of Mechanical Instruments such as the Æolian," and Mr. David Day on "Piracies of Copyright Music."

The publishers are following the natural course of events in meeting this time in Germany, the three preceding congresses having been held in Paris, in Brussels, and in London. The German publishers, bent on making a success of the social, as well as the business, side of the congress, have drawn up a tempting list of entertainments—concerts, banquets, a reception by the town council of Leipzig, and visits to places of interest; while as a wind-up to the proceedings the members have been invited by the Corporation of Berlin Publishers and Booksellers to see some of the sights of the capital and to attend a farewell banquet there. Mr. Edward Fairholme, who made an excellent general secretary at the third congress, is going to Leipzig to read a report on the London proceedings, and to act as secretary to the English commission.

Messrs. Constable announce a volume of hitherto unprinted autograph poems by James the First of England. The existence of the poems in the Bodleian Library at Oxford has been recently discovered, and permission to print them has been given by Bodley's Librarian. The editor is Mr. Robert S. Rait, Fellow of New College. The title-page is an exact reproduction, mutatis mutandis, of that which was engraved for the folio edition of the King's works, published under his own supervision in 1616. There will be several colotype reproductions of the pages of the book, and, by permission of Sir Robert Gresley, the frontispiece is a hitherto unpublished portrait of King James. The edition is limited to 275 copies, of which 250 numbered copies will be for sale.

We mentioned last week the approaching completion of Mr. Laird Clowes' "History of the Royal Navy." The original idea was to limit the history to five volumes, but so much fresh matter about the last century came into the editor's hands that a sixth volume became inevitable. It is now announced that the important part played by the Naval Brigade in the South African campaign has made a seventh volume necessary.

M. Paul Formeaux, whose "Napoléon Prisonnier" has just gone into a second edition, is preparing a monograph in two volumes on the island of St. Helena.

Messrs. Hood, Douglas, and Howard have just issued an attractive pamphlet on "The Gainsborough Duchess," containing, besides a reproduction of the picture itself, a portrait of Gainsborough and other illustrations, with a life of the painter, an account of the picture, and the full story of its theft—a useful memento of perhaps the most extraordinary incident in the history of English art.

"Famous New York Families" is the title of a book to be published by Messrs. Putnam, in which the author—Margherita A. Hamm—endeavours to give the intimate history of city and State through the histories of some thirty prominent New York families. The writer has had access to many family documents which have never before been published. The early history of the United States remains a prevalent note in new American literature. Besides the forthcoming "History of the Scotch-Irish Families in America" and the record of "The Thirteen Colonies," already announced, Messrs. Putnam have a volume in hand by Mr. Woodbury Lowery on "The Spanish Settlements within the Present Limits of the United States, 1513-1561." Two illustrated volumes on "Historic Towns of the Western States," edited by Lyman P. Powell, with an introduction by R. G. Thwaites, are also announced.

"Tennyson" will be the subject of the next volume of Messrs. Dent's "Temple Cyclopædic Primers." An introduction has been written by Mr. Moreton Luce, and a short biography opens the volume. Some account is given of a hitherto unpublished poem.

Mr. Brimley Johnson announces a novel by Mr. A. T. Story, entitled "Master and Slave," which treats of life in agricultural districts. Some of the articles on "No Room to Live in the Villages," recently published by the Daily News, were from the pen of Mr. Story.

PROBLEM No. 168, by Max Karstedt.—White (2 pieces)—K at K R 3; B at K 8. Black (4 pieces)—K at K B 5; Kt at K 4; pawns at K Kt 4, K R 5. White moves—a drawn game.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A.C.W. (Bromley).—1. By accident, although using your interesting notes, acknowledgments of solutions were apparently overlooked. Did you note No. 147? Q-B 4 would be very commonplace. 2. If you and all others would add authors' names in each case it would be very convenient.

R.E.M., A.W.J. and others.—You go to work the wrong way. It is difficult to emphasize too strongly the fact that composers recognize certain leading principles of construction, and when you try to solve by giving a commonplace check or taking the first piece at hand you do violence to all of them, and waste your energy fruitlessly. Try something subtle and artistic. Begin anew with above prize-winners.

NOTES BY CORRESPONDENTS:—"I was much struck with the variety of play in No. 160."—W.M.B. "The sacrifices of the queen are pretty, and the variations produced by pawn defences are interesting."—A.C.W. The same correspondent writes, re No. 155, that it is solved by 1. K-B 5, K-Kt 8; 2. B-Q 3, P-Kt 8=Q; 3. B×Q, K×B; 4. B-K R 2, P-R 6; 5. K-B 4, P-R 7; 6. K-B 3, P-R 8=Kt (for if P queens, K-Kt 6 wins); 7. R-K Kt 2, P-B 4; 8. R-K 2, P-B 5; 9. K×P, and wins the ending from this point, being identical with one by Bachmann published in "Literature" a few weeks ago. We may well commend such studies to the attention of players and students.

SOLUTIONS.—Problem No. 151, by G. E. Carpenter (2), B-Q 5. No. 152, Carpenter (3), 1. B-Kt 3, R×B; 2. R-Kt 5, &c. Or 1. B-Kt 3, R-Kt 4; 2. Q-B 6 ch, &c. No. 153, La Stratégie (2), Q-K R 2. No. 154, same, White wins by 1. R×B ch, P×R; 2. P×B P, &c. No. 155 (See note). No. 156, Amundsen (2), R-K 2. No. 157, Schaad (3), 1. Q-Q Kt 2, Kt×Q; 2. P-Q 4, &c. No. 158, La Stratégie, White wins by 1. P-R 7, Kt-Kt 2 ch; 2. K-Q 5, and wins. If 1. P-R 7, B-B 3; 2. P-R 8=Q ch, &c. No. 159, Jespersen (2), B-Q B 2. No. 160, Marotti (3), 1. P-Kt 3; Kt-B 4; 2. Q-K 5 ch, Kt×Q; 3. Kt-B 6 mate. Many variations.

The following are Correct Solvers:—J. D. Tucker, 153, 154, 156, 157; Ernest O. Smiley (Leeds), 156, 158; A. Grose (Kensington), 155, 158; Arthur A. E. Thoms, 162, 163; W. M. B., 159, 160; Otto Würzburg (Michigan), 140, 141, 143 to 145, 147 to 149; A. C. W., 130 to 146, 148 to 160; W. Newsom, 154, 157.

THE LITERATURE OF CHESS.—M. Rosenthal, the veteran master who was mainly responsible for last year's Paris tournament, has issued, through the Société Anonyme de Publications Périodiques, 13 Quai Voltaire, a chess treatise ("Traité des Echecs") of about 470 pages, post 8vo. The work, which is, of course, in French, is much more than a mere record of the tournament, though it includes, we believe, all the games played therein, with useful notes. There is an introduction explaining the origin of the great tournament of 1900 and giving also the elementary principles of the game, so that novices may easily follow the notation and the games. The games of the tournament follow, and the volume closes with about 80 pages devoted to the discussion of various openings. Such a work deserves high commendation. We should be glad to believe that the necessarily heavy expenditure involved in its production is justified by the sale.

We have occasionally read of chess in Iceland, where, it seems, there are one or two flourishing clubs. Now the chess players there are issuing a magazine, which, by the way, is far better in its matter and general get-up than any, except the best German chess magazines. The title (we do not attempt the accents) is "Í Uppnami; Íslenzkt Skakrit," (Petur Zophoniasson, Chess Club, Reykjavik, Iceland). All chess players will cordially wish these Icelanders all prosperity.

"One of the most stimulating writers of the day, especially in the sketch-portraits of the people who have influenced him. His essay on Mark Pattison is not likely to be forgotten by any Oxford man, or, indeed, by any student of modern letters, who has chance to read it, and it is safe to foretell that the same will be the case with the 'Personal Memoir' in which he has enshrined his recollections of the late Master of Balliol."—THE TIMES.

"Since the death of Hayward, we know no English litterateur who has, in the same degree as Mr. Tollemache, the happy knack of recollecting or collecting the characteristic sayings and doings of a distinguished man, and piecing them together in a finished mosaic."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"It will not be surprising to any clear-minded reader of this and its companion essays that, in Pattison's final letter to his friend from Oxford, he should have finished it with the following words:—'For my part I cannot expect ever to see you again, and I must content myself with here recording my experience that your conversation was to me more stimulating than that of any man I ever met.' These essays must have a striking resemblance to that conversation."—LITERARY WORLD.

"The 'Safe Studies' are those to which it is impossible for any human creature to raise the smallest objection on any ground whatever, and they are about four times as long as the 'Stones of Stumbling.' These stumbling-blocks may possibly at some period or other have given scandal to a part of the population by no means likely to read them; but in these days the public has swallowed so many camels that we do not think Mr. Tollemache's gnats would even make any considerable portion of them cough. . . . We propose to make some observations on the most important of these charming essays. They are all singularly well worth reading, and may be described as the works of a most ingenious, accomplished, and cultivated man of leisure, who writes in order to fix recollections and systematize speculations which interest him, and not for the purpose of advocating particular views in the spirit of a partisan or propagandist. . . . The only likelihood of Charles Austin being remembered at all lies in the chance of the survival of the touching and striking account given of him by his accomplished, grateful, and most appreciative pupil."—The late Mr. Justice Fitzjames Stephen, in the ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week a portrait—the third in the series of "LITERATURE" PORTRAITS—of Mr. Rider Haggard, with some account of his literary work. The number will also contain a "Personal View" by Mr. Justin McCarthy on "The Revival of the Irish Language and Literature."

Pillars of Society was the second of Ibsen's plays of modern life, and appeared in 1877. It has faults, both ethical and dramaturgic. But it showed so few traces of age this week, when it was acted for the Stage Society, and in a general way fitted so well to the circumstances of to-day, that one cannot call it anything but a fine play. The ideas of the plays of 1877—British or foreign—are now the ideas of the past. The ideas which Ibsen makes us think about in Pillars of Society are still some of them the ideas of to-morrow. This is the ultimate test of any work of literature, after all. As Matthew Arnold put it, it is not the works which are oracles for their own generation that live; it is the works that are a little ahead of their time. The principal characters—Berwick and Lona Hessel—were well acted by Mr. Oscar Asche and Miss Constance Robertson, both trained under Mr. Benson. Mr. Charles Quatermain, another Bensonian, was also good as the fatuous schoolmaster whose idea of keeping home sacred is to draw the curtains and bar the door against the facts of life. For the rest, the representation was unequal. It really is a discredit to our stage that only three scratch performances should ever have been given in England of a play so constantly acted in Germany, as well as in Norway and Sweden, and containing so much to interest and stimulate an intelligent audience.

German research is following the fashion and turning its attention to love letters. Bismarck's we have already had—we notice them in another column. We now find Kant playing his part on the stage of epistolary erotics. Few students of the philosopher have suspected the existence of these letters. Heine says nothing of them in his immortal portrait of the Sage of Königsberg revolutionizing the philosophy of the world without moving beyond the walls of his native city. They appear nevertheless (together with the famous correspondence with Fichte) in the second volume of Kant's correspondence issued by the Berlin Academie der Wissenschaften. The lady, Fräulein von Horbert, addresses Kant in impassioned and stormy language on the pretext of consulting him about certain affairs of the heart, and finally proposes marriage to him—a proposal which Kant, from the serene heights of the critical philosophy, politely but firmly declined, though he continued the correspondence for some time afterwards.

Miss Rose Graves-Sawle, who has just passed away, was the third of the three ladies christened Rose, commemorated in Walter Savage Landor's verse:—

I now have heard
Gloeful, chirping Rose the third.

Mr. Leonard Courtney, writing to The Times, calls her "the third Rose Aylmer." She was the grand-niece of the first, the real Rose Aylmer, the heroine of the well-known lines:—

Ah! what avails the sceptred race!
Ah! what the form divine!
What every virtue, every grace!
Rose Aylmer, all were thine.
Rose Aylmer, whom these wakeful eyes
May weep, but never see,
A night of memories and sighs
I consecrate to thee.

This lady was the daughter of the fourth Lord Aylmer. She made Landor's acquaintance when he was still a young man and lent him a story by Clara Reeve which suggested his "Gebir." Her niece, Lady Graves-Sawle, the mother of the lady who has just died, is now the sole survivor of the three Roses—the second Rose, who,

Upon her wedding day,
Carried home my tenderest lay.

We are sorry to hear of the illness of Mr. Cencas Mackay, which has compelled him to resign the Sheriffship of Fife and Kinross. He is the chief living representative of the old union of law and literature at the Scottish Bar. His "History of Fife and Kinross" is a highly valuable work. From 1874 to 1881 Mr. Mackay was Professor of Constitutional Law and History in the University of Edinburgh, and last year he presented the University with £2,000 to supplement the salary of the assistant to the Professor of History.

M. Maeterlinck is in London at present and was in a box at the Royalty Theatre when Mrs. Patrick Campbell revived Pelleas and Melisande on Saturday. There was a loud call for him at the end, and in response he bowed his acknowledgments. The dreamlike fantasy of his imagining is now firmly established in the favour of a small but discerning public, to whom Mrs. Campbell's annual performances (this is the third year she has given them) are very welcome.

Young Italy has found its epic poet, and this poet is no less a person than d'Annunzio. The sun of his genius seems at last to have triumphantly pierced the clouds which obscured it from the eyes of his compatriots, and a chorus of eulogy has greeted his "Canzoni di Garibaldi." Carducci himself has crowned the head of the novelist with the laurels of the poet. The epic, when complete, will be in seven sections, viz. :—(1) "La Nascita dell' Eroe"; (2) "L'Oceano a la Pampa"; (3) "La Notte di Caprera"; (4) "Da Roma alla Palude"; (5) "Aspromonte e Mentana"; (6) "La Corona della pace"; (7) "La Morte dell' Eroe." The third of these, "La Notte di Caprera," has just been published (Treves, Milan). It describes the return of Garibaldi to Capri after his first campaign. In the night he is kept awake by the voices of Nature singing to him of his immortal deeds. He hears in them the tumult of battles, shouts of victory, the pæans of a liberated people. But in the background looms the shadow of Rome still enslaved, Rome once free and held by a hero against the French. The voices speak of heroic combats, of the attack four times repulsed, the farewell and retreat from the city. Then all becomes silence around the listener. The bleating of a lost lamb falls on his ear. He sets off to find it and restores it to its mother, and, like another Cincinnatus, he resumes his bucolic labours.

A correspondent writes :—It may be suspected that the really inexcusable offenders in the matter of misquotation, recently dealt with at large in your columns, are not the journalists, but the writers of books. They, at all events, cannot plead inexorable pressure of time. In "Babs the Impossible," for example, Madame Sarah Grand quotes three times, for purposes especially relevant to the opening of the story, a four-lined stanza from Bryant's "To a Waterfowl." Her version contains two mistakes. Mr. Le Gallienne is an incurable misquoter. He has this in "The Life Romantic"—

I know not thy soul from thy body,
Neither our love from God—which can only be a quite shocking mutilation of Rossetti's famous lines from "The House of Life" :—

Thy soul I know not from thy body, nor Thee from myself, neither our love from God.

Mr. Herbert Paul, in the opening essay of the book you reviewed last week, says that Pallas in "Cenone" is "now made to express herself" thus :—

Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control,
These three alone lead men to sovereign power.

The word in the second line is, of course, "life" not "men." Another point in this most admirable essay is worthy of note. Mr. Paul observes that "an interval of about twenty years elapsed between the publication of 'Ulysses' and the publication of 'Tithonus.'" That is true; but any comparison between the two poems should take account of the fact that "Tithonus" was begun at the same time that "Ulysses" was written, although it was not brought out again and finished until the end of 1859, nearly twenty years later.

The death of "the great Mac Dermott" has re-opened the not very important question of the origin of the political nickname of "Jingoes"; and we have even been favoured with learned disquisitions on the history of the phrase "By Jingo" whence it was taken. The last time the discussion arose was when President McKinley spoke of being "Jingoes into war." The Daily News, then, on the authority of the "Dictionary of National Biography," assigned the credit or discredit of the first use of the phrase in print in 1879 to the late Professor Minto. Thereupon Mr. J. G. Holyoake wrote to remind the Daily News that he had himself used the word in a letter to its own columns on March 13, 1878, and that his friend Professor Minto was well aware of the fact. The "Dictionary," by the way, merely says Professor Minto "gave currency" to the phrase. The Saturday Review prophesied as early as 1880 that the word might become as widely known and as respectable as the name of Whig or Tory, and took occasion to point out in an amusing passage its inappropriateness. "If we turn," wrote the reviewer, "to the celebrated refrain which has given currency to the word, and which will be remembered longer than many verses of greater lyrical value, we can find nothing more in it than the expression of a modest firmness and self-reliance. It breathes defence not defiance. It affirms that we have no desire for war; but that, should war arise, we have the means to face it. This temperate affirmation is clinched with an oath, reprehensible, indeed, and by no means refined, but far less objectionable than many other such words that we unfortunately hear even from the Liberal working man when we walk the streets."

Light has been thrown on Balzac's origin by recent investigations. His father's birth register has been unearthed in the archives of the Tarn Department. His name was Balssa, and he was the son of a ploughman. When he died, at the age of 82, in 1829, he had already changed his name to Balzac, and the prefix De was added by his son.

A morning paper, we notice, asserts that the quaint tenement in Portsmouth-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, shortly to be razed to the ground in preparation for the new thoroughfare, is, "without doubt," the real "Old Curiosity Shop" of Dickens' novel. This picturesque structure, alas, has no claim to be considered as the home of Little Nell and her grandfather. Dickens seems to have intentionally refrained from offering a clue to its exact whereabouts. Mr. Allbut, however, affirms (in his "Rambles in Dickens-land") that he was informed by a lady, personally acquainted with the novelist, that she was taken by Dickens to Green-street, near Leicester-square (behind the National Gallery), and he himself pointed out No. 10, Green-street, where the business of curiosity-dealing was then carried on, as the original of the Little Nell's home; her bedroom was an inner room, divided from the shop by a glass partition. This house was swept away when Charing-cross-road was constructed. There is evidence that the little red-roofed building in Portsmouth-street was first called "The Old Curiosity Shop" in 1868, when the then proprietor (Tessyman, a dealer in old books, paintings, &c.) had those words placed over the front for purely business purposes. Before that date, no suggestion had ever been made that the place was the veritable "Old Curiosity Shop" of the story. The misleading inscription on the plaster front, "immortalized by Charles Dickens," was apparently added by Tessyman's successor.

An American contemporary, Collier's Weekly, announces the discovery that Mark Twain was indebted to an earlier humorist for his famous story of the jumping frog of Calaveras County. The story, we are told, "emanated from the fertile brain of Samuel Seabough, the well-known Californian journalist of the days of '49," who wrote it for the Independent, published at Stockton, California. It appeared in the number of December 11, 1858; and our contemporary quotes the whole of it. A bit at the end will suffice for purposes of comparison :—

"Hello!" said one. "He's sick; they've drugged him."

"Lightnin' has struck the critter," dryly remarked Boniface.

"Throw off," remarked another.

Old Weaseleye pushed through the crowd, and, picking up the discomfited racer and holding him above his head, squeezed out of his stomach about a pound of bird-shot which Boniface had fed him in the night, mistaking them for flies.

Forty high-pressure boats pulling against the current of the Mississippi, or a hundred howling wolves would be a dead silence to the roars and yells that followed Joe as his coat-tail disappeared behind the next hill.

Certainly this is Mark Twain's story though Mark Twain told it better; and another of Mark Twain's famous stories, "The Great North American Pie Biter," is traced by our contemporary to the same source. The curious thing is that the original author never considered that he had a grievance, though his friends, years afterwards, wanted him to take the matter up:—

He said it was true that he had originally written both stories for the papers named, but that Mark Twain had taken them and made them humorous and famous. He added that he did not propose to claim their authorship for, as they then stood, they bore no resemblance to the originals, and both being actual occurrences he considered that Mark had a legitimate right to dress them up, and was now entitled to own them.

One wonders how many authors would have taken that genial view of the case.

Those Englishmen who enjoy seeing themselves as others see them should read an "Essai d'une Psychologie Politique du Peuple Anglais au XIX^{ème} Siècle" (Colin). M. Boutmy, the author, is well known to the British public; his studies on the English Constitution are hardly less familiar than Bagehot's brilliant monograph. He has spent an entire lifetime in the collection of British social and political facts, and his treatment is far richer and more scientific than Emerson's in his "English Traits." The Englishman will learn here why surgical operations succeed better on an Englishman than on an Italian; why English prose had so belated a development; why Ruskin is one of the most typical of Englishmen; why the soul of the nation is among the dissenters and not in Anglicanism; why England, which in its foreign contacts, is the most unsocial of countries remains at home the most liberal and hospitable. There is no book which has appeared in Paris for months likely to arouse more genuine interest in English readers.

The success of the German Theatre in London has set on Mr. Grein and others to consider whether a French theatre could not be established on the same lines. French plays would probably appeal to a wider class than German plays, if they were reasonably well acted. A guarantee fund is being subscribed and we may hope that the idea will bear fruit.

A correspondent writes:—"There has come into my possession a Shakespearian item of genuine interest. It is a marked copy of the catalogue of the memorable sale of Shakespeare's house and relics on the 16th of September, 1847. I have also obtained with it the original sketch for the picture of the scene in the auction mart, which was published at the time in the Illustrated London News, containing portraits of Sir F. Madden, of the British Museum, Peter Cunningham, Charles Knight, Payne Collier, Halliwell-Phillipps, &c. The auctioneer was the famed George Robins, that prince of auctioneers for gorgeous and flowery eloquence; and this sale gave him an opportunity of displaying his auctioneering rhetoric in its finest and most full-bodied form. The catalogue is a large quarto. The green cover has fortunately been preserved, and it is adorned with portraits and views. It would almost seem that my copy of the catalogue is the auctioneer's own copy, as it contains two additional items written in, which were not in the copies of the catalogue as printed and issued to the public.

"From the 'Particulars' we learn that 'pilgrims to this shrine of genius were attracted from the earliest part of the last century, and that the ever memorable jubilee at Stratford, instituted by Garrick, induced an immense assemblage of all those anxious to do homage to the memory of the all-inspired bard, while from that period an increasing flow of devotees may be traced, until within the last thirty years, when the blessings of peace reigned throughout the world, and the facilities of travelling having increased, visitors from all parts of the world rushed with a spontaneous and universal feeling to visit the abode and birthplace of the mighty dead.' In the true 'Ercles vein—a style unknown until the advent of Robins—the auctioneer speaks of the great necromancer whose mighty mind has led one and all to that reflection which must tend to ameliorate and gladden the hearts of those whose delight it is to peruse and ponder on his writings, and who must exclaim, with a well-known writer, 'Ten thousand honours and blessings on the bard who has thus gilded the dull realities of life with innocent illusions; who has spread exquisite and unbought pleasures on our chequered path, and beguiled our spirits in many a lonely hour with all the cordial and cheerful sympathies of social life.' Appended to the 'Particulars' is a copy from the register at Stratford-on-Avon of the baptisms, marriages, and burials of the Shakespeare family from the year 1558 to the death of the last descendant of the poet, George Hart, in 1778.

"For Shakespeare's house and the buildings adjoining an offer of £1,500 was first made, and this was immediately advanced upon to £2,000 by Mr. T. S. Butler, of Upper Clapton. The London and Stratford Shakespeare Committees finally secured the lot for £3,000. The next five lots were the visitors' books of autographs, extending from May, 1821, to September, 1847, containing the autographs of almost all the eminent men of the time, and these became the property of Mr. Butler, at an expenditure of seventy guineas; a small bust of Shakespeare, carved from the veritable mulberry tree, fetched £18 18s; the chairs and cabinets, some of them curious and elaborate, brought no large sums; and a fine though slightly imperfect old black-letter Bible ('Breeches Bible') of the year 1589 went for £2 2s.—a very different sum from what it would have fetched to-day."

THE SYMBOLIST.

Help me to seek that unknown land,

Help me to see the shrine,

Help me to feel the hidden hand

That ever holdeth mine.

Help me to seek and I shall see,

To hear and I shall know,

To feel and I shall hold in fee

The realms of earth below.

Help me to mourn and I shall love:

What grief is like to mine?

Crown me with thorn, the stars above

Shall in the circlet shine!

The mystic angels group and kneel

Before the cross of flame,

They cry, as through the gloom they steal,

The glory of the Name.

The Temple opens wide, none sees

The love, the dream, the light;

Oh, blind and finite, are not these

Blinding and infinite?

The veil, the veil is rent! The skies

Are white with wings of fire

Where victim souls triumphant rise

In torment of desire.

Help me to seek: I would not find;

For when I find I know

I shall have clasped the wandering wind

And built a house of snow.

ALFRED NOYES.

"Hibernicus" writes: "I am desirous of reading up the work done in English literature by 'Irish' authors of all sorts; and also to try and trace any effects which Irish writers may have had upon English letters. Can you inform me whether there are any books published dealing with such writers collectedly; or with the more abstract point? If you can oblige me on this point it would be a very great favour—one added to the many benefits which I have already derived from the columns of your paper."

Some interesting comments passed on the American book trade by Mr. George Haven Putnam are reported in another column. We learn with interest that the expense of putting a book on the market is greater in the United States than here, owing to the need for advertising in many centres of culture, and the high cost of keeping travellers in the field; but we surmise that this disadvantage is fairly well balanced by the fact that authors usually (and properly) accept lower royalties from American than from English publishers. More interesting, from the literary point of view, is Mr. Putnam's contention that "the great stream of traffic between England and America is broadening the interest of the reading public on both sides," and that "we grow more familiar with each other's country and characteristics and like to read about them," and above all that this happy state of things is attested by "the larger audience which the American author can nowadays find over here." To what extent actual figures support this representation Mr. Putnam does not say; and no doubt exact figures would be difficult to get. But there is no doubt that the conditions of the international book trade have changed considerably of recent years; and perhaps the most striking change that has come over them is a certain well-defined divergence of taste between English and American readers of American books. In the old days the American books which acquired popularity in England were almost invariably the books of the authors who were the most popular in their own country too. The names of Washington Irving, of Longfellow, of the Rev. E. P. Roe, of Harriet Beecher Stowe, of Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, of Emerson, of Bret Harte, and of Mark Twain suggest themselves at once as illustrations of the truth of the statement in many diverse branches of the literary art. At the present moment, however, we find a new phenomenon—a number of American authors whose sales are unparalleled in the history of bookselling, but whose popularity finds rather a faint echo on this side. There is the exception, of course, due to exceptional circumstances, of the religious story by the Rev. Charles Sheldon; but the rule is unaffected by it. For the American writers who are most highly regarded here are such writers as Mr. Henry James, Mrs. Atherton, and Miss Wilkins, while the popularity of such immensely popular writers as Mr. Winston Churchill, and the author of David Harum, if not actually bounded by the frontiers of the United States, certainly does not leap to the eye in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It seems singular, but perhaps the explanation is not really very far to seek. It lies in the fact that recent American successes have not been purely literary successes, but have been achieved upon what we may almost call "provincial" lines. Books like "Richard Carvel" do not appeal to humanity at large, but to the local patriotism of the United States. There are plenty of local patriots to buy them; and their very limitations are no doubt locally helpful to their sales. But the cosmopolitan appeal must necessarily be made from a broader platform. The fact that he speaks from such a platform, championing the cause and expressing the sentiments of white men generally, is one of the reasons why Mr. Rudyard Kipling has such a following in America as no American writer has in England. Similarly the American writers who have been most warmly welcomed by English readers have been humourists like Mark Twain, or pathetic writers like Harriet Beecher Stowe, or cultivated writers like Mr. Henry James. For tears and laughter and culture are all cosmopolitan; whereas local patriotism is uninteresting away from the locality.

Literature Portraits.—II.

Mr. ANTHONY HOPE HAWKINS.

Literary success is often difficult to predict; but in the case of Mr. Anthony Hope there could have been no mistake from the outset. No competent judge of the popular taste could have failed to see that a popular success was assured and inevitable. Nowadays, with the multiplication of libraries and of publishing houses to supply them, it is easy enough to get a hearing; probably every book of any quality gets published sooner or later. But to gain the public ear is another matter, and our purveyors of fiction have not yet perhaps quite grasped the fact that what the public wants is not so much to be taught and lectured at as to be represented and portrayed. Yet, over and over again, the repetition of popular success enforces the lesson; it is the representative man who holds the public. He may represent only a class or a sect, but if he represents it sincerely and radically he will find it rally round him, and the larger his field the larger, of course, his following. The one certainty in popular fiction, as in politics, is that "the man-of-the-hour" is always found to be not so much an individuality as a reflection or sublimation of many individualities—a man made in the image of his fellows, and bearing their superscription, like a phylactery, upon his forehead.

To these qualifications no one among the novelists of to-day answers more fully than Mr. Anthony Hope, for he represents—and does so with genuine frankness and vigour—the most characteristic qualities of the well-bred and well-educated Englishman of the time. His talent, and the ideals for which it stands, are the natural fruit of our public-school and University education; his heroes, under whatever guise they appear, are forthright modern Englishmen. They might have stepped from the Guards' Club or from the pavilion at Lord's; we know them at once, and we know them true to life. And since they are our countrymen and our own familiar friends, we are slow to subject them to criticism. Theirs is the world with which we all sympathize, and in which many of us live the whole of our easy and contented lives. Let us see for a moment our natural faces in Mr. Hope's clear and shining glass.

The life to which he introduces us is healthily, manfully enjoyable; "there are our young barbarians all at play." There is nothing here of the subtler shades either of emotion or of thought, no looking before and after, no pining for what is not. It is a sunny afternoon; and whether the adventure be of the heart in Dolly's boudoir, or of the sword in Streisau, it is taken up freshly and with a soul for any fate. Life has for these excellent, but rather limited, fellows no perturbing problems, and very little illusioning poetry; everything is straightforward, simple, and direct. It is a world where a man will meet with some temptations, but more adventures; and, when the temptation comes, the way of escape is plain before him. Love is a good thing, but honour is a better, and when a man is at crossways he can only take the right one. Noblesse oblige. The Southern lover would sacrifice his world to his passion; the Englishman resigns Flavia to a nobler code of duty. Life is not always easy, but its ways are clear; a man can only be a gentleman after all.

That this is Mr. Hope's world is explicitly clear in his stories of adventure; but the same ideal is implicit in his tales of modern politics and sketches of London society. The modern Englishman, and the modern Englishwoman, too, reappear under every circumstance, sane in mind as in body, and issuing always in action. That is, indeed, the second characteristic of his work; energy is its keystone. Modern honour and modern energy underlie it all, and excellent qualities they are. The British public school system is built exclusively upon their foundation; and as yet no sounder system of education has been invented!

It is interesting to notice how neatly these characteristics have fitted into the scheme of current fiction. The representative man always arrives when the hour is ripe for him, and Mr. Hope has not been exempt from his opportunity. The old melodrama, whether of the library or the theatre, has languished during the last few years; even the Adelphi has failed to retain its patrons. The familiar, unsophisticated sentiments, which were good enough for our fathers, are found at last to be threadbare; even the gallery no longer thrills to the old trumpet-call, "An Englishman will never strike a woman!" And pat to the moment, "like the catastrophe of the old comedy," comes Mr. Anthony Hope, with a new and polished method of melodrama for the stalls. The "Zenda" school of story, whether in the book or on the stage, is really nothing, of course, but refined melodrama, with the old offences of fustian shorn away. The characters are the old friends, tinted with a new manner; the tradition of action is sustained; there is nothing new but the invention. One feels this particularly, perhaps, in the case of the villains. Rupert of Hentzau, for example, is but a superficial schemer. Like Richard of Gloucester, his villainy is entirely displayed in active resource; there is no underlying spirituality of evil as in Iago. He is cast in a mould, and ticketed with a quality. He acts up to the ticket, but always acts, and only acts; and even his villainy borrows a reflected glory from its objective. This, indeed, is of the essence of Mr. Hope's method. The interest in his villain's machinations is animated by the fact that they are directed against a modern Englishman, thrown by the fantastic spirit of adventure into an almost mediæval environment. This device, in which Mr. Hope was anticipated by Stevenson, adds greatly to the effect of his narrative; how greatly we get some idea when we compare the "Zenda" and "Phroso" stories with his purely historical novels. This side of his work is commonly disparaged by criticism; but it is work entertaining enough, of its rather artificial kind. It is refreshingly free from Wardour-street archaism, and, like everything Mr. Hope does, it moves with vivacity and colour. But it certainly does serve to show, what many critics overlook in the more original stories, that Mr. Hope has not much gift for characterization. When we get a new tale of pure action we are carried away by the spirit of the thing, and do not stop to analyse character; but when historical personages are represented, concerning whom certain facts of character are generally known, we begin to look for more motive and more detailed portraiture. And, missing them, we then appreciate that these things are not part of Mr. Hope's equipment, and that all his people have a certain superficial and conventional quality; they talk and act rather than think.

His contributions to dramatic literature, pleasant and unaffected as they are, have no striking qualities to differentiate them from his fiction. The best of them—the drawing-room school of melodrama—afforded easily effective parts to actors of subordinate individuality, while the "English Nell" and "Lady Ursula" experiments are of a familiar order of costume play which appeals rather to the ingenuity of the stage-manager than to the art of dramatic interpretation. On the stage his bright and diversified dialogue shows, naturally, to advantage; but he has given no scope to what is rather presumptuously called "the creation" of character. And this again emphasizes the fact that action and word rather than motive are the main-springs of his method.

This is true also of his social sketches, his "Dialogues," his "Comedies of Courtship," even, too, of his more ambitious studies, such as "The God in the Car" and "Half a Hero." Here there are much more delicacy of handling and a genuine sense of that sort of surface-level emotion which plays over the comedy of modern philandering. Moreover, the workmanship is often intricate and of rare finish. Even the too much reiterated trick of aposiopesis adds to the natural air of the conversation. "In moments of effort," said Stevenson, "one learns to do the easy things that people like"; and no one who has any sense of the literary craft will imagine that these apparently simple effects of Mr. Hope's are secured without much comparison and elaboration. Still, even in this gay and natural world a certain superficiality dissipates the sentiment. The emotions displayed are those commonly touched by vers de société, which Frederick Locker, himself a master of the method, described as the interests of a world where "a boudoir decorum is preserved, sentiment never surges into passion, and humour never overflows into boisterous merriment." In his women, who are almost uniformly shallow, this foible is no doubt intentionally emphasized, but it overflows into the masculine realm as well. Mr. Hope's men are not "men of feeling"; sentiment is felt and acknowledged, but never with a fervour beyond the limits of breeding and behaviour; no one is greatly affected—not even the reader.

But these very qualities—for they are actually qualities rather than defects—stamp Mr. Hope as the representative Englishman we have already described him. "The modern Englishman," said Taine, "is influential and respected. He has the pleasures of self-esteem and the satisfaction of conscience. He knows that he has authority, and that he uses it loyally, for the good of others. And this healthy state of mind is supported by a wholesome life. . . . He lives in the open air, he withstands the encroachments of a sedentary life, which always leads the modern man to agitation of the brain, weakness of the muscles, and excitement of the nerves. Such is this elegant and common-sense society, refined in comfort, regular in conduct." Such, too, is the society into which Mr. Hope conveys his readers. It has more of the adventurous spirit than Taine ascribed to it, and is, perhaps, rather strenuous and downright than actually "elegant," but in all other details the Frenchman's observation is unquestionably correct. And it is a thoroughly sound and invigorating society in which to move and act. Its records, whether at ease in Mayfair, or in perils in Ruritania, will not, it may be, make literature of the first order; for that, even in fiction, more vigour of thought and more sense of the seriousness of life are needful. Still, it remains a good world to live in, and its people are, in their way, true and profitable companions. They are, at least, men, and leaders of men; sincere, open of hand and heart; and, when you want them, you know where to find them. Their superficiality is of ideal, not of conduct; and, if they only see one side of a question, that partial vision does not prevent them, when it comes to action, from acting in the one right way. In a word, they are thorough-going Englishmen; and that, to an Englishman himself, is warranty enough.

ARTHUR WAUGH.

Mr. Anthony Hope had probably little inkling of the golden harvest ahead when he sowed his first literary seeds a dozen years ago. He was a barrister, and took to writing partly to occupy his leisure. But he was not sanguine enough to think that any publisher would care to run the risk of bringing out his first venture—"A Man of Mark"—so he had it printed at his own expense and published it on commission. The critics received it with mingled praise and blame. It was not a financial success at the time, but it must have long since repaid its author, for Messrs. Methuen, its present publishers, have not only brought it to a fifth edition in six-shilling form, but have printed two large editions of it in their sixpenny "Novelist" series. "Father Stafford," Anthony Hope's second book, was written in 1890 and refused again and again by various publishers before Messrs. Cassell took it up and published it at six shillings. Even then it hung fire for a long time, waiting for the author's reputation to be made with his later books. It is now published by Cassell's at three and sixpence, and has also gone through one of their immense sixpenny editions. His next book was "Mr. Witt's Widow," which was published in 1892 by Innes. It was very favourably reviewed and sold fairly well as a six-shilling book. To-day it sells as well as ever, and has reached its seventh edition—including a recent sixpenny reprint which was exhausted within a week or so of publication. It now appears with "Sport Royal"—the short stories originally contributed by Anthony Hope to the St. James's Gazette—"Half a Hero" and "Comedies of Courtship," in the uniform three-and-sixpenny edition published by Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co., who took the books over from Messrs. Innes. "Half a Hero" was originally published as a two-volume novel, and only had a small sale at fast; but it went well as a six-shilling volume, and does even better in its present form.

In 1893—the year after his unsuccessful fight as a Liberal candidate against Viscount Curzon for the Southern Division of South Bucks—Anthony Hope began his connexion with Messrs. Methuen, when they published his book, “A Change of Air” (now in its sixth edition), and, with the exception of 1896, they have issued a new novel from the same pen every succeeding year. “A God in the Car,” which they published in two volumes in 1894, was begun before “The Prisoner of Zenda,” but was put aside so that the latter could be finished. This was originally brought out by Messrs. Arrowsmith at 3s. 6d., but they now publish it at 6s., uniform with its sequel, “Rupert of Hentzau.” Arrowsmiths are also the publishers of the “Indiscretion of the Duchess,” issued in the first place as one of their annuals, but now produced in the more substantial style of the other volumes. The year 1894 was an eventful one for Anthony Hope. It was the year not only of “The Prisoner of Zenda” and “The God in the Car,” but of “The Dolly Dialogues” (the new series of which will no doubt, like the old, be reprinted in course of time in book form), and the year in which he gave up the Bar to devote himself entirely to literature. Since then success has followed success with almost monotonous regularity. Every year his popularity increases, and each new book goes better than the last. About forty editions, for instance, have been printed of the eight novels published by Methuen—which include, besides those already mentioned, “Phroso” (1897), “Simon Dale” (1898), “The King’s Mirror” (1899), and “Quisante” (1900)—and they are all still in constant demand. One of the earlier books, “The Chronicles of Count Antonio,” will shortly be included in the sixpenny “Novelist” series. Another of Anthony Hope’s novels, it should be added, is published by Messrs. Longmans—“The Heart of Princess Osra” (1896). It is understood that his play, The Adventure of Lady Ursula (produced at the Duke of York’s Theatre in 1896), is founded on a novel which has been copyrighted both in England and America, and it is possible that we may yet have it in book form on this side of the Atlantic.

PAPER-PATTERN NOVELS.

A “Personal View.”

[BY A REVIEWER.*]

In these prolific days, when every reviewer who possesses a pretty wit and no bowels of compassion can have his sideboard, his mantelpiece, and his chairs heaped with novels, it is the custom to marvel at the degeneracy of an age that can turn out waste matter until the “general reader” takes his daily walk between dust heaps. What struck me, before the truth dawned, was the reverse of this impression of degeneracy. “What stupendous energy,” I thought, “what perseverance, what power of seeing life steadily and seeing it an inch at a time appears to belong to all my fellow-creatures! I have the same equipment as the greater part of them—arrogance, ignorance and facility—besides the advantage of having handled the ropes for some years and being familiar with their every twist. But the ‘sustained effort’ of writing a novel remains steadily beyond me.” Out of all the chaotic mass of human beings, with their interests and actions and passions, how to carve a compact slice and turn it into a mould and out again with a pretty shape and all its angles gone?

A burning conviction on any subject whatsoever—the more remote its aptness to fiction the better—might be of use. Let a man take to heart the over-population of England or the under-population of France, the disadvantages of marriage or the evils of the motor-car, and he is pretty sure of a long, perfectly inartistic, and probably popular result. The daily Press will say he has laid a fearless finger upon a festering sore; the weeklies will speak of it as “A highly interesting study.” But most of us who have not yet written novels are young enough to have buried our convictions with our illusions; we dig them up later and mumble them again, as a dog mumbles a bone; but in the meantime there is not enough of them to make a penny novelette. A fresh form of unpleasantness is another promising foundation for a novel. But how few there are left! Unmarried ladies have laid “a fearless finger” upon most of them. And it is a serious fact that people who long to write novels savouring of impropriety go in fear of their relatives. Agony strives with humour as they picture the spectacles adjusted and the awful pages turned by beamingly admiring elders. Few have the disarming spirit of a young writer whose work I recently met with. Her book was steadily and conscientiously improper, and she dedicated it “To my dear father and mother, to whose literary incentive I owe this, my first effort.” After that, there was not much left for “my dear father and mother” to say—but they probably said it.

The people who, without either conviction or audacity, paid out their yearly novel less laboriously than if it had been their income-tax seemed to me to be mystic and wonderful. As a reviewer, I read them with reverence and “slated” them with compunction. Then the naked facts became apparent to me. Four or five out of ten of these people write the same novel! It is literally true. There are only about half-a-dozen novels written by the second-rate and third-rate authors. You may read half of one of them, put it down, take it up again (as you think), read the other half, glance at the title, and find that you have been reading two books—half of each! The “flats join” quite accurately. If it is the changed identity novel, the apparently ineligible lover will be in full swing of a passion inspired by “himself alone” when the book is half written. If it is the arbitrary will novel, the cousins who have fiercely resolved not to marry “to order” will be surprising a love-light in each other’s eyes, and turning away “with a bitter little laugh” whenever things begin to look promising. This method of mildly tantalizing is good for at least six chapters out of the last seven. The seventh is concerned with the skating, shooting, or dog-cart accident which reveals each inanity to the other. Quite twenty popular novelists will be found to blend indistinguishably over this recipe. Its title will be “Love’s Victory” or Somebody’s “Secret.” And throughout not a spark of real love or passion can be found in it. If it were only real—if there were blood in it—if the novelist either imagined or even observed for herself one pair of lovers possessed by any form of love, from the basest to the highest, and would reproduce the merest shadow of what she saw, the faintest echo of what she heard, one would not complain of the framework. All skeletons have a strong likeness to one another. It is when there is no body round them—nothing but the kid and horsehair of the tailor’s dummy—that we refuse them their audacious claim to human interest. There is no need to fall into the opposite pit of minute realism, with its conscientious reproduction of every thrill, which has the ludicrous effect of making sin itself uninteresting. The masters of style have shown how light a touch will make their characters stand out as palpable flesh and blood. Read the scene in one of “Mark Rutherford’s” books between Thomas Broad and Fanny Allen at “the religious picnic.” It is not love and does not pretend to be—but how extraordinarily real it is! My twenty novelists would have been quite capable of taking the scene in hand. They would have used at least twice as many words (the same words, approximately) and it would all have resulted in—a description! No. An old woman, who lived in a village near Clifton, used to make a steady living by the manufacture of honey out of turnips—I think it was turnips. “There’s many as don’t know the difference,” she chuckled, “and it tastes much the same, and costs much less.” It certainly costs much less. It takes no imagination, no sympathy, no exhausting climb after the truth, to use the turnips heaped up ready to the hand and turn out an innocuous, marketable imitation. But what of the public palate dulled by the turnips until it finds that they “taste much the same” as real honey?

Not only with love but with villainy (revenge, tyranny, murder) does the many-headed writer of one novel take his types ready-stuffed from the shop-window. When has there ever been a creature so consistent, so preposterous as the “bad man” of the conventional story? He is forever in the same mood. He has a power of concentration and remorselessness that would make a Napoleon of him if he chose. Yet the feeblest device is enough to bring him to disaster. If he is of the physically violent order, he will move earth and heaven to get the heroine into his power; and having gained his object, he will let her out again, “without a stain upon her character.” He will get the hero into bonds and mock him with threats of torture, and release him without a scar upon his person. If he is of the slightly subtler kind, he will still pursue his end without any of the caprices or compunctions that make a man human—and dangerous. A creature so ostentatiously compact of evil would have no chance of corrupting anybody. From the moment when he enters a room, with his eyes too close together, kicks the family dog, and causes the infant daughter of the house to cry “Go ’way, bad man!” he would be perfectly harmless; for the people who might be affected by him would certainly have read my twenty novelists, and learnt to take him at his true value.

Not only are the broad lines of these would-be artists all untrue to life, but the touches which fill in the detail are largely false as well. Take the stock way in which an agitating piece of news is generally received. It is the breaking of a paper-knife. Unless I gave chapter and verse, the number of times in which this particular device is used would hardly be credited. Somebody is “toying” with an ivory paper-knife. A name is uttered in some startling connexion; and the “frail toy” snaps in two pieces. Now, I have made a special study of this question, simply because I wished to see for myself whether the accident was so usual as really to have impressed itself upon the twenty novelists, or whether it was simply their docility of imitation. I found that a verbal shock causes a cessation of muscular action, and not a sudden spasmodic intensifying of it. If a man were “toying” with a paper-knife and an arresting speech were made to him, it would be literally arresting. He would keep his hands perfectly still for an instant, as if to listen better. In the heat of an argument, on the contrary, he would probably bend the paper-knife more and more recklessly until it did actually snap. This is an insignificant piece of observation, but it shows how many people will shirk noticing the smallest facts for themselves, and will take them on trust from others. It reminds us of the stage start, in which the hand is clenched and jerked up to the mouth. Hardly any one living starts like that. But the stage has such limitations, and such dangers lie in over-subtlety, that one accepts the obvious from it, in gesticulation at any rate. Why an author, with all the world before him, should bind himself to fixed antics, I cannot understand. It is easier, and usually more lucrative, to refrain from writing a novel than to write it.

A. H.

THE AMERICAN BOOK WORLD.

The American book trade will have a distinguished representative at the Leipzig Congress next month in Mr. George Haven Putnam, the head of the house of G. P. Putnam's Sons. One of the most learned of publishers, and the author of two scholarly studies of literary conditions from the earliest times to the Middle Ages, he has done much towards increasing the solidarity of interests between authors and publishers on the other side of the Atlantic. His father founded the house of Putnam in America in 1837, and three years later came to London to inaugurate a branch of the business over here. It was during the elder Putnam's eight years' stay in England that Mr. George Haven Putnam was born. He was a student at Göttingen when the American Civil War broke out, and he had three years' active service as an officer in the army of the North. At the present moment Mr. Putnam is in England—on his annual visit to the London branch of his house—and we were fortunate enough to learn his views on the subject of the American book trade in general and the recent successes in American fiction in particular. Mr. Harper was lately credited with the sweeping assertion that the British book trade was declining; that England was falling behind America in the development of literary talent, and that the United States was now the book market of the world. Mr. Putnam smiled when we asked him if that was the general impression in the United States, but as he had not seen the statement he preferred not to express an opinion upon it.

But, he added, it ought not to be a question of one country against another; and, fortunately, the great stream of traffic between England and America is broadening the interest of the reading public on both sides. We grow more familiar with each other's country and characteristics, and we like to read about them. “Certainly we have widened out our sympathies in this respect in America, and that the feeling is reciprocated is clearly shown by the larger audience which the American author can nowadays find over here.” The extraordinary sales of certain books in the United States, he continued, have been due to a combination of causes, but mainly to the improvement in the average quality of the home product and the rapid development of literary taste of the people as a whole. With a population of seventy millions it is easy to see that once a book commands attention its selling possibilities are tremendous; and in these days of swift communication, a book that is talked about in New York will immediately be heard of in almost every town in the States. Then its success comes by leaps and bounds. “But publishing in America has its difficulties. Over here, for instance, it is a simple matter to send your traveller to any part of the kingdom, but in a country of such immense distances as America it is a more serious matter. To keep a traveller in the field costs £2 a day east of the Rocky Mountains, and £3 west of the Rockies, apart from his salary. Advertising, too, is a more expensive undertaking in the States than in England, for we have to do it on a much larger scale. Advertisements in the London papers are seen everywhere, and the English author, for the most part, is satisfied with these; in our case the author is not content with advertisements in the New York papers only; he expects to see them repeated in the other leading cities of America. And all these items have to come out of the publisher's margin, so that sometimes, with a book that seems to the outsider to have been something of a success, the margin of profit has vanished.” But what about the “dry goods stores”? Mr. Putnam admitted that certain of these establishments were playing an important part in the book trade of the country—but he maintained that they were rendering a service of their own. The difficulties in the way of the regular bookseller were deeply to be regretted, and he hoped that the new net scheme would do something to restore the bookselling trade. But one's personal feelings could not be allowed to affect the well-being of the book-world as a whole, and American publishers, he said, had no choice but to accept the advantages offered by the book departments opened by the "dry goods stores" in an increasing number, of which the business was intelligently and, generally speaking, admirably managed.

A distant relative of Mr. Putnam—his great great-uncle—is to be the subject of the next volume in the "Men of Energy" Series—"Israel Putnam, Farmer, Pioneer, Major-General," written by one of his direct descendants, Mr. William F. Livingston. Major-General Putnam left his plough for the battlefield and did good work under British Commanders before the Declaration of Independence, and then fought his way up to Second in Command under Washington. He takes his place in the "Men of Energy" Series as a first-rate citizen as well as an excellent soldier. Another biography published by Messrs. Putnam is "Roger Ludlow, the Colonial Lawmaker (1590-1664)," by John M. Taylor. Roger Ludlow, the "Father of Connecticut Jurisprudence," was the old Balliol scholar who left the English Bar to sail for America, to be one of the first settlers in Dorchester. He became one of the ruling spirits of Connecticut, and was appointed to codify the laws of the colony in 1646, "Mr. Ludlow's Code" being established four years later. The most stirring years of his life, however, were spent in his town of Fairfield, protecting the frontier against both the Indians and the Dutch, and bringing a hornet's nest about his ears by raising volunteers. The Government said he was attempting an insurrection, and Ludlow, resenting this reflection on his patriotism, abandoned the colonies and returned to England, eventually, it is believed, settling in Ireland. An important work in the press for the series of "Writings of the Fathers of the Republic" is the "Constitutional Decisions of John Marshall," first Chief Justice, edited by P. A. Cotton, of the New York Bar.

Apropos of our recent article on English bookbinding, an American Correspondent writes:—On the whole, book-binding receives more encouragement, I fancy, in America than in England. Some little time ago the New York Times published some views on the subject, from which I quote the following:—

"There is more originality and thought in their format," said a well-known English publisher, backing up his assertion by producing half a dozen American books at random from his shelves. "They spend more time and money on a book than we do. They will give $20 for a cover design, and another $20 to the man who produces the brasses (stamps) to impress it. If we give a sovereign for the design and another for the brasses we think we are doing the thing stylishly." The American book cover conveys an impression of thought, and probably is in itself an admirable advertisement of the contents of the book. On the other hand, it may be observed that an English publisher recently stated that he had produced a book which he would match against anything of its kind in America, and he had only sold four copies of the edition!

Editions de luxe of standard authors with expensive bindings do, without doubt, find a market here, and there are not a few firms who make a speciality of this branch of the book trade. A city in Wisconsin is more suggestive of breweries and foundries than of literature; but "The Philosopher Press" at Wausau in that State is producing a limited edition of "The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám"—twenty-six copies on Japanese vellum in full levant leather, sold at £20 a copy, and 100 copies on hand-made paper at £5 a copy—the pages bordered with a Persian design, in which the gold is hot-stamped leaf, and the borders filled in by hand with water-colours in the rich colourings of Persian art. To judge from the sale of other limited editions, there will be no trouble in selling off this edition, and purchasers will be eager to get the low numbers, as many book-lovers take a pride in having No. 1, or as near to it as they can get of a numbered edition. Such at any rate was the experience of B. C. Montgomery, of Rochester, N.Y., who disposed without undue delay of an "Edition Magnifique" of Shakespeare limited to twenty-five copies, and issued in twenty-four octavo volumes at £8 a volume, and an "Edition des Amateurs" of Tennyson in twelve volumes, limited to 100 copies, at a cost of £6 a volume. Both these editions were printed on finest imperial Japan paper, bound in full crushed levant or full polished calf. The Shakespeare is illustrated with 240 etchings and photo-gravures. The same publisher had similar good fortune with an edition of seventy copies of the Waverley Novels in forty-eight small octavo volumes at £2 a volume, of 500 copies of Victor Hugo's works in thirty volumes at £1 a volume, and thirty-two volumes of 100 numbered sets of Dickens' work at £5 a volume. Other expensive editions of these authors and of George Eliot, Thackeray, Carlyle, Ruskin, Byron, and others are selling almost as freely. These are by no means the only houses who devote their whole attention to this class of work; witness the successful issues by the "Roycroft" shop at East Aurora, who have just published an elaborate catalogue of their work. Their edition of the "Rubáiyát" comprised forty copies on Japan vellum at £2 a volume, and is not such an elaborate work as that of "The Philosopher Press." But another volume by the "Roycrofters," "The Last Ride by Robert Browning," has each stanza enclosed in a specially hand-illuminated border, signed by the artist, and, to quote the words of the publishers, "is an approach to the Ideal; it has the flavour of the Missal and bears on every page and part the apparent touch of consecrated labour. . . . Joy will be the possession of each one of the 'Eleet who owns a copy.'" After this, one breathes a sigh of relief in finding that the price is only £20 a volume in the edition of twenty-five copies on classic vellum, individually bound in full levant, hand tooled, with other less elaborate copies at lower prices. Other issues are the "Essay on Walt Whitman" (Stevenson), "The King of the Golden River" (Ruskin), "Christmas Eve" (Browning), and Tennyson's "Maud," all limited editions elaborately got up and priced at £2 and £1 each according to their style.

Dr. Azel Ames, a member of the Pilgrim Society, publishes through Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin, and Co. a large octavo volume which, it is stated, will give all that is authoritatively known about the voyage of the Mayflower. The little ship of 180 tons, with 100 Pilgrims on board, dropped anchor in Plymouth Harbour, Massachusetts, on the 11th of December, 1620, and it is natural for the patriotic New Englander of to-day to revert with pride to its history and to cherish as their most sacred possessions relics of the Pilgrims which were brought over from the old country and survived the perils of the voyage and of nearly 300 years' existence. The authenticated relics include old-fashioned chairs belonging to Elder Brewster, Governor Bradford, and Myles Standish, and a cradle the property of Dr. Samuel Fuller, the physician to the Pilgrims. But the wanderer through New England towns and villages of to-day is lost in wonder how the devout Elder or the patriotic Governor could have found a use for the vast number of chairs of various shapes and sizes which they are alleged to have sat on, or how many babies Dr. Samuel Fuller reared for himself or others whose cradles are now reverently preserved as relics of the Mayflower. It must have been a wonderful boat, this ship of 180 tons, and we picture it sailing into Plymouth Harbour with chairs and cradles hung on to every mast and rope, chests and bureaus bulging out of every porthole, and the captain directing the movements of the ship from a pinnacle of household furniture of antique design. If we are to believe the artist of one of the frescoes at Westminster, the ship Mayflower showed yet another marvel; for it is there represented as flying the Union Jack, which was not invented before 1800.

Some high prices were obtained at the recent sale of Mr. F. W. French's library at Boston. A complete set of Charles Lever's works, sold in fifty-five volumes, went to J. O. Wright and Co. for £92; MS. of the Bible in Latin, circa 1220, a little damaged, £12 10s.; Burns' Poems, 1787, £6 5s.; Burton's Arabian Nights, 1885-8, 16 vols., £37 10s.; "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," 1866, first edition, £11 9s. 2d.; first edition of "Pickwick," in original parts, £16 5s.; "Tale of Two Cities," in original parts, £11 9s.; "David Copperfield," in original parts, £6 5s.; Dickens' Christmas Books, 1843-48, £10 18s. 7d.; first edition of Lang's "Ballads and Lyrics of Old France," bound by Riviere, £7 5s. 10d.; first edition of Lang's "Aucassin and Nicolette," 1887, £5 6s. 3d.

THE TASTE FOR FICTION IN MEDÆVAL ITALY.

[By W. G. WATERS.]

II.

In spite of the blight cast by the popularity of the "Decameron" upon chivalric romance, the realist movement set going by Boccaccio was not entirely unchecked. Some ghost of the dead Provençal culture must have been walking in Central Italy at the time when the "Pecorone," the collection of stories which comes next to the "Decameron," was put together. The scheme of Ser Giovanni's poem might have been taken direct from Troubadour romance. The crude realism of Boccaccio falls once more into the background, and the writer—who must have read some story like that of Geffroi Rudel and Melisande of Tripoli—sets forth how Aurette the lovesick youth was moved to the worship of the beauteous nun Saturnina simply because he had heard report of her graces and perfections. They managed to meet and tell one another stories every day in the convent parlour. There was no crafty intrigue, no befooling of husband or father. Aurette, who had spent all his substance in cortesia, had attained his object by putting on a priest's frock and getting by the favour of a friend the post of convent chaplain. By losing his heart in this fashion Aurette was following strictly the rules of Troubadour etiquette. A few of the stories resemble those of the "Decameron," but the greater part of the work is filled with historical narratives taken from Villani's chronicles. It is hard to explain the cause of this abrupt change in subject. Perhaps the author may have felt himself overshadowed by the fame of his illustrious forerunner, or even outdone in popularity by the more racy work of his contemporary Franco Sacchetti; more probably he was driven to alter his line of narrative through distaste of the gross and lascivious subjects which in those days formed the stock material of the world of fiction; for his stories, judged by the standard of his age, are pure both in form and spirit. The "Pecorone" seems to have enjoyed a certain popularity, but it found no imitators. The romance of chivalry had made its last bid for favour amongst the Italians.

With Sacchetti, the contemporary of Ser Giovanni, the realist movement made a further advance. Sacchetti rarely travels beyond the borghi of Florence for his subjects; his tales are generally descriptions of petty life, the coarsest practical jokes told in the coarsest possible language; they have no setting like the "Decameron" and the "Pecorone"; and many of them are mere anecdotes in the style of Poggio. With Sacchetti the vehicle of expression is degraded as much as the subject-matter, for he writes his stories in the roughest vernacular without the least effort after literary style. The time had evidently come when the popular novelist might dispense with all rhetorical ornament. But Sacchetti's novels, unattractive as they are as literary performances, are perhaps the most valuable of all in helping to reveal the inner life of the citizen. The thoughts and feelings of the common people are set before us in the language they themselves used. The point of the story is almost always some artful trick, or still more artful retaliation. The Florentines evidently hankered after chronicles of common life told in the most pungent phrase; for Grazzini (Il Lasca), who wrote "Le Cene" some century later, followed the same line and achieved just as great popularity. Meantime in the south had appeared a collection of tales altogether different, the "Novellino" of Masuccio, which certainly ranks in merit next to the "Decameron." The Florentine story tellers had not spared the priests and the religious orders, but there was generally a spice of good-humoured banter in their castigation of the gallantries of a peccant friar. It was reserved for Masuccio to exhaust the vocabulary of hate and contempt over the abominable wickedness of the Neapolitan clergy and of the corrupted women who shared their offences. Masuccio's book first appeared in 1476, and the four other editions which came out before the end of the century give evidence of its popularity, and show that the public taste was fully in sympathy with his attack on the abuses of the Church.

With all his hard words Masuccio was no foe to true religion for he reserves his highest eulogy for St. Bernadino, St. Antonio, and the other great evangelists; but the Papal authorities must have liked his "Novellino" less than did the lay public, seeing that it was one of the first books put on the Index. The appetite of the Italians for fiction was thoroughly roused and for the next century novels were poured out by the hundred. Firenzuola, Cinthio, and Bandello were the best known of the novelists of the sixteenth century, but their tales are largely imitations or variants of the writers already named, and they call for no special mention because they show little variation from those which preceded them, a proof that the public taste was still the same—or perhaps it would be more correct to say that none of these later writers possessed the gift necessary for the direction of taste into a new channel. At last came a change; in 1550 Giovanni Francesco Straparola published in Venice the "Piaci-vole Notti," a collection of stories on the old lines, with a "Decameron"-like setting and novelle of the normal type, of which some were original, and others—and here comes in the distinctive characteristic of the "Notti"—were taken from Oriental sources and enriched with that supernatural interest which the "Decameron" had banished from fiction. The reign of materialistic realism was over, and the fairy tale had found its place in modern literature.

The fact that this collection came out at Venice counts for something. Travelling Venetian traders may have heard and repeated these stories—some of which are almost exact renderings of the Arabian Nights, which were not done into any European language till 150 years later—or some Eastern story-teller may have told them upon the quays of Venice. Straparola, like Ser Giovanni, illuminates fiction with romance, but he does more than this. In all Ser Giovanni's romances of chivalry there is no touch of the marvellous. All his plots are worked out by natural means, but Straparola draws upon the miraculous without stint. For instance, one story common to both, has for leading incident the ascent of the lover to his mistress's chamber by the aid of an eagle. Ser Giovanni makes the eagle a colossal hollow figure, inside which the lover is transported; but Straparola lets him transform himself by magic into the form of the bird and fly up to the lady's balcony. In Straparola, too, we find the first European rendering of our old friend "Puss in Boots."

We have trespassed beyond the bounds of mediævalism; indeed at this point imaginative literature in Italy ceased to put forth any fresh growth. As a rule the Italian writers of fiction concerned themselves with little else than the typical Novella. Beyond Sannazzaro's Arcadia there is no important Italian contribution to pastoral romance, nor to the picaresque tales, written after the model of Lazarillo de Tormes; nor to such monstrosities as Polexandre or Le grand Cyrus, romances de longue haleine, with which the novel readers of the seventeenth century beguiled their leisure.

A UNIQUE "PILGRIM'S PROGRESS."

SOME PARALLEL PRICES IN THE PAST.

On Thursday of last week a very large copy of a very small book made no less than £1,475. It was an editio princeps, with certain remarkable features, of Bunyan's immortal "Pilgrim's Progress." Buy the truth, sell not wisdom, enjoined Solomon; but the legend over the library of the bibliophile is, as it has always been, acquire the rare, take no heed of the plentiful. The "uniquity" of this little volume made it thus valuable. Although Macaulay in 1854 wrote that "not a single copy of the first edition is known to be in existence," five examples can now be traced, three of them imperfect. This original issue was "printed for Nath. Ponder at the Peacock in the Poultry, near Cornhill," 1678. The copy which realized the unprecedentedly high sum last week measures 5½ in. by 3½ in., the largest known, the calf in which it was first bound is in excellent state, and, save for two or three letters of the text and a portion of a marginal note, it is quite perfect. The feature upon which much of its value depends is the engraved portrait of Bunyan, for long deemed to attach to the third edition only. In the hilly background of this engraving is the suggestion of a city marked "Vanity," instead of, as in the third edition, "Destruction." Mr. R. E. Graves, of the British Museum, discovered slight remains of the letters "V" and "y" beneath those of the altered plate; moreover, the paper on which the 1678 plate is printed is similar to that of the rest of the book, which contains 232 pages of text, and is said initially to have cost 1s. 6d. Lowndes, the bibliographer, valued the late Mr. R. F. Holford's copy, lacking the frontispiece, at £50 in 1873; but not until now, so far as is known, has an example of the editio princeps come under the hammer. The opening bid of £100 was little more than humorous, the second quintupled it, and in less than a minute offers, among others from Messrs. Denham and Sabin, had raised the booklet to four figures. Onward from this point the "Pilgrim's Progress" was, so to say, pitched from one side of the Atlantic to the other, inasmuch as Mr. B. F. Stevens, the American agent, and Mr. S. C. Cockerell, one of William Morris' associates in the Kelmscott Press, said to be representing a home collector, were the combatants. At £1,450 the volume would have crossed the Atlantic, perhaps not again to be seen by bibliophiles in this country; but Mr. Cockerell made an advance of £25, and the hammer fell.

The incident is of even greater significance than may appear at first sight. Apart from Horæ, whether MS. or printed, the painted and illuminated miniatures of which give distinctive character to each, no book of the size of the "Pilgrim's Progress" has hitherto, we fancy, realized a comparable sum at auction. But, after all, the dimensions of the volume are a secondary consideration. It is of much more importance to note that, save for the greatest work in our language, and again excepting Books of Hours, &c., which contain idiosyncratic pictures, only outstanding examples from early printing presses have hitherto realized sums in excess of the Bunyan. It must not be understood, of course, that if brought to auction to-day fine copies of many another book would not make £1,500; but, so far, if we mistake not, this has not been the case. The following table gives details of a few of the highest-priced works which have come under the hammer, with in some cases a record of earlier sales:—

At the head of the list is the second edition of the Psalter, printed on vellum by Fust and Schoeffer in 1459. This was the second book bearing a date, and the enormous cost of production was in all probability partly borne by some wealthy man at Mainz. To this day it remains uncertain how the beautiful capital letters, printed in two colours, the letter itself in one, the surrounding ornamentation in another, were produced. Some deem them to have been illuminated by hand, but Mr. Weale is of opinion that they were "printed, subsequently to the typography, not by a pull of the press, but by the blow of a mallet on the super-imposed block." The late Mr. Bernard Quaritch bought this Psalter for the highest sum ever paid for a book at auction, and in his subsequent catalogue it was marked at 5,000 guineas. In the Mazarin Bible, second on our list, we have not only the first printed edition of the Bible, but the first book executed with metal types. The Paris copy has the rubricator's inscription, showing that it was finished prior to August 15, 1456, the earliest dated printed document being an Indulgence, November 15, 1454. Some idea of the appreciation of this great initial effort of the printing press may be gained by comparing the prices paid respectively in 1824 and 1873 for the Sykes-Perkins example on paper. The fourth book on our list is the first printed Bible with a date, and the first work divided by the date into two volumes.

One of the most memorable book sales ever held was that of the Duke of Roxburghe's great assemblage, dispersed in the summer of 1812. In a total of nearly £24,000, far and away the most noteworthy item was that which appears fifth on our list. As the issue of a spirited contest between the Marquis of Blandford and Earl Spencer, the former paid £2,260 for the "Decameron," issued by Christopher Valdarfer at Venice in 1471. That this was an inflated price for the period—and not for many decades was a like sum given for a printed book—is indicated by the fact that Earl Spencer procured the identical copy seven years afterwards to add to "the finest private library in Europe," for £918 odd. The Duke of Roxburghe is said to have given 100 guineas for the volume. The Roxburghe Club was founded in connexion with this historic sale in 1812, and by way of dedication a "Bibliomaniac Ballad," signed "Cristofer Valdarfer," was addressed to the thirty-one eminent book collectors forming it, "and all black letter dogs who have passed initiation." The value of the Sunderland copy of Petrarch's last work, the allegorical poem "I Trionfi," printed by Bernardino de Novara, depended in part on the fact that it had two sets of the six illustrations, one on metal and one on wood. These are full page cuts, measuring some 10in. by 6in., illustrating the triumphs of Love, Chastity, Death, Fame, Time, and True Divinity.

Four works printed by Caxton appear on the table. Raoul le Fevre's "Boke of the Hoole Lyf of Jason" was translated out of the French by our first native printer, and is one of the earliest productions of the press he set up at Westminster. The Jersey example of the King Arthur is said by Blades to be the only perfect one. The colophon bears these words:—"Emprynted in thabbey westmestre, the last day of Juyl the yere of our Lord MCCCClxxxv." The editio princeps of the "Canterbury Tales" is a monument not alone to Caxton but to Chaucer. In Mr. Blades' opinion this, in many respects the chief production of his press, was the fifth book printed by Caxton at Westminster. It is without name, date, or place. "The History of Troy" is of surpassing interest inasmuch as it is the first book printed in English. Caxton had made a translation of this favourite work for the Duchess of Burgundy, and a considerable demand for copies seems to have sprung up. As the printer-translator informs us in the prologue to the third book, it was during its progress through the press that he learned the "new art of printing." The Earl of Jersey's copy is the only perfect one known.

It will be noted that each of the foregoing works has special claim on the collector from a typographical point of view. With the Shakespeare and the Bunyan it is different. The £1,700 First Folio had many contemporary seventeenth-century notes, which added greatly to its literary value, and, despite Dibdin's prognostication that a copy was never likely to fetch more than the 116 guineas paid for the Grenville example now in the British Museum, we cannot be surprised that in the general appreciation in other directions this First Folio has participated. Now Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" takes its place with Shakespeare in the company of monumental works issued within four decades of the birth-time of printing.

Besides the large sum given for the "Pilgrim's Progress," referred to above, another good price was the £340 for "Ivanhoe"—a portion of the original MS., comprising about 53 leaves. This portion, together with the 58 leaves sold in 1894, probably forms all of the novel that was written in Scott's own autograph. Among other important books to which we did not refer last week were :—

Shakespeare, "The Raigne of King Edward the Third," 1590	£68
"The Life and Death of King Richard the Second," 1634	£56
"The Two Noble Kinsmen," 1634	£33 10s.
Higden, "Polychronicon," 123 leaves of Caxton's 1482 ed.	£55
Montesquieu, "Le Temple de Guide," 1772, plates in three states, a fine copy	£74
Cowper, "Poems" and "The Task," first ed.	£23 10s.
Lamb, Lloyd, and Coleridge, "Poems on the Death of Priscilla Farmer," Bristol, 1796	£30
Tennyson, "The Last Tournament," first ed., 1871	£22
FitzGerald, "Salámán and Absál," first ed., 1856	£31
Scott, "The Lord of the Isles," 1815, presentation copy to Wordsworth	£34 10s.
"Marmion," 1808, also a presentation copy to Wordsworth	£44

After the hurry and rush usually so characteristic of the auction room, there was quite a leisurely air about the proceedings at Sotheby's on Friday and Saturday last. Two important, though numerically not large, collections of MSS. came up for sale. No one can say definitely what the precise value of an illuminated MS. is. There are no trustworthy criteria to work by, and no two volumes are ever alike. It is merely a question of what bidders are prepared to give. Hence every one takes time to think, and this general absence of haste fits well with the old-world tone of the books themselves. Besides the MSS. there were a few other volumes which went back to the beginnings of things in the book world. Cheek by jowl with French MSS. of the late fifteenth century were some fine books, on vellum too, printed by the great French printers Thielman Kerver, Eustace, and Hardouyn. One book, representative of the best qualities of them all, is assumed to have been written for Charles VII. of France. It is a regal volume of the best period of illuminated MS., and fetched £730. The principles of perspective, at that time new, are excellently worked out in its miniatures, which contain an epitome of contemporary costume and local architecture. This volume—like most of the other old books sold—is in excellent repair. The vellum has mellowed a little, but otherwise it might have come only yesterday from the Kelmescott Press. Where it has been all these 400 and odd years must remain a riddle to the bibliophile. We give a list of the large prices paid for some of the other old books :—Ingliš, E., "Argumenta Psalmorum Davidis," 1608, a tiny volume of 156 leaves of vellum written for Henry, Prince of Wales, eldest son of James I., for presentation on New Year's Day, £93; "Horæ Beatæ Mariæ Virginis," late fifteenth century, an octavo MS. of 149 leaves of vellum, with eighteen full-page miniatures, £100; Vincent de Beauvais, "Mironer Hystorial," fourteenth century folio on 433 leaves of vellum, with nearly 100 miniatures, £100; "Le Livre appellee Boece de Consolatione," fifteenth century, a small quarto on 165 leaves of vellum, fine French work, with six miniatures, £210; "Passion de Nostre Seigneur Jhesu Crist," fifteenth century, small folio on eighty-six leaves of vellum, with sixteen miniatures, £230; "Horæ Gloriosæ semper Virginis Mariæ," fifteenth century, a duodecimo of 155 leaves on vellum, with nine miniatures, a fine Flemish MS., £235; "Horæ Beatæ Mariæ Virginis," fourteenth century, a small quarto on 205 leaves of vellum with fifty-eight miniatures and finely-painted borders, £335; Josephus, F., "Les Anciennetez des Juifs," livres i.-xii. (No. cxlv. of the Ashburnham Library), a folio of 315 leaves of vellum, with thirteen fine miniatures, and bound by Clovis Eve, £955; "Horæ Beatæ Mariæ Virginis," fifteenth century, a small quarto of 268 leaves on vellum, with sixty-four very beautiful miniatures, an exceptionally rich and interesting volume, every page being surrounded by brilliant floreate and leafy scrolls, £730.

FOREIGN LETTER.

FRANCE.

France and Russia—Paul Bourget—Marcel Prévost—François Villon.

M. Gaston Deschamps, who is at present lecturing in the United States, recorded the other day in the Temps the prejudice which the Boston reading public entertains against the yellow-covered French novel. M. Rostand's vogue was partly accounted for by the fact that his French publisher has clothed his latest book in a green cover. This differentiated it instantly from the volumes which an insufficient acquaintance with the Parisian output classes as noxious; and this distinction is, in fact, one of the best reasons which any one, except M. Rostand's intimate friends and the Academy, has been able to find for perusal of this poet. But the question raised by M. Deschamps—with lamentations with which even the foreigner can sympathize—is certainly an important one. No prejudice in the world was less able to give an account of itself. Yet it is deeply rooted, and the shortest way to proceed to its extirpation is to point to the amount of crocus-coloured literature now appearing in France which is distinctly not noxious, and thus show the prodigious absurdity of the generalization. Such an attitude for the critic is somewhat humiliating, but, que voulez-vous? he must seize the opportunities that lie in his way.

I recently dealt in some detail with the memoirs and histories that have appeared in France since the opening of the year. Let me now note some of the more purely literary productions during the same period. The curiosity of French literary circles has been directed towards Northern writers by the sudden arrival here of M. Björnstjerne Björnson, whose play, entitled in its French version Au-delà des Forces, has been brought out in special performances organized by M. Lugné Poë. Naturally, M. Stock immediately put upon the market translations of this piece, as well as of "Le Roi" and "Le Journaliste," and for some ten days in March the salons discussed the difference between the Northern soul, shrouded in fog, and the Latin soul, limpid and clear. The success of the great Scandinavian writer in Paris has not, however, been in any sense a popular one. It is the creation of a minority, and is not comparable with that which M. Björnson has enjoyed for many years in all the English-speaking countries. He had been here before, some twenty years ago, and had been accessible almost as long as Tolstoy; yet any book by the Russian gains in Paris an immediate sale—a form of flattery quite unconnected with the political alliance between the two countries. Tolstoy's most fleeting pages are instantly translated, and we have just had from M. Stock a translation of the philosophical articles written by Tolstoy during the last three years, entitled "Les Rayons de l'Aube." It contains Tolstoy's latest ideas on war and peace with reference to the Hague Conference and the Transvaal war; on suicide; on the assassination of King Humbert, his letter to the Doukhobors, and a number of more general articles on the duties of the Christian as citizen, all urging the maxim of Jesus, "to turn, when smitten, the other cheek to the smiter." It is curious to note the discrepancy between two sides of Tolstoy; on the one hand, as a corrosive influence on Russian society, the author of "Resurrection," the cause in no slight degree of the disturbances in the Russian Universities—and, on the other hand, as the evangelist of the Christian spirit of meekness. The Russian writers have, like the Encyclopædists, let loose the whirlwind and now seem to be surprised at their success. Gogol and Tolstoy are followed by the realists of the younger school, Gorki in his "Thomas Gordeieff" (Calmann Lévy) and Anton Tchekhov (some of whose best work has recently been published in French by Perrin under the title of "Les Moujiks"). The younger writers have come under Nietzsche's influence. The strain of sceptical Nihilism and unrest characteristic of the Slav temperament, charged with all the greater explosive force because of the compression to which it has been submitted in Russia, is beginning to startle Frenchmen and to startle Tolstoy himself. Frenchmen hardly realize that they are doing in Russia what England did in the eighteenth century in France—awakening liberal ideas. What Nietzsche has done recently in France by way of enforcing the spirit of individual revolt (through the translations published by the Mercur de France), France is silently but relentlessly accomplishing in Russia. Yet it will be long, no doubt, before Russian society reaches the state which M. Challemlacour so vigorously describes (apropos of Swift) in a posthumous book recently published—"when politics are transplanted into the highways, when a revolution makes in a few days a statesman of every artisan, an orator of every newspaper hawker, a congress of every gathering or of every barber's shop, the same evil, composed of suspicion, appetites, rivalry, fury and calumny, spreads like an epidemic among the masses." This book, by the way, "Études et Reflexions d'un Pessimiste" (Fasquelle), is one of great distinction of style, and contains remarkable criticisms of Leopardi, Byron, Shelley, and Schopenhauer.

The almost savage primitive power of a writer like Gorki is in strange contrast with the spirit of three books in themselves so reciprocally unlike as M. Paul Bourget's "La Fantôme" (Plon), M. Marcel Prévost's "L'Heureux Ménage" (Lemerre), and the curious document of romanticism which the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul has discovered and printed for the first time in his "Sainte-Beuve Inconnu" (Plon)—namely an unpublished novel by Sainte-Beuve. M. Bourget's work is powerful, but, as in all the work of modern Frenchmen (excepting, perhaps, M. Zola), the passions depicted are the complex ones of society, not those of impetuous and primitive races. The plot of the story is not easy to describe; stripped of its accessories and baldly stated, it seems almost odious. It is, in a word, the theme treated by Maupassant in his famous "Fort Comme La Mort," save that "La Fantôme" begins just where that novel ends. Instead of committing suicide, as the only way of triumphing over a passion which is intolerable, M. Bourget's hero, Malclerc, decides to run all the risks. What the situation is M. Bourget may be allowed to state in his own tongue:—

Il se rencontre dans la vie, écrit l'auteur, des situations sans issue, qui semblent ne comporter d'autres remèdes que l'attente. Les pires misères, et qui paraissent les plus inguérissables, finissent avec le temps, ou plutôt elles ne finissent pas, elles s'usent. Mais avant que cette force d'usure n'ait exercé son irrésistible pouvoir, il y a vraiment des problèmes de destinée insolubles. Le mariage d'Eveline en était un. En épousant la fille de sa maîtresse, comme il avait fait, à cause du sentiment qu'il gardait à la mémoire de la morte et halluciné par le mirage d'une saisissante ressemblance entre ces deux femmes, Malclerc s'était engagé, et avait engagé avec lui cette innocente, dans une de ces impasses morales qui ne permettent à un couple humain ni d'y rester, ni d'en sortir. Quoique le cas n'ait pas été prévu par aucun code, et qu'au demeurant il eût le droit strict d'agir comme il avait agi, il n'en avait pas moins manqué à une de ces lois non écrites que la conscience reconnaît comme absolument, comme irrévocablement impératives. Cette substitution, sentimentale et physique, de l'épouse à la maîtresse, de la fille à la mère, constituait une véritable monstruosité. C'était une anomalie, et d'autant plus irréductible que le charme de cette vivante n'avait même pas eu raison du souvenir de cette morte. Le malheureux Malclerc n'était arrivé qu'à empoisonner son présent par son passé et son passé par son présent.

M. Bourget has never been more impressive than in his analysis of this "case," and in Andignier and Eveline he gives us two of the noblest figures in the French literature of our time.

M. Marcel Prévost in his "L'Heureux Ménage" makes no pretension to any such ethical strenuousness. The "case" with which he deals is indicated by his title, and is so commonplace as to be part of the inevitable furnishing of the comedy of France. It is simply and frankly told—the story of the well-bred Parisienne, of the bien pensant world, who finds her conjugal felicity troubled by the ill-bred infidelity of her incomprehensible husband. There is a little girl in the book, Geneviève, who is one of M. Prévost's most attractive characters. Nothing could be more graceful than M. Prévost's way of telling a story. The real traditions of clear French style live unadulterated in much of M. Prévost's earlier work. His "Lea" and its sequel seemed therefore in form a mistake. It is almost as absurd for M. Marcel Prévost to wish to become a Balzac, or even a George Sand, as it would be for an Anatole France to abandon the style of Voltaire in order to imitate Zola. Hence all who regretted M. Prévost's lapse into the "three-volume novel form" will be glad to learn that "L'Heureux Ménage" is one of his exquisite products in his old and admirable manner.

When we compare such a narrative as this with the romantic phraseology of Sainte-Beuve's resuscitated novel, we have unexpected, useful, although very much belated, data for the appreciation of the Romantic movement in French literature, with all its paraphernalia, its buskins, and its stilts. As a story, "Arthur" has no importance whatever; it is even less significant than "Volupté." Its significance is only as the "document" of an epoch. It contains, too, the whole text of a manuscript from which Sainte-Beuve quoted a few passages in the fourth volume of his "Portraits et Critiques Littéraires," and also a prospectus for the works of Victor Hugo, which settles a literary problem which has troubled the sleep of French critics.

Speaking of Victor Hugo I am reminded that the French biographer of Sterne, Prof. Paul Stapfer, has produced an elaborate study of "Victor Hugo et la Grande Poésie Satirique en France" (Ollendorff). The moralist and publicist is here more visible than the literary critic. M. Stapfer would seem to have been haunted by the question, "What would Victor Hugo have done during the great moral crisis of the last three years in France?" His answer is clear. Victor Hugo would have been on the side of the Dreyfusists and against "Nationalism." M. Stapfer's own manner takes on sometimes the prophetic lyricism of Victor Hugo. For example, "The French Revolution is a Golgotha, which, like that of Christ, constitutes a climacteric date in the history of humanity." Such want of taste explains much of the repugnance which the young lions of the "Nationalist" party feel for the leaders of Protestantism. The "Gardien du Feu" (Calmann Lévy), which a professor at Quimper and a folk-lorist of European reputation, M. Anatole Le Braz, produced last year, is a remarkable work. It is a seriously artistic performance. The tale is sombre, the plot of great simplicity, but the power with which the desolate Breton promontory, with the lighthouse in the offing, is depicted amid the shifting lights and shadows of the sea, recall the beauty of the great Greek drama in which grandiose human passions were given a setting where Nature itself sympathizes with the protagonists of the play. The note of pathos in this tale is Lotian, but the construction is more literary—and this, too, is crocus-coloured.

The new volume by M. Gaston Paris is charmingly literary in its flavour. In "François Villon" (Hachette), we have certainly a view of the delicious singer of the dames du temps jadis, which would only partially recommend itself to Mr. Havelock Ellis. This writer, it will be remembered, explained the peculiar note of personal emotion in Villon and Verlaine by the fact of their situation as social pariahs. No doubt the points of comparison between these two poets are facile and numerous, but if there is any one thing which the book of M. Gaston Paris shows it is that Villon, outlaw as he is by our standards, is not, by any means, a rara avis in the fifteenth century. The wretched complications of his life, of which his poetry is the reflection, were common enough in this strange epoch of social disorder, in which French society was fermenting between feudalism and Richelieu. Nothing could be more picturesque than the Paris described in this volume. There are pages on the student life here which are no less amusing than the account of Villon's promenades in the old Cemetery of the Innocents, where now are the Paris Central Markets, and where once was the famous painting of the "Danse Macabré" (this word, as M. Gaston Paris shows, should be thus written), which was copied all over Europe, and especially in Germany. W. M. F.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

BISMARCK AS LOVER.

In reviewing THE LOVE LETTERS OF PRINCE BISMARCK (Heinemann, 20s. n.) it is not necessary to quibble over the question whether a man's letters to his wife are love-letters "within the meaning of the Act." The letters, whether we class them with love-letters or not, supplement our knowledge of Prince Bismarck in an interesting manner, and almost revolutionize the popular impression of his character. If the book had borne a motto on its title-page, nothing, in fact, would have been more appropriate than Browning's famous

God be thanked ! the meanest of his creatures
Has got two soul sides, one to face the world with
And one to show a woman when he loves her.

One ordinarily thinks of Bismarck, not only as strong but also as hard, unsympathetic, and unscrupulous—more particularly unscrupulous. And, indeed, not only his patriotism but also his vanity did sometimes lead him to emancipate himself from those scruples to which plain men with a normal sense of honour attach importance. His secret treaties, and his subsequent revelations concerning those secret treaties, published when his Emperor sent him back into private life, are there to prove it. But his letters, first to his fiancée and then to his wife, show him in a different and more attractive light—a man of strong affections, pronounced domestic inclinations, and definite Christian piety. He reads the Bible, and he quotes St. Paul's Epistles freely, and apparently desires to regulate his conduct by their precepts. Only when he fights a duel with "V." does the old Adam cry aloud. Then it is :—

We took our positions, fired at Bodelschwing's command, and both missed. God forgive me the grave sin that I did not at once recognize His mercy, but I cannot deny it : when I looked through the smoke and saw my adversary standing erect, a feeling of disappointment prevented me from participating in the general rejoicing, which caused Bodelschwing to shed tears ; the modification of the challenge annoyed me, and I would gladly have continued the combat. But as I was not the insulted party, I could say nothing ; it was over, and all shook hands. We rode home, and I dined with my sister alone. All the world was dissatisfied with the outcome, but the Lord must know what He still intends to make of V.

The most interesting letters are unquestionably the earlier ones. In these, as is natural, the self-revelation is most complete. First we have two letters to Herr von Puttkamer, soliciting his daughter's hand, in which the suitor defines his religious position. He had sought peace of mind in vain "in uncomprehended writings of Hegel and particularly in Spinoza's seeming mathematical clearness." Then he had been "brought to the point of reading the Scriptures more consecutively" ; and though he cannot conscientiously say that his "feet are firmly established," he is "fixedly and manfully determined to seek peace with every man, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord." The statement was regarded as satisfactory. The betrothal was celebrated ; and the letters to Fräulein von Puttkamer follow. They show Bismarck in sentimental moods of which those who only knew his public career would not have believed him capable. He has been like Werther, but his love has roused him :—

The English poems of mortal misery trouble me no more now ; that was of old, when I looked out into nothing—cold and stiff, snow-drifts in my heart. Now a black cat plays with it in the sunshine, as though with a rolling skein, and I like to see it rolling.

But if Fräulein von Puttkamer still loved sad poetry, he can find excuses for her. It is not a morbid taste, but rather "an advance in sensitiveness to and perception of poetry" :—

The thing that in an earthly sense is impressive and affecting, that can ordinarily be represented by human means, is always related to the fallen angel, who is beautiful, but without peace ; great in his plans and endeavours, but without success ; proud and sad. Such things as there are, outside the province of religion, to stir our emotions, cannot, therefore, be cheerful and happy, but only serve as a constant finger-post, showing where we may find peace. If your mind has grown more receptive of the poetry of autumn, of frost on a night in May, and all human experiences of this class, then that fact proves that you are no longer a twelve-year-old. The storm that rages in the tops of the old trees, bending and breaking them, passes over the heads of children, children in body and mind, as it does over the little trees in the forest ; on becoming larger they grow up into the region of storms, and their roots must become stronger if they are not to fall.

Then, mixed up with thanks for presents of sausages, we have the young man's confession of political ambitions. He does not "think it unqualified good fortune to be an office-holder or even minister" ; his reason being that public office does not seem to promise sufficient scope for energy :—

The Prussian office-holder is like an individual in an orchestra. Whether he plays first violin or triangle, he must, without oversight or influence upon the whole, play off his fragment as it is assigned to him, whether he considers it good or bad. But I wish to make music such as I discern to be good, or none at all.

As for the career :—

What would be the outlook, then, for me, in my utter poverty, who of old have a dangerous tendency to spend more than I get—a tendency that I now combat successfully in my solitude, while I can scarcely endure falling behind any one in any respect when I am in the company of my equals ? If my career were the most successful I could expect, I should have an income on which I, with my requirements, could marry and set up a household in the city in my fortieth year, perhaps as president, or the like, when I shall be dried up with documentary dust, a hypochondriac, diseased in chest and abdomen from too much sitting, and need a wife as a nurse.

As a matter of fact, Bismarck was far more suited for important public office than Fräulein von Puttkamer was to be the wife of a man in a prominent public position. She generally stopped at home when her husband was "lying abroad for his country's honour." His letters of exhortation to her seem to indicate that she exercised a wise discretion in so doing. In some of the letters it is quite pathetic to see Bismarck struggling between his affection for her as she is, and his desire to see her develop into something different, by studying the French language and the manners and tone of society. He returns to the subject several times. This is the most striking passage :—

Read French, but if you love me, do not do so by artificial light, or if your eyes pain you ; in that case you had better ask mother to read aloud to you, for it is almost harder to understand than to speak. If you know of any agreeable piece of baggage you can get in a hurry to chatter French to you, then engage one ; I will gladly pay the bill. You will find yourself in a circle where French manners and conversation predominate ; so you are bound to familiarize yourself with these as far as possible. If you know of no person whom you like and who is available, never mind ; and, at any rate, I beg you not to consider this advice as a hardship, or as of more moment than if I asked you to buy yourself a green or a blue dress ; it is not a matter of life and death ; you are my wife, and not the diplomatists', and they can just as well learn German as you can learn French. Only if you have leisure, or want something to read, take a French novel ; but if you have no desire to do so, consider this unwritten, for I married you to love you in God and according to the need of my heart, and to have in the midst of the strange world a place for my heart, which all the world's bleak winds cannot chill, and where I may find the warmth of the home-fire, to which I eagerly betake myself when it is stormy and cold without ;

not to have a society woman for others. I shall cherish and nurse your little hearth, put wood on it and blow, and protect it against all that is evil and strange, for, next to God's mercy, there is nothing which is dearer and more necessary to me than your love, and the homelike hearth which is ours everywhere, even in a strange land, when we are together. Do not be too greatly depressed at the change in our life; my heart is not attached, or, at least, not strongly attached, to earthly honour; I could easily dispense with it, if it should ever endanger our peace with God or our contentment. . . Farewell, my dearly beloved heart.

This was in 1851. Fourteen years later, the homeliness of Princess Bismarck was still such as to call for marital admonition. She has to be warned that she cannot possibly go to Homburg "without a maid and new dresses." The letter is addressed to "My eighteen-years-beloved Heart" :—

Since you have the misfortune to be my wife, the newspapers will surely take note on occasion of you and your attire. It is the misery of this position that the freedom of private life ceases, and therefore it is I warn you that in Homburg you ~~must~~ practise no economies which might be out of that measure which the public mercilessly defines for you, as the Prussian Prime Minister's wife, not according to your taste or means, but by your rank. We are unfortunately forced to regard a thousand thalers less than criticism on externals, and the part of a modest country housewife is no longer permitted you, at least not at watering-places !

These letters certainly reveal Princess Bismarck to us no less clearly than her husband. Having read them one is not surprised that the correspondence has less and less connexion with politics as the years roll on. The book, in fact, must be read for its human interest, and for nothing else. But that interest is quite enough to carry the majority of readers through the two volumes without a moment's weariness.

BOLINGBROKE.

BOLINGBROKE AND HIS TIMES. By WALTER SICHEL, late Exhibitioner of Balliol College, Oxford. (Nisbet. 12s. 6d. n.)

The fascination of Bolingbroke has certainly not died away. Among the most modern of the moderns Mr. Churton Collins and Mr. Arthur Hassall have attacked and defended him as if they were knights in the lists of old. Mr. John Morley, in his brilliant eulogy of Walpole, betrays, in page after page, his uneasiness in the presence of his hero's great rival, too great a man to be brushed aside with a smile, too great to be tackled, in such a sketch, with any convincing force. And still, it is incontestable, men remember Lord Beaconsfield and read "Sybil"; and the masterly chapter in which, as Mr. Traill wrote six years ago, was summarized "the whole of Disraeli's reading, reflection, and conclusions on English politics and political parties for three hundred years" is not likely to be forgotten when it places St. John among the three greatest of English statesmen. He was, we all know, as fascinating to his contemporaries as his memory has proved to posterity. He combined the charm of personal grace and wit, the knowledge and love of good literature, the talents of an astute party leader, the political principles of a man of honour and a statesman, in a harmony which Englishmen have always found peculiarly attractive. He belonged to perhaps the most brilliant body of literary men that has ever been gathered together in England in one age. He reached the summit of success; he touched the depth of misfortune. "What a world is this! And how does Fortune banter us!" The words have now a classic ring, and Bolingbroke has his place, almost without challenge, among great Englishmen of letters and great English statesmen.

It is on this bright and romantic figure that Mr. Walter Sichel has set himself to write an ambitious book. An admirer who does not fear to touch hyperbole in his praises, he is also a student who has neglected not a single clue that might add to our knowledge of, or our interest in, the man and his times. We much doubt if any study of the English political literature of any period, even when we remember Mr. Gardiner and Mr. Firth, has been more close than that of Mr. Sichel. And the minuteness of his investigation has all been subordinated to his main object. He can digress, if we may say so, without being irrelevant. His illustrations, however detailed, never prove, on investigation, to be superfluous. Thus much we may say when we speak of what is but the first volume of the complete biography that is promised. A final estimate, till the whole work appears, we cannot make. Though the earlier career of St. John is dramatic enough, the deeper interest for the statesman and the student of letters is to come. We have seen the politician and the man of fashion. We have still to follow the career of the adviser of James Edward, the opponent of Walpole, the pedagogue of "the Boys," the man who gave the thoughts of his maturity to the world in the "Letters on History," the "Craftsman," and the "Patriot King." Mr. Sichel has not here attempted to set forth at length any coherent view of what Toryism, as it appeared to Bolingbroke, really was. He has vindicated, with some minuteness, and it must be admitted some lack of clearness, the Treaty of Utrecht, which, indeed, has been often vindicated before. He has sketched the social and political surroundings of St. John with an almost unerring accuracy and not without a certain piquancy and grace. But the greater part of his task is still to come.

It is easy briefly to describe the merits and defects of this book. And primarily it is a study that needs very careful reading and, often, following up. It is a professed vindication, and it does not hesitate to use the language of the partisan. It is so minute, so elaborate that inevitably, here and there, one cannot see the wood for the trees. In so great a mass of facts there must be a few slips. Here and there a story is told incompletely, as that of Bolingbroke's adroit action when he saw "Cato," or a fact slightly misstated, as when it is said that the adjournment till March 31, 1714, was due to "the approach of Easter Week," when Holy Week is probably meant. We think, too, that Mr. Sichel has fallen into the very common error of attaching too much importance to the statements of Defoe. He quotes him often, and sometimes as the only authority. It is too often forgotten that the author of "Robinson Crusoe" was not only a romancer when he wrote that immortal work or the Journal of the Plague. But it is not easy to catch Mr. Sichel tripping. While the final judgment, as we have said, must wait, we recognize the book as one of real importance, and one not to be neglected by any student of the eighteenth century.

BAGHDAD.

English scholars have generally been to the fore in Oriental archæology, if not always in Oriental philology, and it is gratifying to our national vanity to find so excellent an example of Arabic topography as BAGHDAD DURING THE ABBASID CALIPHATE, by Mr. G. le Strange (Clarendon Press, 16s. n.). We have often experienced the difficulty of getting any definite information out of the Arabic geographers and historians, who either assume that their readers are already acquainted with the famous city, or else describe it so vaguely and inconsistently that it seems impossible to make head or tail of the topography. Mr. le Strange, however, has accomplished the feat, thanks partly to the aid of an invaluable little treatise on the canals of Mesopotamia by a certain Ibn Serapion, who wrote at the close of the ninth century of our era, and who devoted to the water system of the Tigris and Euphrates a care and minuteness that would delight any irrigation engineer in Egypt or India. By mapping out the intersections of the canals which traversed Baghdad and its suburbs, it became possible to fix the positions of the chief buildings referred to in the histories of the Caliphs; and, although some difficulties still remain, Mr. le Strange may be congratulated on having rebuilt the long-vanished mediæval city out of literary references, and enabled us to realise in imagination the place where "Haroun-al-Raschid" presided over the Golden Prime which Tennyson celebrated with so superb a disregard of the quantities of Arabic syllables. It must have been an extremely laborious and delicate task to establish the details of the topography on such obscure and random references as are found in the Arabic and Persian chroniclers; but Mr. le Strange is no novice at such researches, and he has done his work right well.

Like Constantinople, Baghdad grew up on both sides of a river, and fashion shifted the seat of royalty from one side to the other. It was founded by the second 'Abbâsid Caliph, al-Mansûr, in 762, on the site of a Persian village of the same name. The capital of the earlier or Omayyad Caliphs had been Damascus; but their successors required a metropolis more in the centre of an empire which had then spread as far as Tartary, and less open to the inroads of the Byzantine armies and the influences of the unruly tribes of Arabia. Charles Martel had set a bound to the westward expansion of the caliphate, and Islâm was now to face east, not west. The Saracens, too, were acquiring a taste for commerce and conquering their repugnance to the sea; their capital must be a seaport, and Baghdad on the broad Tigris offered great advantages for the Indian trade. Here, then, on the west bank Mansûr founded his new city. It was perfectly round in shape, with four gates—iron gates taken from another city and said to have been made for King Solomon—from which four streets, piercing the double walls, thick as the Great Wall of China, led to the central enclosure, an area of nearly a mile, where stood the Palace of the Golden Gate and the Caliph's mosque. The spaces between the palace enclosure and the main wall were filled with houses and bazaars. The main wall was a great rampart of large sun-burnt bricks, ninety feet high and 100 feet thick at the base; and the diameter of the city from ditch to ditch was nearly two miles. An important suburb, the nucleus of which was the camp of the Caliph's son, al-Mahdi, sprang up simultaneously on the eastern bank of the river, connected by bridges of boats, and this Eastern City, called Rusâfah, was the residence of the famous family of the Barmecide viziers. Other suburbs and palaces arose on both sides of the river; Hârûn-er-Rashid built his great mansion of the Khuld, Zobeida had her own palaces on the west bank, and the double city spread over a breadth of not less than six miles. The original Round City, however, did not survive the great epoch of the fighting Caliphs—the time when no Caliph died peacefully at Baghdad, but when "their tombs lie scattered over the length and breadth of the empire, from the pilgrim road near Mecca to Tûs in Khurâsân, or the gate of Tarsus in the north-west—for the burial-place of the Caliph was where he had died, on the road, so to speak, journeying in the affairs of Islâm." The fratricidal struggle between Rashid's sons, and the eighteen months' siege of Baghdad in 812-13—when the catapults of Tâhir pounded the brick walls to powder—ruined the Round City, and a century later the ramparts had disappeared. In the East no king repairs the buildings of his predecessors, so the ruins of the famous city of Mansûr gradually crumbled away, and the commercial quarters of Western Baghdad rose on its site.

On the east bank, however, the palaces of the caliphs continued to multiply. Jaafar the Barmecide's mansion became the palace of Mamûn, the Caliph who took so keen an interest in science and Greek philosophy; and the palaces of "the Pleiades," "the Crown," "the Tree" testified to the taste and luxury of a dynasty that had studied pleasure as a consolation for its loss of power. In the tenth century the Bûyid princes of Persia became the maîtres du palais of the fainting Caliphs, and new palaces and splendour marked their sway. A century later the Seljûks sat in the seats of the Bûyids, and the famous University of the great vizier Nizâm-el-Mulk, the friend of Omar Khayyâm, rivalled the splendid Hospital of a Bûyid prince. These munificent institutions reflect the noble spirit of the cultivated Sovereigns of Islâm, and the completeness of their provisions and apparatus will astonish the reader who is not familiar with the high standard of civilization attained in Mahomedan countries in the Middle Ages. Unhappily, no trace of these great monuments of Saracenic science and public spirit remains, save in the countless writings of the scholars who studied under the learned professors of the Nizâmiyah University. Sieges and inundations undid the toil of wise Kings, and the final vandalism of the Mongol conquest in 1258, the fifty days' bombardment, the forty days' sack, completed the destruction of Baghdad. "The greater part of what was left of the city was laid in ruin," writes a witness at the end of the same century; "its inhabitants were all put to death, hardly one surviving to recall the splendour of what had been. People came in from the countryside to settle in Baghdad, seeing that its own citizens had all perished; so the city now is indeed other than it was, . . . but God, exalted be He, ordaineth all things."

In M. le Strange's eight plans, and in his clear and detailed chapters on the different parts of the city at various stages in its history, we see all that a very careful and complete study of the authorities can reveal. All the chief buildings, palaces, mosques, mausoleums, markets, and streets are identified and set down, and the periods of their life fixed from contemporary sources. The volume is, in fact, a marvellous triumph of reconstruction based upon literary evidence in place of excavations—which might lead to very slight results in the case of brick buildings. From an archæological point of view the book is fascinating, and we follow the various clues that lead to the final identifications with the greatest zest. But it must not be supposed that the work pretends to do more than fix the topography. It is not a history of Baghdad in the sense of a chronicle of what happened there, and we confess we should like to see M. le Strange not only provide the stage, but put the actors playing on it. Perhaps this may be done by himself or another in a second volume, and, meanwhile, all students of Mahomedan history will be grateful for so accurate a framework on which to work. Such trifling oversights as we have noticed are inevitable in a book abounding in names and critical remarks, but in a second edition M. le Strange would do well to correct a few misprints, such as Mâlik Shah, Kurn, Sanjâr, and to explain why he spells "Nich" without an "e."

The May Book.

Books published in aid of charities do not always give what the hypercritical would consider good value for the money; but no such charge can be brought against THE MAY BOOK (Macmillan, 10s. n.), compiled by Mrs. Aria in aid of Charing-cross Hospital. It is luxurious in appearance, and the contributors, whether authors, artists, or musicians, are all distinguished. Among the poets are included Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. George Meredith, Mr. Thomas Hardy, Mr. Barry Pain, Mr. Robert Hichens, and Miss Corelli; while other familiar names are those of Mr. Henry James, Mr. Egerton Castle, Mr. Percy White, and Mr. Gilbert Parker. It would be ungracious, considering the occasion, to say that any author has done better or worse than any other, but we cannot resist the temptation to quote Mr. Austin Dobson's "Rondeau":—

In Angel Court the sunless air
The cowering houses shrink from sight,
Huddling and hopeless, eyeless, bare.

Misnamed you say. For surely rare
Must be the angel-shapes that light
In Angel Court!

Nay: the Eternities are there.
Death by the doorway stands to smite;
Life in its garrets leaps to light;
And Love has climbed that crumbling stair
In Angel Court!

EDUCATIONAL.

FRENCH.

Readers.

CONTES ET MÉLANGES (Black, 2s.) is an edition for schools of a selection from the shorter prose writings of Voltaire. The requisite Bowdlerizing has, of course, been done; and there are some ingenious oral exercises designed to enlarge the student's vocabulary, by grouping useful words. One can best show what these are like by quoting one of them:—

Le livre.—Qu'est-ce que j'ai à la main? Quel est le titre, l'auteur de ce livre? Comment se nomment les éditeurs (publishers)? Qui a publié, a écrit le livre? Combien de pages y a-t-il dans le livre? Combien de lignes à la page?—de lettres à la ligne? Combien de gravures? Qui a dessiné les gravures? De quelle couleur est la reliure? Qui a relié le livre?—le relieur.

This is an easy example. A more difficult one is:—

Une Épée.—(1) La garde sert à protéger la main; (2) la lame; (3) la pointe de la lame sert à frapper "de pointe"; (4) le tranchant de la lame sert à frapper "de taille"; (5) le fort de l'épée, tiers (third) du tranchant à partir de (from) la garde. Il sert à parer les coups; (6) le faible de l'épée, tiers à partir de la pointe. Il sert à frapper "de taille."

As preparations for "unseens" we should think these exercises would be useful.

CONTES FRANÇAIS, a selection with notes and vocabulary, edited by Emile le François (Blackie's Modern Language Series, 1s.), is a nice little book of easy stories, told in simple language. The notes are short and to the point. Mr. Arnold sends an edition of de Musset's charming MONSIEUR LE VENT ET MADAME LA PLUCIE (9d.), with notes and vocabulary.

Mr. F. W. B. Smart has carried out a good idea in his AGE OF LOUIS XI., AS DESCRIBED BY FRENCH CONTEMPORARIES AND FRENCH HISTORIANS (Black's Historical French Readings). There is, perhaps, less of the contemporary than might be wished, but the historians are almost as interesting. The book is not difficult in style or language, and any variations from modern idiom are explained in the notes. Something might have been said of the authors. There are a short historical introduction, exercises, pieces of prose, and essay subjects.

From Messrs. Blackie come two FRENCH PICTURE PRIMERS (6d. each) intended to make the first steps in French easy and interesting to very young pupils. They give simple sentences with illustrations. If there is a fault it is that the vocabulary includes too many out of the way words, such as souricière, robinet, éperon, cochon-de-mer, gousse, phoque, gland, gui. Children cannot remember many words at once, so that it would be more discreet not to go beyond the obvious ones.

Mr. Alfred Starck's FRENCH CORRESPONDENCE BY EASY STAGES (Blackie) is really an elementary French grammar in which the examples, exercises, and vocabulary are selected to illustrate the operations of the counting-house. For example, "A buyer from Liverpool has bought the acids from the manufacturer"; "Charles' banker has sent back the cheque"; "The joint stock company announced a dividend of eighteen francs"; "We have begun business in this town as soap manufacturers." No doubt it is more useful to mercantile men to be able to express sentiments of that sort than to be able to ask a stranger whether his aunt has given the grocer's silk stockings to the tallow-chandler, after the style of the pupils of Ollendorff. At the same time it seems rather an insult to a noble language to treat it, from the day on which the alphabet is learnt, as though it were merely a medium for the driving of bargains in commodities. To do so is surely to give colour to the views of those who hold that commercial education is no education at all.

BOOKS OF REFERENCE FOR STUDENTS AND TEACHERS OF FRENCH, by E. G. W. Braunnholtz, is a particularly well-arranged and useful bibliography. The books on such diverse subsections of the subject as "Phonetics," "French Spelling," "French Metre," "Provençal," &c., are brought together under their respective headings. The lists are selected, not exhaustive; but that is not a fault. The selection has been made with admirable discrimination; and it would be hypercriticism to suggest that an item here and there was too unimportant to be worth including.

There is no lack of English books about French literature. Mr. Ernest Weekley's PRIMER OF FRENCH LITERATURE (Blackie, 2s. 6d.) may serve the purposes of those who wish to get a synoptic survey of the subject at a sitting. The earlier literature is dealt with more satisfactorily than the later, and there are a few extracts from Villon and other writers of that period. The criticism of recent and contemporary writers is weak and superficial. One may as well not criticize at all as remark that "the weak point of the Symbolists is that they appeal only to the initiated"; and it is absolutely misleading to speak of Daudet as "belonging to the naturalistic school." The school influenced him, but he no more belonged to it than Dickens, the master whom he principally imitated, did.

GREEK

Demosthenes.

The edition, by a scholar so famous as Professor Goodwin of Harvard, of DEMOSTHENES ON THE CROWN (Cambridge University Press, 12s. 6d.) is something of an event; and we may say, after a careful examination, that it is worthy of its author. Professor Goodwin's keen instinct for the niceties of Greek syntax and his power of lucid exposition place the notes on a very high level. We would instance the notes on ἐπὶ τῇ ἀνακρίσει § 63.1, ὥστερ ἂν εἰ ἡγοῦμενοι § 214.4, ἐπεχείρησ' ἂν § 101.3, ἂν ᾧ after the optative § 148.4, and § 168.4, but these are only a few out of many. The apparatus criticus is full, and the most recent discoveries are used for criticism of the text. Thus [δομενοι καὶ] is bracketed in § 43.8, on the authority of the Oxyrhynchus papyrus, and the words μηδὲν . . . βιορῇ in the epigram of § 289 are explained, after Kirchhoff, as a quotation from Simonides, which explains the mysterious phrase ἐν βιορῇ. In a note which is a model of sound sense, the burning of the booths mentioned in § 169, instead of being due to a senseless panic, is explained by Professor Goodwin as referring to a beacon fire on Lycabettus. In fact, it is hard to overpraise the notes as a whole, though in a few points we might have something to suggest. Thus Thucydides' usage with ἐπεὶ is not fully stated on § 1.4. After πρῶτον μὲν the proportion of ἐπεὶ alone to ἐπεὶ δὲ is nearly four to one, and ἐπεὶ δὲ is regular where καὶ follows, whether or not μὲν precedes. Again, it is very doubtful whether the ρομεία of the Athenian riff-raff is exaggerated by Aristophanes (§ 11.6). Such practices still exist, or existed lately, for instance in Samos, where they caused much scandal—not to mention India; and the abuse was of the most ribald kind. The condemnation of the Boeotians for stupidity (§ 35.9) should be qualified, as Professor Roberts has lately shown in "The Ancient Boeotians." Lastly, we are not convinced that the text is complete in § 45.7 πλὴν οὐκ ἐφ' ἑαυτοῦς. The appendices we have read with the greatest interest, and we are glad to see that Professor Goodwin is quite clear (as against Holm and the latest tendency) that Demosthenes was not only a sincere patriot, but a far-seeing statesman. His indictment of Aeschines is completely convincing, and we cannot see how, after this demonstration, any other view can be taken. The tortuous story of the embassies is unravelled with great skill; and new light is thrown on the history from the inscriptions lately discovered at Delphi. There are some interesting remarks on the γραφὴ παρανόμων, which is elucidated by a comparison with the American Constitution. Other essays deal with the Suit Against Ctesiphon, the Trials of Aeschines and Philocrates, the Amphictyonic Council, the Hero Physician, the Manuscripts, and Stichometry in the MSS. of Demosthenes: from the last of which an unexpected argument has been drawn against the authenticity of the public documents cited in the Speech on the Crown.

Thucydides.

The Edition of THUCYDIDES: HISTORIES BOOK III., by H. F. Fox (Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.), printed with the neatness and elegance which are usual in the Clarendon Press, is on the whole good. In some respects, indeed, it is very good. The account of the style of Thucydides in the introduction, the remarks on the text, and the greater part of the notes are all that could be desired. We have not space to call attention to these in detail, but must content ourselves with the most disagreeable, if it is the most useful, part of the critic's task in pointing out a few faults. More care is needed in the phrasing; it is incorrect to say that an adverb "qualifies" a verb (8.1). It would be easy to explain why words expressing duty or possibility need no ἂν to help out the meaning (10.6) The explanation of παρὰ τοσοῦτον takes no account of the meaning of παρὰ with the accusative, and is only a paraphrase (49.4); it would have been worth while to collect instances of the use of παρὰ here. We are glad to add that the interpretations of difficult places are well summarized and clearly put; but the editor is not always definite enough in his own opinion.

Herodotus.

Mr. W. J. Woodhouse, author of "Aetolia," is a good editor, as we have before had occasion to point out; and his edition of HERODOTUS IV., 1-144, University Tutorial Series (Clive, 4s. 6d.), is not unworthy of his reputation. A very good summary of the author's dialect is prefixed, which will be found useful, and quite sufficient for practical purposes, by more advanced students than those whom the book is meant for. We can recommend it.

Æschylus.

ÆSCHYLUS: EUMENIDES, edited by T. B. Mills, M.A., University Tutorial Series (Clive, 3s. 6d.), is for the most part a useful little edition. The notes are much the same as others as far as they go. In literary appreciation, however, they fail, a common fault in this series. There are several serious omissions. On page 1, τράγοι should be explained; and αὐτοῖσι in lines 771, 774 is passed by without a word. Mr. Mills has not seen Delos, or he could hardly have explained χορὰδα (9) as possibly the cliffs on its west; the island outline, with Cynthus in the middle, is graphically described by "hog-back." On line 473 he has confused two different explanations of κατηρυκώς: κατηρύω "to train" could never give rise to the metaphorical sense "furnished with teeth." We like Mr. Mills' reading of 489 (ὀρκῶν περὶ ὧντας μηδὲν) better than Sidgwick's.

Euripides.

We cannot confidently recommend Mr. G. M. Gwyther's BACCHÆ OF EURIPIDES (Bell's Illustrated Classics). There is, in our opinion, too much help given in the text; to insert stage directions is good, but not so to add an elaborate summary of each small section. It is the notes, however, we chiefly find fault with. Mr. Gwyther writes incorrectly, e.g., he says "to be on guard against" when he means "to be on watch for" (67). Or he says the opposite of what he means; the τραιηρίς is explained as "every third year, i.e., according to Greek calculation, every other year" (133). Irrelevant facts are mentioned, as the three rims of the helmets worn by the priests of Cybele (120). A difficulty is overlooked in ὥστε for ὥσπερ (1,066). Lastly, the explanation of οὐ μὴ προσοίσει (343) is quite wrong; Mr. Gwyther apparently regards it as οὐ προσοίσει negatived by μὴ, whereas μὴ προσοίσει is the starting-point of the phrase. It is a pity, because most of the notes are judicious and adequate. The pictures here are very freely adapted, and have no archæological value; we are surprised to see the familiar three Graces, "from a bas-relief," dancing before a background of mountains.

THE RISE OF HELLAS, by E. G. Wilkinson, M.A. (Black's Historical Greek Readers, with vocabulary, 2s. 6d.), is an interesting and intelligent book, beginning in difficulty where Graecula leaves off, and advancing with greater speed than usual. It includes a wide range of style and vocabulary; the subjects begin with the myths and end with the battles of Plataea and Mycale. There are good comments on the matter, though the editor is a little too much inclined to rationalize. It is very unlikely that Hercules is a personification of the civilizing tendencies of the Phœnicians. The pictures are good, except Delphi, which is a caricature.

English Literature.

Mr. E. J. Mathew has written a HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE (Macmillans, 4s. 6d., pp. 534), clearly arranged and classified, with many facts, dates, and typical extracts, which for the earlier periods are particularly useful to the student. Although the editor's own English is not above suspicion, his criticisms are often clear and sound. The comparison of Shakespeare and Jonson, for example, is drawn out in some detail and summed up thus:—"We turn to Shakespeare for studies of human nature; from Jonson we only learn what our forefathers were like at some one particular period." Of course, the same detail cannot be expected in the treatment of lesser lights. The chief faults we have to find are these, and they are rather serious. The treatment of Elizabethan prose is meagre, and takes no sufficient account of the luxuriant vigour of Sir Thomas North, the grace and versatility of Greene, or the mordant invective of Nash, not to name many others, such as Holland, Lodge, L'Estrange, and the other translators. And the criticism of modern authors is somewhat blind to their merits. Mrs. Browning is placed above her husband, and Tennyson and George Eliot are depreciated. The former fault Mr. Mathew shares with most other historians of English literature. He seems at times to be too dependent on tradition for his criticism, and perhaps he has neglected parts of the field for want of earlier guides.

It is not easy to see the plan of selection in LAUREATA, A BOOK OF POETRY FOR THE YOUNG, by Richard Wilson (Arnold, 1s. 6d.). The pieces do not seem to be specially suited to the young; otherwise we should hardly find among them Southwell's "Shun Delays," Tennyson's "In Memoriam" stanzas, Arnold's "Rugby Chapel," and other such introspective or philosophical verse. But nearly all the pieces are of high excellence—all perhaps, if we except Hood's "November," which offends by its trivial play upon the word and its lack of form; and many are such as stir the blood, as the ballad of Agincourt, the Light Brigade, the ride from Ghent to Aix. The selection from Swinburne is poor. It consists of a so-called "Child's Song," with a flat ending; the concluding verses of the "Armada," unhappy specimens of his most gasping style; and "A Child's Laughter," which can only appeal to those who are not children. Nevertheless, although we cannot commend the principles of selection, we gladly admit that there is plenty of fine poetry in "Laureata."

Science.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF PHYSICS, Vol. I. General Physical Measurements, by Allan F. Walden, M.A., and T. T. Manley (A. and C. Black, 3s. 6d.), may be warmly commended to young teachers of Physics in schools, and will be welcomed by many of greater experience, not only by reason of its intrinsic merits, but also because it displays the methods of two teachers who have given an unusual amount of careful thought to the consideration of the method of presenting the first elements of physics to beginners. In the case of the older subjects of school study the experience of generations has already settled many of the questions which are still open in the modern subjects of school instruction in science, and the publication of books of this kind will help to make the differences less marked. The easiest method and that which naturally, but unfortunately, presents itself to the young teacher fresh from the University, imbued with confidence in his teachers and admiration for the results which he has seen to follow from their labours, is to present a scientific subject to children just as it has been put before him in his maturer years. In the case of Physics this fundamental error is not so marked as in Biology, because it is limited by the condition of the mathematical knowledge already acquired. This is an important matter, and is hardly sufficiently recognized in this book. The ordinary arithmetic of schools, the arithmetic of counted quantities, is an insufficient preparation for the study of physical measurements, and, until the arithmetic of measured quantities is definitely taught, it would be well to introduce a prefatory chapter on this subject. The paragraph on the Multiplication of Errors (which is a misnomer) might then be omitted, and the indication of the accuracy of a measurement by the number of places of decimals replaced by the number of significant digits employed. It is as yet premature to commend too highly any scheme for the teaching of Physics, but the plan developed in this book is good, and it certainly represents honest thought and careful practice.

School Histories.

HARROW (3s. 6d. n.) in Mr. Bell's Public Schools Series gives the history of the school first, and then an account of present-day conditions there. The account of the expenses is not so full as in the case of some of the other volumes, but there is a good chapter on Harrow songs.

A good deal of antiquarian research has lately been expended on Winchester by Mr. Leach and others, but a light and readable book, such as Mr. R. Townsend Warner's admirably illustrated WINCHESTER (Handbooks to Great Public Schools Bell, 3s. 6d. n.), was a desideratum. The history of the school and the salient features of its modern life are emphasized with the avowed object of informing parents who may think of sending their sons to Winchester. Some new and entertaining light is thrown upon the customs of the school in the seventeenth century by extracts from letters written by a gentleman commoner, Ralph Verney, to his father, and lent to the author by the present Lady Verney.

M. Pierre de Coubertin is known as an interpreter of France to England, in our own columns and elsewhere. His NOTES SUR L'ÉDUCATION PUBLIQUE (Hachette, 3f. 50c.) are intended rather for his own countrymen than ours. Possibly he covers too much ground to cover it all thoroughly; but he is a thoughtful writer, hampered by few prejudices, though decidedly opposed to the "feminism" championed by M. Marcel Prévost. "Il faut laisser à l'ouragan féministe le temps de passer," he writes; and he wants women educated for marriage and not for independent careers. In a country in which the convents absorb the old maids this doubtless seems more plausible than here.

FICTION.

Zack's Latest.

It was argued in our columns a few weeks ago that, though all long novels were not great, all great novels were long. The advocates of the contrary opinion will be entitled to quote the case of THE WHITE COTTAGE, by Zack (Constable, 6s.), which is short and amazingly good. The writer who can take village folk for her characters, can distribute among them the parts of a strong drama of elementary passion, can preserve their dialect and their characteristics of habit and thought without ever letting their actions or emotions seem grotesque or unconvincing, has done one of the most difficult things in the art of fiction. The story is a study of a woman's heart, and more particularly, of a woman's preference of a man who treats women badly to a man whose attitude towards women is chivalrous and respectful. The theme is essentially one which requires a woman to deal with it. When men have handled it, as they sometimes have, the note of special pleading has seldom failed to be audible. To them the psychological situation is a strange phenomenon observed ab extra. With women, if they perceive it at all, the perception is instinctive. It is their province to understand the success of Don Juan, just as it is a man's province to understand the success of Messalina. More particularly is this the case when we have to do with a Messalina or a Don Juan of humble life; and Zack's Don Juan is a fisherman. Her scene is laid in a little village on the North Devon coast and she seems to know her North Devon almost as well as Richard Blackmore knew it. Not only the dialect but also the habits of thought, the metaphors, the humorous way of looking at things are truly rendered. Nothing could be more delightful than the interlude in which the village constable tells how he went to Barnstaple fair to buy a present for the lady whom he wished to marry, and was persuaded by the stall-keeper to purchase five large coloured glass balls. He had explained that he wanted "sommatt wi' a look to it":—

"Then ses she to me, 'You couldn't go for to do a wiser thing than buy they five coloured balls. There's the blue wan,' she ses, 'the same colour ez the stripes across Her Majesty's breast; red, that 'ull put 'ee in mind of battle, murder, and sudden death, the same being, ez' the Prayer-book ses, always in our midst; green stands for the Emerald Isle, a part o' England, tho' I've heard a place wi' ways; yaller 'ull tell 'ee ivery Saturday night to put your money faithful in your wife's hand; purple pictures life, not overfull o' zarrer or o' joy, but fair eating and clothes to taste.' Wi' that I paid down my money, thinking I cudn't do a much wiser thing."

Tears and laughter are close together in the book, and the pathos is as admirable as the humour.

More Love-Letters.

It may soon become necessary to assign a definite place in literature to the imaginary love-letter, a form of writing which seems suddenly to have commended itself to several young authors who wish to discover some new method of communicating to the world their views upon things in general. The essay is discredited and dull; the love-letter may very well take its place, for a time. The advantages offered by this sort of writing are considerable, at first sight. There is, first of all, the romantic setting; then the spirit of curiosity that prompts so many of us to pry into what are ostensibly a woman's most sacred thoughts; and, finally, it is no longer necessary for the author to express her opinions with any regard to definite form. The conventions of the literary love-letter have not yet begun to exercise more than a gentle restraint, though the careful observer may note that some are beginning to assert themselves. Thus it is already essential, apparently, to begin every letter with a new term of endearment. But this is a small matter. As a means of literary expression we have no great quarrel with the love-letter, except on the score of sentimentality and an unavoidable similarity in the form of the several letters when they come to be collected. The publication of actual love-letters is a different matter, and one that would seem to argue a certain obtuseness of the finer feelings. Yet it is the fashion for the authors (or editors) to insert explanatory prefaces vouching for the authenticity of their selections. "George Egerton," who is responsible for ROSA AMOROSA (Grant Richards, 6s.), prefixes a note expressly disclaiming comparison with other books of a similar nature on the ground that hers is no piece of exquisite literature, but "of value only as truthfully human." Furthermore, she has a long introductory notice, as it were, of the real writer, explaining in some fashion (perhaps rather lamely) how it is that the publication of this book cannot be considered as a breach of confidence. All this is well enough, no doubt, as a piece of literary make-believe, but it seems unnecessary trouble. Were the letters authentic, they should never have been published; supposing them to be merely the outcome of "George Egerton's" imagination, all this parade does not give credit to the reader's intelligence. To come to the letters themselves, we will admit cheerfully that they contain some very fine writing indeed, and some thoughts on the relation between husband and wife that were worth setting down. In short, they are good letters, full of excellent description of nature—is this also becoming one of the conventions?—and displaying a good deal of varied information and a character something out of the common. But the fault in this kind of writing lies in the unavoidable sameness, the constant repetition. It is always "Do you remember"—and then off into a sheaf of loving reminiscences, and after a dozen letters or so the iteration makes one "tired." To the lover himself these confidences are no doubt delightful, but the whole world of readers cannot be expected to put themselves in his position, and to read from his point of view. In short, books of this kind should be taken, if at all, in small doses. Read in any quantity they afflict us with a weariness of all such strained sentiment; the perpetual harping on the same string takes on an air of artificiality, and even the most intimate disclosures begin to pall. "Rosa Amorosa" contains a good deal that is quite worth reading, but a careful perusal of the book has not left us with an extraordinarily high opinion of the love-letter as a form of literary expression.

Ireland.

Miss Crottie writes with true Irish daintiness and sympathy the records of an Irish country town towards the end of the eighteenth century in THE LOST LAND (Fisher Unwin, 6s.). A note of sorrow is struck again and again almost as though the sorrowing took pleasure in their pain—a characteristic which every one who knows the Irish peasantry will recognize as true. So persistent is this note that it seems almost fitting that Thad, the large-hearted far-seeing friend of the poor and well-beloved head of the house, should die as the tale draws to its end. Some of the minor characters, notably The Stranger and Jane Fogarty, are drawn with rare skill, and Miss Crottie writes far better English, Irish though she be, than many English authors of to-day. Her style and choice of words afford pleasure apart from the story she has to tell.

It may be doubted whether many people will take JOHN TOWNLEY: A TALE FOR THE TIMES (Henry Deane, 6s.) as seriously as does its author, Mr. Robert Thynne. He has previously treated of Irish disaffection and shown himself a painstaking rather than a sympathetic student of a certain side of Irish politics and social life. The book hinges on the Phoenix-park murders and the Parnellite conspiracy. Mr. Gladstone, under the name of Mr. Mazyman, and other leading actors in the drama of those troublous days figure in the narrative. Few, perhaps, will care to seek their fiction among the pages whereon is written the tale of Gladstonian Home Rule. But for those who care to do so Mr. Thynne's well-written and earnest book has many attractions, treating as it does prominently of the part played in the struggle by the Roman Catholic priesthood.

Mechanics.

If you want a recipe for the popular, trim-built, soulless, semi-historical novel you may take Mr. S. R. Crockett's new book, THE SILVER SKULL (Smith, Elder, 6s.), and find the rules for its concoction as well as an excellent example of the result. As a highly-successful author Mr. Crockett takes his novel seriously and button-holes you in the preface, telling you that, "howsoever I may have succeeded in telling it," there is no truer and no stranger tale in all the long history of Italy than that of "The Silver Skull," which was the badge of a band of murderers, led by Ciro the Priest, in Apulia and the "Heel of the Boot," early in the last century. He also mentions that a quantity of "justificative material" has come into his hands; that he has himself lived, in his youth, in Italy and knows its "little wayside inns, its hill-set towns, tower-crowned and battlemented, the white farmhouses, the brown shepherds' shelters, the swarthy fisherfolk of Adria, the red-lipped, saucy-eyed maidens by the fountains . . ."; and that Mr. C. C. Lacaita and the journals of the late General Richard Church have been of great service to him. All this is interesting. But when one comes to the story of the Red Terror, the wild doings of the murderous Decisi, and the adventures of the gay Vardarelli riders it is apparent that the most fortunate collector of "romantic" data may yet produce a very artificial novel. Mr. Crockett seems to have felt as much, for he says that the present book can hardly be called a romance, "so close has the story been kept to the material facts of history." Writers like Motley have produced histories with all the vivacity of the novel, and novelists have written stories with the vital force of history; but Mr. Crockett falls between both ideals and fails to give us real men and women. The adventures of his marionettes are mechanically thrilling to the last degree; the actions of the characters read like melodrama; their diction hints the Surrey-side. But Mr. Crockett is an accomplished showman, and his puppets will very likely dance their way into the hearts of the public who, perhaps wisely, prefer the obvious to the subtle, the external accidents to the eternal verities.

The Occult.

To a certain class of mind it is a pleasurable thing to hover curiously on the edge of the occult. Such persons will find plenty of interest in Mr. T. W. Speight's STRANGE EXPERIENCES OF MR. VERSCHOYLE (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), which is concerned with the successive re-incarnations of a rather commonplace person who becomes interesting because of the abnormal conditions in which he views life. The thing has been done with more sensationalism in "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," and with more humour in "Vice Versa." Mr. Speight's book differs in some details of the conception from both of these. There is here no exchange of identities, though we meet with the same commingling of "egos" (if that is the way to put it), the same dreadful legacies from the body's former tenant, the same "grotesqueries" consequent upon the wandering spirit's ignorance of the antecedents of his physical domicile. All this is made the most of by Mr. Speight who contrives to import a sentimental interest to catch sentimental readers.

On the River.

MY SON RICHARD, by Douglas Sladen (Hutchinson, 6s.), is a story which is likely to please, but the reader will find that certain passages in its first few pages are not necessary to his enjoyment. Such, for instance, are some preliminary notes addressed to various persons, and a third chapter which the author tells us "may be skipped by the reader who takes no interest in his country." The reader who does take an interest in his country may, we venture to think, risk a similar course without serious damage to his patriotism. The only preliminary note of importance is that which explains the change of title, which was originally "the great Company," a term applied by Mr. Sladen to the military caste (so far as such a caste exists), the ardour of which he tells us—though the moment is not quite a fortunate one for such an assertion—"will be enhanced a hundredfold by the reforms at the War Office." But the tale, we hasten to remark again, is one which cannot fail to prove agreeable. Its background is the sunlit woods of the Thames, its characters appear always in pretty blouses or immaculate flannels and conduct their delightful flirtations in punts or bungalows. Every one is as "nice" as they can be—except one young lady, and she is pretty, well dressed, and agreeable; and a charming marchioness with her two daughters who come, under an incognito, into touch with the "great company" on the river, add a pleasant piquancy to the situation, while the military ardour of Richard and his departure to the front in Africa give it an actuality. It is in fact a story which may be read with enjoyment—not very probable indeed or very profound, but told with freshness, humour, and sympathy, and with the charm which always accompanies a novel in which the writer succeeds in making you like all his dramatis personæ without denying them character and individuality.

From America.

PARLOUS TIMES (Heinemann, 4s.), by Mr. D. D. Wells, is No. 2 of the Dollar Library, which we are told will give to English readers an impression of "the mercurial genius picturesquely expressing itself on the other side of the Atlantic. . . ." We are not quite sure of the mercurial genius of Mr. D. D. Wells, but any book from the author of "Her Ladyship's Elephant" and "His Lordship's Leopard" is welcome. "Parlous Times" is an exciting story of melodramatic English life as it is understood by a widely observant and moderately inspired American writer. Aloysius Stanley, Secretary of a South American Embassy, is a fortunate young gentleman in London who becomes entangled with three interesting ladies, one of whom is the wife of a very important and wicked and rather stogy Colonel Darcy. It is a well-told tale; a pleasant book to read and one likely to be almost as popular on this side of the Atlantic as with those "variedly composite and interesting people" who will enjoy it in the land of its birth.

Another interesting American novel, not belonging this time to the "Dollar Library," is Mrs. Grace Denio Litchfield's THE MOVING FINGER WRITES (Putnam's, 6s.), in which a plain tale is admirably told. Mrs. Litchfield is agreeably "literary" in her method, apt with quotation, elegant in allusion and experienced in the development of plot. "The Moving Finger Writes" is, perhaps, more essentially American in spirit than Mr. Wells' example of Transatlantic fiction.

Sensations.

An enticingly mysterious title, like a famous two-letter advertisement on the hoardings, piques the public curiosity, and of this Mr. St. John Raikes, the author of SESA (Arrowsmith, 3s. 6d.), is evidently aware. We naturally ask "Who or what is Sesa?" It would not be fair to hint at the depths of the many mysteries contained in this ingeniously constructed and genially gory tale of wholesale murder. Mr. Raikes writes so freely and unaffectedly of deeds of blood that the most sensitive ceases to be repelled. Thus, "Between us Campbell and I moved the body of Elvida, and, covering it and the other corpses with sheets, we placed the dying man upon the mattress." To the reader who has reached the point in the story where this sentence occurs, those "other corpses" will seem natural enough. But Mr. Raikes shows that he has gifts fitting him for work on higher themes than that of "Sesa," and next time we hope he will come in less bloodthirsty guise.

Mr. Harry Spurr, unless we are mistaken, has hitherto presented himself to the public in the character of a painstaking humorist; so that it is a little amusing to find the author of "A Cockney in Arcadia" grappling with real solid melodrama as he does in THE VAULTED CHAMBER (Digby, Long, 3s. 6d.)—the tale of the terrible vengeance of a Russian wife on those who have done to death her innocent husband. It is very easy to read, both because of its clear type and wide margins, and of the almost terribly facile style of the man who tells the tale. The mystery of the vaulted chamber to which the Princess Obanoff lures her victims and there despatches them is not very original or ingenious, but there is throughout that strong melodramatic flavour that suits some palates.

A DAUGHTER OF MYSTERY, by R. Norman Silver (Jarrold, 6s.), begins well, with some sort of resemblance to actual life in the sayings and doings of its characters, but degenerates quickly. "Sensation" is all very well. There are plenty of people who like it; but it has to be well done. And modern gentlemen who go about slaying people and burying them out of hand, and who hiss "Ten thousand fiends!" when they are annoyed, are less terrible than absurd.

In DAYS OF DOUBT (Ward, Lock) Miss Alice Maud Meadows gives uncommonly honest value for 3s. 6d. There are 348 pages of story, exemplary in tone and exciting beyond the dreams of the most exacting sensation-seeker. Early in the book the hero, Arthur Richmond, who is about to be married to a conventionally charming heroine, prevents another gentleman, his double, from jumping over Waterloo-bridge. He takes him home to his rooms in the Temple, being determined to play into the novelist's hands; and soon after Arthur is knocked down in the street with his double's pocket-book in his coat, and the other gentleman, Harry Stanmore, lies dead in the Temple-chambers. Arthur is taken to a hospital and the relations of Harry surround him. His memory is supposed to have gone, and Miss Meadows has made a very fair start towards a novel of confusions. These are destined to be worse confounded in a hundred rather mechanical ways, but still the result is excitement, sensation, and a rush of interest.

HISTORICAL NOVELS.

Prince Rupert.

As a narrator of spirited stories of adventure Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne has established his reputation with those who enjoy being swept along by unhalting tales of daring deeds. To such it does not greatly matter in what period or where the scene is cast. It happens that in PRINCE RUPERT THE BUCCANEER (Methuen, 6s.) the story is concerned with the time of Cromwell, when the worsted Royalists of fighting blood sought some field for their blood-letting propensities in the world's remote corners, the while the representative of the Stuart dynasty held inglorious Court at The Hague. In the Spanish Main, it would seem, carracks laden with gold bars and doubloons and pieces of eight were to be captured by any band of ruffians with sufficient thirst for blood and greed for treasure. As a combination of sprightly swordsman and cunning diplomatist Prince Rupert is drawn as a figure that challenges comparison, say, with D'Artagnan. To supply the "love interest" we have "Master Stephen Laughan," a maid who adores the hero, and follows him, disguised as a man, fighting by his side, all unknown to him, in the bloodiest engagements. For the kind of story where breathless adventure and skin-of-the-teeth escapes are the chief stock-in-trade one can hardly imagine the thing better done. The occasional bits of modern slang which slip into the seventeenth century diction are but superficial blemishes of a rattling story of adventure.

Stuart and Hanoverian.

In dealing with THE CURIOUS CAREER OF RODERICK CAMPBELL (Constable, 6s.) Miss Jean McIlwraith contrives to include almost as much variety of incident as Dr. Conan Doyle put into "The Refugees"—a story which we have been accustomed to consider as unrivalled in respect of breathless action. For Mr. Campbell, beginning with the pacific post of sergeant in the Edinburgh Town Guard, finds himself led to fight first for Stuart and then for Hanoverian in the rising of '45, and fills up his spare time by effecting the release of a prisoner after Culloden. Thence to Canada, where the canny Scot escapes a scalping party of Indians by the timely display of a wig—the trick is not new in fiction—and becomes a medicine-man and something of a power in the land. Naturally enough, many of the characters reappear in the New World, as actors in the struggle for the possession of Canada, and the gallant sergeant generally manages to be on the spot when events of importance are proceeding. The story is well told; there is a love interest running through it which turns out happily; the characters are out of the common run; and nobody could accuse the author of lack of adventurous incident. In short, this is a creditable romance. No self-respecting Scot, we suppose, can refrain from handling one of the Jacobite risings, but Miss McIlwraith has imparted so much novelty into a hackneyed subject that we forgive her readily.

In Puritan New England.

In THE MAKING OF CHRISTOPHER FERRINGHAM (The Macmillan Co., 6s.) Miss Boulah Marie Dix has produced a fine picture of colonial America in the days of Puritan and Cavalier, but it lacks the debonnaire charm of her earlier and slighter story, "Hugh Gwyeth." Kester Ferringham is a dissipated young wastrel, bred in the Royalist camp during the Civil War, made captive at Worcester, and shipped over seas by his Puritan kindred. He is an engaging scamp—a strange figure enough in the godly little town of Meadowcreek, in Massachusetts; but his earlier escapades are too much in the nature of school-boy mischief for a man who has known the tragedy of the Civil War from Marston Moor to Worcester, and has sailed far seas with Prince Rupert. Christopher, however, soon gets on to more serious misdemeanours, such as dicing, drinking, and—most grievous of all—secretly aiding Quakers, and ends by being cast off by his kinsfolk, condemned to work out his debts as a bond-servant, and set in the stocks. Miss Dix's realism shows to advantage when she describes her hero's penance; she really conveys the ache, physical and mental, of those ignominious hours spent beneath the stare of enemies, idlers, children, "even the very geese" on the village green. The upbuilding of Christopher's character is less convincing than his earlier recklessness, and his love story is frankly conventional. Nevertheless, the slow-moving story quickens to an adventurous pace when the scene shifts to the Barbados, where Christopher rights old wrongs and captures the pirate ship after a struggle with death, narrated with almost brutal force, and returns in triumph to a reconciled Meadowcreek. The book is clever and conscientious, and if its style is too closely detailed for beauty, it certainly achieves reality, while Christopher himself is a vital figure. The retrospective condemnation of Royalists is uncalled for; and the unregenerate reader wonders whether residence in the American settlements was essential to salvation and whether a soldier under that loyal leader, Prince Rupert, might not have had some chances of proving his manhood.

LEST WE FORGET, by Joseph Hocking (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), is a long, closely-printed, but not at all tedious tale of the days of "Bloody Mary" and the great Cardinal. Mr. Hocking is fond of hairbreadth escapes. The frontispiece shows a damsel tied to a stake, and a stalwart youth lifting another man over his head with obvious intent to do him grievous bodily harm. The plot is really interesting. The accession of Elizabeth just in time to prevent the match being applied to the faggots round the damsel stretches "the long arm" a little, but will surely please all but the most case-hardened readers. Often as writers have represented Stephen Gardiner in fiction, there is originality in Mr. Hocking's portrait of "The Lion's Cub."

THE BLACK WOLF'S BREED, by Harris Dickson (Methuen, 6s.), is "a story of France in the old world and the new, happening in the reign of Louis XIV." The young hero, as gallant and foolhardy as he always is in tales of the sort, comes to Paris from Louisiana, and many are his adventures. They are told with great spirit, and an excellent picture is given of Louis' Court and time.

LOCAL STUDIES.

West Country Tales.

The country parish is very much in evidence just now. Dialect seems to possess a subtle charm for many writers, and those who have had the fortune to be born and bred in the provinces no doubt find it easy to produce books on this model—"Idylls of Country Life," "Sketches in Our Village," and so forth. Whether the reader finds his share of the bargain equally easy is another matter. Mr. Christopher Hare, who is responsible for the collection of West Country tales which he calls DINAH KELLOW (Ward, Lock, 6s.), is tainted with the common heresy of dialect-mongers, that of thinking it necessary to torture his spelling in a vain attempt to reproduce accurately the vowel sounds of his villagers' language. Except in a philological treatise, dialect (as we have hinted before) should be indicated rather than painfully trans-literated. As for Mr. Hare's stories, "Dinah Kellow" itself, the first of the series, is also considerably the longest and the best; the others are so slight as to be mere sketches; and, with the exception perhaps of "Jenima's Love Story," they were hardly worth printing. The illustrations appear to be from photographs.

In a North Country.

HARLOW OF SENDLE (Blackwood, 6s.), by Mr. John W. Graham, the author of "Neera," is one of the pleasantest stories we have met with for many a day. It has originality and charm in manner, though not especially in matter. Over the whole there lies an agreeable distinction as of the eighteenth century. The style is at once pedantic and pleasant, informed yet gay, lucid but allusive. The subtitle tells us that the book contains passages relating to the family of Harlaw in Strathclyde, collected out of the note-books of Thomas Denton, Esquire, of Eselby, and it is this latter gentleman about whom we learn most. For it is Mr. Denton's style which makes the book, and the style is at least a better index to the man than a history of his actions. The note-taker of Strathclyde lives apart and watches with sympathetic interest the fortunes of his neighbours, the Harlaws. All that happens is that the family is threatened with destruction because its head happens to be a coldly proud gambler and recovers itself owing to the graces of its younger members. So stated the book sounds bald, but its vivid portraits and convincing method make it an excellent example of fiction. It is true that we may find the ultimate dialect of Strathclyde a little wearisome; and that young Harry Harlaw of Sendle, Mr. Tom Denton's hero, like many a hero on the stage of life, is a sad donkey whose heroics are a little like rodomontade; but the book is none the less agreeable and the portraits of the two charming girls, of Martin Rothery, of Lot Barwise, and a host of others make a book which all will enjoy. Among the massed battalions of novelists who set out with high hopes of giving us some new thing, Mr. Graham is one of the few who arrive. And his has been a simple method; he has chosen the charm of style, the use of sympathy and beauty, the classic means to an entirely satisfactory end.

East Coast Sketches.

It is often curious to notice how different the same object will appear under different handling. "Athol Forbes" knows his East Coast fishermen well, and deals in a series of sketches with the adventures of Mr. Cutting, skipper of the coasting brig Rising Sun. The incidents he relates are at times quite funny, but they are told in a manner that destroys most of the humour. It is impossible to resist a comparison with the work of Mr. W. W. Jacobs, who would have shown off the same wares to infinitely greater advantage. The fact is, Mr. Forbes is too self-conscious; he must intrude his own personality. Work of this kind is none the better for the writer's personal views; they are not particularly valuable in themselves, and the artistic value of the stories is spoilt by the figure of the author, dimly visible behind every paragraph. But as studies of East Coast characters we can recommend ODD FISH (Skeffington, 3s. 6d.) to all who wish to become acquainted with Yarmouth and Gorleston and the rest of a remote and interesting district of England. The book is decorated with photographs of the neighbourhood, which come in rather curiously as illustrations to fiction; but this, we suppose, is modern realism.

On the Fells.

IDYLLS OF THE FELLS (Brimley Johnson, 3s. 6d.) contains a baker's dozen of sketches by Mr. Kingsley Tarpey, carefully written and bound up together in a pretty little green-covered volume. The tone varies pleasantly, though, perhaps, rather inclined to sadness; they have a distinct note of originality; and they are short enough to make no great demand upon the attention. Some of these idylls have appeared before, in the pages of the Speaker. Collected sketches are seldom successful, but these are marked by finer workmanship than most. Mr. Tarpey is liberal in his use of dialect, but he can write prettily descriptive passages, and has a sense of style. The book has for frontispiece a not very successful reproduction of a painting by the author—"The Cottage on the Fell."

VOYSEY, the title of Mr. R. O. Prowse's new novel (Heinemann, 6s.), is the name of an interesting young man whose acquaintance with Mrs. Detmond, the wife of a former acquaintance at Oxford, detains the reader through some 130 pages. Then comes a spurt. Voysey and Mrs. Detmond meet on the razor-edge of her husband's married happiness. At this point Mr. Prowse enters into a real analysis of passions, motives, temptation, remorse—and we are guided with minute care through the by-ways of temperament. Mrs. Detmond is as real as she is repulsive. Those who have a taste for psychological study will enjoy much of the book. The style is, as a rule, clear and incisive.

BELINDA FITZWARREN, by the Earl of Iddesleigh (Methuen, 6s.), is rather a disappointment. Perhaps unconsciously, we expected greater things from the son of Lord Iddesleigh's father, even in this new province of fiction. The "Belinda" of the book seems to us a trifle too puerile in her methods to convince. Her plan of going to an office for a business interview arrayed in a mask and domino would hardly commend itself to people over twelve. Moreover, her scheme of vengeance against the injurers of her father is a little out of date. Outside book-covers, and perhaps the island of Sicily, young women do not live for a vendetta. However, it can safely be said that the story is easily and pleasantly written, occasionally humorous, and always readable.

OUR FAMILY PORTRAITS, by W. Clinton Ellis (6s.), is a collection of short stories mostly written in a festive and hilarious spirit, though one or two, and notably the tale that gives the book its title, have a more serious flavour. It is full of rollicking humour and many mildly epigrammatic statements like this: "A time-table, like many other monthly magazines, is a mixture of facts and fiction. The names of the stations are facts, which the porters do their best to falsify; the figures represent fiction."

THE GREAT MAGICIAN, by T. R. Threlfall (Ward, Lock, 6s.), tells of a most formidable person with many kinds of magics at his disposal, who here, however, uses his powers on the side of the angels. The preface is disturbing. It says, "Sidi Senussi, the new Mahdi, is no myth. On the contrary, he is the most potent force in North Africa, and the diplomats of Great Britain and France stand in more awe of him than they care to publicly admit. Silent, inscrutable, mysterious, he is so jealously guarded in the remote Kuffra Oasis that no Christian or Jew is allowed to approach within hundreds of miles of it. Here he is storing up arms, ammunition, and wealth—for what?" For what indeed! The very lively pictures (by W. S. Stacey), make him all the more perturbing. Africa is a fatiguing and fidgety continent.

THE LONE STAR RUSH, by Edmund Mitchell (Chatto and Windus, 6s.), is a good average tale of love and gold—principally gold. One of the characters has no very high opinion of the gentlemen who come to the diggings to test ore. He expresses himself on the subject thus:—"Dunderheads or liars, sir—but most often liars. I reckon that Old Nick, when he claps eyes on a Coolgardie expert at the gates of Hades, has to kinder break the news of such an arrival to Ananias." The cover suggests the Christmas book. Although not perhaps written specially for girls and boys, "The Lone Star Rush" would not do much harm to either. It is in quite a different style from "Plotters of Paris," for instance, which we noticed last year.

ART.

SPANISH ART IN THE GUILDHALL.

Artistically speaking, England is not saved by its geographical position from successful invasion by the foreigner, and the City fathers, although they are spending money upon the pictorial embellishment of the dark purlieus of the Royal Exchange, have allowed their excellent curator, Mr. Temple, to go to Spain for his show material this year. The result is a collection of pictures which clearly demonstrates that the art of Spain has flowered and passed away. The native artist will not bestir himself, and the foreign artist has but little to do with a country which persists in keeping its eyes shut. It is so different with us where Van Dyke and Rubens, Canaletto and Claude, Winterhausen, Boehm, Whistler, Abbey, and Sargent have at different times set all our young painters thinking new thoughts. Nevertheless, if Spain has no artistic present, its past is singularly glorious. There is Velazquez, Murillo, Zurbaran, Eduardo Zamacois, Domingo, and—at a great distance of time and merit—Alvarez and Goya. It is, really, a sparse record numerically speaking, and we are indebted to the Guildhall authorities for securing so much that interests within the limitations of the art of a once dominant race. The art of the Spaniard, always excepting the colossal Velazquez, is not startling, but when he painted it was without haste, and the records as we have them to-day are eloquent in their testimony to the indifference of the worker to time or posterity. There was no New Spanish Art Club to disturb the serenity of such still-life painters as Barbudo or Gallegos, no one to be shocked by Goya, no archaeological experts to question the accuracy of Tusqueta. Francisco Pradillo painted brilliantly because he painted in the sunshine, and Fortuny had acclimatized his eyes to the glare of Morocco and the “blazing white walls” of Tetuan until his vibrating colour, seen in the sombre setting of our City, strikes us as surpassingly brilliant. Fortuny, then, and the newly-discovered Goya are, for most of the visitors, the surprises of the collection. Both are deserving of better acquaintance. Neither dispossesses Velazquez of his crown or leads us to accept Murillo once more with only that mild tolerance which has been accorded to the last of the sincerely religious painters. Murillo was no mere painter of gipsy Madonnahood. The two Sevillians can never be effaced from the records of serious art. There is a world of achievement between them, a great gulf fixed between the high intellectuality, truthfulness, and swift perception of the one and the sweetness and sentimentality of the painter of the “Immaculate Conception.” The two seventeenth century painters touched art at the opposite poles, and the smaller men, of course, are to be found occupying the intervening country. The Guildhall collection, nevertheless, confirms us in our view of Spanish art as a remarkable solecism—a nation with only one great painter, and he, perhaps, the greatest of all. The new room is devoted to his works, or, speaking more accurately, to work which it is difficult to dissociate from his name. Nowhere outside the Prado Gallery of Madrid can we hope to find forty genuine Velazquez gathered together, but a collection which includes the Duke of Wellington’s “Portrait of a Man” and “Water Carrier,” the Duke of Devonshire’s “Lady with a Mantilla,” and Lord Bristol’s “Don Balthazar Carlos,” must be accounted worthy of all attention. Among the Murillos, too, there is a “Dolorosa,” lent by M. Gaston Linden, which we do not remember to have seen before, and Mr. Beit’s “Prodigal Son Feasting,” which help us to repent the injustice with which we are sometimes tempted to treat a very sympathetic painter. The surprise of the collection is the zest with which the work of Goya is now received. He has been rediscovered for Londoners after the lapse of a hundred years, but he is no new genius to any who have studied art in Paris. Lord Clarendon, when Ambassador at Madrid, developed a strong taste for the works of the vigorous and sometimes eccentric painter, and perhaps the Guildhall collection will assist Englishmen to do him tardy justice. The young and talented Mariano Fortuny never suffered a like neglect, but then he saw art with the eyes of an Italian and was not at all limited by the accident of his nationality.

Amongst the innumerable minor exhibitions that claim attention at the present time is that of the water-colour drawings of “The Seasons” by Mrs. Allingham at the Fine Art Society. The particular brilliancy and the power of retaining and reflecting light peculiar to water-colour painting are well understood by Mrs. Allingham, whose works hold a place of honour between early topographical work and the crudeness into which water-colourists fall who attempt the power and depth proper to oil colour. It is only in her inability always to retain the precious sense of atmosphere that we find her work a little disappointing. That she deals with subjects rather than with problems is not of necessity a blemish. She realizes the true value of her medium and shows its power of rendering minute details crisply and sharply.

In an adjoining room Mr. Sutton Palmer exhibits at once the beauties and the limitations of pastel drawing. He is most successful when he fixes in this somewhat unstable medium rapidly changing effects which elude even the most rapid water-colour painter and are impossible to the painter in oil. When he labours with a medium not fitted for sustained effort the effects are mechanical and meretricious and his colour opaque. The very texture of the paper employed suggests wooliness, and Mr. Palmer lays himself open to this serious charge in more than a score of instances. The livid colours are a matter of less moment, for all crayons soften in tone. We would counsel Mr. Sutton Palmer to study well the works of Girodet and some of the more modern Frenchmen. Art may be in a sorry way in France just now, but drawing in pastels is—with sculpture—one of the things that is understood much better by French artists than by us.

Pastel might be of great assistance to Mr. Goldsborough Anderson, who is exhibiting a series of “Fair Women and Other Portraits” at the Grafton Galleries. Mr. Anderson, we are officially informed, has been described as “the lightning portrait-painter.” He has produced “about 700” portraits during the last three or four years, but we feel that pastels would enable him to improve the extent of his truly astounding output during the next few years. With strict attention to business he might make it fourteen hundred. The medium has the additional advantage that if the picture is sufficiently well shaken before being exhibited much of it can be made to disappear. Seriously we fail to appreciate Mr. Anderson’s merits judged by his one standard of productiveness. And yet there are not lacking indications he might produce a picture which would attain to the level of a work of art. So long as his standard of excellence remains dominated by mere fecundity we can only marvel at the lapse from good intentions which has permitted the exhibition to be held in galleries where we are accustomed to see work painted with a loftier purpose.

Mr. R. G. Goodman’s African oil sketches are much better than might be expected. The artist is a keen observer and has a way of reproducing the very difficult atmosphere of the vast continent which will appeal at once to every artist.

Very delightful is the representative collection of work by Leon Lhermitte which now occupies the Goupil Gallery. From time to time Mr. Obach has shown in Cockspur-street very powerful landscapes by this painter, and Mr. McLean has usually one or more good examples of his work on exhibition in the Haymarket. This is the first occasion within our memory, however, when a really representative collection of work by one of the foremost French landscape painters has been got together. Throughout the whole the note of realism is fearlessly struck, but with the delicate precision of a master. Here almost faultless drawing is wedded to a poetic insight which we have learnt to associate—amongst French painters of the last decade—with Millet, with Corot, and with the more romantic amongst the Dutch painters. Whether M. Lhermitte works in charcoal, in pastel, or in paint, the same certainty of touch, the same romance of perception characterizes his work, and the Goupil Gallery just now should be the rallying point of all those who are satiated with the purposeless efforts which occupy the walls of so many of our galleries.

LIBRARY NOTES.

A report that the British Museum authorities contemplated building a storehouse in the country for books not greatly used is contradicted.

The St. Marylebone Borough Council has—we are sorry to say—decided against the adoption of the Public Libraries Acts.

The second number of the Quarterly Record of the Wigan Public Library is something more than a mere report. It contains notes of much bibliographical interest besides annotated lists of books acquired and the first of a series of students' lists on English History. The twenty-third annual report of the same library witnesses a general increase in work. The reference collection meets with its due share of popularity as well as the lending department.

After several years' experience of cramped and unsuitable quarters, the Hove Public Library is to be moved into more commodious premises. It is an extremely popular institution. One in every eight of the population is a borrower; most London libraries have to be content to count one in twenty. In one street in Hove, so a member of the council declared, there was a ticket to every house.

An interesting point of law is being illustrated in Northwick. The public library—in spite of every effort to prop it up—is rapidly sinking owing to the subsidence of the ground on which it stands. The law allows a claim for compensation from any private house owner in such cases. This is not so if the doomed building is public.

The Dublin Municipal Council has decided to establish two additional public libraries in the districts recently added to the city—Clontarf and Drumcondra. The city cannot impose fresh rates on these absorbed townships for seven years, and the libraries will therefore be on a small scale, but the Council has decided to make certain alterations in the Clontarf Town Hall to form a public library, and will then proceed to stock it with books. Drumcondra has never had even a news room, but it has a sum available for library purposes. It will be seen that Dublin is stirring in the matter of the library movement.

American readers—as we see from the Report of the Librarian of Congress, Washington—take much interest in the English colonies. Lists of books on special subjects which have attracted popular attention are issued with the report, and our colonies occupy quite half the space. There is also a bibliography of Inter-oceanic Canal and Railway routes, comprising some 860 books and 1,100 articles. Other lists treat of Cuba, Hawaii, Alaska (70 pages filled by a list of maps), and Mercantile Marine subsidies. All the lists are creditable examples of labour and skill.

There is an alarming story from Russia of the educative effect of libraries told by a correspondent in St. Petersburg. A peasant applied at the Library at Bielovodsk for a book which would teach him "to live in truth." He was given a copy of the Gospels. On finding the text "And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off," he proceeded to carry out the instruction literally. The fate of this unconscious disciple of Mr. Wackford Squeers opens up terrible possibilities. Librarians cannot obtain a certificate of moral stability from each applicant for books or confine the lending issues to blameless romances.

Correspondence.

RAPIER AND DAGGER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In his interesting article on Captain Hutton's "The Sword and the Centuries" your contributor might have emphasized one of his points by showing with what exactness (in the account given by Benvolio to the Prince of Verona) Shakespeare explains the character of the fight between Tybalt and Mercutio, who—

. with one hand beats
Cold death aside, and with the other sends
It back to Tybalt whose dexterity Retorts it.

In the same speech there is also an illustration of your writer's remark to the effect that a reckless and vigorous onslaught is apt to prove too much for science. Undoubtedly Tybalt is meant to be far more skilful in fence than Romeo, and the words of Benvolio indicate that, in accordance with the fitness of things, he is killed by the inferior swordsman in a rapid and desperate encounter, in which the "immortal passado, the punto reverso," &c., are scattered to the four winds—

And to't they go like lightning; for, ere I Could draw to part them, was stout Tybalt slain.

As the words of Benvolio settle the question of rapier and dagger in Romeo and Juliet, so do the words of Osric settle it in Hamlet; but, apart from this and with regard to representation of the combat between Laertes and Hamlet, I do not see that which the writer of the article implies—namely, that single rapiers are inconsistent with the sequel.

At the same time, I cannot understand why, in the present day, fencing should be practically restricted to the foil. I have witnessed some very good rapier and dagger play, and can answer for it that there are few prettier sights.

Yours truly,

WILLIAM CAIRNS.

"SONGS OF THE SWORD AND THE SOLDIER."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Re your notice of my "Songs of the Sword and the Soldier," will you be so kind as to let me make one remark?

"There is no Kipling and no Browning," because the works of the poet and the author are both in rather strict copyright. Besides, Browning's magnificent poetry contains little that would have been suitable to my purpose. Mr. Kipling has written a few fine, soldierly and patriotic songs; but his agent refused me permission to use any but one, and asked for the use of that one ("Recessional") a practically prohibitory fee.

ALEXANDER EAGAR.

* * As to Browning, we do not quite agree with Mr. Eagar. His collection is an interesting and representative one; but under Patriotic Verse, one may well desire (but for copyright) lines which we need make no excuse for quoting in full—especially for the benefit of those who do not read Browning, and do not credit him with the faculty of grandeur in simplicity:—

Nobly, nobly Cape Saint Vincent to the North-west died away;
Sunset ran, one glorious blood-red, reeking into Cadiz Bay;
Bluish mid the burning water, full in face Trafalgar lay;
In the dimmest North-east distance dawned Gibraltar grand and gray;
"Here and here did England help me; how can I help England?"—say,
Whoso turns as I, this evening, turn to God to praise and pray, While Jove's planet rises yonder, silent over Africa.

"THE ETERNAL CONFLICT."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It would be ungrateful and undignified if I were to complain of the review of my book in your issue of May 11th. That review was penetrating and, on the whole, just. But perhaps it will not be considered out of place if I say that I think the reviewer was not altogether just when he said that "never is the essence of the thought crystallized in one satisfying sentence." The essence of the thought may be valuable or not; but surely it must be considered concentrated, centralized, and crystallized in such sentences as:—"There is nothing but tides," "Armageddon is the ultimate fact," "All that we can know is the everlasting Anabasis and Katabasis of things." Such "reflections" as these are not "indefinite."

Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM ROMAINE PATERSON.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE GUNPOWDER PLOT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—It is indeed difficult to follow the thread of Father Gerard's arguments, when he endeavours to prove that "Farmer" was not a favourite alias of the Jesuit Garnett. To conjecture, as does Father Gerard, that the "Mr. Farmer" mentioned in Sir Everard Digby's letter was not Garnett is simply to ignore the whole drift of the context.

In the index attached to Father Gerard's "What was the Gunpowder Plot," I find the following reference:—

Shakespeare never alludes to the Plot, 226 note.

On turning to the footnote, printed on page 226, the author says:—

It is somewhat remarkable that the universal Shakespeare should make no allusion to the Plot, beyond the doubtful reference to equivocation in Macbeth (ii. 3). He was at the time of its occurrence in the full flow of his dramatic activity.

Yet, in face of this, Father Gerard actually is indignant because I remarked that he implied that there was no direct allusion to the Plot in the plays of Shakespeare! I see no need, therefore, to discuss the matter further, and must respectfully decline to continue the controversy which Father Gerard has raised.

I am yours faithfully,

May 14, 1901.

YOUR REVIEWER.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Father Gerard, S.J., is ingenious in his speculations. But to show they are of no value in the present case let me briefly set forward some of the reasons I have for saying that Garnett was well known by the name of "Farmer," and that an allusion to "Farmer" coupled with "Equivocation" would at once suggest to persons, say, in 1606, no one else but Father Henry Garnett, S.J.:—In the "State Trials" (Vol. II.) the name of "Farmer" as an alias of Garnett—(1) in the general indictment of the Conspirators (p. 159); (2) at Garnett's own trial in the Indictment; (3) in Sir John Croke's speech, at pp. 218, 229, and 234. This makes at least five mentions in open Court. Moreover, the name "Farmer" appears in the Proclamation for Garnett's arrest (see my "History of the Jesuits in England," p. 302). "Farmer" seems to have been a later alias, if we may credit one John Johnson, who, under examination, says he knew Garnett first as Meare, then as "Farmer" ("Calendar Dom Jac. I., 1606," p. 292). Father Gerard must bring forward some positive proof instead of curious speculations if he wishes us to believe that the name "Farmer" was not sufficiently notorious as an alias of Garnett to be understood by an audience, even if joined with "Equivocation," a subject regarded by the public mind as a specialité of the Jesuit Superior.

I am yours truly,

May 15.

ETHELRED L. TAUNTON.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Among the few ladies who have won distinction in the pursuit of archæology was Miss C. Maclagan, of Ravenscroft, Stirling, who has just died at the age of 90. Her work on "The Hill Forts, Stone Circles, and other Structural Remains of Ancient Scotland," published in 1875, was a monument of patient research; and she was also widely known for her admirable collection of rubbings of ancient sculptured monuments, which were done by a process known only to herself. To collect them she visited every parish throughout the length and breadth of Scotland and the Hebrides. The result was a marvellous series of over four hundred rubbings, which were recently presented by her to the British Museum. They form a wonderful history of Scotch monumental art, and suggest several curious ethnographical questions. They represent two great divisions or periods. The first, wherein the stones are mainly tall upright shafts, is on the east side of Scotland, and extends from the seventh century to the twelfth. The second is on the west side of the Highlands, and stretches from the twelfth or thirteenth century to the Reformation. The Early Eastern style, spread to some extent over the west, and the earliest Iona memorials are instances of it; but the second division, where the carving is chiefly of foliage and scroll-like designs on flat grave covers, never reached the east. Iona furnished Miss Maclagan with fifty-four subjects, and another large series comes from the graveyards of Argyllshire. There is one remarkable feature in the western sculptures—viz., the late date (sixteenth century) to which ornaments and designs, often supposed in England to be peculiar to pre-Norman days, lasted in the Highlands. One of the latest of Miss Maclagan's rubbings, which measures as mounted ten feet square, is the great stone of Rodill in Harris, erected by Alaster Crotach to his father, William Macleod of Dunvegan, in 1528. The chief is represented in plate armour under a canopy, the back of which is filled up with figures, while the voussours of the arch are decorated with sculptured panels. Miss Maclagan often wondered that so elaborate a piece of sculpture could have been designed and placed in such a remote corner of the Highlands. She intended at one time to bring out a volume on Scotch sepulchral art from the earliest days, but the great diversity of opinion among various eminent archæologists whom she consulted discouraged her. She followed her "Hill Forts" with a privately-printed work called "Chips from Old Stones." The best article in it is that on the Nuraghi or early stone fortress dwellings of Sardinia, to which she gave special attention as illustrating the brochs of Scotland. Some of her rubbings are shown in the present Glasgow Exhibition, in which she has also a model, constructed by herself, of an ancient broch.

The announcement that "Colloquies in Criticism," which we reviewed last week, is from the pen of Mr. H. W. Mallock reminds us that there is another book, still unclaimed, which, when it appeared in March, 1899, we ascribed, purely from internal evidence, to the same writer. This was "A Reported Change in Religion," by "Onyx," a book which attracted far less attention than it deserved and gave a most interesting study, thrown into the form of fiction, of the Roman ideal as it presents itself to different types of mind. If it be Mr. Mallock's, his reputation would certainly not suffer from being connected with a book which shows so much delicacy of insight and so broad an outlook.

Messrs. Dent announce what they believe to be the first complete edition of the works of William Hazlitt, edited by Mr. Arnold Glover and Mr. A. R. Waller, with an introduction by Mr. W. E. Henley. The edition, which will probably run to twelve volumes, will contain a series of portraits of Hazlitt.

Over the grave of Professor Max Müller in Holywell Churchyard at Oxford has just been raised a tall Celtic cross of West Country granite—close to the somewhat similar memorial which marks the grave of Dr. Price, the Master of Pembroke College. On the granite curbing is the inscription:—"Wie Gott Will." The memorial was designed by the professor's widow, and executed by Mr. Harry Hems, the Exeter sculptor who is to produce the proposed memorial to R. D. Blackmore in Exeter Cathedral.

Books on the war are still coming. First there is Sir Henry Colville's account of "The Work of the IXth Division," giving his version of Paardeberg, Sanna's Post, and the Lindley affair, and next week the same publisher (Arnold) will follow with the campaigning experiences of the Hon. Sydney Peel, the third son of Viscount Peel, in an illustrated volume entitled "Trooper 8008, I.Y." Next week, too, Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish the book on "The Canadian Contingents and Canadian Imperialism," by Mr. W. Sanford Evans. Mr. Long has a volume in preparation entitled "On the War-path: A Lady's Letters from the Front," by Mrs. J. D. Leather-Culley, with photographs.

Messrs. Putnam have another book in hand by the authoress of the "Love Letters of a Musician" (1890) and the "Later Love Letters of a Musician" (1900)—Miss Myrtle Reed. The New York Sun ventured the conjecture that these books were by Mr. Andrew Lang. We believe we are right in saying that "Myrtle Reed" is not a nom de guerre. The new book is called "The Spinster Book."

The second volume, by Mr. Walter Wood, of "British Regiments in War and Peace," to be published on the 21st inst. by Mr. Grant Richards, deals with the famous "Fighting Fifth"—the Northumberland Fusiliers, who have been gaining fresh laurels in the South African campaign.

Mr. R. Lydekker has written a book on the mammals of Europe, Western and Northern Asia, and America for Mr. Rowland Ward's series of books on the Great and Small Game of the World.

Three new volumes of verse are announced from Vigo-street—Mr. R. C. Lehmann's "Anni Fugaces: A Book of Verse, with Cambridge Interludes"; Mr. Elkin Mathews promises the volume of "Sea Verse," by Mr. Guy J. Bridges (nephew of Robert Bridges), and "Chère Reine," by Miss Catherine Phillimore—three odes on Queen Victoria.

The next volume in the Cambridge series for Schools and Training Colleges will be "A Manual of School Hygiene," by Edward W. Hope, M.D., Professor of Hygiene at University College, Liverpool, and Edgar A. Browne, F.R.C.S.E., Lecturer in Ophthalmology in the same college. The Cambridge University Press will shortly add to the Pitt Press Series Erckmann-Chatrian's "Waterloo," edited by Mr. Arthur R. Ropes.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein announce "A Short Comparative Grammar," by Professor Karl Brugmann, of Leipzig, translated by George Davis Chase, Ph.D., late Assistant-Professor of Comparative Philology at Cornell University. This work is an abridgment of Professor Brugmann's well-known "Grundriss der Vergleichenden Grammatik." The abridgment consists partly in a restriction of the number of languages considered to Indian, Greek, Italian, Germanic, and Balto-Slavic.

Messrs. Bell will publish "An Itinerary of English Cathedrals for the use of Travellers" next week (as a companion to their "Cathedral Series"), originally written by Dr. J. G. Gilchrist, of the University of Iowa, and revised by the Rev. T. Perkins, who adds a chapter on English Cathedral Architecture in general. Mr. Perkins has also written a volume in the "Cathedral Series," on Bath Abbey, Malmesbury Abbey, and Bradford-on-Avon Church. The volumes on Ely, Bristol, and Ripon in the "Cathedral Series" will all be published very shortly. "St. David's" (1s. 6d. n.) has just been added to this series. The writer is Mr. Philip A. Robson, A.R.I.B.A.; and the illustrations include architectural drawings as well as photographs.

Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode will issue shortly, under the title of "Victoria the Wise," a reprint of all the poems of the present Poet Laureate written to or of Queen Victoria.

Mr. B. T. Batsford asks us to say that the second issue of Mr. Edwin O. Sachs' "Modern Opera Houses and Theatres," promised for the opening of the Opera Season, has been unavoidably delayed by the illness of the author.

"Lena Laird," a forthcoming book by W. J. Laidlay (Sands), is described as a novel which "will appeal to all interested in the welfare of the Royal Academy."

PROBLEM No. 172, by C. Dahl, Copenhagen.—White (8 pieces)—K at K R sq, R at Q 7, bishops at K B 5 and Q 6, Kt at Q R 3, pawns at K Kt 6, Q 2, Q Kt 5. Black—King at Q 4. Mate in three.

NOTES AND NEWS.—Herr Lasker is in New York and has been fulfilling several engagements at the Manhattan Chess Club. In single-handed matches he met E. Delvar and won brilliantly a Queen's Pawn Game. He next played E. Hymes, a very tough opponent, and the result was a draw. Lasker then met Hanham and won in 31 moves. This was followed by a special exhibition at which the whole club was opposed to the champion.

Essex have recently proved very successful. The county beat Surrey by 8½ to 7½, and Norfolk by 10½ to 5½.

GAME No. LXXX.—The following played in an important Northern match presents several points of interest :—

(a) It has now become distinctive to describe this form of the opening as the Scotch Game. To be really the Gambit, the pawn must not be taken.

(b) We seldom see now what was once a favourite move in some quarters, 4.—Q-R5. Correct analysis shows it is risky. The present move is safe and sound.

(c) Taking with Kt P is better. White could get a good game by exchanging queens.

(d) Q-K2, and proceeding with further development is preferable. Black gets up a smart attack in consequence.

(e) Again bold and daring. Black, however, gets some attack and position also which he thought equivalent for his piece.

(f) Bolder than ever. The sacrifice of a second piece could have hardly been expected, and yet Black is not crushed by its loss.

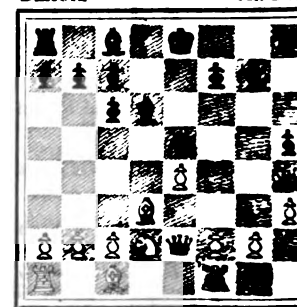

(g) This was pretty enough. Which suggests 16. P-Q7, ch. Q×P; 17. Q-B3, as being very much better.

(h) Black believes he should have drawn here by playing Q-R-Q5, instead of the move made. He certainly would have drawn had White in that case taken K R with K B, or taken E P with Q. The suggested move would have been difficult to parry in any case.

(i) After the exchanges, which are favourable to White's game, the play goes steadily on to the end-game. Still, care has to be exercised even yet to force a win.

(j) A blunder, of course. Had White been obliged to move K-K2, there was no favourable check next move. White had obtained a most favourable position, and should we think, win with it, without Black's blunder.—Notes by Mr. J. White, Leeds.

BLACK. Mr. DOD.

WHITE. Mr. WILDMAN.
White to play—move 11.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The "LITERATURE" PORTRAIT next week—the fourth of the series—will be Mr. Owen Seaman.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling has lost his case against Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons. The latter had purchased from Mr. Kipling's American publishers a small supply of the authorized editions of his books and bound them for sale, to their retail customers, with the title-pages of the original publishers. They offered to meet Mr. Kipling's wishes as far as possible; but he was advised to claim substantial damages. The Judge has now "directed a verdict in favour of the defendants."

The stir created in Ireland by the attempt to revive the Irish language—on which Mr. Justin McCarthy writes in another column—has led to great activity in book production. Scarcely a week passes without a new Gaelic work, or a new announcement of one. Even such slow-moving bodies as the Royal Irish Academy and the Society for the Preservation of the Irish Language have been caught in the whirl, and announce the early publication of works upon which they have been deliberating for years. But the Gaelic League is responsible for most of the publications. Among the minor works already published are several collections of songs and recitations in Irish, and quite a number of controversial pamphlets urging the study of Irish.

But the Publication Committee of the Gaelic League have more important works in hand. The works already published. Vol. VIII. No. 21.

lished include a story, and also two plays, by the Rev. Peter O'Leary, a distinguished Irish scholar; a romance of the Desmond Wars in the sixteenth century by the Rev. P. Dinneen, S.J., and a one-act drama by the same author called Faith and Famine. Other works by this industrious writer in the press include "Cill Ainne," a description of Killarney, and also editiones principes of the famous Munster poets Owen Roe O'Sullivan, John Clarach MacDonnell, and Geoffroy O'Donoghue of the Glens. Father Dinneen was the scholarly editor of the poems of Egan O'Rahilly for the Irish Texts Society. It is curious that while every Munster man who knows Irish, and most other Irishmen as well, know these poets in the originals or in translation, their poems have never yet been collected in book form. The Gaelic League also announces "Greann na Gaedilge," a collection of humorous Irish stories by Henry Morris, an original tale, "Tadg Goba," by J. J. Doyle, a collection of original stories by Mr. Thomas Concanon, another accomplished native writer, and a couple of volumes of Irish songs. There is thus considerable activity in Gaelic circles, and the promoters of the movement have been justified by the large circulation of their publications, which are selling by thousands. The Irish Texts Society, by the way, expects to have ready shortly the fourth volume of its Transactions, being Vol. I. of Keating's "History of Ireland," edited by David Comyn, and their Irish Dictionary is also due in the autumn.

Nero and the persecution of the Christians has long been an engrossing theme to novelists and playwrights. Sienkiewicz, Dean Farrar, and Mr. Wilson Barrett still leave the field open for the librettist and composer, and the period supplies the theme of an opera long promised by the Italian poet and composer, Arrigo Boito. Boito is, perhaps, best known in this country as the librettist of Verdi's later operas. The change of style in Verdi's later manner was largely due to his influence. But Boito has before now shown that he can compose as well as write. In his Mefistofele he attempted almost more than is possible on the musical stage. The librettist of Gounod's Faust contented himself with the episode of Marguerite. Boito attempted a condensed version of Goethe's entire poem. But the beauty of single scenes in his opera has long been acknowledged; and its many admirers will look forward to the completion of Nero.

Prefaces are generally dull, but they are sometimes necessary. Mr. Augustine Birrell achieves a notable feat in the preface which is prefixed to "Henry Broadhurst, M.P." In a preface which is wholly unnecessary he leaps at once to the front rank of preface writers; and its wit, good humour, and aptness gain rather than lose from the fact that there is really no reason at all why it should have been written. The book itself we must deal with elsewhere; but we quote a characteristic passage written apropos of the fact that Mr. Broadhurst, who has been an Under-Secretary of State, was not educated at any ancient foundation:—

Sometimes reports reach the outer world of an Eton dinner, where Prime Ministers past, present, and future sit cheek by jowl, Bishops jest agreeably with Field-M Marshals, Governors-General of India and Canada exchange confidences of a kind never likely to be published by the indiscreetest of widows, Secretaries of State, old Parliamentary hacks, palm off upon Ambassadors, past-masters in the art of polite inattention, narratives to which the House of Commons has long learnt to turn its deafest ear, and all alike gaze with boyish rapture upon each other's garters, stars, and ribbons. At the given signal they rise in their places, clink their glasses, and cry as one man, "Floreat Etona!" How hard they strive to believe that they owe it all to Eton! It is an affecting scene, even when read about in a copyright report. Gratitude to an ancient foundation of learning, be it school or college, is always pleasing, and for my part I greatly prefer Johnson's filial regard for Pembroke to Gibbon's contempt for Magdalen; though, if it were a question of rational basis, it could hardly be disputed that the historian had more reason for his contempt than the moralist for his affection.

Mr. J. D. Logan undeniably challenges criticism in writing, in the Atlantic Monthly, in praise of "American Prose Style." On the whole, and in a general way, American English, like Swiss or Belgian French, is more remarkable to the ear of the purist for its peculiarities than for its distinction; though, of course, just as some Belgians write good French, so some Americans write good English. The curious thing is that the American style is by no means at its best in the works of the Americans who seem most anxious to be stylists. Their search for the inevitable word is too obvious and laborious. You watch them fumbling for it; you are shocked at the number of quite ordinary words which they scatter (frequently in awkward patterns) over the page while they are stooping for it and turning it over to make sure that it is the word they want. Such, at all events, is the impression we too often derive from the prose style of writers like Mr. Henry James and Mr. W. D. Howells.

On the other hand, one does get a very definite and characteristic prose style in the works of certain American writers who seem to be more concerned about their matter than about their manner. We ourselves should have been disposed to cite the case of Mark Twain, though Mr. Logan does not. When, in a serious article, Mr. Mark Twain expresses respectful amazement in the metaphorical sentence "this is pie," he is at least effective; and to be effective is one of the ends of style. On the other hand, Mr. Logan finds American prose admirable when it strikes a note of "manliness," as in such documents as Lincoln's Gettysburg address. There we agree with him; but the model is hardly one to which the American prose style of the present day very frequently conforms. It is hardly too much to say that there is absolutely nothing which approaches within measurable distance of Washington Irving or Nathaniel Hawthorne.

The copy of the Second Folio Shakespeare which sold for £103 at Puttick's on the 14th illustrates a point to which we have previously referred—the growing necessity for a stricter definition of the measurements of rare books. Book-collecting is now an international matter, and our measurements in inches and fractions of inches are too rough and ready to be of any practical use where small differences in the sizes of pages may mean a large sum of money. Apart from the damp stains, which probably accounted for its low price, this Folio was a fine and large copy. Its measurements were put down in the catalogue as $13\frac{1}{4} \times 8\frac{3}{4}$ inches. But a careful measurement showed that, according to the ordinary English rule, the book should have been stated as measuring $13\frac{3}{8} \times 8\frac{7}{8}$ inches. Even this is not quite correct, for the width is hardly the figure now given. Measurements in inches are becoming less and less trusted by English collectors, to say nothing of foreign bibliophiles to whom they are unintelligible. There should be no difficulty in using the finer standard of millimètres for all exceptionally rare books whose reputations are practically universal and whose money value is so much affected by the size of their pages.

The one thoroughly interesting paper in the Twentieth Century Review is that on Verlaine by Count S. C. Soissons. It is partly critical and partly biographical, and, among other things, tells the true story of Verlaine's imprisonment in Belgium. He and Rimbaud had a scuffle in a café, and a pistol went off by accident wounding Rimbaud in the hand. The police ran in and Verlaine was arrested:—

A Belgian citizen would have been sentenced to a fortnight's imprisonment for the unlawful carrying of firearms and unprovoked use of the same. But Verlaine was a Frenchman, police records pointed him out as a member of the Commune; complaints from his father-in-law and his wife, who hated him, were aggravating circumstances, the accused was given the severest punishment, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

Apropos of the probably unique copy of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," sold a few days ago for £1,475, it was understood by many that the buyer, Mr. S. C. Cockerell, once Secretary of the Kelmseott Press, acted on behalf of a home collector—in other words, that the almost priceless little book would not leave this country. According to a credible report, however, the volume must by this time be on the other side of the Atlantic, where it will add to an already valuable collection. If this be so, it is, indeed, regrettable. Too many rare books are leaving this country, not soon, if ever, to return.

A SUNSET SONNET.

One twilight, low with clouds that hurtle by,
I lay among the wheat and barley-ears:
Their stems of steely lustre, like the spears
That bristled on the Mount of Calvary,
Gleamed fierce against a tear-disfigured sky.
An ancient wind bore down the hollowed years
Reverberate echoes of old gibes, old jeers,
Old shouts of "Crucify him, crucify!"

And lo, a sudden splendour I discerned
That spread and filled the universe entire,
The blood of saints to flecks of poppy turned,
The cruel thorns grew gold on every brier,
And through the agonizing cloud-forms burned
The glory of a martyrdom of fire.

ETHEL WHEELER.

The most notable literary portraits in the Royal Academy this year are those of Professor Skeat, of Mr. Frankfort Moore, and of Mr. Henry Arthur Jones.

A statue of Shakespeare is to be erected in Weimar, opposite Rietschl's Goethe and Schiller statue.

Much Ado About Nothing was successfully produced by the O. U. D. S. at Oxford on last Monday night. Professor Stanford's opera, Much Ado About Nothing, will probably be produced at Covent Garden next week.

Sir Courtenay Boyle, who died suddenly on Monday, was not only the author of "Hints on the Conduct of Business, Public and Private," but also a frequent contributor to the reviews, and an occasional contributor to The Times. In his earlier years he wrote verse. A poem of his, beginning

I in a lonely palace;
She in a lonely room, had a great vogue as a drawing-room song in the seventies.

It is proposed to purchase Hogarth's House at Chiswick, and preserve it as a memorial and museum of Hogarth relics. Donations should be sent to P. W. Ramsay, Esq., London and County Bank, Chiswick, or to Walter H. Whitear, Esq., Ravenscroft Park, Chiswick, the treasurer and secretary respectively of the Committee that has been formed for the purpose. At least £1,500 will be required.

The death is announced, at Brighton, of Mr. Joseph Osborne, the well-known author of "The Horse Breeder's Handbook," and a favourite contributor to the defunct Bell's Life.

The 111th annual dinner of the Royal Literary Fund took place on Friday, May 17. The Archbishop of Canterbury was in the chair, and among the men of letters present were the Earl of Crewe, Mr. Gilbert Parker, Mr. W. J. Courthope, Mr. Sidney Lee, Mr. Kinloch Cooke, and Canon Ainger.

The Lord Chancellor took the chair at the thirty-eighth anniversary banquet of the Newspaper Press Fund on Saturday, and deplored the manners and customs of the journals which publish "defamatory gossip" in place of "real discussion."

We are glad to notice that Mr. H. K. Longman, of Trinity, Cambridge, who left Eton with so high a cricketing reputation, made the highest score in the Cambridge Freshmen's match last Saturday. He is following in the footsteps of his father, Mr. G. H. Longman, who was captain of the Cambridge Eleven in 1875.

Another cricketer who distinguished himself on Saturday was Dr. A. Conan Doyle, who played a not-out innings of 32 for the M.C.C. against Leicestershire.

Maxim Gorki, the well-known Russian writer, mentioned last week in our Paris letter, has been arrested as a revolutionist.

The Rappel learns that Count Tolstoy is suffering from intermittent fever. The Imperial Government has ordered all telegrams addressed to the distinguished novelist to be intercepted.

We are shortly to have "Tales from Tolstoy," by Mr. Nisbet Bain.

At the anniversary meeting of the Royal Geographical Society on Monday the Royal medals for the encouragement of geographical discovery and research were awarded to the Duke of the Abruzzi, and Dr. A. Donaldson Smith, the explorer of the country between Lake Rudolf and the Upper Nile.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie's gift of £100,000 to establish branch libraries throughout the City of Glasgow is eclipsed by the magnificent donation of £2,000,000 to form a fund to pay the fees of any Scotch student at any Scottish University.

Mr. Edmund Gosse has been made a Knight of the Norwegian Order of Saint Olaf, first class.

The balance-sheet of M. Yves Guyot's paper, Le Siècle, shows that the additional expenses entailed by the Dreyfus campaign amounted to no less than £12,000.

We are sorry to hear that M. Sully-Prudhomme is dangerously ill, and that some anxiety is caused by the health of Dr. Ibsen.

Mr. J. M. Barrie is at work on a new novel, which may be published in the autumn.

Mr. Wirt Gerare is travelling to Siberia on behalf of a syndicate of newspapers. The book which he will write on his return will be published by Mr. Heinemann.

The Wallace Collection will for the future be open to the public on the two paying days, Tuesday and Friday, at 10 instead of 11.

Paris has lately been, and perhaps is still, excited by a rumour that the Figaro has been sold to a German syndicate.

The story was not very credible, and is, in fact, contradicted in the columns of that paper; "Figaro," the action attributed to the proprietors of the Figaro would have been, in fact, the one inconsistency that would really be inconsistent with its character and antecedents. The Figaro, in truth, is notorious even in Paris for the alacrity with which it has changed its course to catch the shifting winds of public favour. It has been, at different times, a scurrilous paper and a respectable family journal. It has been for and against the Empire, for and against the Royalists, for and against the Republic, for and against M. Zola, and for and against Captain Dreyfus. Only people who keep diaries or have exceptionally retentive memories recollect exactly how many times the Figaro has changed sides. But with all its vagaries and volte-faces it has kept true to certain practices and traditions. Whether genially or offensively—and it can be very offensive as well as very genial—it has always held up the mirror to the boulevards, and remained not only characteristically French, but characteristically Parisian. Germans—and indeed German Jews—have sometimes been among its most popular contributors; but they have posed as good Parisians—some of them, like Jacques St. Cère, under assumed names—when writing for its columns. There could be no stronger proof of the permanence of the influence which a great editor—and this de Villemessant was—can exercise. De Villemessant was certainly the greatest journalist that France has ever known, and one of the greatest in the history of journalism. He had no other great qualities except those of the journalist; but he had those in a supreme degree. He was illiterate, quarrelsome, unscrupulous; but he knew what the public wanted, and he knew how to procure it. As an American would put it, he "sized up" the boulevardiers. He perceived that they did not want to be lectured or instructed, but to be entertained; that a scandal in Paris was more to them than a revolution in any foreign country; that their crying need was for a journal that should reflect the brilliant sparkle of the conversations in the cafés. The execution of this idea required, of course, quite other talents than those necessary for its conception; but de Villemessant possessed both sets of talents. He had a marvellous power of judging men, a marvellous skill in getting their best work out of them, and a merciless alacrity in getting rid of them as soon as their usefulness to him was exhausted. His theory was that every man had one good article dans le ventre, and his object was to get that article for the Figaro. There is a story to the effect that he once put pens, ink, and paper in front of his chimney-sweep and bade him write, and that the chimney-sweep's one article was satisfactory both to the editor and to his readers. On the other hand, he never spared the feelings of a dull writer, however high his reputation stood. Alphonse Daudet happened to be present at the dismissal of Paul d'Ivoy, who had been induced to leave the Courrier de Paris for the Figaro, but had failed to fulfil his editor's expectations. The poor man was dismissed without notice in the presence of the staff; and he referred de Villemessant to his agreement. "Your agreement? Go to law about it if you like," was the truculent reply. "I will have your articles read in Court, and we will see if any agreement can compel me to print such nonsense in my columns." It was not an amiable manner of doing business, but it was the manner of a man who knew his mind; and it was because de Villemessant knew his mind, and insisted on having his own way with something more than the severity of a drill-sergeant, that he was able to make the Figaro what it became and has remained in spite of all its see-saws of policy—the most distinctively Parisian journal in Paris. It would be a pity for such a journal to pass into the hands of proprietors unaffected by, if not actually ignorant of, its traditions. We could hardly bring ourselves to wish it, even if one of the visible consequences of the change were to be the adoption of a less carping tone towards ourselves; and there certainly is nothing to indicate that that is a part of the programme.

Literature Portraits.—III.

HENRY RIDER HAGGARD.

Once, upon a time when we were some of us younger, it was the fashion to go to Mr. Rider Haggard to be thrilled. As there is even now a large number of people who are young Mr. Haggard is still read with avidity. But we are thinking of the great days; "King Solomon's Mines," "She," and the rest were in brisk circulation at the libraries, and the fame of a man was being made on quires and quires of paper and in journals and other places where they sing the praises of those who, to glide back into a phrase outworn, have "arrived." For a brief but clearly articulate moment there was one literary god, and Mr. Lang was his prophet. Fame was followed by fortune, and the rest has been anything but silence. The list of his books, between twenty and thirty of them, is known everywhere, it reaches from "Cetewayo" to "Lysbeth"—the latest and one of the best of his novels, which shows that agricultural statistics have but heightened his historical imagination and his talent for story-telling. His name is now familiar as a household word. But the critical coterie having made his reputation handed him over to an eager and enthusiastic public and lightly turned its thoughts to newer comers. The general reader, however, is more faithful than those who try to lead his taste. Mr. Haggard's enormous band of admirers never ceased to enjoy and to buy even when some of his least valuable work was being published.

While those writings of his which may justly be considered history, such as "Cetewayo" and his White Neighbours, are exactly convincing, many of his novels make the heaviest demands upon the credulity of his readers. They appeal to the gay and unthinking more than to those who take their fiction seriously, who are fain to struggle with problems or who will only welcome a new sociological philosophy stated in epigram. These are complications of the art of novel writing which will be looked for in vain in the work of the author of "King Solomon's Mines." The idea of writing this book was, indeed, he has told us, suggested by an article on boys' books which turned his mind in that direction. With a marked gift for story-telling, a fluency and straightforwardness many greater men lack, Mr. Haggard has not perhaps precisely what is implied in the Ben Jonsonian phrase "a lettered mind." He is rather too much a man of action for that. Although he is, to a rash public, the type of a popular, successful, widely-read writer, he is not, to judge him of course only by his published books, in the strictest sense as was Stevenson, a literary man.

Among his non-ephemeral work, "Jess" reminds one that Mr. Haggard knows the Boer-land intimately and was an early adventurer in the continent of lost reputations. In 1875, at about 20 years of age, he was Secretary to Sir Henry Bulwer, Governor of Natal, and he was also on the staff of Sir Theophilus Shepstone. While with Sir Theophilus, Mr. Haggard committed what one suspects of being his only real literary indiscretion. An article entitled "A Visit to the Chief Secoconi" was printed in England and reached South Africa, signed with the initials H. R. H., shortly after the first annexation of the Transvaal. The Boer at home was described with anything but diplomatic tact, and the Dutch women were not praised—the history of "Lysbeth" was not known to Mr. Haggard then—and altogether the article made very bad reading for the Transvaalers who had many opportunities of seeing it in the Afrikaner papers wherein it was freely quoted. There was a stormy meeting of Boers in Pretoria, and Mr. Haggard's article was very nearly being the cause of war. When Sir Bartle Frere arrived in South Africa the young diplomatist had to explain, and he excused himself by saying that he had set down nothing but the truth. According to his own account, he soon learnt that therein lay his offence. Since those days, to the passer-by, Mr. Haggard's victories would appear to have come easily enough, but he has once confided to an ever-sympathetic public something of early struggles with publishers and of dark laborious hours, although we have heard nothing from him of the heart-breaking hunt for the mot juste in which so many engage. Although his course appears to have been one of fairly constant fortune, there has been a hint or two from him that if all is not vanity, yet there is much vexation of the spirit in the pursuit of literary fame. In a very characteristic and interesting little memoir prefacing an edition of his mother's work, "Life and its Author," he speaks of that lady's disappointment in not being able to devote herself to literature, and asks whether this lack of opportunity was not a blessing in disguise. "Some," he adds, "who have experience of the rough paths leading to any kind of literary success worth winning may entertain their own opinions on the subject." The point of view is characteristic of Mr. Haggard. The reticency of the typical cultured Englishman is over all he has done. There are writers in whom the pursuit of literary honours has broken down this hard reserve, but with Mr. Haggard it is otherwise. He will write you a dashing, entertaining, external romance if he can, but he will not publish love letters from a manor house nor analyse the less obvious emotions of his soul for your amusement. Thus, with a high sense of his art, he writes for a wide and general public the books which come and conquer and pass. But it would seem that Mr. Haggard does not wish to gain the whole world. He is quite content with his readers, from whom a certain modesty and humour prevent him from asking too much. A young lady was once a visitor at his house, and—seeing the book lying on the table—said, "Oh, have you read 'Dawn'? It is a first-rate novel; I have just finished it." "Somebody explained," Mr. Haggard remarked when he told the story, "and the subject dropped, but I was not a little gratified by this unintended compliment." That was a long time ago, and many have been the compliments, with and without intention, that have come to him; but to please a young lady, a visitor at a country house, has been, one fancies, an ideal he has never permitted to escape him. During the heyday of his popularity he had, however, written one book which I believe will live. "Jess," apart from a certain topical interest which is, no doubt, selling it at the present time, has inherent the essential qualities of art. When the coterie of fame makers had done their work they began to think that Mr. Haggard with all his gifts was not a great artist. Was it not "J. K. S." who was among the first to hint that the author of "Allan's Wife" and "Mr. Meeson's Will" could be wearisome? Every one will recall the phrase linking him with Mr. Kipling which soon passed into (news) paper currency and became too tattered and worn for quotation.

His many official and other experiences in South Africa have been used, but not greatly used, in his fiction; he was "full summ'd to tell of deeds above heroic," and the note of actual life is a little hampering when such is the case. In the early days we read much about the imaginative wonders of "She," and now that we find its author writing of country life in agricultural England we can appreciate that quality at its true value. The inviolate laws of free trade make a farmer's year a little difficult. But Mr. Haggard knows how to make its history seem agreeable and tempt us back to the land. It has been hinted, I think unfairly, that he does not labour under the disadvantage of knowing too much about the subject—he certainly does not labour under the still greater disadvantage of knowing nothing about anything else. It is often what he knows about something else that makes him interesting—in his letters to the Press on the subject of farming as well as in other matters. Even when subsoils appear to fill his whole heart he can turn aside to admire the landscape. Mr. Haggard is fortunately many sided. He is a sportsman who is a member of the Athenæum; a novelist who has joined the Sports; a farmer who is to be found at the Savile, and a Justice of the Peace who may occasionally be seen at the Authors' Society, and has been Chairman of its Committee. He knows better than most men how he will appear in the eye of posterity, for he has been made into an admirable picture—with gun and cloak—by

Mr. Maurice Greiffenhagen, who illustrated "Jess" some years ago. As a writer of fiction his rapid fame has settled into a tradition; as a guide and philosophic friend to farming there is no novelist with whom I would sooner go—

. . . . to bind the sheaves;
Or, if the earlier season lead,
To the tann'd haycock in the mead.

E. M.

Mr. Rider Haggard, like Mr. Anthony Hope, was not an immediate success as a novelist. Nor was it a work of fiction that first bore his name on its title-page, for "Cetewayo and his White Neighbours," which made its appearance in 1882, was a semi-political book on South African affairs, and included his views on the Transvaal rebellion. The Boers had just been given back their independence, and Mr. Rider Haggard—one of the few survivors of the original handful of men who hoisted the Union Flag on the annexation of the Transvaal—had given up his South African property in disgust at the turn which matters had taken. "Cetewayo and his White Neighbours" was the first thing he wrote on his return to England, but no publisher would look at it until Messrs. Trübner took it up, and offered to bring it out on the half-profit system, on the condition that the author paid £50 down towards the cost of production. It was some years before that £50 found its way back to Mr. Haggard's pocket, but the sum must have proved a fairly good investment in the long run, as the book pleased the Cape politicians, and eventually worked its way into a revised and cheaper edition. Portions of the work were reprinted in Mr. Haggard's shilling story "The Last Boer War," which Messrs. Kegan Paul published in 1890, when the South African crisis again became acute. The late Mr. Trübner seems to have behaved extremely well to Mr. Haggard in his early literary days, encouraging him to write a novel, and promising to get it published for him, though Mr. Trübner's firm did not deal in fiction. Even Mr. Trübner, however, found it no easy matter to find a publisher for "Dawn"; his publishing friends would have nothing to do with it as it stood. Mr. Trübner, with sturdy faith in his author's ability, submitted the manuscript to Mr. John Cordy Jeaffreson for report. The late Mr. Jeaffreson sent a kindly note of criticism, favourable on the whole, but advising the entire revision of the story and the substitution of a happy ending for the melancholy fate which the author had mapped out for his heroine. The advice was taken to heart; the book was re-written, and "Dawn," in its new shape, was at once accepted by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett and published by them in three volumes in 1884. "The Witch's Head," Mr. Haggard's second novel, was published by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett in three volumes in the same year, and soon went out of print. But it was not a large edition, and the publishers did not care to run the risk of re-issuing the tale in one volume form. "Then it was," the author tells us in his story of "My First Book" in the volume of literary reminiscences published under that title by Messrs. Chatto and Windus:—

I came to the conclusion that I would abandon the making of books. The work was very hard, and when put to the test of experience the glamour that surrounds this occupation vanished. I did not care much for the publicity involved, and, like most young authors, I failed to appreciate being sneered at by anonymous critics who happened not to care for what I wrote, and whom I had no opportunity of answering. It is true that then, as now, I liked the work for its own sake. Indeed, I have always thought that literature would be a charming profession if its conditions allowed of the depositing of manuscripts when completed in a drawer, there to languish in obscurity, or of their private publication only. But I could not afford myself these luxuries. I was too modest to hope for any renown worth having, and for the rest the game seemed hardly worth the candle. I had published a history and two novels. On the history I had lost fifty pounds, on the first novel I had made ten pounds, and on the second fifty; net profit on the three ten pounds, which in the case of a man with other occupations and duties did not appear to be an adequate return for the labour involved.

But chance at that moment led him to read a timely article in favour of boy's books, and it occurred to Mr. Haggard that he might at least do as well as others in that profitable branch of literature. This was the turning point in his literary career. He wrote "King Solomon's Mines," and the immediate and remarkable popularity of that romance brought him to the front with a bound. Yet Mr. Haggard assures us that three firms, including his own publishers, refused even to consider the book, and it was left to Cassell's to make the lucky venture in 1885. They sold about 100,000 copies within the first five years, and it still sells steadily in its new and revised three-and-sixpenny form, besides going through an enormous sixpenny edition. The natural result of this success was to send up the circulation of "Dawn" and "The Witch's Head," and both books, in various new editions, passed first from Messrs. Hurst and Blackett to Mr. Spencer Blackett and thence to Messrs. J. and R. Maxwell, eventually finding safe anchorage with Messrs. Longmans, who, with one or two exceptions, now publish all Mr. Haggard's works. Before they became his recognized publishers, however, Mr. Spencer Blackett (now manager for Messrs. Kegan Paul) had published two new volumes by Mr. Haggard—"Mr. Meeson's Will" and "Allan's Wife and other Tales"—but these, after a certain amount of wandering on the part of "Allan's Wife," also came to seek shelter under the sign of "The Ship" in Paternoster-row. "The Wizard" appeared as Arrowsmith's Christmas Annual, 1896. "Jess" is published by Messrs. Smith, Elder, and it has gone through many editions since they first brought it out in 1887. As a sixpenny book—published by Messrs. Newnes by arrangement with Messrs. Smith, Elder—it has proved one of the most popular of the paper-covered editions on the market, and the outbreak of the present war sent up the sales of the book in both forms. It was in 1887, when they brought out "She," that Messrs. Longmans began their direct connexion with Mr. Haggard, and now they have a list of twenty novels under his name. "She" was dedicated to Mr. Andrew Lang, and went remarkably well. It appeared in a new and revised edition in 1896, and has also been a great success as a sixpenny novel, Messrs. Newnes bringing it out in that form by arrangement with Messrs. Longmans. The remaining works published by Longmans are—"Allan Quatermain," 1888; "Maiwa's Revenge," 1888; "Colonel Quaritch, V.C.," 1888; "Cleopatra," 1889; "Beatrice," 1890; "Eric Brighteyes," 1891; "Nada the Lily," 1892; "Montezuma's Daughter," 1894; "The People of the Mist," 1894; "Joan Haste," 1895; "Heart of the World," 1895; "Dr. Thorne," 1898; "Swallow: A Tale of the Great Trek," 1899; "Black Heart and White Heart, and other Stories," 1900; and "Lysbeth: A Tale of the Dutch," 1901. Ten years ago they also published "The World's Desire," which Mr. Haggard wrote in collaboration with Mr. Andrew Lang, and which went to a new edition in 1894. The demand for "Lysbeth," which has been one of the most successful novels of the present season, shows that Mr. Haggard has lost little of his old popularity. It is interesting to learn, too, that his commonplace book for 1898, "A Farmer's Year," still has a ready sale, and has, indeed, become a standard book on the subject. As a landowner and farmer Mr. Haggard cultivates some 370 acres in the Waveney Valley, which divides Norfolk from Suffolk, and at the present moment, as most people are doubtless aware, he is giving the results of his inquiries into the agricultural conditions of different parts of England in a series of contributions to the Daily Express under the title of "Back to the Land." These will probably appear subsequently in book form. Straying into yet another path of literature, Mr. Haggard has lately been embodying the experiences of a tour in Palestine—interwoven with the records of mediæval pilgrims to the Holy Land—in a serial which has been appearing in the Queen, and will be published by Messrs. Longmans in the autumn. The new work is called "A Winter Pilgrimage." Next month Mr. Haggard is to preside at a dinner of the New Vagabonds' Club, when the Bishop of London—like his predecessor Dr. Creighton in 1899—will be the guest of the evening.

Mrs. Humphry Ward was the guest of the evening at the ladies' dinner given at the Hotel Cecil on Saturday by the Authors' Club. Dr. Conan Doyle presided, and the members and guests present included Sir Rennell Rodd, Lady Rodd, and Miss Rodd, Mr. Henniker Heaton, M.P., Dr. Romesh Dutt, Mr. and Mrs. Frankfort Moore, Mr. Morley Roberts, Mr. C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne, Mr. Poulteney Bigelow, Mr. F. T. Bullen, and many others. Mrs. Ward, in replying to the toast of "The Ladies," proposed by Dr. Doyle, made an interesting defence for the novel with a purpose.

The pension dinner of the London Association of Correctors of the Press, postponed on account of the Monmouth election, will be held on June 15, at the Hotel Cecil. Those who wish to attend are requested to communicate with the Secretary at 33, Chancery-lane.

REVIVAL OF IRISH LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

A "Personal View"

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

It has not been in my power to lend any help towards the effort which so many of my countrymen are now making to promote something like a revival of Irish literature and the Irish language. Indeed, I have to confess that I am one of the many Irishmen engaged in literary occupations who cannot speak or read the language of Ireland, and who know only at second hand anything about Irish literature. But I have always from my very early days felt an interest in the subject, and have long been hopeful that some such effort might be made as that which appears to have been taking of late an organized form. During my boyhood the influence of Thomas Davis, Charles Gavan Duffy, Clarence Mangan, and many others brought a stirring among the minds of the young men whom I knew for a study of genuine Irish literature, just as some of the poems of Thomas Moore had done for an earlier generation. Owing to many causes nothing very definite or practical came of the impulse just then, but I think its influence never wholly faded since that time, and may be said to have found new expression in the more direct and determined organization of the present day. I suppose it will hardly be denied by any one now that Ireland has a national literature which belongs directly to her history, her traditions, her soil, and her atmosphere, and owes nothing of its growth to the influence of the Anglo-Saxon race.

It is no part of my purpose to enter into any consideration of the various causes which during so many generations and even centuries combined to bring about the almost total neglect and for a time the actual suppression of Ireland's ancient literature. We have now arrived at a period of the world's history when the Anglo-Saxon himself may be expected to feel a genuine interest in every effort to bring into the light of day the buried treasures of Irish poetry, romance, and history. The most casual stranger visiting Ireland, if only he have a mind and heart open to artistic impression, must see in the ruined castles and abbeys which meet his eye everywhere throughout the island, must hear in the legends and stories which cannot but reach him on his way, must find in the mountains, the lakes, and the rivers, must feel in the very atmosphere of the island evidences enough that he is passing through a country which must have had a literature distinctively its own. If he looks for evidence of a more literal and practical order he can find it amply and even lavishly set forth in the priceless literary records which for all that has come and gone are still preserved in the Irish capital. Now I venture to think that there is no living Englishman of intelligence—Mr. Podsnap I believe has been dead this some time—who would not welcome any effort towards a revival of the study of that long neglected literature. So far as Irishmen are concerned I think it is little short of a disgrace to most of us that we should have found time and opportunity, or should have time and opportunity found for us and forced upon us, to study the ancient literature of so many other countries to the total neglect of our own. Most of us are fairly well acquainted with the stories which Homer has to tell us, with the plots and personages of the great Greek dramas, with the Thousand and One Nights, with the Nibelung legend, with the companionships of King Arthur's Round Table, and with Roland and Oliver, and we know nothing except what a few words from Moore or from Mangan may suggest to us about the early poetry, romance, and legends of our own country.

The late Lord Russell of Killowen, in a speech made not long before his too early death, deprecated the idea of any serious attempt towards the restoration of the Irish language. His argument seemed to be that any effort to make the Irish language a common mode of speech among Irishmen of the present day would be a wholly unnecessary, even if it would not be a wholly impossible, task. Now I think the most enthusiastic Irish Nationalist would hardly set himself to deny that in the English language, which we can most of us speak with tolerable fluency and accuracy, we have an instrument for the expression of our thoughts which can put them into adequate words no matter how far-reaching our imagination or how precise our scientific purpose. Mr. Goldwin Smith had at one time an idea that the scientific men of the civilized world might sooner or later agree to make classic Greek their common language for the sake of the greater precision it would afford them in the expression of their ideas. For most of us, however, I am willing to admit that the English language will quite enable us to express to each other all that we want to say, and that the revival of the Irish language for this purpose alone is not a necessary condition to our progress in civilization. But I am decidedly for the teaching of the Irish language as part of an Irishman's education, and that being done or agreed upon I am willing to let the future take care of itself. I cannot see any disadvantage whatever in making the young Irishman of the coming generations a person who starts in life with two languages to carry him on. It is almost as easy to teach a child two languages as to teach him one, and we have most of us travelled in foreign or at least in parts of foreign countries where the speaking of two tongues was almost a necessary condition of ordinary existence. I cannot regard it as an objectionable burden to impose on my countrymen of the coming generations, if they were set to learn English and Irish from the very beginning of their education; and I very much wish that such burden had been imposed upon me when I was beginning to learn the names of the animated and inanimate objects around me.

For the present, however, I am mainly interested in that part of the movement which has for its object a general revival of the study of Irish literature. I have read with great satisfaction the letter lately addressed by a patriotic Irishman and a distinguished soldier, Sir William Butler, to one of the local divisions of the Gaelic League in which he describes the work of the League as "a truly noble labour." "You are opening," Sir William Butler goes on to say, "the long-choked springs of a pure and beautiful knowledge, and by offering to a national mind, which has always been hungry to learn the revived art, music and literature of its own, you are raising the surest barrier against the depraving influence—I might say the soul-destroying poison—of the modern bookstall." I may be allowed to indulge in the fond hope that the modern bookstall is not quite such a store of poison as Sir William Butler describes it, for I have many highly esteemed friends, men and women, whose works are to be found at every railway station and in every circulating library, and I cannot help believing that the reading of their books has done much good for most of us. But I can cordially agree with Sir William Butler in believing that we all want other literature besides that which even the best selected of modern bookstalls can supply, and I am convinced that Irishmen and Irishwomen could hardly be better occupied than in looking back through the waves of time for the long faded glories of literature they cover.

I am not considering the whole question from the point of view which is proper to the antiquarian or the linguist or even the general scholar. [My wish would rather be to impress upon ordinary readers, like myself, that the long lost treasure caves of Irish literature contain wonders of romance and legend and poetry which would open to every intelligent mind new visions of beauty, idealism, and imagination. I may own that I am sometimes filled with a feeling of wonder and of regret when I think of the manner in which the ordinary English reader, even of the intelligent class, goes along through life with an almost absolute ignorance and indifference to some of the noblest treasures of his own literature. I am well acquainted with large numbers of Englishmen and Englishwomen, supposed to be adequately educated and always in the habit of reading books, who have never taken the slightest interest in some of the greatest poems and dramas the genius of England has yet produced. Every one we meet knows something of Shakespeare because we all go to see certain of his plays enacted now and then at a theatre, and so we are led to talk about him and perhaps even to think about him, but I wonder what proportion of the cultivated audience who attend the first night of a Shakespearian performance at the Lyceum have any personal reason for knowing that in the dramas of the Shakespearian age, apart from Shakespeare's own plays, England has a dramatic literature probably superior to that of any other country in the world if we leave out the country and the age of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides.

It is no part of my task, however, to recommend a movement for the revival in England of some great forgotten English dramatists and poets; I am only concerned with the Gaelic revival which is going on in my own country and among true lovers of literature here as well as there. I feel satisfied that any Englishman who pays attention to the subject, and who makes himself acquainted even through the medium of translation with some of the works of genuine literary art bequeathed to us by the Irish language, will feel and will admit that he has gained something of unspeakable worth by the discovery. England, too, still owes a heavy debt to Ireland, quite apart from any question of political legislation, for the manner in which during centuries she may be said to have banned and excommunicated every effort to keep alive the memories of that which had been for so long a time a living literature in Ireland. The Gaelic literature has peculiarities, qualities, and charms which are not to be found in the literature of any other race. Study the classical works of Greece and Rome, of the Eastern world so far as we know anything about its classics, of England, of France, of Germany, and you will have left much undiscovered and untouched which you would not willingly miss if you have neglected to learn something about the classics of native Irish literature. If the Gaelic League can thoroughly arouse us all to a sense of what we have lost and are losing by our indifference to what the Irish language has done for us, we shall all find that a new world of wonder has opened upon us of whose existence we had not in our former days the slightest conception. So far as Ireland is concerned I do not think it is by any means too much to expect that those of the coming generations who have intelligence and taste enough to make themselves acquainted with the literature of England, France, and Germany will as a matter of course make themselves acquainted with the literature of their own country as well. Irishmen are as a rule rather quick at the learning of languages, and there must be something in the genius and construction of the language belonging to one's own native country which ought to help him to a more easy mastery of it than if it were some absolutely foreign tongue. Whether Irish is ever to become a familiarly spoken language in Ireland I do not venture to say, but I think the Irish revival movement will have accomplished a splendid success if it only succeeds in making intelligent Irishmen and Irishwomen as well acquainted with the romance and the poetry of the language which was once the living tongue of their own country as they are now expected to be with the romance and the poetry of England, France, and Germany. Better to know it by translation than not to know it at all; better, much better still, to read it through the medium of its own language; best of all for those who educate themselves to read and to speak the language of their own people.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE CENTENARY.

SOME LITERARY ASSOCIATIONS.

"If Cæsar were to re-appear on earth," said Sydney Smith facetiously, "Wettenhall's List would be more important than his Commentaries; Rothschild would open and shut the Temple of Janus; Thomas Baring would probably command the Tenth Legion; and the soldiers would march to battle with loud cries of Scrip and Omnium Reduced, Consols and Cæsar." Money is perhaps even more potent to-day than when the writer of these words "grew old merrily" in the Rectory of Combe-Florey. During the century that has passed since William Hammond on May 18, 1801, laid the foundation-stone of the first building in London devoted exclusively to "the transaction of business in the public funds," the telegraph wire and the daily newspapers, have served to enhance a thousand fold in the esteem of two-thirds of the populace the importance of Stock Exchange incidents. The Royal Exchange, so proclaimed by herald when Queen Elizabeth opened the original building in January, 1571, has long ceased to be "the eye of London." The Stock Exchange, known among brokers as "the House"—regardless of the Parliamentary claims of St. Stephen's, and the academic claims of Christchurch—has become, so to say, the annexe of ten thousand homes all over the country; an annexe whither more or less frequently men fare to experience the intoxication inseparable from the endless movements of the money market. Within half a mile of Capel Court the nerves of the civilized world converge; and, just as the telegraph wires pour out their fateful messages in St. Martin's-le-Grand, where once stood a collegiate church and sanctuary, so daily and hourly do the hopes and fears of a million folk centre in that little world, bounded by Broad-street and Throgmorton-street, a stone's throw from the garden fleched from the father of John Stowe by Sir Thomas Cromwell.

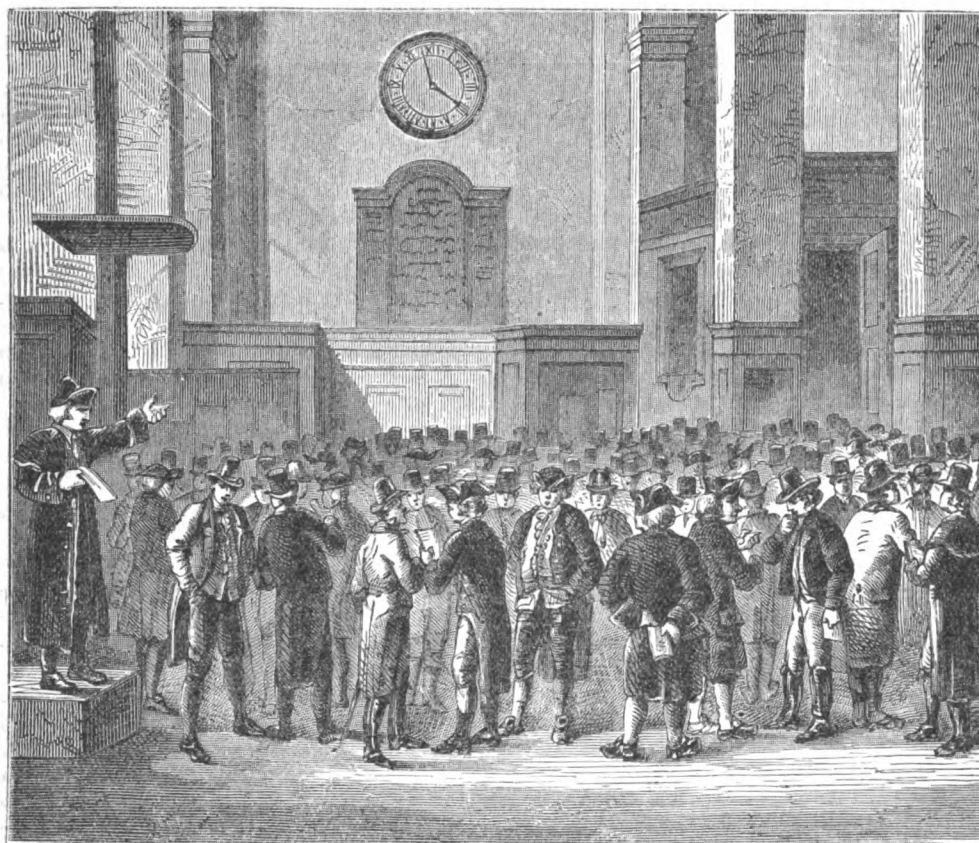

Last Saturday the Stock Exchange celebrated the centenary of the laying of the first stone in Capel Court; but though as a corporate body it dates only from the beginning of the nineteenth century, the conditions of which it is the outcome are traceable to a much earlier period. Till 1698 dealers and jobbers in the share market were wont to meet in the Royal Exchange. Here met the grave Fleming in fur-trimmed coat, the Venetian in long and sumptuous robe, the vivacious Frenchman, the sun-tanned Italian, the Turk in fez. The majority were intent upon bartering merchandise; the few, remembering the fabulous sums gained and lost in the tulip mania which swept over Holland in 1634, desired to grow rich in swifter fashion. At this time the broker had his walk upon the Royal Exchange, where took place transactions in the funds of the East India and other great corporations. Complaints became frequent that the Royal Exchange was being used for other than its legitimate purposes, and in 1698 the dealers determined to move to 'Change Alley, then a relatively unfrequented space. A contemporary pamphleteer has left this word-picture:—

The centre of jobbing is in the kingdom of 'Change

Alley and its adjacencies. The limits are easily surrounded in about a minute and a-half. Stepping out of Jonathan's into the Alley, you turn your face full south; moving on a few paces, and turning due east, you advance to Garraway's; from thence, going out at the other door, you go on still east into Birchin-lane; and then, halting a little at the Sword Blade Bank, you immediately face to the north, enter Cornhill, visit two or three petty provinces there on your way to the west; and thus having boxed your compass, and sailed round the stock-jobbing globe, you turn into Jonathan's again.

Gay, in his "Trivia," gives us one of many descriptions of the City at about this time:—

The tricking gamester insolently rides
With loves and graces on his chariot sides;
In saucy state the grasping broker sits,
And laughs at honesty and trudging wits.

ON 'CHANGE.

[From an Old Print, about 1800. The Figures by Rowlandson; Architecture by Nash.]

For long, besides the Alley itself, the two famous coffee-houses already named were haunted by speculators. The name of Garraway's survived till 1866. Its founder was believed to be the first retailer of tea in this country, and his shop bill, printed in Ellis' Letters, begins by saying that "tea, in England, hath been sold in the leaf for six pounds, and sometimes for ten pounds the pound weight, and in respect of its former scarceness and dearness it has been only used as a regalia in high treatments and entertainments." But Garraway purchased a quantity of tea, and made the beverage—

According to the directions of the most knowing merchants and travellers in those Eastern countries . . . and very many noblemen, physicians, merchants, and gentlemen of quality have ever since sent to him for the said leaf, and daily resorted to his house in Exchange Alley, aforesaid, to drink the drink thereof; and to the end that all persons of eminence and quality, gentlemen and others, who have occasion for tea in leaf, may be supplied, these are to give notice, that the said Thomas Garway hath tea to sell from sixteen to fifty shillings the pound.

Defoe mentions Garraway's as the resort about noon of "people of quality." As to Jonathan's, "the general mart for stock jobbers," as it is described in the Tatler, No. 38, it has many literary associations. In Addison's brief survey of "My Own History," the Spectator, No. 1, he says:—

I have been taken for a merchant upon the Exchange for above these ten years, and sometimes pass for a Jew in the assembly of stock jobbers at Jonathan's. In short, wherever I see a cluster of people, I always mix with them, though I never open my lips but in my own club. Thus I live in the world rather as a Spectator of mankind than as one of the species.

Again, one of the scenes in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy, A Bold Stroke for a Wife, produced at Drury Lane Theatre in 1718, is laid in Jonathan's, where, amid the hubbub of stock brokers' talk, serving boys cry "Fresh coffee, gentlemen—fresh coffee! Bohea tea, gentlemen." Three decades later Smollett deplored that his satire had not . . . yet supplied a scourge

For the vile tribe of usurers and bites

Who sneak at Jonathan's and swear at White's.

Allusion cannot here be made to a hundred exciting incidents in the history of 'Change Alley; to the thousand ruses, successful and unsuccessful, resorted to by financiers and the stock-jobbing fraternity; how, during the struggle between the old and the new East India Companies, Boroughs were sold almost as freely as lottery tickets; how Thomas Guy, founder of the great Hospital, amassed half a million sterling, in large part by buying from sailors, at greatly reduced rates, the paper money which they were compelled to accept as wages. Apropos of the notorious "Charitable Corporation," whose cashier decamped in the first quarter of the eighteenth century, Fielding in his farce The Lottery makes Mr. Stocks say, in answer to a question of Chloe, that the Corporation "is, Madam, a method invented by some very wise men, by which the rich may be charitable to the poor, and be money in pocket by it." The events of 1720, when 'Change Alley became a veritable cock-pit, cannot be passed without notice. In 1711 the South Sea Scheme was originated by Harley, Earl of Oxford, with a view to the extinction of the National Debt, which at that time amounted to £10,000,000. Nine years thereafter, having in 1717 advanced to the Government a sum of £5,000,000, the Corporation offered to become responsible for the whole public debt of something like £30,000,000; and, despite the protests of Walpole, this scheme was sanctioned by Parliament. Up to this point the project had been honestly, if mistakenly, promoted; but now any and every method was adopted to advance the price of the stock. Every one, from the Prince of Wales to the penurious cleric, speculated, and the cry was

'Get money, money still,
And then let virtue follow, if she will.'
This, this the saving doctrine preached to all,
From low St. James' up to high St. Paul;
From him whose quill stands quivered at his ear,
To him who knotches sticks at Westminster.

Sir Isaac Newton, then in his 68th year, almost alone among men of letters, was not drawn into the vortex. Asked as to the issue of the people's infatuation, he said he "could calculate the motions of erratic bodies, but not the madness of a multitude." The elder Scraggs gave John Gay £1,000 South Sea Stock, and inasmuch as he is said to have received £1,000 for his "Poems," published in 1720, it is all but certain that he purchased on his own account as well. At one time Gay's gains amounted to £20,000. Swift and Pope recommended him to buy a comfortable annuity with the money; Erasmus Lewis to invest it in the funds and live on the interest; Dr. Arbuthnot to trust to Providence and live on the principal. Arbuthnot sold his South Sea Stock too late, but philosophically comforted himself for the loss of £2,000 by saying that this would cause him only to ascend two thousand more pairs of stairs. Gay refused even to make "sure of a clean shirt and a shoulder of mutton every day," and like many others he was a heavy loser. He could, however, write wisely on the subject. Of his friend, Thomas Snow, the banker-goldsmith of Temple Bar, he asked

Why did 'Change Alley waste thy precious hours,
Among the fools who gap'd for golden show'rs?
No wonder if we found some poets there,
Who live on fancy and can feed on air;
No wonder they were caught by South Sea schemes,
Who ne'er enjoy'd a guinea but in dreams.

In 1718 Pope was in a position to think of building a house in London; but instead of so doing he bought the Strawberry-hill property at Twickenham in the following year. He, too, invested money in the South Sea Scheme, and at one time might have realized at an enormous profit; even in the result he is said to have been a slight gainer. Pope corresponded on the subject with Lady Mary Wortley Montagu and Teresa and Mary Blount, each of whom was more or less concerned. Besides writing "A strange but true Relation how Edmund Curll of Fleet-street, Stationer, out of an extraordinary desire of lucre, went into 'Change Alley and was converted from the Christian Religion by certain eminent Jews. And how he was circumcised and initiated with their mysteries," Pope thus sketches Sir John Blunt, the puritanical scrivener, who originated the South Sea Bubble:—

'Twas no Court badge, great Scrivener, fired thy trains;
Nor lordly luxury, nor city gains.
No! 'twas thy righteous end, ashamed to see Senates degenerate, Patriots disagree,
And nobly wishing party rage to cease,
To buy both sides, and give thy Country peace.

The unctuousness of Blunt is suggested in Pope's couplet—

"God cannot love," says Blunt, with tearless eyes,
"The wretch he starves," and piously denies!

Nor does Pope ineptly sum up the mad scenes in the 'Change Alley of 1720:—

Statesmen and patriots ply alike the stocks,
Peeress and butler share alike the box,
And judges job, and bishops bite the town,
And mighty dukes pack cards for half-a-crown.

We may compare with this three quatrains by Swift in which he likens 'Change Alley to a gulf in the South Seas:—

Subscribers here by thousands float,
And jostle one another down,
Each paddling in his leaky boat,
And here they fish for gold, and drown.

Now buried in the depths below,
Now mounted up to Heaven again,
They reel and stagger to and fro,
At their wits' end, like drunken men.

Meantime, secure on Garraway's cliffs,
A savage race, by shipwrecks fed,
Lie waiting for the founder's skulls,
And strip the bodies of the dead.

In Colley Cibber's play The Refusal, produced in 1720, he makes use of terms which are now definitely associated with financial operations. Asked by Granger if all his money had been made on 'Change, Witting answers:—"Every shilling, Sir; all out of stocks, puts, bulls, shams, bears, and bubbles." Cibber, moreover, has left us a vivid little sketch of the Alley. "You'll see a duke," he says, "dangling after a director; here a peer and a 'prentice haggling for an eighth; there a Jew and a parson making up differences; there a young woman of quality buying bears of a Quaker; and there an old one selling refusals to a Lieutenant of Grenadiers."

Among the 156 Bubble companies floated at this time, not the least curious are those in which prospective profits were to be gained from "Importing a large number of jackasses from Spain," and, most illusory of all, from "An undertaking which shall in due time be revealed." From the £1,000 at which shares in the South Sea Company once sold in the market, the stock fell to £135, and the Bubble burst.

On July 14, 1773, a number of stockbrokers met at New Jonathan's Coffee House and determined that thereafter "it should be called the Stock Exchange, which is to be wrote over the door, the brokers then collected sixpence each, and christened the house with punch." The beginnings of the Stock Exchange, as we now know it in Capel Court, date from 1801, the inscription beneath the foundation-stone then laid ending with these words:—"The inviolate faith of the British nation, and the principles of the Constitution, sanction and secure the property embarked in this undertaking. May the blessing of that Constitution be secured to the latest posterity." If less picturesque than old 'Change Alley and Garraway's and Jonathan's, at any rate the public cannot now gain access to the greatly enlarged buildings, and, save in "the street" speculators are unable to witness actual dealings; dealings hardly less tumultuous during a scare nowadays than in the beginning of the eighteenth century.

BADMINTON.*

[BY THE RIGHT HON. SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, BART., M.P.]

The discouragement and ultimate suppression of what they politely term "blood-sports" are the objects advocated with more earnestness than nicety of argument by members of the Humanitarian League. Consistent in this, if in nothing else, they identify themselves more or less intimately with vegetarians, citing, in support of their primary doctrine that man is bound to apply the same treatment to the lower animals as to his fellow-men, the demonstration by modern science of the common origin of all animated creatures, but forgetting or avoiding the logical conclusion to which universal acceptance of this doctrine must lead. If the sixth commandment is to be construed so as to prescribe the duty of civilized man to beasts, how can one avoid similar application of moral and ethical obligations outside the decalogue? It would not be difficult to show that this would bring the work of civilization to an abrupt stop. With the universal assent of white men, we have pronounced slavery to be a violation of duty to our neighbour. "Lord, who is my neighbour?" If it is my horse or my ass, then must I go afoot for evermore, if these reformers have their way, seeing that under no system but slavery can these animals be induced to draw or carry me half a dozen yards. All beasts of draft and burden are slaves, working under compulsion, from the King's pampered State creams to the coster's donkey.

Such be some of the reflections suggested by several numbers of the Humanitarian recently received by the present writer, containing marked passages vehemently uncomplimentary to him, on account of his opinion that a sportsman is not necessarily an inhuman monster—may even be habitually merciful in behaviour to dumb animals. And these reflections tend to merge into speculation as to the fate of a considerable branch of English literature when the ethical revolution shall be accomplished which is to send all field sports into limbo after the Royal Buckhounds. No more editions of the evergreen Izaak, as it please you; be anathema henceforward "Nimrod's" pernicious page, wherein you shall learn only how to kill a fox scientifically. Whyte-Melville and William Scrope may be spared, perhaps; the first for his pretty love-stories, the second in virtue of the folk-lore and historic association which he managed to weave even into his narrative of the muckle hart of Benmore; but both must be mercilessly edited for the consumption of humanitarian families.

* "The Eighth Duke of Beaufort and the Badminton Hunt." By T. F. Dale. (Constable, 21s.)

And how shall we deal with the incorrigible Mr. T. F. Dale, so closely identified with the chronicle of these "blood-sports"? Not content to have filled many columns of the Field with ephemeral records, he has already paraded his devotion to the chase in his "History of the Belvoir Hunt," and now returns to his darling theme in "The Eighth Duke of Beaufort and the Badminton Hunt." He has done it so well, too, that I fancy the number of his readers will go far to reassure those who fancy that foxhunting is losing its hold upon the affections of our people. Mr. Dale has feelingly described how sorely some of its pillars in the land have been crippled by the long depression in agriculture and fall in rents, and apprehends further limitation of establishments in consequence of the onerous death duties. But the fact is that long ago the end was pronounced to be at hand by one well qualified to judge thereof. It was in the 'thirties, I think, that "Nimrod" discerned the speedy doom of foxhunting in the spread of railways, and, strange to say, the novel sport of steeplechasing. Threatened men live long. There are no signs apparent that Englishmen are willing to give up in favour of croquet and amateur photography those arduous exercises which put endurance and resource to the test, and, paradoxical as it may appear, cause them to cherish the very animals of which they take toll. The day has not yet dawned when English eyes will cease to brighten at sight of horse and hound, and, even should the huntsman's horn fall silent in the vales where it has echoed so long, unborn generations will yet turn with delight to stirring records of the sport of Kings. (Casting his eye back over the last sentence, the writer is reminded that the Badminton fashion has discarded the horn in the field for a business-like whistle.)

It is not given to every good sportsman to write readably on sport; there are few drearier specimens of literature than some produced by the best of performers in the field. Beckford had the right literary blend; so had Tom Smith of the Hambledon; so had C. J. Apperley, better known as "Nimrod," and still better, to readers of Surtees, as Pomponius Ego—albeit it used to be whispered that he got along faster at his desk than over a country. And Mr. Dale not only knows his subject, but how to write about it. In the title he has chosen he is a trifle misleading; one has to get through half the volume before reaching the eighth Duke of Beaufort. Moreover, Mr. Dale's naivety in the preface rather gives one pause. He tells us that the present duke has perused the book before publication, which "will be a guarantee that its views represent on the whole the feelings of the late duke's friends." Disabling fetters, these, upon a serious biographer; but Mr. Dale aims at no more than to depict the late duke as a sportsman, a landlord, and country gentleman "without trenching on ground where strangers have no right to trespass." There is, first, a condensed and lucid account of the origin and rise of the Somersetts, in tracing which Mr. Dale seems to have shared the fate of so many amateur genealogists in being pulled up short by the expert. Mr. J. H. Round has pronounced the opinion that the second Marquis of Worcester forged or "faked" the patent of dukedom dated 4th March, 1646. Mr. Dale declares that such an act would have been "entirely out of harmony" with the marquis's character, and unkindly suggests that Charles I. was much more likely to act dishonestly. I am content to leave the meed of rogue to be awarded by more competent hands than mine. I must confess, also, that the biographical chapters upon the late duke, subjected as they have avowedly been to the approval of the family, have less interest for me than the chronicle of the pack and its doings. One is accustomed to look for more in one holding the highest rank of nobility than that he should merely excel in killing foxes and driving coaches. It is proper that he should do these things well, if such be his fancy, and undoubtedly the late duke did them right well; but they scarcely suffice for the life work of a great noble, or at least do not qualify him for the dignity of a biography. The eighth duke, however, graduated in literature, for we have Mr. Dale's assurance that, when, late in life, this mighty hunter undertook to edit the well-known Badminton Library, he had no idea of being a mere figure-head. No doubt he received much technical guidance from the assistant editor, Mr. Alfred Watson, but it was the duke's thorough practical acquaintance with almost every branch of British sport which gave its peculiar stamp to the series, and placed them far above all previous essays in that particular domain. He was not content with mere supervision, but contributed much original matter from his own pen; the chapters on riding and driving are just as good as there is any need for.

It is in the technical part of his book that Mr. Dale is at his best. For some time after 1728 there were two packs kept at Badminton, neither of them strictly foxhounds, though no doubt both hunted fox occasionally. In 1734 there were thirty couple of harriers and six couple of staghounds. To Henry, the fifth duke, is assigned the credit of founding the foxhounds. Returning from a bad day with stag, he threw his hounds into Silk Wood, where they found a fox which gave him a splendid gallop. Thereafter "he steadied his hounds from deer and helped to found one of the greatest of our national sports." Much interest will be found by masters of hounds in the account of the evolution of these foxhounds, till the Badminton badger-pies became a strain as famous and distinct as the Belvoir tans. The Beaufort Hunt has never borne a reputation for hard riding, but it can boast some famous runs, notably that with the Greatwood fox on 22nd February, 1871, which takes a place in the annals of the chase beside Mr. Anstruther Thomson's Waterloo run and the memorable performance of the Belvoir from Jericho Gorse. The distance traversed in the Greatwood run was twenty-seven miles in three hours and a half; from point to point was fourteen miles; there was only one check, and only seven men saw the finish. The story is told right well in Mr. Dale's last chapter.

Seldom have I seen a good book so wretchedly served in the matter of illustration. There are a few fair portraits, but the reproductions of pictures are the poorest possible specimens of the cheap process, and the photographs of groups, &c., are little better. I note a curious blunder on page 201. "The third season the duke carried the horn, that of 1857-58, was undoubtedly a bad one. It was the first winter of the Crimean War." Now the fact is that this duke first hunted his own hounds when William Long retired in October, 1855, so it is a mystery how the Crimean War finds its way into the business at all. The blue-and-buff of the Badminton Hunt has weathered the darkest years of agricultural adversity. The hounds still share with the Belvoir, Brocklesby, and Fitzwilliam packs the distinction of never having passed from the family of the original founder. From this well-managed establishment, as well as from Mr. Dale's excellent description thereof, I part with a cordial "Prosit!"

THE DRAMA.

"THE SECRET ORCHARD."—REVIVALS.

Who is Miss Grace Lane? She may be known to provincial audiences, but I, for one, had never seen her on the London stage until her appearance last week in The Secret Orchard. I conjecture that she is a young lady with a future, though on this occasion she was playing a young lady with a past. Joy (surname not stated) is the victim of heredity. Her mother was a bad woman, and Joy has the eyes of a devil. Charles Henri Stuart, Duke of Cluny, has looked into those eyes, to his own undoing and hers. He gives her a pearl necklace and thinks he is rid of her. For this unprincipled conduct you are to look to heredity again, the Duke, as his name imports, being a descendant of the exiled Stuarts. The Duchess ("née Helen Church of Virginia") is, as her name imports, a woman of piety, and one of her pious works is the adoption of Joy. Thus the mistress is brought by the long arm of coincidence under the same roof as the wife, and the question to which the playwright, Mr. Egerton Castle, invites our attention is, What will happen when the truth comes out? What happens is a duel, in which the Duke, stricken with remorse, allows himself to be shot. The Duchess and Joy are left mingling their tears over his corpse. This lugubrious ending strikes me as rather cheap pathos. Anybody can make a deathbed scene affecting; but the really interesting thing is to know how people get out of entanglements of this kind while going on living. Mr. Castle will, perhaps, reply that, as a moralist, it was his business to prove (once more) that the wages of sin is death. In that case he should not have misled us by writing half his work in the key of comedy. I understand that the play is founded on a novel, and, perhaps, in the leisurely process of print the atmosphere is more successfully preserved. Perhaps, too, the novel explains why the Duke's confidant should be Minister of Fine Arts, why the Duchess's aunt should be "née Mary Charch," and why the Duchess's maid should be a mulatto. On the stage the significance of these facts is not apparent. But let me return to Miss Grace Lane, who can act with passion, and in repose can convey the air fatal without melodramatic exaggeration. To be sure she makes too much play with those wicked eyes, feeling apparently that the author's point about heredity must be made at all costs. It is an uncanny character, and not every young actress knows how to be uncanny with measure and propriety. Miss Lane does. We shall hear of her again. Miss Hilda Rivers as a sprightly American ("née Nessie P. Dixon of Buffalo") speaks as "Buffalo gals" are required to speak by English audiences, but is otherwise natural and pleasing. As for Mr. and Mrs. Kendal (Duke and Duchess), they have unsuitable parts and so cannot be either natural or pleasing. They are excellent comedians—Mr. Kendal has of late years become almost as clever a comedian as his wife, which is saying a very great deal—but there is no chance for comedy in the part of a saint who is always casting up her eyes to heaven, or in that of a husband who is always going about in the sackcloth and ashes of repentance. Their success in Mrs. Clifford's play has tempted them to go on exploiting the gloomy. I beseech them to come out of the tombs. They are really full of fun. Sane and sparkling comedy is their proper element. It is a poor heart that never rejoices, as Mr. Pecksniff said on a memorable occasion.

My own heart particularly rejoices over the revival of Mr. Carton's Wheels within Wheels at the Criterion. It treats conjugal infidelity lightly—I do not mean with immoral cynicism, but, as M. Anatole France would say, avec allégresse. Observe that Lady Curtoys does not run away with Mr. Egerton Vartrey. Honour is saved. But there is not too much fuss about honour in the piece, and there is not a trace of sentimentality. Curtoys is a bit of an ass but not a bad fellow. Lady Curtoys is a bit of a flirt but not a bad woman. In truth, it matters little what they are or are not, for their relations merely serve as an excuse for the delightful adventures of Mrs. Onslow Bulmer, the lady who saves her friend from an elopement by taking that indiscretion upon herself. The spirit and sense and humour of Miss Compton in this part act on the nerves like a tonic. Years ago (in courtesy to all parties I will not say how many) I saw this lady, in a provincial playhouse, make her first appearance on any stage as Maria in The School for Scandal. No one who was present on that occasion could have foreseen the genial, imperturbable, authoritative actress of to-day. When I think of the difference I feel a tenderness to all débutantes—they may turn into such artists as Miss Compton, though I admit the chances are against it; for it is not every actress who can hope to marry a playwright like Mr. Carton, able and willing to fit his wife's talent to perfection. In Wheels within Wheels Mr. Arthur Bouchier and Mr. Eric Lewis and Mr. Dion Boucicault resume their old parts, and they were never more amusing. For a light, digestive entertainment playgoers may safely be directed to the Criterion.

Mr. H. A. Jones' Rebellious Susan, now to be seen at Wyndham's Theatre, does not stand revival quite so well. Mr. Wyndham is as good as ever in his favourite part of l'ami des femmes, and Miss Mary Moore is still quite charming in a part well within her rather limited range. But Mr. Jones, choosing virtually the same theme as that of Francillon, challenges comparison with Dumas *fil*s on his own ground, and—well, revival for revival, I would rather it were Francillon. There is no sentimental love affair in the French play; there is in the English, and it is rather mawkish stuff. Further, the difference in the character of the husbands tells heavily against the English play. The French husband is a gentleman who has for a moment forgotten himself, and one does not pity his wife when circumstances compel her to forgive him; the return of Lady Susan to the arms of that worthless nincompoop, James Harabin, is a real tragedy. But Mr. Jones seems (through the mouth of Sir Richard Kato) to find it "all werry capital." His thesis is that married couples must be kept together at all costs, scandal and social inconvenience being apparently regarded as in all conceivable conditions worse than ill-assorted unions. This is genuine cynicism, and Lady Susan, though outwardly a merry piece, leaves rather a bitter flavour on the palate. But how good Mr. Granville Barker is in the (already obsolescent) character of Fergusson Pybus, the prig who desires to "stamp himself upon the world"! Here is another young player who ought to go far.

A. B. WALKLEY.

The high price of £1,200 was given at Sotheby's on the 16th for a MS. copy of Wycliffe's translation of the Bible. It is a large folio of 269 leaves of vellum, finely written, and is probably the work of an English scribe at the beginning of the fifteenth century. Early copies of Wycliffe's translation are so rare that the price seems at first sight to be low as prices now stand. But, considering its condition, this book is really one of the dearest ever sold at auction. Of the thirty and odd pages with fully illuminated borders hardly one is in perfect condition. Owing to damp the illuminations have set off on the opposite pages, and there are dozens of pages where the damp has caused the ink to run in a most disastrous manner. Of the other notable books included in the same sale the following were the more important:—

Allot, "England's Parnassus," first edition, 1600.	£38.
Behn, Mrs. A., "Female Poems on Several Occasions," first edition, 1679.	£14 5s.
Burton, "The Anatomy of Melancholy," first edition, 1621.	£26 10s.
Drayton, "Polyolbion," the two parts, first edition, 1613-1622.	£15 10s.
Goldsmith, "Retaliation," first edition, 1774.	£26 10s.
Goldsmith, "She Stoops to Conquer," first edition, 1773.	£14 10s.
Goldsmith, "The Deserted Village," first edition, 1770.	£18.
Goldsmith, "The Good Natured Man," first edition, 1768.	£11 10s.
Goldsmith, "The Traveller," first edition, 1765.	£12 5s.
Goldsmith, "The Vicar of Wakefield," first edition, 1766.	£85.
Johnson (R.), "The Seven Champions of Christendome," 2 vols. in one, 1608.	£42.
Jonson, Ben, "Workes," 2 vols., first edition, 1616-1640.	£35.
Killigrew, "Comedies and Tragedies," first collected edition, 1664.	£18.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

FROM BELMONT TO LINDLEY.

THE WORK OF THE NINTH DIVISION. By Major-General Sir H. E. COLVILLE, K.C.M.G., C.B. (Arnold. 10s. 6d. n.)

The book which General Colville has written on the work of the Ninth Division will be eagerly read, if for no other reason, to see what the author has to say on the incidents which led to his supersession. There is, however, very little of a controversial character in it. General Colville has detailed the circumstances of the engagement at Sannah's Post and of the march to Lindley, but he has added little in the nature of criticism or discussion. He has throughout taken the attitude which characterizes his brief description of the fateful interview with Lord Roberts at Pretoria :—

What he and I said to each other has nothing to do with the story of the Ninth Division. I have often dwelt, may be at tedious length, on my own thoughts and motives, as it was on these that the Division moved, and for some of which it had to suffer ; but henceforth these affected no one but myself.

The motive of the book is the desire to vindicate for the officers and men of the Division, for the Divisional Staff, and for Smith-Dorrien and Macdonald, the credit which no one will grudge them, but which has been somewhat obscured by the reverse which has overtaken their Commander. The question whether Sir Henry Colville should leave the story for another hand to write, or tell it himself, could only be decided according to the line which that story was to take. Probably no one else could have performed the task so well. There are a few marks of haste, a few errors in proof correction, but the narrative is singularly lucid and charming. It is fortunate in every way that Sir Henry Colville has not deviated into the polemical. With very considerable literary gifts, and the power of graphically conveying military situation, he seems deficient in the intuition which enables a man to seize the vulnerable point in an adverse argument. The talent which is effective in drawing up a military memorandum or a State paper is not by any means necessarily associated with forensic ability. Whatever judgment may be formed on Sir Henry Colville's case, any one who reads the criticisms—printed in the Appendix—on General Broadwood's despatch will see that General Colville failed to grasp a number of important points, which he afterwards somewhat sketchily indicated in his memorandum to the War Office.

A preliminary chapter briefly refers to the fortunes of Lord Methuen's relief column. There is a reminiscence of the afternoon before the Magersfontein disaster which has a pathetic interest.

I had had a few minutes' talk with Wauchope the afternoon before, and had said to him that, as we were in reserve, I did not suppose we should see much of the fight. He shook his head and said :—" Things do not always go as they are expected ; you may not be in reserve for long."

The rear-guard action of the Grenadiers will long be remembered by the regiment with pride.

Shortly afterwards the Grenadiers got the same chance, of which they took the fullest advantage. I had often thought at home that we did not practise rear-guard actions quite enough, but if Crabbe and his men had been doing nothing else all their lives they could not have carried it out more neatly. As soon as they began to move, the enemy's guns turned most of their attention to them, and at times Crabbe's lines could hardly be seen through the dust ; but when we did see them they were strolling quietly along in slow time, utterly unconcerned, alternate files halting and facing the enemy, while the others retired to a fresh position, in which they halted till the advanced files had passed through them. In Hyde Park the movement would have been called perfect ; at Aldershot it would have been said that it was too regular and slow ; at Magersfontein it, at all events, showed the Boers that, if the British soldier does not mean to hurry, it is not easy to make him do so.

The operations of Paardeberg are a matter of common knowledge. Still, as those were the occasions of a great distinction to a Division which afterwards met with very ill luck—quite undeserved by themselves, whatever may have been the desert of their Commander—the considerations which led General Colville to decide on a final and successful advance are not without interest.

The thick scrub between us and the Boer lines made it difficult to know exactly what direction the northern trench should take ; but on going to the end of it on the morning of the 26th, I found that it was clear of the trees, and looked into the west face of the Boer laager. To have carried it more to the south-eastward would only have exposed us to enfilade fire, while a turn to the north-east would have taken it, if carried on far enough, right outside the laager. I therefore made up my mind that we ought to make a fresh start from the right bank. It seemed to me that, if we could once gain the ground clear of the trees, we should have the laager at our mercy. I knew Lord Roberts was very adverse to trying an assault, so got hold of General Eliot Wood, his Chief Engineer, and went through the trenches again with him, with the result that he, too, thought that no further good could be done with the present trench. Fortified with this expert opinion, I went to Lord Roberts, explained the situation, and got his leave to try an advance that night.

Very soon after the arrival at Bloemfontein troubles began to come thickly upon the Division and its General. Perhaps the most interesting, and certainly the most novel detail which this book contributes to our knowledge of the incident of Sannah's Post is General Colville's description of his feelings when he received the advice, from Colonel Martyr, his subordinate, to join him on Boesman's Kop—advice which he afterwards himself passed on, as Senior Officer in Command, to Brigadier-General Broadwood.

I was overtaken by a Mounted Infantry officer with a message from Colonel Martyr that he was on the top of the Kop, and advised me to come there. I yield to no one in my regard for the British infantry soldier ; but his greatest admirers must admit that he is not a rapid mover, especially when he is taken in bulk, and I know nothing more trying to the temper than the conviction that one ought to fly when perforce one has to crawl. Had we been able, on first hearing the guns near Springfield, to move at the rate of fourteen miles an hour, we should have saved the situation, and I knew it ; and the further knowledge that we could do no more than two had, I own, made me rather irritable that morning, and inclined to go ahead somewhere, if it was only for the sake of going. . . . Therefore, when this young officer invited me to climb Boesman's Kop, which seemed out of the way, I am afraid I answered him rather sharply and rode on. I have never seen him since, and never knew his name ; but if he is still alive, and happens to read this, I hope he will forgive me, especially as I acted on his message after all. For, on thinking it over, I remembered that Martyr was a hard-headed man and a good soldier, and that, as he knew that he was under my orders, he would certainly have come down to meet me, unless he had some good reason for staying where he was ; so I pocketed my fidgets and went up the hill.

General Colville mentions, what was already well known, that Macdonald advised the pursuit of the guns by the Waterworks route, that being the line taken by the Boers who carried them off. On the other hand, Smith-Dorrien recommended the route by Watervaal Drift, as cutting directly into the line of retreat, and avoiding the danger of being delayed in the spruits by the Boer rear-guard. General Colville did not receive Broadwood's message urging an advance on the spruits, but he considers that this would not have affected his decision, as General Broadwood was stationed in a hollow, from which nothing could be seen, while from Boesman's Kop the enemy was visible and the country lay spread out like a map.

General Colville's account of the march from Ventersburg, through Lindley, to Heilbron, shows that the Highland Brigade accomplished a remarkable feat in making its way so rapidly, unprotected by cavalry, through a country infested by large bodies of the enemy, who offered a stubborn resistance. Unfortunately, the march accomplished nothing. General Colville was in error in thinking that he was ordered to Heilbron to set free Hamilton for operations across the Vaal. Heilbron had been already evacuated. Although Macdonald shared General Colville's views as to the urgency of reaching Heilbron by the date named in the orders, this does not detract in the least from his admirable work as brigadier, since the responsibility for the decision rested entirely with Colville, the Divisional Commander.

Apart from the difficulties in which General Colville became involved, the description of the work of the division is bright and pleasant reading. Admirable feeling seems to have pervaded the whole division. The Staff could not be beaten "for good solid hard work and all-round common sense." The troops were a set of heroes; it is impossible to decide the question of precedence between Shropshires and Canadians, Cornwalls and Highlanders. With a few light touches General Colville has made us intimately acquainted with the men whom he commanded. Ewart, who first comes to our notice, working, with Ruggles-Brise, day and night, in defiance of General Colville's warning, that "if they kept on as they were going, they would both be in hospital before long"; who makes a flag for headquarters out of the lining of his greatcoat; who for fifteen years had been missed steadily by various enemies, yet "during the four months" he was "with the Ninth Division was rarely without a bandage on some part of him," and whom we last catch sight of, "looking very doleful," on the platform at Heilbron, as the Staff steamed out of the station; Smith-Dorrien, whom "it is always a pleasure to meet," whether he is arguing in language (which his Commander cannot print) with an obstinate sentry who delayed a whole brigade, or, whether to reach him, one had to cross an unsavoury battle-ground, strewn with carcasses of cattle, by putting "a cigarette into one's mouth and spurs into one's horse, and thanking heaven they were not elephants"; the General's orderly, an excellent fellow, who unluckily "commandeered" a watch—a very poor one to be hanged for—and was marched off to the Provost-Marshal, causing the General to waste so much sympathy during the night-march that he felt almost injured when at dawn the fellow turned up in his usual place; and the ragged, footsore soldiers, at last reduced to such a state that "some of the men's nakedness would have been less striking if they had taken their rags off altogether"—these people have been made very real to us without the employment of any tricks of art or the extravagant colouring of the later school of war-correspondents.

Sir Henry Colville has some shrewd and penetrating remarks on the subject of Boer tactics:—

The Boer, with many very strong points, has his limitations, a knowledge of which lets one take liberties with him. He is a good shot (though not so good as we thought before the war), with an inborn talent for choosing a position, a master of the art of taking cover, very mobile, and very clever in the way in which he covers his retreat. But having chosen his position, he rarely leaves it till he is forced from it or out-flanked; he is extraordinarily sensitive as to his flanks, and, in spite of his mobility, rarely changes front to meet an out-flanking movement. He never makes a counter-attack, or, having once retired, rallies on the same day. He can therefore be held in front with a handful of men, which a European enemy would sweep away, and which can afterwards be used to take the position without any fear of their being driven back by a rally. He can always be moved out of a position, if it is small enough to be outflanked in one day; by the second day he will have taken up another to meet a flank march.

General Colville seems to have been a commander of the type of Lord Hill, Wellington's lieutenant in the Peninsular War. He was scrupulously careful of the well-being of his troops. Perhaps it may be thought that he was too careful. But he remembered the morning of the Modder River engagement, when the men were told that they would get their breakfast at the Modder River station, and the terrible butchery of Magersfontein. Other officers, who had not passed through such harrowing experiences, naturally chafed at his determination to spare his men fatigue or loss that was not inevitable.

That the Highland Brigade, within two months of its heavy punishment and its collapse at Magersfontein, should have taken without flinching the bloodiest share of the assault at Paardeberg, and this after a march of thirty miles, with scarcely any pause before going into action, says much not only for the indomitable spirit of the men, but for their gallant Brigadier; yet some of the credit must be given to the Divisional Commander and his staff, who organized a Division only a few days old into the effective body that was chiefly instrumental in forcing Cronje to surrender. The first days of the Division's career were as brilliant as the close was dark. This book will stand out from the literature of the South African War in virtue of two distinctive qualities. The clearness and grasp with which military situations are explained will appeal to military critics. The general public will inevitably be attracted by the natural and genial touches which make the Ninth Division appeal to us, not as a piece of military machinery, but with the directness of human sympathy.

THE REVISED POETRY OF MR. YEATS.

Between covers, redolent, we were almost going to say, of the symbolism and mysticism within—for the Rose in the midst of waving lines and interwoven foliage is central upon them—Mr. W. B. Yeats once more reissues in POEMS (Unwin 7s. 6d.) an edition of those of his poems which were first collected and reprinted in one volume in 1895, and again revised and reprinted in 1898. The collection does not include anything from "The Wind Among the Reeds," or the recently published "By Shadowy Waters," but consists, as formerly, of "The Countess Cathleen," "The Land of Heart's Desire," "The Wanderings of Oisín," and the two series of lyrics grouped together under the titles of "The Rose" and "Crossways."

Nevertheless one thing, if one thing only, differentiates this from the last edition of the Poems, since into "The Countess Cathleen" Mr. Yeats has introduced a new scene which may be said to complete the development which the play underwent as far back as 1895, while it rounds off the conception of Aleel, the mystic and poet of the people, in whom we are now enabled to realize more clearly the very spirit of that vague and shadowy yet beautiful folk-lore of which the play is so full. Many will be familiar with the tale which tells how, in old times, when famine pressed hard upon Ireland, and the folk who dwelt upon the domain of a certain rich and beautiful Countess Cathleen were dying for want of bread, there appeared two demons disguised as merchants who offered to buy the souls of the starving poor; and how Cathleen, frustrated by their wickedness in all her attempts to succour her people and unable to stay the hateful traffic, sacrificed her own soul to win their redemption, yet was herself redeemed in the end by virtue of her motive and the beauty of her renunciation. Working upon this basis of self-sacrifice Mr. Yeats wrote in 1891 a play which even in its earliest form substitutes for the profoundly moving austerity and the terrible directness of the Antigone of Sophocles a wild and mournful poetry which lifted it at once into a fine atmosphere of its own. At first, however, Aleel (or Kevin, as Mr. Yeats had him then) was but faintly sketched in as one whose songs "of the dim Danaan nations in their raths" had made Cathleen long for some peaceful land of faery in which she might dwell for ever and so lose the fret and trouble of the times. But in the edition of 1895 he is one of the central figures at the death of Cathleen, after which he breaks into a heart-rending cry of despair and bitterness till an angel comforts him with an assurance of her salvation ; and when the play was produced in Dublin two years ago it was felt that the conception now needed further development. Hence he is now represented as Cathleen's lover, and himself urges her in the new scene between them to flee from the unimaginable evils that beset her. We certainly think that the dramatic intensity of the play is increased by this scene, which also brings into clearer contrast contending moods and moral motives which each in their own way are beautiful and unselfish. Here is the heart of it :—" I lay in the dusk," says Aleel,

Upon the grassy margin of a lake
Among the hills, where none of mortal creatures
But the swan comes—my sleep became a fire.
One walked in the fire with birds about his head.

Cathleen, steeped as she is in the old fairy traditions of the country-side, thinks that this must be Aengus, the god of beauty, poetry, and youth, who reigns eternally in Tir-nan-Ogue, the Country of the Young. "He may be Aengus," Aleel breaks in, "but it may be that he bears an angelical name, and he bids you come and live in the hills"

Among the sounds of music and the light
Of waters till the evil days are gone.

But Cathleen will not. "He bids me go," she cries,
Where none of mortal creatures but the swan Dabbles, and there you would pluck the harp, when the trees
Had made a heavy shadow about our door,
And talk among the rustling of the reeds
When night hunted the foolish sun away,
With stillness and faint tapers. No, no, no,
I cannot.

Aleel entreats her, faltering. He had thought but of the peace and healing of his enchanted fairy land ;—God would take care of the people—the vision was angelical. But Cathleen turns away from him. "Nay, not angelical," she says, but of the old gods

Who wander about the world to waken the heart—
The passionate proud heart that all the angels
Leaving nine heavens empty would rock to sleep.—
Do not hold out to me beseeching hands.
This heart shall never waken on earth. I have sworn
By her whose heart the seven sorrows have pierced
To pray before this altar until my heart
Has grown to heaven like a tree, and there
Rustled its leaves till heaven has saved my people.

It is this contest between the impulses of Christianity and those of older and vaguer faiths that is for ever crossing and complicating Mr. Yeats' continuous dream of peace and purity and youth. We see it in one aspect in "The Land of Heart's Desire," in another in "The Wanderings of Oisín." But in "The Countess Cathleen" it is not so much the struggle between opposite impulses as the possibility of their reconciliation, if both are born of good, that is finally dwelt upon.

The Light of Lights
Looks always on the motive, not the deed
The Shadow of Shadows on the deed alone, says the Angel to Aleel, and we seem to see a connexion between the sentence and a passage in the preface. Let Mr. Yeats speak for himself :—

I would, if I could, add to that majestic heraldry of the poets—some new heraldic images gathered from the lips of the common people. Christianity and the old nature faith have lain down side by side in the cottages, and I would proclaim that peace as loudly as I can among the kingdoms of poetry, where there is no peace that is not joyous, no battle that does not give life instead of death ; I may even try to persuade others in more sober prose, that there can be no language more worthy of poetry and of the meditation of the soul than that which has been made or can be made out of a subtlety of desire, an emotion of sacrifice, a delight in order, that are perhaps Christian, and myths and images that mirror the energies of woods and streams and of their wild creatures. Has any part of the majestic heraldry of the poets had a very different setting ? Is it not the ritual of the marriage of heaven and earth ?

The minor alterations in this and the other long poems do not seem to call for much comment. Some of those in "The Countess Cathleen" were made necessary by the larger changes. In other cases again a line here and there may seem to some to have lost savour by the substitution of an English equivalent for an Irish term. Or it is a fastidious ear that dictates the change, and here Mr. Yeats seldom makes a mistake. On the whole, however, we are inclined to think that he tends to over-revise his work, and over-revision is apt to seduce criticism into dwelling too much upon refined subtleties and minute details. Take the case of the little poem called "The Pity of Love." Originally it ran :—

A pity beyond all telling
Is hid in the heart of love ;
The folk who are buying and selling,
The stars of God where they move,
The mouse-grey waters on flowing,
The clouds on their journey above,
And the cold wet winds ever blowing,
All threaten the head that I love.

Now it is :—

A pity beyond all telling
Is hid in the heart of love ;
The folk who are buying and selling,
The clouds on their journey above ;
The cold wet winds ever blowing ;
And the shadowy hazel grove
Where mouse-grey waters are flowing,
Threaten the head that I love.

Now either of these versions tenderly enshrines the same pathetic thought, but the reader who pauses too long to consider whether the improved rhythm, for instance, sufficiently compensates for the changed order, or whether the last line is better with eight or seven syllables, is likely to find emotion evaporating in the process.

Turning to the notes at the end of the volume we find that Mr. Yeats has written at some length upon the origin of "The Countess Cathleen," which has been much discussed in Ireland. He tells us that he first came across the story in what professed to be a collection of Irish folk-lore in an Irish newspaper some years ago. Though he made inquiries he was unable for some time to trace it further, but he learnt later that it was a translation of a story included in a short collection of contes and articles by Leo Lespès, published under the title of "Les Matinées de Timothée Trimm." It was over the signature of Timothée Trimm that Lespès, a man of many pseudonyms and much versatility—he was born on the date of Waterloo, died in 1875, and wrote in his earlier days under the names of "Le Fusilier," "Le Commandeur," and "Lepsel"—wrote the causeries which contributed so largely in the early sixties to the success of Le Petit Journal ; and it is curious that this old Irish legend, if old it is, should have been first put into literary form by the French littérateur. Lespès, however, appears to entertain no doubt that it was widely known among the poor in Ireland when he wrote it down, and though his sources of information are unknown to us it seems unlikely that he should have invented it.

Le boiteux [he says], l'aveugle, le paralytique des rues de Dublin ou de Limerick, vous le diraient mieux que moi, cher lecteur, si vous alliez le leur demander, un sixpence d'argent à la main. Il n'est pas une jeune fille catholique à laquelle on ne l'ait appris, pendant les jours de préparation à la communion sainte, pas un berger des bords de la Blackwater qui ne le puisse redire à la veillée.

On the other hand, Mr. Yeats, whose acquaintance with his national folk-lore is extensive, has failed to find any knowledge of it in the cottages of Ireland. The late Mr. A. E. W. Larminie included in his "West Irish Folk-Tales and Romances" a Donegal variant of undoubted antiquity, of a woman who goes to hell for ten years to save her husband and stays there for another ten on the condition that she may carry away as many souls as can cling to her skirt. Mr. Larminie was able to print the Irish original together with the English version of this tale, but of the Countess Cathleen no written Irish version has so far proved discoverable. After all it is not the origin but the idea itself that matters; yet we hope, for his own satisfaction, that Mr. Yeats will finally prove the "essential antiquity" of his very beautiful tale of self-renunciation.

AN INTERPRETATION OF TOLSTOY.

The perplexed English public may be grateful to Mr. Aylmer Maude for his sympathetic study of Tolstoy and his philosophy of life—TOLSTOY AND HIS PROBLEMS (Grant Richards, 6s.). The sketch of the man and the summary of his teaching certainly evince his striving towards absolute sincerity; his untiring effort to bring the outer life into harmony with the "Inner Light," for this Quaker phrase is the best guide, perhaps, to Tolstoy's course of conduct and its best justification in theory. How to impress the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man, as the foundation truths of creed and conduct on the political and social structures of our time, is the problem for all Christian thinkers. Tolstoy would solve the problem for the world, as in his own life, by abnegation of wealth and position, by practical acceptance of the hard saying, "Whosoever of you will be the chiefest shall be the servant of all." Can we thus unbuild the world's civilization? Would this avail to reconcile the conflicting claims of intellect and spirit in their many developments? Is renunciation of individual gifts of birth and fortune possible? The philosopher has himself, as his disciple admits, been forced to compromise. And though Tolstoy has approximated in simplicity to the peasant state, it is unconsciously but a dramatic assumption of the character. He can hardly know the peasant's keen apprehension of the failure of the harvest, the possible suffering of actual famine; and therefore he cannot attain to the peasant's faith. With the outlook of a widely-experienced thinker he cannot know the peasant's narrowness of horizon, and therefore he misses the peasant's singleness of conviction. To live as the peasant lives there would need be the power to renounce that inalienable birthright—the more sensitive nerves and finer brain tissues of inherited culture. Such objections, however, are not touched on by Mr. Maude, who fully justifies the philosophy he expounds. Tolstoy's philosophy is a protest against the world, the flesh, and the devil—a stirring call to the higher life of the spirit. Its failure as a working force lies in its neglect of the fact that such passion of sacrifice as his is not a universal but a most exceptional endowment. It has given the Church its martyrs, and to this age Mazzini, William Lloyd Garrison, John Brown of Osawatimie, Father Damien, and —Leo Tolstoy.

In accordance with his theories of life is Tolstoy's estimate of art. He does not, as his critics complain, underrate art; he over-estimates the willingness of common men to listen to the direct spiritual message. In accepting art as the power of transmitting emotion he recognizes it as one of the vital forces of life. Because of this recognition he arraigns art as an unfaithful herald of the Divine, universal truth. In his over-emphasis upon the direct ethical intent of art he does not recognize sufficiently the purifying effect of the fire of emotion, the uplifting power of ideal beauty upon an over-materialized world. Hence Tolstoy's smirching accusation of sensuality against the maiden love of Juliet. Hence his estimate of the Greek passion for pure beauty as "the ideal that was held by a semi-savage, slave-holding people who lived 2,000 years ago, who imitated the nude human body extremely well and created buildings pleasant to look upon." Such words prove the master's limitations, which are frankly admitted by his disciple Mr. Maude.

The book is a series of essays more or less closely linked with the gospel according to Tolstoy. One gives a most interesting study of the Doukhobors, their spiritual conception of the Christ within us, their kinship to the Quakers in their claim for an individual revelation and their doctrine of non-resistance, their community without government, their good health without doctors, their religion without priests, and their courage under persecution. In their behalf Tolstoy published "Resurrection," and so far abjured his objection to moneymaking as to accept payment to aid in their migration to Canada. This sympathy is significant of Tolstoy's own antagonism to war as opposed to the plain teaching of Christ.

Mr. Maude speaks with authority as an interpreter of Tolstoy to Englishmen, but in one essay he departs from his subject in a manner more likely, we are afraid, to arouse hostility than sympathetic consideration. Tolstoy cannot be held responsible for the pro-Boer sympathies expressed by Mr. Maude in "War and Patriotism," which open up the whole question of England's relations with the Transvaal. But we may wish for this book a wide and responsive reading, for the world is in no danger of too sudden a conversion to the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount.

TRAVEL.

IN TIBET AND CHINESE TURKESTAN, by Captain H. H. P. DEASY. (Fisher Unwin. 21s.).

A story is told of an enterprising young officer who made persistent but unavailing efforts to get into Chinese Tibet, and who at length seemed to have undermined the opposition of the frontier guards by lavish bribery. He proceeded exultant to be slung across the Indus in a basket; but, when in mid air above the rushing current the basket stopped, and he was only hauled back—to the Ladakh side—after promising to desist from any further attempts upon the forbidden land, whither, however, his "backsheesh" had gone before. Although such was not the immediate fate of Captain Deasy, the obstacles which he encountered on his several approaches to this and similarly inhospitable territory were enough to deter any one less determined to persevere in the pursuit of exploration and survey.

Beginning in 1896, by utilizing a leave season with one companion to enter the south-west portion of Tibet, he undertook to traverse and map ground hitherto untouched by other travellers. In this latter respect alone was the desire easy of gratification. For six months roughly out and home from Leh the explorers struggled and worked among the mountains and passes, the brackish lakes and stony wastes of the desolate region south of the Kuen Lun Mountains; and between parallels 78° and 83°. They surveyed routes, practicable and impracticable; they established new, or checked old, altitudes; and they reached a highest point at the glacier of Nabo La, 18,880ft., where also they completed the system of triangulation by connecting it with what are known in the G. T. Survey of India as "Tartary Peaks, Nos. 1 and 2." For difficulties other than those of climate and physical features of the land there were robberies by nomad Chukpas, the doubtful attitude of Tibetans, and sickness, mountain and other. Caravan men were inexperienced or mutinous; ponies strayed and were abandoned. On one occasion the leader of the party himself was lost for a day and a night in the desert. Among other lessons taught by this journey were, that aneroids are unreliable for altitudes above 18,000ft., and that with the thermometer about zero cordite becomes ineffectual, the bullets from a carbine dropping within fifty yards of the firer.

But this first expedition was only the precursor to a more sustained series. In 1897, having meanwhile left the Service.

Captain Deasy turned his independence to account in a fresh direction. This was the careful survey of that part of the valley of the Yarkand River extending from the west end of Raskam to the neighbourhood of Yarkand, which on Lord Curzon's map of the Pamirs and adjacent country, published in 1896, is represented by dotted lines of uncertainty. Some Europeans had already crossed the river at Langar (en passant, there are two Langars in misleading proximity in the latest map), and Grombchefskey had done so at Sanglash, but no other traveller had followed its course below the west end of Raskam. Yarkand was reached by the Gilgit-Hunza route and the Taghdumbash Pamir, and certain errors in the existing map (lat. 37° N.) were rectified on the way. By subsequent observations from this neighbourhood the computation of the height of Muz Tagh Ata was fixed at 24,400ft., corrected by Colonel Wahab in 1899 to 24,321ft. Dr. Sven Hedin, it may be noted, placed it at 25,600ft.

Between 1897 and 1899 the author may be said to have oscillated between Turkestan and Tibet, nibbling at the latter from the North during the summer months, and making the former the ground for his winter labours. This arrangement was in part recommended by the better chance afforded by the channel of the Yarkand River when frozen for threading its precipitous gorges, and, while it entailed great additional hardship and suffering upon the explorer and his followers, it was the means whereby eventual success was gained. This issue was not, however, attained until the fourth separate attempt, in Christmas, 1898. The gain to geographical research is that a stretch of the Yarkand river, some 300 miles in length, from Bazar Dara to a point where the river is crossed by the road to Khotan, has been accurately added to our knowledge. Of this, at least that portion between the west end of Raskam and Kosarab had never before been surveyed. This in itself is no mean contribution, and when it is taken into account that the achievement was the outcome of efforts repeated time after time against check and failure, under conditions of extraordinary severity, with marches and countermarches until scarcely a remote valley or exposed pass would seem to have been left untested, Captain Deasy may well be congratulated on his performance.

Reverting in the summer intervals from this portion of his task to his first love, the traveller made two further expeditions into the confines of Tibet, via Khotan and Polu, with a brief but not fortunate deviation into the Takla Makan desert from Guma. Herein he missed both the perils and the success that attended Sven Hedin's more protracted search for buried cities. Although not penetrating far into Tibet—his furthest point east was Kara Sai, 84° 10' 48"—the author worked the district which he touched with thoroughness, and, after convincing himself of the non-existence of any feasible caravan route towards central Tibet, marked the sources of the Keriya and Khotan rivers, and ultimately established touch between his later and previous surveys, and by consequence formed connexion with the Survey of India. In his observations he was much hampered by atmospheric conditions, snow on the summits and haze in the flats. Perhaps to the latter phenomenon may be attributable the fact that Marco Polo nowhere makes mention of the giant Kuen Lun Mountains. The author managed to get a good view of a double peak in them, which he registers at 21,850ft., but does not name. Other impediments were of course found in the sub-hostility of Chinese officials, and the dread of the natives for their Pombos and the mysterious powers of Lhasa. While at Kashgar the author had occasion to contrast the positions of the representatives of Great Britain and of Russia, very much to the advantage of the latter Power, which recognizes that to be respected of the Oriental you must make a brave display.

The value of Captain Deasy's book is mainly geographical. In the narrative it is perhaps inevitable that the writing should often be infected with the weary and cheerless nature of its setting. Certainly the effect of such frequent headlines as "bleak bivouac," "waterless camp," "barren and waterless country," "sickness," "fever camp," "death of animals," is depressing. But of its permanent merit there can be no two opinions. Remembering Sir Richard Burton's warning that travel in unknown lands is waste of time without suitable instruments and skill to use them, Captain Deasy had mentally equipped himself by learning astronomy and surveying, no less than with some study of surgery and medicine. In the latter connexion it was a little hard on the native whose repeated cry of "issuk" (donkey) was confounded with a similar sound meaning "hot," that, being mistaken for a fever patient, he should receive payment for his beast in pills.

MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF.

IN THE FURTHER MEMOIRS OF MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF (Richards, 5s.) we learn more of the gifted Russian girl so exceptional—not in temperament, for innumerable women feel, think, and act as she did during a certain phase of development—but in combining the power of literary expression with the courage of self-revelation. The self-revealing woman as a rule cannot write, while the woman who can is remarkable generally for self-reticence. Nevertheless, these final entries in Marie Bashkirtseff's journal would have been scarcely worth printing, were it not that the real interest of the slender book is to be found in her correspondence with Guy de Maupassant which concludes it.

The inauguration of this correspondence well illustrates a certain type of woman; the type which is entirely incapable of passion—to be passionate you must be something more than a sublime egoist—and which seeks at all costs intellectual stimuli. Marie, satiated with the adulation of her own circle, with the incense perpetually offered up to her as musician, sculptor, painter, and best-dressed woman in Paris—this last triumph perhaps was the one which she really most enjoyed—looked about her for a new excitement, and found it in the idea of a correspondence with some celebrity, some literary man of genius who would appreciate the pretty things that occurred to her.

Once and again in life you read some book which completely overwhelms you. The strength and beauty of your author's thought, the perfection of his style, move you so powerfully that—particularly if you are young and generous—you find yourself compelled to write and thank him for the wonderful emotions he has given you—and more often than not he never replies to you at all, so there the matter rests. But Marie Bashkirtseff was actuated by no such foolish if lovable hero-worship. Always filled with herself she woke up one morning with the desire of getting the pretty things she imagined she knew how to say appreciated by a connoisseur, and passing under review the names of the writers then famous in France—Zola, Dumas, Daudet, Maupassant (later on she regretted she had not addressed herself to Zola instead of to his lieutenant, as she uncritically terms Maupassant)—finally selected for her experiment le pauvre Guy. From Marie's first epistle signed "Miss Hastings," and addressed from the Bureau de la Madeleine, to the last signed Maupassant a dozen letters passed between them, and we must express our candid opinion that the girl comes out of the correspondence far less creditably than does the man. She shows plenty of vanity and egotism and of that unlovely caution which would have all the pleasures of playing with fire, and yet run none of the risks. She plays unfairly; knowing herself who her correspondent is, never for one moment will she lift the veil of her own anonymity. In her first letter she writes, "Now, mark me well" (which is the literal translation of Notex bien, but not the equivalent. Who would ever dream of writing in English, "Now, mark me well"? Translators are traitors indeed). "I shall remain always unknown for good." And she thus naturally defeats her avowed object of becoming the confidante of his soul. For Maupassant replies with masculine good sense:—"What can mystery add to the charm of relationship by letter? . . . In the last two years I have received about fifty or sixty letters from unknown persons. How shall I choose among these women the confidante of my soul, as you say? When they are willing to show themselves and make acquaintance as in the world of simple bourgeois, relations of friendship and confidence can be established ; if not why neglect the charming friends one knows for a friend who may be charming but is unknown ; or who may be disagreeable whether to our eyes or to our thought ? ”

The good temper, the honesty, and the wit of Maupassant's side of this correspondence, which he had done nothing to invite, and more than once sought to terminate, have added to our admiration for him, and we wish to accentuate our opinion in view of the depreciatory tone towards this great writer which Mr. G. H. Perris has adopted in his preface.

THE TOURIST IN YORKSHIRE.

A PICTURESQUE HISTORY OF YORKSHIRE. By J. S. FLETCHER.
Vol. III. (Dent. 7s. 6d. n.)

This volume brings to a conclusion Mr. Fletcher's labours in describing the beauties of the many-acred shire. There is pleasant reading here and again in these 450 pages, and some of the views are charming. The book will possibly gratify certain hasty tourists, and pass away some idle hours of the less informed residents. But, so far as accurate information is concerned, we are bound to say that the book is of very little value, and is, indeed, very misleading. Why Mr. Fletcher, who possesses some power of writing and appreciation of scenery, should have cared to produce all this amount of well-printed material without asking any antiquary's advice, and without reading or digesting anything sound of recent date, is a complete puzzle not in any way solved by a Philistine preface. Near the beginning of this volume—which deals with the North and East Ridings—comes the account of Malton. The description of the two old churches of New Malton is faulty, but that of Old Malton Priory Church, which Gilbert Scott styled “a magnificent remain of one of the noblest periods of mediæval art,” is full of error and confusion. For instance, we are told that on the west side of the quadrangle (cloister garth) was the refectory, and “in the south-west corner a crypt over which presumably the chapter-house once stood.” If this was true the conventual arrangements of this Gilbertine house (whose male inmates Mr. Fletcher wrongly terms monks instead of canons) were the most extraordinary on record, and are quite contrary to any known plan of any known order. The fact is that the frater or refectory opened from the south alley of the cloister, and the vaulted chamber or “crypt” now under the modern abbey-house was the undercroft of the frater. The chapter-house with a crypt under it has yet to be found. There is a curious inscription below the capital of one of the pillars of the north arcade of the nave, which a tiro would know to be of fifteenth or early sixteenth century date ; of this Mr. Fletcher produces a facsimile, but assigns it to a prior who died in the twelfth century.

Starting on a tour from Malton to Helmsley the author passes through Appleton-le-Street, and remarks that it “still retains its Norman tower.” There is nothing Norman about it ; its Saxon style is perfectly obvious ; indeed, of that style it is a well-known plain example, and is of two different dates. The next village, just beyond, is Barton-le-Street, where there are most remarkable Saxon sculptures in the porch ; this is ignored, and the information given is insufficient and incorrect. Slingsby comes next, where the church was entirely rebuilt by Lord Lanerton in 1869. It is the only church within a radius of several miles of Lasingham that has no trace of Saxon work extant ; but Mr. Fletcher says that the village is “chiefly interesting because of its church, which appears to be of Saxon origin and has been carefully restored.” A mile or two further is the village of Hovingham, where the unbattered tower is mainly Saxon, but is here called Norman. The description of the great Cistercian house of Rievaulx is inadequate and incorrect, and the same must be said of the accounts of Byland Abbey and Kirkham Priory. Kirkdale church is quite celebrated, and has had much that is fairly accurate written of it during recent years, but the description in this volume is disappointingly poor.

The well-known Saxon sun-dial over the south entrance, with the most interesting church inscription in all England, is given quite wrongly and in special characters which are no more like the original than Tenterden steeple is like Goodwin Sands. A good deal less space than is occupied in giving this inscription in large type would have sufficed for a photographic picture of the original. The church of Lasingham, the early centre of the Christianity of this district, redolent of the memories of Bishops Cedd and Chad, about which some of our best ecclesiologists have of late written, is described after a halting and bewildering fashion. No archæologist of to-day can possibly believe that the present crypt is the original one of Saxon date, though there is something to be said in favour of parts of the outer walls. Turning to the East Riding the accounts are equally unhappy. Mr. Fletcher seems to have a knack of consulting out-of-date works for his ecclesiology and architectural jottings, and so gets wrong with the grand fabrics of the Minster and St. Mary's church at Beverley, of which much that is sound by Messrs. Bilson, Stevenson, Nolloth, and others has of late been written. Of Watton Priory (not “Abbey,” as Mr. Fletcher has it) the account is grievously misleading. It deserved better treatment, for in some respects its remains are the most interesting of any English religious house. It was a large Gilbertine priory, and was one of the three that remained double-houses, that is, for nuns and canons, at the time of the Suppression. Of those three Walton is the only one that has been excavated and expounded ; with the remains of the other two this is not possible. The excavations were begun in 1893 by Mr. St. John Hope and the Rev. Dr. Cox. Their explorations were no secret matter ; columns about the interesting discoveries appeared in the Yorkshire Post and Leeds Mercury, and shorter and more technical accounts in various London weekly papers. The then newly-formed East Riding Antiquarian Society paid special visits to the site, and the work was done by public subscription. The discovery and planning of the double church and the two separate cloisters was quite an event in the record of monastic work of the only order of English foundation. And yet Mr. Fletcher seems never to have heard of anything of the kind, but gives two or three pages of gossip about the place from works that are now quite out-of-date. At all events in “Picturesque Yorkshire” it might be expected that some account or an illustration would have been given of the very beautiful fifteenth century oriel of the Prior's Lodging at Watton, which is in perfect preservation. But, no, it is altogether ignored. The kindest thing to suppose is that Mr. Fletcher has never visited Watton, but simply trusted to old books, such as those by Poulson and Grange, which have long ago been worn threadbare.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Max Müller.

After reading Max Müller's LAST ESSAYS, First Series (Longmans, 5s.), we feel a natural regret that the Professor was not able, so his son tells us, before his last illness to revise and enlarge them before publication, according to his usual custom in such cases. Not, however, because of any deficiency in the treatment of his matter, but simply because the Professor's fresh, lucid, and original mind so illumined a subject that the reader inevitably wants to hear more. As it is, these papers “on Language, Folk-lore, and other subjects” are reprints of essays in the monthly reviews, or from public lectures and addresses. One which will be read with interest at the present moment is a delightful paper on “Dean Liddell as I Knew Him.” Of the others, perhaps the most generally interesting are a masterly paper on “The Savage” and a remarkable investigation of the early mnemonics in “Literature before Letters.” Another subject of importance on which the Professor had collected far more material than is here made use of is on the coincidences between Buddhism and Christianity—a contribution to the comparative study of religion, on which a further instalment of essays is to be published in the autumn. The value of these discourses lies in the fact that there is no living writer who approaches Max Müller in the faculty of presenting in an attractive form the wider aspects of scholarship—the origin of language, the relation between thought and speech, and the many subjects of research connected with the historical development of the human mind. No writer that we can think of is able as he was to address, at the same moment, both the savant and the general reader and to interest them both. One essay is a political one—on the Schleswig-Holstein question. The book is well indexed.

Handel.

In Mr. F. J. Crowest's series of "Master Musicians" (Dent, 3s. 6d. n.), Mr. C. F. Abdy Williams follows up his able little volume on Bach with HANDEL. It is difficult to say anything new about Handel's music after what so many musical specialists, such as Mr. Rocstro and Dr. Chrysander, have written; nevertheless we wish that Mr. Williams, with his sound musical knowledge, had devoted a little more space to the compositions at the expense of some of the biographical detail. The present series is ostensibly designed for the vast number of readers who nowadays take a superficial interest in music—people who crowd our concert rooms and require to be told, so to speak, what to look out for in a work of art. Handel's oratorios offer a capital opportunity for this kind of explanatory comment. The mere fact that an oratorio is music put to words makes it easier to bring out many of its essential points. We do not say that there is no musical criticism in Mr. Williams' book. He writes interestingly but briefly on Handel's instrumentation and takes a sane view on the much vexed question of Handel's plagiarisms. He makes a rapid survey of the various forms of Handel's musical activity. But he conveys a very sketchy idea of the nature of Handel's greatest works, of the cause of the immense impression they have made upon Englishmen. In accordance with his purpose Mr. Williams gives a long and admirable account of Handel's struggle for success as a writer for the musical stage, amid the opposing factions of Buononcini, Ariosti, and the rest. But it was not till Handel was fifty-five and had abandoned opera for oratorio that he composed the music which still holds such sway over the English public. Mr. Williams himself confesses that it would be hopeless to attempt a revival of Handel's operas—and the kind of reception which they would meet with may be to some extent realized since the ineffective revival of Purcell's Dido and Æneas at the Coronet Theatre the other day. No one could deny the greatness of individual songs contained in these operas. They still appear as occasional gems in concert programmes. But for various causes—the conventionalities of the opera-house in those days, burlesqued in Gay's Beggar's Opera and ridiculed by Addison in the Spectator, the tyranny of solo singers and of an audience that would not endure a chorus, and the consequent repetition of aria after aria—taken as a whole a Handelian opera is only of interest to the antiquarian. But his oratorios are still and cannot cease to be of the most vital importance; and we wish that Mr. Williams had devoted more space to bringing out the special points of interest in this wonderful series of works.

The Art of Sailing.

It is very rare, indeed, for a deepwater sailorman to know much about boats or the proper method of handling them, and it thus happens that in one branch of seamanship the amateur has the best of the most experienced "shellback." And among amateurs and yachtsmen Mr. E. F. Knight, or "Falcon" Knight, is high in the first-class by reason of his very varied experience of the sea in all kinds of crafts, from a ketch to a coble or an Arab dhow. In SMALL BOAT SAILING (Murray, 5s. n.) he has produced a handy and compact guide to sailing so far as it can be done in a book. It is a question, however, for those who have been rash enough to seek death by single-handed sailing, and are now almost old enough to know better, whether too much encouragement is not given to the inexperienced by such books as these. It is true that Mr. Knight himself deprecates his formal knowledge being substituted for experience. Nevertheless, it remains true that a clear statement of the right thing to do in a sudden difficulty reads so easily that the greenhorn is convinced that he can do it. When, however, he finds himself off a high coast in a sudden squall with a rising sea and in an open boat which will not act just as it was expected to act, the man who loses his head will not remember Mr. Knight's directions. It is, at any rate, well to remind the ambitious without knowledge that the use of such a book as the one in question is only to carry the inexperienced to the next stage in practical management. Like all books of its kind it will be of most real service to those who know almost as much as the author, and are, perhaps, preparing to sail some other kind of boat than that to which they have hitherto been accustomed. For if all seamanship is an art in which knowledge must be ready on the tongue or in the hands, small-boat sailing is that branch of it in which swiftness of decision is of the greatest importance. The worst dangers give the least time to meet them, and it is on tidal waters and near the coast that the worst dangers occur. It is at least a great point in Mr. Knight's book that, like all men who know his branch of seamanship, he is always on the side of caution, at any rate when giving advice to others. It is, perhaps, being too critical to remark that some of his own adventures given incidentally are examples of rashness which would have been better omitted. They might encourage those who are only too ready to run their heads into dangers from which neither their brains nor their endurance can extricate them.

"Wise Men and a Fool."

Mr. Coulson Kernahan's collection of articles upon literary persons, WISE MEN AND A FOOL (Ward, Lock, 3s. 6d.), does not seem to us a remarkably valuable addition to the bulk of critical matter dealing with such men as Robert Louis Stevenson, Dr. George MacDonald, Mr. Frederick Locker-Lampson, Emerson, the Brontës, Tennyson, the Brownings, and some others of the mighty dead. But it is a book the would-be reading public should like; it is addressed, it seems, rather to those who wish to interest themselves in literature than to those who have studied it or practised it. Its title indicates Mr. Kernahan's native modesty and his hearty interest in the men and women of whom he writes. His criticisms and strictures are often weighty, but his appreciations do not always produce quite the result he has intended. We have always been among the warm admirers of Mr. Frederick Locker's verse, but after reading the article entitled "A Society Poet," we are conscious of a certain sense of repulsion. Mr. Kernahan's judgments on the poet are as irreproachable as they are familiar; his quotations are well justified and yet one is disappointed both in the poet and in his critic. Perhaps it is the following little story and the way it is told that has warped our point of view:—"Once," writes Mr. Kernahan, "when he and I were chatting together at a literary 'At Home,' a guest, to whom he was only slightly known, broke into our talk by slapping him roughly on the back, exclaiming 'Well, Locker-Lampson, how are you? You never seem to get any older.' Mr. Locker replied with perfect courtesy to the effect that he was quite well, but I, who heard the emphasis with which he prefixed 'Mr.' to the offender's name, and saw the look of haughty surprise which flashed from his eyes, felt that I would rather have faced a pistol at seven paces than that look." Somehow this reminds us of a couplet written, we think, as an epitaph by Locker for himself:—

A rather sad man, still at times he was jolly,
And though hating a fool he'd a weakness for folly, and we wonder which was the folly and which the fool of Mr. Kernahan's rather pointless anecdote. The review of the work of Tennyson is one of the most valuable in the volume, and the estimate of Emerson, under the title "A Poet who was not a Poet," has a touch of insight and a note of individuality which is lacking in some of the other articles. As a whole, "Wise Men and a Fool" is a book we can recommend to those who are rightly struggling to be free of that province of art with which Mr. Coulson Kernahan deals. He is a kindly and sympathetic guide; lucid, painstaking, and earnest, even while he lacks the inspiration necessary for the highest criticism.

Religious Autobiography.

One does not often find a religious autobiography so fresh, racy, and candid as AN EVENTFUL LIFE (Cassell, 6s.). The Rev. A. J. Harrison, who is now Incumbent of S. Thomas the Martyr, Newcastle-on-Tyne, seems to have had from youth a genius for perilous adventure, and has "knocked about" the world as few clergymen have done. As a boy he almost drifted into journalism by becoming secretary to a journalistic Major. The Major, however, one day called him a liar, on which he packed up and went off after flinging the inkpot "with no small force" into the Major's face. After that he was a navy; but he eventually became a Methodist minister, and finally joined the Church of England. His main work, however, has been that of a Lecturer and Debater on Christian evidences; and he feels "a little lonely without" Mr. Bradlaugh. It is an honest, cheery, wholesome book. "I have carried the story," says Mr. Harrison, "only to 1884. If readers wish for more, well; but if they have had enough, well also." For ourselves, we vote for more.

OLD HIGHLAND DAYS (Religious Tract Society, 6s.) is the autobiography of Dr. John Kennedy, supplemented by his son Mr. H. A. Kennedy. It will be read with interest by all who knew or were influenced by this eminent Congregationalist writer and Divine, whose high qualities became well known in London during his tenure of the pastorate of the historical Stepney meeting, where he earned the title of the Nonconformist "Bishop of East London." In the early part of the book, as the title indicates, will be found some interesting reminiscences of religious life in the Highlands in the first half of the last century.

Company Law.

The large number of Joint-Stock Companies—bubble and otherwise—which have come into existence during the last few years in consequence of the increased facilities for the establishment of such companies granted by recent Legislation has naturally led to a vast development of Company-Law Literature, to which a further impetus has been given by the "Companies Act, 1900." The complications which have thus been set up are no doubt a justification for Mr. G. F. Emery's TREATISE ON COMPANY LAW (Effingham Wilson, price 21s.). The author has done his best to digest into a convenient form the large mass of incongruous material which was ready to hand, and if the result cannot quite be called a conspicuous success, the fault rests not so much with the author as with Parliament for having tinkered the subject of Company Law by a succession of piecemeal alterations instead of replacing the original "Companies Act, 1862" by a well-conceived measure of revision and consolidation. Mr. Emery begins with the modus operandi of starting a new Company, the Preparation of Articles of Association, the Register of Shareholders, the Register of Directors, the Management of Meetings, the Allotment of Shares, Contracts with Companies, and the Preparation of Prospectuses, and he ends, as so many Companies end, in "Winding-up." All these matters are dealt with in succinct form, and a person consulting the book will have no difficulty in making himself acquainted with the general principles of Company Law. We think, however, that Mr. Emery's book might have been more useful if he had amplified a good deal his information for the guidance of those engaged in the framing of Prospectuses. This is an important matter which has received a good deal of attention from his Majesty's Judges during the last half-a-dozen years, and their opinions on the right and the wrong way of framing Prospectuses, if set out more fully than Mr. Emery has done, would certainly have enhanced the up-to-date value of his labours. Finally, the entire absence of marginal notes and chapter summaries materially lessens the usefulness of the book as a book of reference for people who are in a hurry—and nowadays we are all in a hurry—and the Index does not compensate for these omissions.

The Netherlands.

Miss Ruth Putnam's translation of Professor Blok's HISTORY OF THE PEOPLE OF THE NETHERLANDS continues to appear. There are to be five parts in all, and Part III. (Putnam's, 12s. 6d.), dealing with the war with Spain, is now before us. This is the best known and also the most interesting period of Dutch history, and it is in the relation of the thrilling events involved that Professor Blok most clearly exhibits his qualities and defects as an historian. The qualities are learning, thoroughness, exhaustiveness. From the point of view of the scientific school, the work would appear to have been so done that it need not be done over again. Professor Blok was entitled to say the last word on the subject, and he has said it. The pity is that he is so appallingly uninteresting and undramatic. His most thrilling stories fail to thrill, and his heroes cut unheroic figures. Take the story of the siege of Leyden, and the opening of the dikes, for instance:—

The water was still low. A fortnight more passed without action. Suddenly, on September 20th, a north-westerly storm broke. The water rose higher and higher, and the fleet sailed on, though under difficulties. The Spaniards in the dikes tried in vain to repel these newcomers. Finally, on October 2nd, the beleaguering force, fearing the rising water, stealthily retreated. It was just in time.

Compare that with Motley. It is like comparing one of Lord Kitchener's despatches with Napier's description of Albuera or the storming of Badajoz. One can say the same of Professor Blok's account of the siege of Haarlem, in which that gallant woman warrior, Kenau Hasselaar, is not even so much as mentioned. One might say the same of many other episodes. The book, in short, is a monument of erudition, presented in a form repellently austere. One misses the lights and shades by which the historian, who is also a literary artist, enables the reader to see at a glance which are the important and which the unimportant events. The book, in short, will do more to facilitate than to popularize the study of Dutch annals. But the fact that we found it tedious must not blind us to its value. Students may feel no affection for the book, but they will not be able to do without it.

Mr. D. H. MacGregor's LORD MACAULAY (Cambridge University Press) won the members' prize in 1900, and is a good prize essay as prize essays go. The criticism of Macaulay's ballads is particularly apt.

THE CRY OF THE POOR (Digby, Long, 3s. 6d.) contains an account of the experiences of Mr. R. H. Sherard travelling "as a pariah" in some of the chief towns of the United Kingdom. The tour was undertaken as "a literary commission," and records solely facts and not conclusions—the facts being sometimes rather uncertain, as in the case of the rate of wages at Belfast. The book contains, however, a good many data, well strung together, on which the social reformer may work. The worst individual Mr. Sherard seems to have met with is the "Edinburgh loafer."

ENGLAND'S PHANTOM ARMY (Sands, 1s.) is an anonymous pamphlet on Mr. Brodrick's Army reorganization scheme, which it rakes with scathing criticism.

A new edition of Dr. Ogilvie's ENGLISH DICTIONARY (Blackie, 2s.) has a supplement "containing words recently introduced"—not into the language but into the dictionary.

There is a good deal of useful matter in Mr. W. H. Webbe's PIANIST'S A B C PRIMER AND GUIDE (Forsyth). Mr. Webbe takes a wide view of the pianist's requirements, providing him with a brief sketch of musical history, a descriptive catalogue of pianists and composers, a list of "What Music to Play" in several grades, a bibliography, and even a guide to music publishers, in addition to the usual chapters on the practice and theory of music. To include so much he is compelled to be a little summary on important matters—e.g., he defines such an essential thing as "touch" without giving any hints how to acquire it. But if only as a book of reference, and it is much more, the primer is well worth some of the pianist's pocket-money.

ART.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

In giving so much of their wall space this year to portraits the Royal Academy, it must be confessed, is not altogether unmindful of the material side of art. It is a secret none too zealously guarded that the placing of a commission to paint a portrait with a member of the Academy occasionally implies that the portrait will hang in Burlington House. This is not necessarily prejudicial to good work. Nevertheless, the "outsider" has less certainty of being "hung," and his chances of obtaining sitters is lessened accordingly. Even here, however, the hanging committee has been unusually kind this year, and the painters may be expected to benefit thereby. An artist who has to make a living by his brush can hardly quarrel with the spirit which dominates contemporary art. And bad as many of the portraits are, they are better, taken in the bulk, than the subject pictures. It might well be asked, for instance, whether her late Majesty is not more honoured by Benjamin Constant's inadequate portrait than by the subject pictures suggested by the close of the longest reign. The portrait proves what we have always believed—that the French painter is seldom successful with women's portraits. He represents them abroad more or less as unabashed advertisements for magnificent jewellery. In England he bestows upon the late Queen but few queenly attributes. If we feel this, however, with the most ambitious effort in portraiture, what good is there to be said of the subject pictures—of W. L. Wyllie's nerveless and mechanical "Passing of a Great Queen" and Mr. John Charlton's photographic and laboured "2nd February, 1901"? Neither has much excuse for its existence in the age of that flickering reality the biograph.

We see, then, how successfully the ideal evades the painters of to-day. Mr. Herbert Draper, in particular, fails to interest us in his Iseult, and his Tristram is wanting in the vigour of the age of abundant manhood. The most illustrative of all the failures, however, is probably the Hon. John Collier's "Venusberg." The ideal is so well brought down to the period of Voyagey carpets that the picture, in spite of the undeniable qualities of strong draughtsmanship and not unpleasant colour, is almost improper. It is so true to fact, so deficient in emotion. Then there is Mr. Tuke's "The Coming of Day." Again the ideal is so misunderstood that the plain person wonders why the sleeping figures are so famine-stricken and uncomfortable, and what the upstanding misty, but not mysterious, spright expects to do next. It is better to have the idealized reality of Mr. Clausen's "Golden Barn," or Mrs. Stanhope Forbes' "Gypsy," than the materialized ideality of Mr. A. T. Nowell's "Awakening of Spring," and the President's "Helena and Hermia." Two pictures in this class arrest attention. They are Mr. Hacker's "The Cloud," and Mr. H. Gandy's "The Finding of Ophelia." Both suggest thought and invention. It is true that Mr. Hacker's principal figure is only a very little more than a skilful painting of the nude; but it is that little more, and the precious quality of thought finds expression in the subsidiary figures, particularly in the contrast suggested by the lowest head. In Mr. Gandy's picture imagination plays an even greater part. The artist is expected to carry us further than the narrator. His province, properly understood, is to be satisfactorily definite even when portraying the merely imaginary, for he should be able to realize a fancy with more sureness than the most skilful writer. Mr. Gandy's picture is a fitting illustration of our point:—

Fell in the weeping brook. Her clothes spread wide,
And, mermaid-like, a while they bore her up;
. but long it could not be,
Till that her garments, heavy with their drink,
Pulled the poor wretch from her melodious lay
To muddy death.

This is all the poet has to tell, and upon so slight a text the painter carries on with much beauty the story of "The Finding of Ophelia." It is realized imagination, lovingly painted landscape, the actors well conceived and the drowned Ophelia beautiful to the end. It offers a true illustration of the artist's mission, while Mr. Penrose's "Queen Margaret of Anjou and the Robber," Blair Leighton's "The Accolade," Seymour Lucas' Wolsey picture and Chevallier Taylor's "Honi soit qui mal y pense," show that the artist who regards himself merely as an illustrator leaves us unmoved. The same difference accounts for the failure or success of the landscape painter. The same power to see beyond a merely capable topographical illustration is at the root of our admiration for Corot and his followers and for our own Frederick Walker and George Mason. It is thus that the dexterity of Sidney Cooper and H. W. B. Davis, of Ernest Parton, Clayton Adams, and B. W. Leader fail when compared with the insight, the temperament of George Clausen, Arnesby Brown, David Farquharson, Colin Hunter, Julius Olsson, and of David Murray, E. A. Waterlow, and E. J. Gregory, when at their best. And it is when tried by the touchstone of temperament that so many popular painters fail. W. L. C.

FICTION.

Tales that are well Told.

TALES THAT ARE TOLD (Methuen, 6s.), by Miss Mary Findlater and Miss Jane Helen Findlater, are those for which we have the warmest welcome and the most attentive ear. That the respective authors of "Over the Hills" and "The Green Graves of Balgowrie" should do nothing mean, in the literary sense, is a foregone conclusion, but that they should be able to give us a collection of six such delightful and graceful stories as the present volume contains is a cause for sincere congratulation. Where all are good, Miss Mary Findlater is at her best in the story, which covers some 100 pages, called "My Little Hester." Apart from the note of mysticism and the excellent use of humour in it, there is a sense of gentleness, of love and beauty, which only an artist can get into his work. It contains in a marked degree that indefinite quality of charm which no laborious artisan can capture, and which is given only occasionally to writers of fiction. We know that some consider it but indifferent taste to compare one living writer with another. But the standard is a convenient one, and at the risk of giving offence we must say how pleasantly Miss Mary Findlater recalls our early memories of the work of Mrs. Richmond Ritchie. It is not, of course, that there is the slightest hint of plagiarism, but the same delicate and tender spirit which informed the novels of Miss Thackeray is to be found within the covers of "Tales That Are Told." In the work of both the Miss Findlaters the characters are real and sympathetic, and the quaint, quiet air, the reserved force and humour of their stories will make them live for many a day. Among the others, "Life's Deceitful Morning" is extremely interesting and entertaining. It tells how a young girl who had had the advantage of "finishing" at the historical West Country school kept by Mistress Hannah More changes from a would-be romantic little fool into a wise and gentle woman. How this came about the reader must find for himself. In so doing, and in reading the other stories, we can assure him of some pleasant hours, for the authors have wit and grace, insight, courage, dignity, and delicacy, and they give us of all of these freely in "Tales That Are Told."

Dedications.

The dedications which occasionally appear in the forefront of novels are very welcome to a reviewer. They indicate immediately something of the point of view of the author. "To all who have helped me, especially to my Aunt, Anna Cunningham Graham," writes Miss Graham Hope after the title page of A CARDINAL AND HIS CONSCIENCE (Smith, Elder, 6s.), and one feels at once that we shall encounter the careful work of an earnest writer and grateful egoist. How useful thus to be assured that we shall not be overdone with would-be humour or undone by an indiscretion. Miss Hope's inscription is not belied; her historical novel is a careful and often effective piece of writing. The House of Guise may be said to be the background and the Cardinal of Lorraine the hero. The members of the House are not much like human beings; the heart of their desires is not made clear to us, but the love of the Cardinal for the Calvinist lady is well depicted and the point of conscience which arises is extremely interesting. It saves a rather artificial and occasionally dull book from the charge of commonplace; it proves that with courage and a knowledge of life Miss Hope might, even independently of her aunt, easily become a writer of some achievement.

"Dedicated to C— my C— 'Verona's summer hath not such a flower'" is "Victoria Cross's" way of indicating the inner spirit of ANNA LOMBARD (Long, 6s.). The over-strained note of "To C— my C—" is sounded too often throughout the extraordinary story supposed to be told by a young gentleman, Gerald Ethridge, "who had come out at the head of the Indian Civil Service Examination and been granted the coveted position of Assistant Commissioner." It is perhaps characteristic of a certain contempt in the author for the art of convincing her readers that she chooses to tell her tale through the mouth of a man. The talk between Ethridge and his friends robs the book of much vraisemblance. This, for example, at the Commissioner's great dance:—"Well, Gerald, old man, what makes you look so awfully blue? Come and have a pick-me-up, a bitter or something is just what you want." "A bitter" is quaint, but there are stranger things to be found in the conversations of "Victoria Cross's" mere men. When, however, she deals with a woman's passionate love she seems endowed with an intuition far outrunning common experience. Anna Lombard loves two men at once and is so entirely non-moral as to think nothing of living with both. The daughter of a general and the heiress of a thousand conventions, she is sometimes mysteriously Greek, sometimes Oriental, and sometimes Machiavellian. She is generally wicked and always interesting; this can hardly be said for her lovers, but the author endows them with an air of romance and sets them in scenes of gorgeous Eastern colouring so that one forgets something of right and wrong as they are understood in the Occident. "Anna Lombard," like several other clever novels, is not intended, at least is not suitable, for the young. The seasoned reader will not, perhaps, be the better for reading this strange and contradictory book, but he will find in it many a fine passage, many a brilliant picture of life and emotion.

A waiter sees a good deal of the world, especially if he, like Mr. Jerome K. Jerome's friend Henri, for so he prefers to call himself, is cosmopolitan. OBSERVATIONS OF HENRY (Arrowsmith, 1s.) is very cheerful and amusing, and each of the five "observations" is in its way original and express the point of view of a waiter in a waiter's diction. "The Surprise of Mr. Milberry" is highly farcical; "The Ghost of the Marchioness of Appleford" is that also and a story of true love in low life as well. As Henri says, "Whether a man's running away from a thing or running after a thing, he stops at a hotel on his way"; and this particular waiter has observed at many inns of strange meetings, with the result that what he tells to Mr. Jerome makes a pleasant addition to the comfort of a Pullman or the leisure of an easy chair.

If variety still be considered charming, STRANGE HAPPENINGS (Methuen, 6s.), a collection of stories by H. D. Lowry, W. Clark Russell, W. E. Morris, Grant Allen, W. Beir, L. Cope Cornford, Beatrice O'Connor, Martin Ross, Frank Bird, L. Galbraith, Mrs. Fleming, F. C. Philips, H. B. Marriott-Watson, Hamlin Garland, Francis Prevost, and Clara Savile-Clarke should please, for its variety is infinite. It is a book for the shelves of the guests' chamber. Those who are not interested by Mr. Clark Russell may like Mr. Philips or Mr. Lowry, and those who care for none of the three can range at large among the other fifteen contes with a certainty of finding amusement. Mr. Lowry's story of the walled-off grave in the churchyard at Landane is a rather painful account of the bitterness of "decent women" to one of their own sex.

Mr. Carlton Dawe in CLAUDIA POLE (Hutchinson, 6s.) maintains a dead level of mediocrity. The framework is skilful enough, but the incidents are commonplace and the conversation is wearisome. The hero is a man who gains the good graces of his lady-love by his bravery in the siege of Ladysmith. Claudia herself is elaborately portrayed, but she hardly struggles into life. Judicious compression would have improved the story, as would also the omission of Mr. Dawe's frequent interventions in the rôle of moralist and philosopher.

RUNNING 'AMOK (Chatto and Windus, 6s.) is a thrilling tale of adventure in the Malay Peninsula. There seems to be no limit to the fertility of Mr. Manville Fenn's imagination, and it is well illustrated in the situations in which the treachery of a native rajah involves the gallant South Surrey Rangers, and in the diverse characters of the British officers. The local colour derived from first-hand experience and the pictures of Oriental life are effective enough.

The main interest of A BEAR SQUEEZE, by Mr. McDonnell Bodkin (Ward, Lock, 2s.), a tale of Stock Exchange manœuvres, turns on the strong resemblance of a mother and a daughter to each other. Love is proverbially blind, but that a husband and a brace of lovers should be misled by the likeness puts somewhat of a strain on the average man's credulity. The story is brightly written and readable.

Correspondence.

JINGO.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I believe that I was the unintentional cause of this word becoming famous, and you may care to print the ground of my belief.

In December, 1877, I went to Australia, and, not knowing how long my stay might last, I took a round of theatres and one or two music-halls before I started. At the Oxford I heard MacDermott sing the famous four lines, which I need not quote. I was immensely tickled with them as a piece of blatant swagger, for, in spite of the Saturday Review, it was in that sense that they were sung and emphasized.

Before sailing I sent the lines to the late John Mylne of Oxford-square, a dear old College friend long since dead. There is no harm in mentioning his name because very many Oxford men regret him. Sir George Otto Trevelyan had married his first cousin, and a few days after my letter was written Mylne met Sir George at his wife's home, Welcombe, near Stratford-on-Avon, and read him the lines.

Sir George was tickled, and it happened that he left the Christmas party to address his constituents at the Scotch Burghs he represented. He quoted the lines in his amusing way; this passage in the speech caught the public ear; the lines began to be quoted, and soon the word was detached.

This tallies with Mr. Holyoake's contention, mentioned by you to-day. But it is no after-thought on my part. Mylne's first letter to me in Australia mentioned to me that my quotation to him had borne fruit. He said that he had read them to Sir George, as I have said; that he had taken them down and used them in a speech; that they had "caught on" and were beginning to give rise to a separate word.

I have frequently mentioned the matter in conversation, and now (if at all) it seems worthy of print, since the great "Dictionary" has given a first source, and has not gone far enough back. Christmas, 1877, was a time when it seemed likely we should fight Russia. I am, &c., C. S. OAKLEY.

The Hove Club, Fourth-avenue, Hove, May 18, 1901.

[Sir George (then Mr.) Trevelyan's speech at Selkirk, containing a quotation of the song in question, is reported at length in The Times of Jan. 12, 1878.—Ed.]

SHAKESPEARE AND THE GUNPOWDER PLOT. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—May I be allowed in concluding this discussion briefly to indicate the line taken by "Your Reviewer"? He began by citing the supposed allusion to Father Garnett in Macbeth, as a point ignored by me and fatal to my assertion that Shakespeare nowhere mentions the Gunpowder Plot. In reply, I pointed out that I had referred specifically to this very passage.

Thereupon, saying no word on this subject, he went off to the minor question of the relative frequency of Garnett's various aliases, declaring that examination of original authorities forced him to contradict me on this point. I cited original evidence which undoubtedly strongly corroborates my view, requesting him to indicate in return that which favours his. He responds by reverting to Macbeth, quotes from my book the reference which originally he said was not there, and declares that, the thread of my argument being hard to follow, he must respectfully decline to continue the controversy which I have raised. If he cannot substantiate and will not withdraw the charges which he chose to volunteer, his best course is undoubtedly that which he now proposes.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

JOHN GERARD, S.J.

31, Farm-street, Berkeley-square, W., May 18.

* * We are not aware that our Reviewer has advanced any "charges" which are not substantiated or which ought to be withdrawn. The relative frequency of Garnett's aliases is certainly not a minor point, but one which lies at the centre of the discussion, for the question whether Shakespeare refers to the Plot depends largely upon the question whether "Farmer" was or was not a favourite alias of Garnett's. Our space will hardly permit of any lengthy statement of evidence on this point; but quite as much "original evidence" (to say the least) has been produced in the course of this correspondence to show that it was a favourite alias of Garnett's as by Father Gerard on the other side. Our Reviewer found the arguments adduced by Father Gerard "hard to follow" only, of course, because they appeared to him quite unsubstantial. With reference to the first part of Father Gerard's letter, we must agree with what our Reviewer has already pointed out—that, although Father Gerard in his book "What was the Gunpowder Plot?" recognizes a "doubtful reference to equivocation in Macbeth," it is certainly unfortunate that in his index to the book should appear the statement "Shakespeare never alludes to the Plot." We may perhaps return to the origin of the discussion by quoting in full the remark originally made by our Reviewer with reference to Father Gerard:—"One of the chief arguments recently employed by Father Gerard in order to demolish 'the traditional story,' was that no reference to the Plot is ever made in the plays of Shakespeare." This (with the exception possibly of the word "chief") remains entirely uncontradicted. The subject has been so fully discussed in other quarters that we cannot afford space to continue it.—Ed.

THE NATIONAL HOME-READING UNION. TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Had it not been for the war in South Africa and the great national bereavement, there can be little doubt that the celebration of the Millenary of King Alfred's death would have been one of the most notable events of the year. Yet, although the celebration cannot now attain to the importance as a national festival which its promoters originally contemplated, no passing events can rob it of its significance; nor is the city of Winchester, in which the representatives of Universities and learned societies will shortly assemble, any less interesting as the capital of the great King. Its thousand years of association with his name and fame make it in a peculiar sense the birth-place of English national life, and its abundant historic monuments mirror the successive developments of this life with very singular fulness. Will you allow me to call the attention of your readers to the Summer Assembly which the National Home-Reading Union has arranged to hold at Winchester from June 22, when the Mayor has kindly promised to welcome the visitors until June 29, when the members of the Assembly will disperse, visiting Athelney, King Alfred's refuge in his darkest days, or Wantage, the scene of his decisive battle with the Danes, on their way to their respective homes? During the week lectures will be given by Dean Stubbs, author of "God's Englishmen, the Prophets and Kings of England," the Bishop of Bristol on "King Alfred as a Religious Man and an Educationalist," Professor Skeat on "The King's English; Alfred the Great to Edward VII.," Rev. Dugald MacFadyen on "Alfred, the King of the West Saxons," the Dean of Winchester on "Winchester Cathedral," Mr. N. C. H. Nisbett on "Wolsey Castle," Dr. T. J. Lawrence, sometime Deputy Whewell Professor of International Law at Cambridge, on "Alfred as Statesman and Lawyer" (four lectures), Mr. Philip Wicksteed on "Alfred as a Man of Letters" (four lectures), Mr. J. E. Marr, F.R.S., Sec. G.S., on "The Application of Geology to Scenery" (four lectures) and others.

The course last named indicates a secondary purpose of the meeting—namely, the study of the geology and botany of the district, as well as its archaeology. The afternoons of the Assembly will be devoted to visits to the places and monuments associated with the great King's fame, as well as to the exploration of the memorials of mediæval times, with which the district abounds, such, for example, as the Cathedral, Wolsey Castle, Hyde Abbey and the Hospital of St. Cross, where the "Wayfarer's Dole" of bread and beer is still given to strangers who ask it.

The Assembly is open to all who obtain tickets from the Secretary, N.H.R.U., Surrey-house, Victoria-embankment, W.C.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ALEX. HILL.

Master of Downing College, Cambridge.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

A new life of Josephine, by an American author, Mr. Frederick A. Ober, will be issued shortly by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Mr. Ober has taken Joseph Aubenas' "Histoire de l'Impératrice Joséphine" (Paris, 1857) as his basis, and, like Aubenas, he has made a special examination of all available material in Martinique, having a personal knowledge of the Caribbean island in which the daughter of the Creole planter was born. He is the author of "Camps in the Caribbees" and "In the Wake of Columbus," which deal to a certain extent with Martinique and its history. The story, however, gives due prominence to the later chapters in the Empress's life, and includes Napoleon's love letters and numerous illustrations.

"The Story of the Stock Exchange," a natural sequel to last Saturday's centenary, has been written by Mr. Duguid, and will shortly be published by Mr. Grant Richards, illustrated by Mr. Joseph Pennell and Mr. Dudley Hardy. The author traces the history of the stock market back to days long before the present "Exchange" was built.

Mr. Fisher Unwin on Monday week will add to his collection of books on China and the Far East another volume on "China Under the Searchlight," by Mr. W. A. Carnaby, of the Church Missionary Society, editor of the "Chung-si-chaio-hui-pao."

Messrs. Duckworth announce a study of the life and works of "Peter Abélard," by Joseph McCabe, author of "Twelve Years in a Monastery"; and a portion is devoted to the romance of Abélard and Héloïse, giving quotations from the letters of the lovers.

The Cambridge University Press will shortly publish a volume of "Renderings of Church Hymns from Eastern and Western Books," by the Rev. Robert Maude Moorsom, who suggests that the Church of England should include in its Book of Praise the Liturgical chants of the Eastern Churches. Dr. Neale translated about sixty of these half a century ago, and only last year the Rev. John Brownlie, of Portpatrick, published a collection of forty-six "Hymns of the Greek Church"; but they are still comparatively little known. Mr. Moorsom's versions are to appear with music by the Rev. G. W. Griffith and Mr. W. S. de Winton. Another publication shortly forthcoming from the Cambridge Press is Part I. of "The Prayer-Book Explained," by the Rev. Percival Jackson, dealing with the Daily Offices and the Litany.

The next volume of the "Artist's Library" (Unicorn Press), which is nearly ready, deals with Constable, and is written by Mr. C. J. Holmes, who started the series with his book on "Hokusai." "Constable" will be followed by "Van Dyck," in two volumes, by Mr. Lionel Cust, who is also preparing "The Chatsworth Van Dyck Sketch Book" for the same publishers.

Mr. Frank Hollings, of 7, Great Turnstile, Holborn, announces a limited edition of an enlarged reprint of the "Notes for a Bibliography of Edward FitzGerald," by Colonel W. F. Prideaux, C.S.I. It contains some notes on Crabbe, never previously reprinted in England, and a back view of FitzGerald at his harmonium, from a sketch by Charles Keene.

Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co., have just sent to press a new work on "Psychology, Normal and Morbid," by Charles Mercier, M.B., M.R.C.P., the author, among other books, of "The Nervous System and the Mind," and "Sanity and Insanity." It is primarily intended as an introduction to the study of insanity, but gives a general survey of mental processes and their bearing upon conduct.

Messrs. Bousfield announce "Secret Chambers and Hiding Places of Great Britain," by Allan Fea, dealing with traditions about Priests' Holes, Secret Chambers, &c., illustrated.

Mrs. Everard Cotes (Sara Jeannette Duncan) has written a book of personal impressions—especially of an Indian garden—which Messrs. Methuen are publishing.

On the other side of the Atlantic Messrs. Harper are experimenting with an "American Novel Series," written for the most part by new American writers, who deal with different phases of American life. The third in the series—"Martin Brook," by Morgan Bates—will shortly appear in London. It is a religious love story.

Messrs. Putnam announce a new cyclopædia, "Five Thousand Facts and Fancies," dealing, among other things, with curious literary productions, mythological and historical characters, political and slang terms and derivations. The author is Mr. William H. Phye, best known for his "Seven Thousand Words often Mispronounced," a book which is now in its 51st thousand.

Messrs. Houghton Mifflin have brought out a fresh edition of Adams' "A Dictionary of American Authors," with 1,000 new names, and of "The American Library Association Index."

Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co. have transferred their City warehouse to St. Andrew's-hill.

The export business of the late Mr. Th. Wohlleben (50, Great Russell-street), has been taken over by Messrs. Kegan Paul.

NOTES AND NEWS.—At last we have the pleasure of recording some doings by the world's champion. Herr Lasker suddenly left Manchester for an engagement at the celebrated Manhattan C.C., where he encountered in single-handed matches some of the American experts. Interesting games, of course, resulted. One of these games was with Mr. J. Finn, the New York State champion, and the concluding position, where the game was abandoned as drawn, is here appended. It may easily be that white had here a winning advantage, and we shall be glad to publish brief analysis if a win on either side can be demonstrated.

WHITE. FINN.
Black played here B-Kt8. What result? Can White win?

AMATEUR TOURNAMENTS.—The leading first-class players have plenty of good things provided for them just now. At Folkestone, on Monday and three following days, there is an excellent meeting arranged by the Kent County Association, Mr. W. W. White returning, for the time at least, to his old post of managing hon. secretary. The Glasgow Exhibition has given the Scottish players an opportunity of arranging a series of tournaments for this and next week, which ought to bring numerous entries. Then we have a new and startling announcement of an open tournament for amateurs at 37, King-street, Covent-garden (the old premises of the British C.C.), for which Mr. J. T. Herbert Bailey will give three prizes value 20 guineas, seven guineas, and five guineas respectively. This ought to be good enough to bring more than the 20 entries required. Intending competitors must make up their minds—a very difficult thing by the way for chess players to do—by May 31. Only one game per week need be played. We do not care for this rule. A tournament which goes ahead and finishes within 14 or 21 days is better. The Morning Post refers to the question of amateurs receiving money prizes, and to the exclusion of the professionals from all such contests. These are matters of some importance, and they are worthy of full consideration. But the City of London C.C. and various other associations have long ago settled one point by giving substantial money prizes, which are readily, if not greedily, accepted. A central and governing chess association might deal with such matters with authority.

THE SPANISH OPENING.—Ruy Lopez, the old chess master of the sixteenth century, is not likely to be forgotten, for the opening which bears his name is in more general use than any other. It is fitting, therefore, that there should be issued in Barcelona a treatise on the subject. Such is really the work, entitled "La Apertura Española ó Ruy Lopez," by Señor J. Capó Gonzalez. Several hundreds of variations of the Ruy Lopez are given, with copious notes and references to the players. There is also a brief glance at the history of chess in Spain. The volume is nicely printed and is intended to be one of a series.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

We shall publish next week a special "Edinburgh Number" containing illustrated articles on the literary history of Edinburgh, famous Edinburgh periodicals and publishing houses, literary landmarks, &c., with a "Personal View" by Mr. William Wallace on Scottish Fiction.

The "LITERATURE" PORTRAIT in the same number will be that of a distinguished alumnus of Edinburgh University, Dr. A. Conan Doyle. The portrait which we shall reproduce is one drawn from life by Mr. Mortimer Menpes during Dr. Conan Doyle's visit to South Africa.

The vicissitudes of the Figaro have not ceased since the appearance of our note upon the subject; and a further instalment of commotion will probably be forthcoming when the adjourned meeting of the shareholders takes place in the middle of June. Then it may be possible to determine how far the recent coup d'état is attributable to the natural desire of M. de Poidatz to retain his privilege, which seemed to be threatened, of giving gratuitous financial advice to the readers of that journal. In the meantime, it is interesting to note that M. Périvier, having fought his way to the editorial chair at the revolver's mouth, and with the moral support of the master-printer, announces his intention of making the Figaro once more what it was in the days of de Villemessant and Francis Magnard. That means, supposing that the programme can be carried out, that the Figaro will cease, in the first place to be earnest, and in the second place to be literary.

We said something about de Villemessant last week, and probably made it clear that earnestness was no part of his scheme. He was no less strongly convinced that literature was out of place in a newspaper that prided itself on being up to date; and he said so, in no measured terms, to M. Jouvin, one of the most literary of his contributors. "Your articles are polished and scholarly," he said to M. Jouvin, "but I am persuaded that, in the Figaro, no one ever reads them." Jouvin protested, and de Villemessant proposed a test. "I propose," he said, "to print an un-Parliamentary expression right in the middle of one of your finest sentences, and I will wager what you like that no one ever discovers that it is there." Daudet, who tells the story, says that Jouvin dared not make the bet.

No account of the Figaro is complete which does not recognize the services rendered to it by Francis Magnard. He, like de Villemessant, was a self-made man—the illegitimate son of a washerwoman who made it her one aim in life to give him a good bourgeois education. He had a hard struggle with fortune, giving lessons at two francs an hour, until de Villemessant discovered him. Then he developed into the best leaderette-writer in Paris. He wrote the leaderettes of which the average man infallibly said when he read them:—"Exactly what I thought myself. And admirably put!" He always signed them, and "le Magnard" came to be the name given to this feature of the paper. Recently these leaderettes have been written by M. Cornély. They were delightfully pungent and witty, but apt to stroke some persons the wrong way. The new leaderette-writer is M. Henri des Houx of the Matin. He is a Nationalist and a good all-round journalist, but his work, as compared with that of his predecessors, seems to lack distinction.

The Lady Mayoress, Miss Kathleen Haydn Green, who is the granddaughter of Joseph Haydn, of "The Dictionary of Dates," has herself strayed into the land of letters, having published a volume of verse in 1899. She is about to establish a precedent by being the first Lady Mayoress to publish a book during her tenure of office. Her new book will be published immediately by Mr. John Lane. It is entitled "Twelve Allegories."

The approaching millenary of Alfred the Great adds some interest to the announcement that the Winklebury estate at Basingstoke, with its ancient camp, is to be put up for auction next month. The West Saxons are believed to have occupied this camp when they fought the Danes at Basing in 870, shortly after their victory, under Alfred and Ethelred, over the invaders at Ashdown. But Winklebury Camp dates back to far remoter days than those of Alfred. It was probably constructed by the ancient Britons possibly 3,000 years ago. Mr. Reginald Smith, of the British Museum, has just unearthed further fragments of ancient British pottery on the estate, with bones and other relics bearing traces of fire. These discoveries confirm Mr. Smith's investigations of last autumn, which pointed to a burial of the bronze period. The camp has a circumference of 1,100 yards, and its formation resembles other defensive works of the ancient Britons. It stands close to the great Roman road which crosses the county from Winchester to Silchester, and the Romans must have occupied the camp some time between 55 B.C. and 410 A.D. It was last occupied by Cromwell's troops during the siege of Basing House, 1643-45, and since then it has been neglected, until within the last year or two, even by antiquarians.

"This stone marks the grave of Jean Lorimer, the 'Chloris' and 'Lassie wi' the lint-white locks' of the poet Burns. Born 1775. Died 1831. Erected under the auspices of the Ninety Burns Club, Edinburgh, 1901." This is the inscription on a cross of light grey granite which has just been put up in Preston-street burial ground, Edinburgh. Burns addressed some delightful verses to Jean Lorimer, but her story is an unhappy one. While still in her teens she was married to a spendthrift named Whelpdale, from whom she was forced to separate after a few months. Afterwards when her father failed in business the sting of poverty added to her troubles. Such was the lot of the girl whose beauty inspired the poet—

Ah ! Chloris, since it may not be
That thou of love will hear ;
If from the lover thou maun flee
Yet let the friend be dear.

Tho' a' my daily care thou art
And a' my nightly dream
I'll hide the struggle in my heart
And say it is esteem.

Burns refers constantly to Chloris's flaxen hair—

Sae flaxen were her ringlets
Her eyebrows of a darker hue
Bewitchingly o'erarching
Twa laughing e'en of bonnie blue.

but he afterwards owned, in a correspondence with George Thompson (evidently a connoisseur in beauty) that "flaxen locks cannot enter into an elegant description of beauty." There is another piece of self-criticism in the same letter, touching Burns' bad habit of introducing classical terminology into his characteristically Scotch songs :—

In my by-past songs I dislike one thing—the name Chloris.
I meant it as the fictitious name of a certain lady ; but, on second thoughts, it is a high incongruity to have a Greek appellation to a Scotch pastoral ballad.

Jean Lorimer was born at Craigieburn, close to "Willie's Mill," the scene of the immortal "Willie brew'd a Peck of Maut."

Our Universities could learn a good deal from the sister establishments in America, if only their rulers and their wealthy alumni ever turned their eyes westwards. Harvard has lately purchased 400 acres of land on the shore of a lake in New Hampshire where a summer camp will be established for a course in surveying. Wisconsin has determined to have special courses on journalism, expert work in statistics, and practical philanthropy. Pennsylvania is spending £80,000 for a complete equipment for graduate work in engineering of all kinds. Yet these progressive institutions are some of them becoming venerable with age. The University of Georgia celebrates its centenary on June 12. Its charter was granted in 1785, but it did not begin operations till 1801. Such developments as we have mentioned and many others are of course chiefly due to the large benefactions of wealthy Americans which are constantly announced. Even in England it seems to be the American millionaire who is most ready to help University endowments.

THE RIVER AND THE GIRL.

(From the Swedish of Viktor Rydberg.)

Pretty child who gaily splashest
In my waves thy breast, and flashest
Like the fairest water-lily, pure and white on billows free,
Ah, what varied lot lies hiding
In the future, thee betiding,
Whilst my purling stream unruffled laves the birch and alder tree.

I have not, like thee, to measure
Days of sorrow, days of pleasure,
For my waves that none can number flow on smoothly to the sea.
Thou a bud shalt bloom a woman,
Loving, loved, in all things human,
Whilst my river's stream in silence wanders through the peaceful lea.

Lovely child, in heart and thinking
Cool and fresh as wavelets sprinkling—
Fairest lily I have cradled, pure and white on billows free—
In a while thou shalt be dreaming Dreams of love so wond'rous seeming
Whilst my purling stream unruffled laves the birch and alder tree.

In a while thou shalt be kneeling
In thy bride's veil, near thee feeling
Him whom thou hast rendered happy by thy heart's election free.
In a while thou shalt be pressing
In thine arms a mother's blessing
Whilst my river's stream in silence wanders through the peaceful lea.

Dim, mysterious fate's subjection—
Hope and death and blithe affection—
I embrace when I embrace thee, pretty child, on billows free.
Some few sun's quick revolution
And thy riddle finds solution
Whilst my purling stream unruffled laves the birch and alder tree.

Ah, my flowing stream will never Reach the goal that's thine for ever,
Which by human joy is shadowed and by human misery.
Thou must to the grave be going,
Dying like red sunsets glowing,
Whilst my river's stream in silence wanders through the peaceful lea.

W. F. HARVEY.

The extracts which The Times has been printing from its issues of 1801 have inspired a correspondent in America to look up the American papers of that year. The Independent Chronicle and Universal Advertiser was then printed at Boston every Monday and Thursday for $3 per annum, and it is one of the very few papers of that period whose files have been preserved. The issue at the opening of the year is numbered 2,063, so that the paper must have been running for some years. In an article "On Newspapers" it remarks :—

The pleasure derived from the page of a newspaper is perhaps more fully enjoyed in America than any other part of the Globe. Living remote from the theatre of those politics that cement or disunite the nations of Europe, Americans cannot be otherwise than eager news-mongers ; and therefore the surprize of a stranger should not be excited if, instead of enquiring after his health, his new trans-Atlantic acquaintances demand from him the news.

If presses have been multiplied on the American continent from the Delaware to the Ohio, it was not to print books and diffuse a love of literature, but to publish newspapers and disseminate intelligence. It is from newspapers that the mass of the people derive their knowledge.

This sounds modern enough ; but that it did not always hold good in the opinion of the Editor of the Chronicle may be gathered from the following extract from a later issue. Criticizing the "New England Palladium," he says:—

Columns long and tedious, columns of uninteresting harangue forbid even a glance at the paper, unless where the grates of a prison shut out all amusement, or the sick chamber seeks for something to lull the sense of pain.

The advertisements then as now occupied a considerable part of the paper. One of them offers for sale "Selections from the correspondence of General Washington with James Anderson, LL.D., F.R.S., F.A.S.E., &c. This correspondence is of a moral, philosophical, and agricultural nature." The paper is not without its Yankee humour, as appears from the following note:—

A bookseller in Boston in true Hibernian or Hottentot phraseology advertises Lavater's system of Physiognomy in 8 vols., "with innumerable plates." This hyperbole is not very unlike the "forever and a day" of a good and ancient divine, who in preaching of the future punishment of unbelievers thought the scriptural expression of "eternal" was not sufficiently strong to give his hearers an adequate notion of its duration.

The King has consented to become the patron of "The Printers' Pension, Almshouse, and Orphan Asylum Corporation."

It has been decided to make an appeal to admirers of the late Miss Charlotte Yonge and her works for funds to place a memorial to the novelist in Otterbourne Church, where she worshipped, and to erect a new reredos in the Lady Chapel of Winchester Cathedral. The Memorial Committee includes the Bishops of Winchester, Rochester, Guildford, and Southampton and the Lords Lieutenant of Hampshire and Surrey.

Mr. J. S. Shedlock has discovered the full score of Purcell's "Fairy Queen," which has been missing for 200 years. It was found concealed among a quantity of printed and MS. music in the library of the Royal Academy of Music in Tenterden-street. It is believed that a portion of the score is in Purcell's own handwriting.

Dr. Ibsen has had a second stroke of apoplexy, and his condition causes the greatest anxiety.

The Red Lion Hotel at Henley-on-Thames, associated with the name of the poet Shenstone, was put up to auction last week, but failed to find a purchaser.

Count Tolstoy has authorized M. Camille Audigier to dramatize his "Resurrection."

The sum of 100,000 lire has been collected for the purpose of erecting a monument to Virgil at Mantua. Hitherto there has been no monument to Virgil in Italy, except a bust in Rome in the Pincio.

Princess Louise has nearly finished the statue of Queen Victoria which she is executing for the new entrance of the Manchester Cathedral.

The French Academy has conferred the Palme Académique on Mr. Louis N. Parker for his services as translator of the plays of MM. Richepin, Rostand, and Tietcelin.

The elections to the vacancies in the French Academy of Letters were announced to take place on Thursday, but the results have not been announced at the moment of going to press.

Defoe was born and Milton buried in St. Giles, Cripplegate, and their busts are being presented to the Cripplegate Institute by Mr. Passmore Edwards.

M. Jules Verne, who has passed his 73rd birthday, is engaged upon his 99th novel. He has just recovered from a serious illness, and has resumed his customary walks in and around Amiens.

Last Thursday a performance was given at the Odéon to raise further funds for the contemplated statue of Alphonse Daudet. The programme consisted entirely of selections from the eminent writer's dramatic works.

On the 6th of June Corneille's birthday will be celebrated at the Comédie Française by a performance of the Cid.

The sister of Friedrich Nietzsche has published in the "Insel" some of her brother's personal ideas written down for her during his stay in Italy in 1880-1881.

Sir William Martin Conway has been elected to the Slade Professorship of Fine Art at Cambridge.

Mr. Alfred Harmsworth has given £10,000 to the London Hospital to endow a lamp for the light cure for lupus.

Mr. Eustace Miles, whose books on Athletics and Vegetarianism have been noticed in our columns, has again won the tennis amateur championship.

Shortly after the King's accession we ventured to express the hope that the new reign might be signalized by an increasing perception of the importance to the national life of Civil List literature and men of letters; and we pointed out Pensioners, that one of the ways in which a concern for the interests of literature might be manifested was in the administration of the Civil List Pension Fund. We have now before us a Return of persons at present in receipt of Civil List Pensions, as well as the schedule of pensioners compiled by Mr. William Morris Colles, for the Incorporated Society of Authors, in 1889. To those who see in the Civil List a legitimate instrument for fostering the intellectual life of the nation, the matter is undoubtedly one of public interest which suggests criticism. Even if they admit the propriety of the precedent set by Queen Victoria's advisers in distributing pensions of £650, out of the £1,200 available, among her late Majesty's teachers of French, German, Italian, writing, singing, music, and dancing, in 1840, they may, perhaps, question the pensioning of two gentlemen "in consideration of the services rendered by their ancestors to King Charles II., in his escape after the Battle of Worcester." Services rendered to a Stuart whose descendants twice invaded England hardly seem to constitute a valid claim on the just beneficence of a Hanoverian ruler. Nor is it easy to see why the money which the British taxpayer has to find, and which ministers responsible to the taxpayer allot to the fortunate recipients, should have been bestowed upon a Prince of the House of Bonaparte, two lineal descendants of Daniel Defoe, and "the widow of the faithful servant of Lord Byron." Only by a perverted use of language can these pensioners be regarded as, in the words of the statute, "such persons as have just claims on the Royal beneficence or who by their personal services to the Crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science or attainments in literature and the arts have merited the gracious consideration of their Sovereign and the gratitude of their country." A further question which arises is whether it is justifiable to use the Civil List to eke out service pensions. This practice at one time prevailed extensively, and was the cause of the pamphlet of protest by Mr. Colles from which we have quoted. "Inadequate," Mr. Colles wrote, "as the allowances to the widows of our soldiers and sailors and police constables admittedly are, these are only properly chargeable on the Consolidated Fund." He might have added that the Civil List Fund is so small, and the legitimate claims on it of literature, science, and art, so large that to help the services from the surplus that can be made available is like trying to bail a sinking boat with a thimble. And this seems to be the view to which the First Lord of the Treasury is beginning to accept. The representatives of literature, science, and art have been better treated of late years than they used to be. They had all but two of the pensions in 1899, and all but three in 1900. Of the £425 so far awarded in 1901, £175 have gone to literature, £150 to science, and £100 to the widow of a consul. It is an improvement for which the strong line taken by the Incorporated Society of Authors is largely to be thanked.

Literature Portraits.—IV.

OWEN SEAMAN.

You might hazard a justifiable guess that the clever face portrayed with these pages was that of a first-rate actor in the best school of comedy. But it is not. Mr. Owen Seaman wears his motley with a different grace, though like all the best comedians he can use his privilege of being serious upon occasion. I shall weary neither you nor him with the inevitable comparisons to Calverley or J. K. S. which are at once suggested by his name. It is enough that he is on their level, which is as much as to say that he is the first of his generation in the line he has made his own. But the value of that line—or shall I say those lines?—needs more mature consideration.

Mr. Seaman's age is 40, for he is older by two full years than "tensured Anthony, our only Hope," and ventured on his first printed publication at a slightly earlier period than that selected by Mr. Hawkins for the enjoyment of his contemporaries. His early life is indeed within such easy recollection that I propose to recall just so much of it as may be necessary for a fair appreciation of his literary work.

"Already," he wrote, long years ago at Cambridge,

Already on my turgid calf
I feel the feathers fresh and fluffy
My massive shoulderblades are half
Besmothered in a sort of puffy Excrescence where the wings fit on. . . .

The time had come, in fact, for the Swan Song to his Alma Mater. His University career was more distinguished than his success in later life might lead the thoughtless to imagine. For he went up to Clare College, Cambridge, as the captain of Shrewsbury School, with a scholarship on each of these foundations. He won the Porson Prize for Greek verse in his second year, and in the Classical Tripos he took a first-class, being captain and stroke of his college boat in the same summer—not an unimportant detail for those who collect statistics concerning rowing men and brains.

For a year or two Mr. Seaman hid his light under a bushel as a schoolmaster, a Professor, and an Extension Lecturer. Greek Art and modern English Poetry were his subjects; and though his pupils, I am told, learnt much, their teacher learnt far more. His audience soon grew wider. In Punch, in Mr. Henley's National Observer, in the World, and elsewhere he soon began to lecture London Town. London enjoyed it. There was a scholarly flavour about his verses that betrayed the Porson Prizeman and the student of Hellenic sculptures; there was a keen touch about his parody that recalled the professional critic. At first he seemed inclined to pay too much attention to Mr. Alfred Austin and the Kaiser. He stopped in time; and rapid imitations of Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Stephen Phillips, Sir Edwin Arnold, Mr. Kipling, Sir Lewis Morris, and Mr. Meredith soon showed his readers that his art was not limited to obvious or individual sources of inspiration.

He is now undergoing the hardest test of all. To be witty on occasion may be the privilege of the few. To be witty every Wednesday is the prerogative of none. Some cruel wag once perpetrated the suggestion that a certain famous literary staff sat round their Mahogany so long that it finally entered into their heads. Mr. Seaman's verses are alone sufficient to remove so base an imputation; nor is his occasional prose less clear an evidence to the same effect. He is not "easy to wear out," because the essentials of his art are his; and they are inexhaustible. To realize what they are to us, it is only needful to read the rhymes that took away the breath of those who admired Sir George Trevelyan. Satiric Verse and rhyming Politics have been raised by Mr. Seaman to a level which is higher than can easily be explained by changing ideals or the advancing demands of contemporary criticism. The note itself is novel; the result is satisfactorily refreshing. Too many minor Bards, impressed with the necessity for saying something definite in their serious verse, are content to raise a laugh merely by unexpected rhymes in those efforts which they wish us to accept as comic. Mr. Seaman's conception of his art seems to indicate a very different ideal. The short line, the artful ending, the divided word: these are but humble weapons in his armoury. His epithets are never otiose; nor does he admit the least inversion; he files and chisels till the verse rings true; we consequently get something which is not merely amusing but also good in itself. The workmanship is often better than the subject. But the combination is as pleasing as it is original.

This is no place for philosophic disquisitions on the comparative value of original work and "mere parody" as the slighting prose writer has called it. I will only say that true parody, as I should define it, is impossible unless the writer of it can do something more than pillory the obvious errors of his subject-victim. In this delicate bypath of poetical expression, the functions of critic and creator are indissolubly mingled. Here it avails nothing to prate of "chiaroscuro" or to "drag in Velasquez"; you must handle brush and palette too. Nor are externals alone the mark of your good-tempered scorn. The spirit of the writer, the very soul of his rhythm, the actual, unconscious source of his bad grammar must be realized and reproduced. It is not enough to criticize in Ruskin's fervid periods; you must paint like Sargent, too. As a result, you will not only reflect; you will reveal; and, if my definition be correct, the subject of your poem will lead himself the laughter of its readers. I may be right or wrong in my ideas of parody in general; but I have at least described the art that Mr. Seaman uses with such well-known skill. Let any one who doubts read those delightful lines in Mr. Stephen Phillips' manner, or the stanzas from the same volume, "dedicated, without malice or permission," to Mr. George Meredith:—

Rooster her sign,
Rooster her pugnant note, she struts
Evocative, amazon spurs aprick at heel;
Nid-nod the authentic stump
Of the once ensanguined comb vermeil as wine;
With conspquent doodle-doo
Hails breach o' the hectic dawn of yon New Year. . . .

Or, as another example in this kind, turn to the imitation of the Jubilee Ode which opens "In Cap and Bells."

. . . Buzzed the Hymettian bee; sat up in bed
The foreign oyster sipping local drains;
The impious cassowary lay like lead
On Afric's plains.
A-nutting went the nimble chimpanzee;—
And what, you ask me, am I driving at?
Wait on; in less than twenty minutes we Shall come to that. . . .

There is no need to emphasize the point further. Parody like this is not mere mimicry; it is a joy in itself that gains by its associations but loses nothing of its jocund originality. This is the great reason for our gratitude to Mr. Seaman. To me his name does not recall the Anti-Jacobin, though I much doubt if such political satire as his has appeared since the days of that famous publication; nor do his verses send my memory back to "Blayds." He makes me laugh; and I am quite content with that. Think of those lines on the imported German Beetle, for instance, in which the feelings of the Native are so pathetically rendered:—

Less gaily from behind the heated boiler
He sallies out on sinful plunder bent;
The presence of a strange imported spoiler
Mars all his sweet content.
More warily he quits his wainscot-hollow
To drink the oven's enervating airs,
For fear the foreigner may go and swallow
His wife at unawares.

Yet to dismiss Mr. Seaman as merely mirth-provoking would be inadequate. The somewhat magisterial features of his face are here to contradict me. "Fate cannot touch me," they seem to hint, "I have dined to-day with Dons." It is his abiding sense of humour that has saved him. Sometimes the Don peeps out. But fortunately for us all the pipes that Mr. Seaman plays are double. Of his more serious work I should select the poem to Wilhelmina, Queen of the Netherlands, on the sixth of September, 1898. There is a swing and splendour in the simple words that are missed in other efforts in the same key. But I must frankly confess my preference for the jester unabashed. Clean laughter, and scholarly wit; polished metre, and humorous phrase—these are to me the essential characteristics for which I am invariably glad to read Mr. Owen Seaman. He who will look elsewhere for the combination of these qualities in modern contemporary verse must look far ere he find them. "Tillers of the Sand" for politics; "The Battle of the Bays" for parody; "Horace at Cambridge" for dexterity of workmanship; "In Cap and Bells" for all these three; here are four books that no melancholy man should be without. It is something of an achievement that Mr. Seaman should have given us so much already. He has but just begun. Long may he contribute to the gaiety of the nation; and, in his own words,

Ever when marsh-marigolds are cheap
And new potatoes crown the death of May,
If memory serve us, we propose to keep His natal day.

THEODORE ANDREA COOK.

Although Mr. Owen Seaman may now be reckoned among the Vigo-street poets, he has had the names of at least half-a-dozen different publishers on the title-pages of his several books. "With Double Pipe," his 1888 collection of verses from the Cambridge Review and the Oxford Magazine, was published in Cambridge by E. Johnson, in Oxford by B. H. Blackwell, and in London by Simpkin, Marshall. He dedicated the book to his sister on her coming of age as "from a player that playeth upon a double pipe, now in lighter, now in deeper 'mode,'" and Mr. Andrew Lang was one of the first critics to recognize its merits. "Ædipus the Wreck," his prose burlesque, was published by Johnson, of Cambridge, and was dedicated "by one Old Salopian to all other Salopians." It was illustrated by Lance Speed—a Clare College man, like Owen Seaman—and J. D. Batten, of Trinity. By that time Mr. Seaman had become master at Rossall School, and he went to Newcastle-on-Tyne as Professor of Literature at Durham College of Science before publishing his next book. Then, after an interval of eight years, came his "Horace at Cambridge," through Messrs. Innes. This was in 1895, but "O. S." were initials which had meantime become familiar to every reader of the National Observer of those days. In the preface to his new book he was careful to explain that his imitations of Horace, drawn from Cambridge scenes and associations, were begun before the Horatian boom of 1894, lest he should be suspected of having taken his idea from that. The series, as a matter of fact, began to appear in the Granta as early as October, 1893. Mr. Lane is now the publisher of this volume, and has a new edition of it in preparation for the autumn. It was in 1894 that Mr. Seaman began writing for Punch, and "Nauticus" made his first appearance in the World in the following year. In 1895, too, came "Tillers of the Sand," the satiric verse written from time to time to illustrate different incidents in Lord Rosebery's Administration, and published in collected form by Messrs. Smith, Elder. Mr. Seaman's last two volumes have been issued through Mr. Lane. "The Battle of the Bays" came in 1896, and is now in its fourth edition. This is the volume which includes the well-known ode, "To the Lord of Potsdam"—"on the sending of a certain telegram"—

"Nor were you meant to solve the nation's knots,
Or be the Earth's protector, willy-nilly;
You only make yourself and Potsdam silly,"

and the companion piece, "From the Lord of Potsdam," beginning with "We, William, Kaiser, planted on our Throne."

Mr. Seaman's last volume, "In Cap and Bells," has proved still more successful, being already in its fourth edition, although only published last year. The greater part of this collection, as in the case of the two preceding volumes, had already appeared in Punch, the World, and other contemporaries. The imitation of George Meredith was first printed in the Morning Post.

"AN ENGLISHWOMAN" AND A FRENCHMAN.

A "Personal View."

It would appear that in the matter of fiction the public are more eager than the Athenians of old. And in answer to this demand for something new we are given at one time elaborated accounts of impossible detections of improbable crimes, at another inventions of fresh modes of murder, or strange sins so intricately concocted that they might have been supposed to be beyond the imagination of sane, healthy persons. Then as a fresh phase we have sociable, affable women who chat prettily and confidently over their gardens, or retail racily their social experiences; and the readiness on the part of the public for these uncere-monious introductions into intimate circles is somewhat touching in the monster-headed thing. Is it enough to justify a printed and published existence that you can write down lightly minute details of your household, call your husband or children by quaint names they do not possess, and by way of seasoning add a few quite personal and unceritcal opinions of books? The mind feminine seems to have become latterly an absorbing study; if it were not so what would account for the widespread popularity of the now notorious "Englishwoman" and her love letters? "Eating caramels to excess in a moonlit churchyard" has not usually been supposed to be a British characteristic. If it is advanced as striking a new vein can it be confidently affirmed that the vein is altogether new, or even quite original?

In the year 1844 Prosper Mérimée wrote "à une Inconnue" thus, "Why will you dispute on this text—'Which loves the best?' A desirable preliminary would be to come to an agreement as to the meaning of the verb, and this we shall never do; we are both too ignorant, and, above all, too ignorant of each other." With a studied avoidance of dignity in language, the "Englishwoman" asks, "How, when, and where is there any use wrangling as to which of us loves the other the best. . . and why in that of all things should we pretend to be rivals?"

And then, when Mérimée writes to this effect, "I kiss your mysterious feet a hundred times," we perceive it to be an attitude that has no offence in it as from a lover to his mistress, but the "Englishwoman" transforms herself into an ugly parody of this when she cries to the man, "Lkiss your feet"; so much so that there hardly remained anything for Barry Pain to touch—yet he does and the appalling descent is complete, "I kiss your beautiful great boots." Only note the scale, "I kiss your mysterious feet a hundred times." "I can wait. I kiss your feet." "I kiss your beautiful great boots." And I maintain that Barry Pain is not in this so far below the "Englishwoman's" unmaidenly posture as she falls below the French author's expression of poetic devotion.

And when in a "rabble" of words the lady declaims on the signification of names, saying that, "I answer with a snap of my temper that the blood, boots, and bones of my ancestors are in mine," has she forgotten little old Mr. Shandy's dictum upon names? But to let alone detached sentences. We find that, after the manner of latter-day book-making, little stories, queer, risqué, or irreverent, are tacked in like pieces in patchwork, to lighten the whole. "Elizabeth" * buttonholes you and solicits a grin over some rather highly-seasoned tale, the owner of the

* "Visits of Elizabeth."

"Man of Wrath" relates many things quite irrelevant to the object of her work, things that have nothing to do with the "delver's toil," and in the same way, perhaps to relieve the love-sickness of her letters, the "Englishwoman" branches off into anecdotes.

This method may or may not be entertaining, according to the skill of the writer and the manner in which such additions are weaved into the main work. In the volume of letters entitled "An Author's Love," and supposed to be the answers of "une Inconnue" to Mérimée, there occurs one of these accessories, which is, however, so cunningly introduced and withal so mirth-provoking that I cannot resist transcribing it in full. It will, I think, compare favourably with the somewhat pointless sneer that the "Englishwoman" indites against the lady with the complex title of a double relationship. The "Inconnue" says that she wrote her last letter in so foolish and loving a spirit that her next shall be as full of wisdom, and will resemble the oil that ran down Aaron's beard in the Bible story:—

By the way [she goes on to say] when in England did you ever hear that story sung as a sacred anthem? I have once, but I am not particularly keen about doing so again. The oil ran down his beard, ran down—Aaron—the oil—it ran—his beard ran down—down—down—Aaron—down—the oil, the oil, the oil, down, Aaron—down—down—the oil his beard ran down—ran—God knows where it finally did or did not run, or whether it was the oil, or Aaron, or the beard which eventually ran down—down—down. The only comprehensive impression left on my mind when the anthem was over was that the beard and Aaron and the oil were going on in such an extraordinary and improper manner and getting so mixed that I felt decidedly shy about having anything to do with any of them.

These letters, the work of an anonymous writer, are not to be compared to those of Mérimée's, but, though they are too copious, they leave in the mind a more pleasing idea of the somewhat wilful lady than do those of the "Englishwoman." Flippancy may prove a piquant sauce with which to flavour a dull society function and a carelessness of language amuse for the time, but can it be a fact that we desire nothing deeper or stronger in our current fiction or in our present-day plays? One is almost tempted to long for the time when to be "epigrammatic" will be a reproach, and to be "smart" a crime. To be an adept at playing battledore and shuttlecock with your wit is not to win to the heights of fiction; the giants of the past and of the present do not descend to such mere pen-agility. I can feel grateful to this self-styled "Englishwoman" since she called into life Barry Pain's "Another Englishwoman," but this somewhat inverted form of gratitude is the highest I can attain to. No doubt it is owing to the necessarily widening circles of a projected idea that many of us on reading these "love letters" have brought down Mérimée's more modest-looking volume from our bookshelves, for two days after this present short article was written it came to my notice that a monthly contemporary also contains an article in which these two, the unknown sentimentalist and the poetic Frenchman, are confronted. But, as there are found more than one artist to paint the sea as blue, so it may be allowed to more than one critic to fasten on the same points of comparison, however diverse the point of view. And against false sentiment no lances should be spared.

ARTHUR HOOD.

SYDENHAM WELLS PARK.

THOMAS CAMPBELL AND HIS FRIENDS.

On Monday yet another open space was dedicated to Londoners of to-day and of the many to-morrows that lie as yet unrevealed in the heart of time. Sydenham Wells Park, comprising about 17½ acres, has cost in all about £12,000; the interest on this outlay should be plentiful, not in the shape of pounds, shillings, and pence, it is true, but of that infinitely more valuable kind, health and pleasure. Of many once fashionable Spas in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, one was at Sydenham. The spring was discovered in 1640, and, if credence is to be given to an optimistic report, its waters were "a certain cure for every ill to which humanity is heir." Others are more guarded in their statements. On the one hand these medicinal waters are said to have been "of a mild cathartic quality nearly resembling those of Epsom," on the other this "purging spring" is deemed to have performed "great cures in scrofulus, scorbutic, paralytic, and other stubborn diseases." After visiting God's Gift College at Dulwich on September 2, 1875, John Evelyn, "came back by certain medicinal spa waters, at a place called Sydenham Wells, in Lewisham parish, much frequented in summer." Six years thereafter, a physician, Dr. John Peter, published a "Treatise on Lewisham Wells," followed in 1699 by a tract of Dr. Allen. As in other cases, various entertainments were arranged in order to attract to the Spa those who were sick, and still more those who deemed themselves to be ailing. The last noteworthy visitor to the Sydenham Wells is said to have been George III., who "once stayed best part of a day whilst he drank of the waters . . . an escort of the Life Guards forming a cordon around the cottage." It would be futile now to search for the spring, inasmuch as its site is covered by the Church of St. Philip, built in the sixties; but until the common land was enclosed and built over, early in the nineteenth century, the Wells House continued to be a popular resort, the more so as it was the headquarters of the St. George's Bowmen, who held their archery practice hard by.

Sydenham can boast of at any rate one literary association; for the happiest years of his life Thomas Campbell lived there. Writing to his publisher, Archibald Constable, in November, 1804, Campbell explains that he has taken on a lease of 21 years a house there, and "ventured on the faith of your support to purchase the fixtures . . . and about £100 worth of furniture, which, being sold along with the fixtures, I got at broker's appraisalment—i.e., half of prime cost . . . if you come to London and drink to the health of Auld Reekie over my new mahogany table . . . if you take a walk round my garden and see my braw house, my courtyard, hens, geese, and turkeys, or view the lovely country in my neighbourhood, you will think this fixture and furniture money well bestowed. I shall, indeed, be nobly settled, and the devil is in it if I don't work as nobly for it." Eleven years afterwards Campbell invited George Ticknor to pay him a long day's visit:—"So, after the morning service, I drove out, and stayed with him till nearly 9 o'clock this evening. He lives in a pleasant little box at Sydenham, nine miles from town, a beautiful village, which looks more like an American village than any I have seen in England. His wife is a bonny little Scotchwoman, with a good deal of natural vivacity." Sir Charles Bell, the eminent surgeon, and like the poet a Scot, has left us a more intimate sketch. After spending the evening indoors he and "Tom Campbell rambled down the village and walked under the delightful trees in the moonlight"; they then "adjourned to the inn and took an egg and plotty. Tom got glorious in pleasing gradation . . . his wife received him at home, not drunk, but in excellent spirits." After breakfast next morning "we wandered over the forest; not a soul to be seen in all Norwood." Cyrus Redding says that Campbell's mode of life at Sydenham was akin to that which he afterwards followed in London. "He rose not very early, breakfasted, studied for an hour or two, dined at 2 or 3 o'clock, and then made a call or two. . . . He would return home to tea, and then retire early to his study, remaining there till a late hour, sometimes even to an early one. His life was strictly domestic [it is a relief to recall the "plotty" incident at the inn in connexion with this statement]; he gave a dinner-party now and then, and at some of them Thomas Moore, Rogers, and other literary friends from town were present. His table was plain, hospitable, and cheered by a hearty welcome." Relatively simple as appear to have been the needs of the household, however, Campbell would have been hampered for means during the years spent at Sydenham, had it not been for the pension of £200 a year granted to him by the Government through the influence of Fox.

As neighbour and acquaintance he had a no less inquisitive person than Thomas Hill, known to his intimates as Tommy Hill. According to some he is the original whence John Poole sketched his Paul Pry; also of Theodore Hook's "Gilbert Gurney." Hill had a passion for accumulating and "popping into some paper minute details of the domestic economy of his friends." Planche says that he concerned himself with "the contents of their wardrobes, their pantries, the number of pots of preserve in their store-closets, and of the table-napkins in their linen-presses, the dates of their births and marriages, the amounts of their tradesmen's bills, and whether paid weekly or quarterly." On his appointment as editor of the New Monthly Review in 1820 Thomas Campbell abandoned his quiet home at Sydenham, and with it for the most part his dream of noble work, to settle in London.

The rental of Campbell's house appears to have been forty guineas. It consisted of six rooms, two on each floor, the upper storey being converted into his study. In summer the heat in this study was so great that, to use his own words, he felt as though enclosed within a hotly seasoned pie. At Sydenham he wrote "Gertrude of Wyoming," "O'Connor's Child," and that incomparably fine lyric, "The Battle of the Baltic." Here the idea of a poet's club, commemorated by Moore, was started. One day Campbell and Rogers and Moore "set about electing the members—not by ballot, but viva voce." The scheme failed, and a week or two thereafter Campbell met Mr. Perry of the Morning Chronicle, to whom he mentioned the projected title of "The Bees." "Oh!" was Perry's reply, "that is a little different from the common report, for they say you are to be called 'The Wasps,'" Campbell was "so stung with this waspish retort, that I thought no more of the poet's club." Byron was more than once a guest, and Lady Charlotte Campbell, daughter of the Duke of Argyll, introduced her clansman to the literary coterie which met at the salon of the Princess of Wales at Blackheath.

The name of the unfortunate poet, Thomas Dermody, is scarcely remembered nowadays. In 1802 he died at Sydenham, and on his monument in Lewisham Churchyard are inscribed some verses from his own "Fate of Genius." A native of Ennis, born there in 1775, he published a volume of poems in his thirteenth year, and subsequently "Peace" and "The Battle of the Bards." He enlisted, but disgraced himself by intemperance, and died at twenty-eight in abject poverty.

THE BLACK HOLE OF CALCUTTA.

Under a Viceroy who has a keen and understanding interest in archæology and art the Government of India is recognizing more and more its duty towards the monuments of the past. A policy far-reaching and enlightened was sketched by Lord Curzon of Kedleston when he addressed the Asiatic Society of Bengal on the 7th of February, 1900. The speech that he then delivered was worthy of much more attention than it received in England. It recognized, for the first time in such fulness, "the conservation of ancient monuments as one of the primary obligations of Government." It sketched the process of destruction which creeds and conquerors had carried out upon the buildings of rival religions and rival monarchs. It commented with caustic wit on the days when "the barbarian still dominated the æsthetic in the official mind." Finally, it showed that the era of intelligent conservatism has now begun. How beneficial has been the influence of this speech, and of the policy which it emphasized, every one who has visited India during the Viceroyalty of Lord Curzon will bear witness.

But it is not only the monuments of departed dynasties and extinct schools of art that it is of historic interest to preserve; the memorials of the early days of British enterprise have for us a very special interest. And these Lord Curzon has not neglected. Calcutta has undergone many changes at the hands of British builders, luxurious or progressive. It is difficult as one looks now at Salt's famous view to know precisely from what point it was taken, so greatly have new streets and new gardens altered the face of the land. But there are still many memorials of the early days of the East India Company. St. John's Church, with its marble monuments, just like a miniature Bath Abbey in its inscriptions, preserves the memory of Job Charnock with that of many another notable man. Statues of Wellesley and Cornwallis and Bentinck, pictures of Hastings and Clive and Moira, may well find a home in the great Memorial Hall with which it is designed to commemorate the reign of Victoria the Empress of India. The Fort William which we see to-day is that which Clive began and which was finished in 1773, the year when Warren Hastings became Governor-General under Lord North's Regulating Act. Recently the house which Warren Hastings occupied during the first years of his rule has been purchased by Government and is to be preserved as an historic place. The study where he worked, the hall with its great columns where he entertained, can still be seen. It stands away from modern Calcutta, in Alipur, with a wide open plain before it, and it recalls the time when the surroundings of English life in the East were more spacious and more luxurious than they are to-day. It would, indeed, add to the interest if the magnificent collection of Hastings pictures and letters and treasures of all kinds which now belongs to Miss Marian Winter of Worton, the great-niece of the "adored Marian," could find a home in this house among the other historical memorials. But all these memories pale before that which is called up by the terrible words, familiar to us all from our childhood, the Black Hole of Calcutta. It is the commemoration of this site which has become the latest historical souvenir of the capital of British India. It was rediscovered, or rather exactly identified through the researches of Mr. C. R. Wilson, and the Viceroy determined that it should run no chance of being forgotten.

It was high time that the memory of the awful night of the 20th of June, 1756, should be permanently preserved. The age of historic doubt has set in in India, and a Bengali writer has actually asserted that the whole horrible scene was the fiction of the vivid imagination of Governor Holwell. Of course there is no doubt whatever about the facts. Orme, when he prepared to write his great history, took the greatest pains to verify them, and he obtained the accounts of two survivors of the terrible night, which fully corroborated the statement of Mr. Holwell. Among the Orme MSS. in the India Office the statement of Captain James Mills—sixteen pages of a small pocket-book—is still preserved. Holwell himself, after his "unequalled sufferings," went home with despatches, and it was on board the sloop Syren, that he wrote his famous letter to Mr. William Davis which gave to the world the tale of heroism and horror. The "Hole" itself was one of those low buildings used in the old fort probably for store rooms, of which some still remain behind the fine post-office in Dalhousie-square. Its size was only 18ft. by 14ft. The rooms that are still preserved are larger, but their low ceilings, thick walls, and small outlets give a vivid impression of what the "dungeon" must have been. Into this cell 145 Englishmen and one Englishwoman (who, strange to say, survived the horrors of the night) were thrust at the point of the bayonet. Night passed in agony and delirium, and when morning dawned only twenty-three walked out, between a lane of corpses, alive. In later years Holwell, who had so gallantly taken command of the British residents when Governor Drake shamefully fled, erected a monument to the "great company" of sufferers, who "by the tyrannic violence of Surajud Dowla, Suba of Bengal, were suffocated in the Black Hole prison of Fort William on the night of the 20th day of June, 1756, and promiscuously thrown the next day into the ditch of the ravelin of this place." It stood on the place where the bodies of the unhappy sufferers were thrown. The Black Hole itself remained, unmarked by any memorial, yet visited by many travellers down to the time—no one seems to know exactly when—of its destruction.

Holwell's memorial seems to have been removed as unsightly, after being struck by lightning. The Black Hole itself was standing in the year 1812, as may be seen from the following letter in the Asiatic Journal :—

Sir,—The formidable Black Hole is now no more. Early in the year 1812 I visited it. It was situate in the old Fort of Calcutta, and was then on the eve of demolition. Since that time the fort has come down, and on its site have been erected some extensive warehouses for the Company. I recollect joining one of a party in Calcutta for the purpose of paying a last visit to this melancholy spot. It consisted of three married ladies, two gentlemen, their husbands, and myself. The ladies were successful, by noise and laughter, in dissipating gloomy recollection; but I had been better pleased had they suffered us to recall in some measure to our minds those events connected with the spot on which we stood. It presented on entering the appearance of an oven, being long, dark, and narrow. One window (if I recollect right) was the utmost, and this secured by bars. The escape of even the small number who survived the horrid fate of the rest is surprising, and can only be accounted for by the accident of their being near the window, and the night air, which in Bengal is commonly damp, allaying the fever which consumed the rest. . . . To the right of the Writers' Buildings a monument is erected, with an inscription commemorating the barbarity of the Nawab. It serves as the first attraction to a stranger arriving in Calcutta, and he pauses with no little exultation to review in his mind the astonishing events which in so short a space of time have succeeded this wanton act of power—events which have secured to us an empire second in riches to none in the world, and which have placed at our disposal the lives of millions of fellow-creatures.

The tragedy which was almost the foundation of British rule in Bengal is now no longer to run the chance of being forgotten. The exact site of the Black Hole has, as we have said, been identified. Zephaniah Holwell's monument is itself to be reproduced, as nearly as may be possible, from views taken at the end of the eighteenth century, under the direction and at the expense of the Viceroy, who takes the keenest interest in the work. Already a plaster obelisk has been set up on the site to the north of the front of the post-office in Dalhousie-square, from which the size and general design may be judged, but which will probably be modified. The site of the Black Hole itself, except a few inches which are covered by an adjoining building, is to be marked by blocks of black marble and surrounded by a railing. The great gate, which has now an inscription inside, where nobody thinks of looking for it, is to be destroyed; and the Black Hole will again take its place among the sights of Calcutta.

The shade of Zephaniah Holwell may then rest in peace. The heroism of the defence of Fort William and the miracle of the survival were the great distinction of his chequered and not wholly fortunate life. Before he left India he took care that his share in those great days should not be forgotten. On the wall of a landing in Government-house hangs a picture which shows him in purple coat, drab waistcoat, white stockings, and buckled shoes, giving directions to a native workman for the construction of his famous monument of commemoration. Very much as he designed it, a memorial will soon stand again on the spot where he had placed his own. The Viceroy will write an inscription, in which the names, so far as they are known, of the sufferers will be preserved.

LYDGATE'S TROY BOOK.

In answer to a letter of mine some time ago Professor Skeat referred us to "all the works of Lydgate" as bearing out his view of the question then under discussion. It struck one how difficult it was for the busy student to follow the advice, not only because of the number of Lydgate's works—Speght (in his "Works of Geoffrey Chaucer," ed. 1602, at folio 376) gives a list of 114—but because most of them are still in manuscript. And when any of them have been printed it has been, for the most part, at a time when the knowledge of the language in which he wrote was so scanty, and critical judgment so faulty, it had almost been better that they should have remained in their original condition.

Without entering into the respective value of all the works of Lydgate, and taking only his Troy Book, or "The historye sege and distrucceyon of Troye," as he called it, as an example of his style, one may fearlessly say that the student of Middle English who can read it in MS. will find there one of the most valuable works of our ancient authors. As a poem it stands second only to Chaucer's larger works. To the antiquary and historian of the later Middle Ages it is of the utmost importance, while as a philological treasure it can hardly be over-estimated. It is full of instructive words, and it forms, as it were, a bridge between the earlier Middle English and the beginning of the age of printing. I may take one example, among very many that occur to me, of this. In the Knight's Tale (l. 951), we are told, the mournful ladies, who met Theseus on his return to Athens, fell "gruf" (not grof as in Skeat's "Etymological Dictionary")—i.e., they fell on their faces, on the ground, before him. In the Troy Book (book iv., chap. 34, in Pynson), when Pirrus fought with "Pantasyllia," she wounded him so severely that he fell to the ground and—

In a traunce ful longé gruflynge lay.

This adverb "gruflynge" does not occur in Chaucer; it gives us the connecting link between Chaucer's obsolete "gruf" and the Spenserian "groveling." (F.Q., iii., 5, 23.)

Downe on the ground his carkas groveling fell.

Yet this work, so full of instruction and poetry, has never been edited. Twice, indeed, it has been printed. First, in 1513, by Richard Pynson—a fine specimen of printing no doubt, and illustrated by most curious woodcuts, but so altered to suit the spelling of the later time that the rhythm is frequently spoilt and the music of its verse destroyed. It was printed again in 1555 for Robert Braham by Marshe, "at the sign of the Princes Arms in Flete Street," but Braham does not improve upon Pynson. He was hardly competent to undertake the work, though, in his "pistle to the reader," he is severe on others, especially on Caxton, who, in his opinion, had attempted things for which they were not qualified.

Yet hath there ben other some (he says) so beastly bolde to undertake without eyther wyt or any learning to translate the same historye, namely the Eanedes of Virgyle into Englyshe, not understandynge searse any word what Virgile wret in all that worke. As by example, if a man studyouse of that historye shoulde seke to fynde the same in the doynages of Wyllyam Caxton in his leawde recueil of Troye. What shulde he then fynde thyncke you, assuredlye none other thyng, but a tedious and brayneles bablyng, tendyng to no end, nor having any certayne begynnynge, but proceedyng therein as an ydyot in his follye.

As well might we try to appreciate the poems of Chaucer in the copies of Speght and Urry as hope to discover the charm of the Troy Book in either of these unskilful volumes of Pynson or Braham.

Lydgate has been unfortunate in his biographers as well as in his printers. Even in the "Dictionary of National Biography" we find it stated, apropos of the Troy Book, "Lydgate mainly paraphrased Guido di Colonna's Historia de Bello Troiano, and perhaps Dares Phrygius or Dictys Cretensis." This is as though one should say that Troilus and Creseide, and the Knight's Tale, of Chaucer, were paraphrases of the Filostrato, and La Teseide, of Boccaccio. Let any one compare the dry Latin treatise of Guido delle Colonne with Lydgate's most original poem and he will see how far it is from being a paraphrase of Guido's work. As to the alternative of the possibility of its being a paraphrase of Dares or Dictys, we must imagine the meaning to be that the writer of the biography supposed it hopeless to attempt to verify his alternative assertion. He had, however, only to refer to the Delphin edition of the classics to find both works which go under these names carefully edited by Madame Dacier. He would have found there the childish chronicles of absurdities, which Guido generally quotes as his authorities, while he is all the time stealing, without acknowledgment, from Bénédict de Sainte More. This Bénédict was the real author of whatever is good in Guido, and of the undying tale of the loves of Troilus and Creseide.

Lydgate takes the tale of Troilus and makes of it a charming episode in his Troy Book. He gives it with a touching apology for attempting a theme Chaucer had written on so well before him; and a eulogium on his master, in words so true and so little known, I venture to quote some of them. After regretting he has not time to give the whole story he consoles himself with the thought—

But me semeth that it is no nede,
The holé storie Chaucer can yow telle,
If that ye liste, no man bettre alyve,
Nor the processe halfe so wel descryve;
For he oure englysshe gylté with his sayes,
Rude and boystous firste, by oldé dayes,
That was ful fer from al perfeccoun,
And but of lytel reputacyoun,
Tyl that he cam and thurgh his poetrye
Gan oure tungé firste to magnifye,
And adourne it with his eloquence.
To whom honoure, laude, and reverence,
Thurgh out this landé, given be and songe,
So that the laurer of oure englysshe tonge
Be to hym gyven for his excellence.

William Morris produced from his Kelmscott Press Caxton's "Recueil of Troye," of which Braham had spoken so contemptuously; it is curious he did not give us this far more worthy work of Lydgate's on the same subject. Can not one of our literary societies be persuaded to attempt the task? It ought not to be difficult. There are many MSS. of the poem in existence. At least four are in the British Museum, of which the Cottonian (Aug. A., iv.) and the Arundel (99) seem to be the best. There are five known to be in the Bodleian, of which Rawlinson (c. 446) and Digby (232) are to be preferred. There is also one in Exeter College Library which I have not yet seen, and another in St. John's Library at Oxford, which is somewhat inferior. There are doubtless many others, but the two best in the British Museum and the Bodleian, which vary but little, would give the basis of a good edition. May we not appeal to those who can to supply this want, and save us from the loss, I think I may add the shame, of keeping one of our most interesting national literary works hid in its present form? This is surely a work which a Government might undertake.

THE DRAMA.

"THE SACRAMENT OF JUDAS"—"MARIANA."

Players may assume the names of their parts, utter the words the author sets down for them, appear to do or to suffer this and that in an imaginary series of material or spiritual adventures; and the skill with which they "pretend," as the children say, is, of course, to be reckoned unto them for histrionic righteousness. But their true virtue for us, the secret of their attraction, is not in what they pretend, but in what they are. The man or woman, not the mime, is the really important thing. A face haunts us, or the timbre of a voice, or the curve of lip or chin, or some grace of attitude, gait, or gesture. We think of the play as the vehicle for these natural qualities rather than for its own sake—at any rate we do so when we see Mr. Forbes Robertson in The Sacrament of Judas or Mrs. Patrick Campbell in Mariana. Both plays, as it happens, are translations, one from the French of M. Louis Tiercelin, the other from the Spanish of Señor Echegaray. The first translation, which is by Mr. Louis Parker, has been especially well done. It has style, a classic chastity, and economy of expression. And it has the true quality of drama, a spiritual conflict, the purification of a soul. Jacques Bernéz, a young Breton peasant, was ordained a priest at the moment the Revolution burst into the sanctuaries and abolished the priesthood. The deliverance is welcomed by Bernéz, for he had been a doubter even at the moment of his entry into the Church, which was the result of outward circumstances rather than of inward vocation. And the fair face of little Jeffik Guillou had turned his thoughts to other than priestly things, to thoughts of wedlock and the prattling of children. But the last words of his Bishop haunt him. Once a priest, a priest to all eternity—and with this thought oppressing him, he dare not wed Jeffik. While he is hesitating, another man takes the place he might, perhaps, have filled in her heart—the proscribed aristocrat Kervern, who has taken refuge in the house of Jeffik's father. Evidently there is a secret between Jeffik and Kervern, a guilty secret as Bernéz thinks, and, to compel its disclosure, he threatens to deliver up Kervern to his pursuers. Kervern is silent, the Republicans surround the house, and Bernéz bids him prepare for death, the worst of all deaths for a Catholic, a death unshrived. Then, answers Kervern, you shall hear my confession, but you shall hear it as the priest that you are, and you shall give me absolution as the Church requires. Bernéz cannot refuse, and he has to absolve the man who has stolen Jeffik from him, and stolen her to her undoing. This soul-conflict which the playwright has imagined, the struggle in one heart between man and priest, is undoubtedly an interesting dramatic theme. It is not more interesting now, perhaps, when the play is presented in three acts, than in its original one-act form—the two new acts merely showing us in action what we had formerly been able to take quite comfortably for granted—but interesting it certainly is. Nevertheless, as I began by saying, what dwells on the mind is not the play, but the personality of the chief actor—the ascetic features of Mr. Forbes Robertson, his resonant voice, the delicate austerity of his style. It is a performance of absolute beauty.

So the acting of Mrs. Patrick Campbell in Mariana is a performance of absolute passion. Here the player is much more important than the play, which would, save for a certain Southern intensity and sincerity, be sheer melodrama. Mariana is introduced to us as a monster of heartless cruelty. Daniel Montoya loves her to distraction, or something very near it, and she treats him like a dog. It appears that she wishes to be revenged on all men, because a man had once betrayed her mother. This vendetta against a whole sex seems a trifle fantastic; it is what the flippant call a "large order." Mariana relents, however, and is on the point of giving her hand to Daniel when she finds that he is the son of her mother's betrayer. To put a barrier between herself and the man she feels she still loves, even against her strongest convictions of filial piety, she promptly weds an elderly general, a terrible personage, reputed to have shot his first wife, and sure not to overlook any weakness in his second. This marriage is, for Mariana, an indirect mode of committing suicide. For Daniel reappears, as she knows he will, and the husband, finding them together, shoots her, as she had hoped he would. Two more pistol shots, "heard off," lead the audience to suppose that all the principal personages are disposed of as completely as in the last act of Hamlet. It is a gloomy tale, smelling of the footlights, and by no means a specimen of Echegaray at his best or even second best. But Mrs. Campbell, as a wild, passionate, fascinating, puzzling creature, is at her very best. You forget the play, and think only of this bundle of nerves, this half-civilized but wholly beautiful thing, called woman.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

MAETERLINCK ON THE BEE.

[By W. B. TEGETMEIER.]

In the large number of works which have been published on the natural history and management of the honey bee, it would be difficult to find another written on the same lines as "The Life of the Bee," by Maurice Maeterlinck,* which has been translated apparently without any emendation or alterations by Mr. Alfred Sutro. The writer and translator have worked together before. Mr. Sutro has translated and published several works by Maeterlinck, including a five-act drama, Aglavaine and Selysette, and Mr. Sutro himself has published a drama with an introduction by Maeterlinck.

As stated by the author the work at present under notice is not to be regarded as one on practical bee keeping, nor is it, on the other hand, a scientific monograph on the natural history of the honey bee. In the words of the writer, "the reader of this book will not gather therefrom how to manage a hive, but he will know more or less all that can with certainty be known of the curious, profound, and intimate sight of its inhabitants." In his first chapter, which he entitles "On the threshold of the hive," he gives a short account of the most eminent previous authors, Swammerdam, Réaumur, and Huber being fully credited with their investigations, and he then recounts the modern writers to whom we are indebted for the extension of our knowledge of bees and the practical improvement in their management.

The volume may be regarded as one on the romance of bee life. It is written throughout in language which is intended to be poetical, and which consequently occasionally oversteps what may be called the hard and dry matter of fact. Let us take the author's description of the examination of a hive.

The first time that we open a hive there comes over us an emotion akin to that we might feel at profaning some unknown object, charged perhaps with dreadful surprise, as a tomb. A legend of menace and peril still clings to the bee. There is the distressful recollection of her sting, which produces a pain so characteristic that one knows not wherewith to compare it; a kind of destroying dryness, a flame of the desert rushing over the wounded limb, as though these daughters of the sun had distilled a dazzling poison from their father's angry rays, in order more effectively to defend the treasure they gather from his beneficent hours.

This extract is a fair example of what may be termed the poetical exaggeration which characterizes the work. The sting of a bee neither resembles a destroying dryness, nor the flame of the desert rushing over the wounded limb; and the three hundred pages in which the bees are alluded to in language which describes them as "daughters of the sun distilling dazzling poison from their father's angry rays," become rather tedious in their perusal, for the same style is pursued throughout the volume. The swarming of the bees, when the hives become over populous, is for some reason or other described as "the great immolation to the exciting gods of the race," and in spite of the claims of the author, some of his alleged facts may be queried. The process of swarming he describes as "a mighty tumult, in which a beautiful cordon, laden with unmistakable menace and anger, streams like wildering golden hail over every object near." This is really an inaccurate description. Hail settles upon the objects on which it descends. Bees when swarming do not do so, but they shortly settle on the branch of a tree and become a great, inoffensive, peaceful cluster, composed of thousands of little motionless groups. My own experience leads me to regard them not as thousands of groups, but as one large group. And then he states that they wait there for the scouts to return who have gone in search of a place of shelter. It is rather in the experience of most bee-keepers that a place of shelter has been determined beforehand, and is not sought out after the bees have swarmed—a proceeding which would not be characteristic of the intelligence of the bees which the author maintains they possess. They do not leave it, as he says, to the first moment of swarming to send forth winged quarter-masters in search of a lodging and then receive back the scouts and give careful and thoughtful attention to their reports as to which lodging they should go to. It may be poetical, but it is certainly not scientific, to say that these reports are to be considered, and that one scout dilates on the advantages of a hollow tree, whilst another is in favour of a crevice in a ruined wall, or a cavity in a grotto, or an abandoned burrow. To state that the assembly will often pause and deliberate until the following morning and then determine on their choice which is approved by all, is certainly more poetical than scientific.

In his account of the formation of the cells of the bees, he entirely misrepresents the views and experiments published by Darwin in the "Origin of Species." Darwin never spoke of the walls becoming hexagonal by the pressure of adjoining cells; what he did say was that a single cell excavated in the wax foundation was commenced in a circular form, as may be seen by any observer on the margin of an unfinished comb where the outward cells are not in contact with others. This, Darwin said, could be tested, and then he quoted his own experiments to prove that each cell is hexagonal inasmuch as it must be surrounded by six others.

The volume is, as the author states, neither scientific nor practical; it is obviously designed to be a poetical description of bee life. As such it may commend itself to a certain class of readers who desire to be amused rather than instructed, but to those acquainted with the subject the work will be regarded as a verbose description of facts and occurrences that are more interesting, and even more truly poetical, in their native simplicity.

THE EARL OF CHATHAM.

WILLIAM PITT, EARL OF CHATHAM, AND THE GROWTH AND DIVISION OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE, 1708-1778. By WALFORD DAVIS GREEN, M.P. (Putnam's, 5s.)

Except in the matter of its illustrations, only a few of which are really good, this new volume of the "Heroes of the Nations" is worthy to rank among the most successful of the series. We have waited long for Mr. John Morley's promised monograph on the Great Commoner, and it seems likely that we shall have to wait still longer. Though Mr. Green's book has not the finished art that we expect from Mr. Morley it may well fill the gap. It is a workmanlike performance, full of knowledge and appreciation, and written without affectation or grandiloquence.

The character of Pitt is still an interesting study. Mr. Lecky's judgment will not be forgotten—"of all very great Englishmen he is, perhaps, the one in whom there was the largest admixture of the qualities of the charlatan." A more sympathetic view might allow for a peculiarly sensitive temperament, and show that it is hard to find affectations in Chatham that were not almost natural. It is difficult to believe that a man who had very little power before he was fifty had really the arts of a charlatan. Possibly a later age will compare him to Gladstone in his enthusiasm and his eloquence, in his power of convincing himself, and not least in the devout firmness of his religious faith. On this last point Mr. Green says what has rarely been so clearly said before. "It is clear from the detached sentences in his handwriting found among his papers that religion was to him a matter not merely of outward observance, but of his innermost thought"; and Chatham himself said "the more a man is versed in business, the more he sees the hand of Providence. There is no such thing as chance; it is the unaccountable name of nothing." His religious opinions were markedly those of his age and station. Mr. Lecky, in a famous passage, has compared him to Wesley; but the comparison does not extend to religion. Pitt's devotion was entirely without enthusiasm, and his theological knowledge may be illustrated by his famous epigram—"we have Calvinist articles (not, by the way, as Mr. Green misquotes it, 'a Calvinist creed'), a Popish Liturgy, and Arminian clergy." Of his great services to England there can be no question, nor of his supreme honesty. "The true measure of his capacity as a War Minister," says Mr. Green very truly, "is in the comparison of his results with those which the British forces obtained in the earlier war of the Austrian Succession and in the later American war." Politically, as in the matter of the Highlanders, and in the debates on the earlier phases of the American question, he was almost always in the right. The Duke of Grafton, as Sir William Anson showed us, believed that if he had remained in office the separation from America might have been avoided. Constitutionally he cannot be said to have been so wise. His famous speech on American taxation, on the real constitutional point, must rank as inferior to the speech of Grenville, though his political wisdom was infinitely the greater. Again, his view of "Present Discontents" was, perhaps rightly, criticized by Burke.

Mr. Green, as we have already implied, has accomplished his task well. He has neglected hardly any source of information or illustration, and he has made good use of his materials. Almost the only omission we can regret is that of the story of Pitt's last interview with Wolfe in the Circus, Bath. If we find Mr. Green adopting too much without question Adam Smith's opinion of England's financial policy towards the colonies it is probably because he is not acquainted with Professor Ashley's interesting papers on the subject in his recent volume of "Surveys." An odd misquotation, which makes the story pointless, is that of "That Jemmy Twitcher should teach me, I own surprises me," when everybody knows that the appropriateness to Sandwich lay in the words "that Jemmy Twitcher should peach." A curious view of modern European history is suggested by the remark that Pitt's opinion that Frederick the Great was "the natural assertor of Germanic liberties against the House of Austria" was "a prophecy fulfilled on the field of Sadowa." But little points of this kind can easily be corrected in a second edition.

RECENT VERSE.

IN THE QUEEN'S CHRONICLER, by Stephen Gwynn, and THE QUEEN AND OTHER POEMS, by Dr. Richard Garnett, which come at the same moment from Mr. John Lane (3s. 6d. n. each), we have the work of men who, like many poets of high rank before them, are also, and perhaps primarily, critics. From critics we expect nothing eerie and nothing eccentric. Dr. Garnett and Mr. Gwynn are both scholarly, correct, mature. But the latter certainly is something more. If in his lighter verse and in his adventures into the odic irregular metre he achieves nothing very wonderful, in at least seven poems in his collection he appears as a true poet, as an artist who can light up a theme by thought vitalized by emotion and embody it in a form aptly chosen for the purpose. These poems are "The Ash Walk"; "The Royal House of France"; "The Captive Polar Bear"; "The Death Mask," a poem of fine pathos; "Out in the Dark," a truly moving cry from a mother's heart; and two poems on Ireland. In both the latter Mr. Gwynn makes happy use of a metre unjustifiably neglected, a metre reminding one of two very different writers, who were at their best when they used it—Charles Lamb, in his "I have had playmates, I have had companions"; and Mr. George Meredith in his splendid "Love in the Valley"—"Under yonder beech tree single on the greensward." Here is Mr. Gwynn:—

IRELAND.

Ireland, oh Ireland! centre of my longings,
Country of my fathers, home of my heart!
Overseas you call me: Why an exile from me?
Wherefore sea-severed, long leagues apart?

As the shining salmon, homeless in the sea-depths,
Hears the river call him, scents out the land,
Leaps and rejoices in the meeting of the waters,
Breasts weir and torrent, nests him in the sand;

Lives there and loves; yet with the year's returning,
Rusting in the river, pines for the sea,
Sweeps back again to the ripple of the tideway,
Roamer of the waters, vagabond and free.

Wanderer am I like the salmon of the rivers;
London is my ocean, murmurous and deep,
Tossing and vast; yet through the roar of London
Comes to me thy summons, calls me in sleep.

Pearly are the skies in the country of my fathers,
Purple are thy mountains, home of my heart.
Mother of my yearning, love of all my longings,
Keep me in remembrance, long leagues apart.

And the same rhythm is running in his ears when he writes
"Mater Severa," of which the thought is contained in this:—

Bleak and grey to man is the countenance of Nature;
Bleak her soil below him, bleak her sky above;
Wherefore, then, by man is her rare smile so cherished?
Paid her niggard bounty with so lavish love?

Mr. Gwynn's "Queen," by the way, is Queen Mary of Scots, and his poem is on her story as chronicled by Brantôme. Dr. Garnett's title poem is on "Queen Victoria," and appeared in these columns on February 2, 1901. The sonnets in his book—all are sonnets but two—are not all new, some having appeared in a book of "Poems" published in 1893. They have many merits, but they are, it must be confessed, somewhat lacking in emotion.

As works her web the spider, I have wrung
An arduous music from my bosom.

These are his own words. If the result sometimes suggests a laborious rhetoric, at others it gives us a stately distinction of style which has an effect of its own. The sonnets are never empty of thought, and they reveal everywhere the work of a man widely read in the English classical poets. We quote one on Joy:—

Joy is there made for all, transparent tide
Of earth's embathing air, sun's general light,
Sea, legioned stars, fields variously bright,
And in a common country common pride:
And joy to human multitudes denied,
But solitary meed of soul of might Pacing in lone content the silent height,
Save by his own thought unaccompanied:
Joy, too, not made for many or for one;
Flashing, as when the flying iron rings
Sharp on smit stone beside the paven way,
As Love to Love in exultation springs:
As fades the star of morn in morning's sun,
All rosiest rapture to such joy is grey.

Mr. R. C. Lehmann calls his present collection of light verse ANNI FUGACES (Lane, 3s. 6d. n.) and the title contains just that proper note of regret "for the year that's awa'" which his poems also express. "A Thousand Years Ago" is one of the most charming reviews of youthful days, of "That land of fairy melody, of laughter, and of dreams," that we have met with since Stevenson wrote. Throughout the volume one's attention is arrested by the expression of a happy, kindly temperament; of wisdom and of wit rather than by high poetic accomplishment or even remarkable workmanship. Mr. Lehmann has not the particular gifts of the late J. K. Stephen, perhaps, but he reminds us, in his own words, most agreeably

Of him who wrote as C.S.C.,
Whose gay good-humour made us smile,
Who never thought it base to be
A jester with a perfect style.

This does not prevent the author of "Anni Fugaces" being perfectly original. There are, indeed, notes in his gamut which other Cambridge writers in his manner have not touched. His recollections of those Universities (for although a devoted son of Cambridge, Oxford is almost equally well-known to him)

Where hopes are high and hearts are true

And life a cheerful summer morn, contain the delightful ring of happy youth, of strength, beauty, comradeship, high hope, and achievement admirably combined with a sense of humour and a touch of pathos. It is the latter quality with which he is more gifted than either Calverley or Stephen, of both of whom he writes with admiration. Perhaps the best verses in his book bear the name of the latter and were written at the time of his early death. The following stanzas are a good example of Mr. Lehmann's fluency, instinct with sincere and tender feeling :—

Oft shall we pause upon our daily round

And one shall mourning to the other say,

"Here did his joyous kindly welcome sound,"

Or, "Here he sudden flashed from grave to gay."

Or, "Here he rolled sonorous eloquence,

With magic sentences enthralled the ear,

Till just the one word, squared to fit the sense,

Dropped to its place and made his meaning clear."

Or, "Here he thrilled us with swift-darting shocks

Of lightning humour, or with innocent guile

O'erturned our arguments with paradox,

And lulled our reason with that glowing smile."

This admirable portrait of J. K. S. has an extremely interesting companion picture in the lines to the memory of an Oxford friend :—

So, here in Magdalen, hail again,

Beneath the Tower, or in the Hall,

Or through the Cloisters, where a rain

Of red leaves flutters from the wall,

Or where in old and happy days

The Barges echoed with your praise.

In a poem following this one and on the same subject there is a couplet which must go directly to the heart of any man who has loved and lost a friend—

The hours that linked us man to man

Outweigh a lifetime's rounded span ;

it crystallizes the compensations of a friendship that is over with wonderful exactitude. Although Mr. Lehmann is often merry and has written some roaring songs for Trinity men to sing, as well as celebrated football triumphs and the birth of a baby to the Master of Trinity, the verses set to the cadence of Frater Ave Atque Vale are those we like best.

After all light verse of this character is rather an expression of personality than a work of high art. Judged from that point of view it is one of the most interesting and pleasing volumes which the younger generation of literary men has published.

TOWN AND COUNTRY POEMS, by Arthur E. J. Legge (David Nutt, 3s. 6d. n.), is the work of one who reasons keenly and courageously on the phenomena of Nature and man. Mr. Legge's matter is attractive, whether he bids you to the sun-washed spaces of Exmoor, and sets you riding till

The drunken hills are rocking and the clouds in heaven reel ;

And amidst a roaring cataract of gallopers you feel

That you own no domination save the phrenzy of a thirst

To see the chase and keep your place and ride among the first.

or conduct you to the police-court, where

Through unwashed glass within a dusty casement,

On the bare desert of discoloured walls

Darkened with memories of man's abasement,

The dim light falls.

Of the world's sorrows and shams Mr. Legge makes trenchant note, but always within the limits of well-bred tolerance. His treatment of "La Grande Dame" is pleasantly light and aloof. In "A Pianist" he makes a bold effort to follow a clue

beyond the fence

Of the region thought can conquer or words explore.

But his manner is not equal to his matter. The expression is always distinct, but rarely distinguished. His lines do not "ache with melody," to quote one of his own phrases against him. His thought is too facilely worded. It is often so good that one wishes he would hold it back till it had crystallized into more exquisite form. His verses are frequently marred by over-alliteration. For example, the police-court is described as the place where justice

Buckles the girth afresh and binds the blinkers

Of brazen law.

His short lines, too, are apt to jingle monotonously, which one regrets the more when one comes on a quietly beautiful passage such as this, in his poem "Gipsy Souls" :—

They glide like shadows through the trailing years,

Their voice a cry from an eternal Past.

Their laughter floats across a wave of tears ;

They play with all the passions, and are cast

Into Love's furnace of delights and fears ;

But Hope's brave banner, on the tide of Sorrow,

Floats proudly from their mast.

They lose not Yesterday, yet win To-morrow ;

And, where the golden sunset flames afar,

They seek their haven in an unborn star.

Mr. Legge is vital and sincere. What one desires for him is more of the magic of mere words.

Mr. Alexander Blair Thaw, in his POEMS (John Lane, 5s. n.), clothes his thoughts with the vocabulary, now of the Elizabethans, now of Omar Khayyám ; but he is not deft enough to weave of these either a beautiful new garment or a fair imitation of an old one. His conceits, weak at best, are done to death by verbiage. That they may last the matter out his stanzas are padded with superfluous words. Expressions like "In this my heart," "In this my little book," occur too frequently. One longs vainly for some sudden flash, some swift, felicitous line. Mr. Thaw, however, has enough poetic instinct to avoid harsh and jarring notes. He glides smoothly along his level, and both his subjects and his treatment of them evince a hankering after beauty—at least so long as he remains among his conceits evolved out of love, flowers, Time's loom, and the like. The following, for instance, from his second sonnet to poetry, is sincere in feeling while not ungraceful in form :—

Ah ! hard it is to win thy meed of worth,

The consecration born of service true !

The sweetest flower that ere thy garden knew

From Life's dark bed and bosom had its birth :

And who would serve thee well upon this earth

The inmost heart of the world's life must woo,

From Life's hot blood distilling purest dew,—

Lest Love's bright arrows bring us woe and dearth.

He is ill advised when, in less adorned manner, he writes plainly of modern men and things. These lines to Kipling are just a trifle too simple and direct :—

And wondrous true and clear

The forms of things appear

To your quick glance.

Out of the sunrise in the East

You came and made our dreams come true ;

And made us, great and least,

Each man and boy and beast,

All friends to you.

Wandering pensively and at peace amid his roses Mr. Thaw may yet cultivate his note into a gentle sweetness that will be pleasant to hear.

Mr. Richard le Gallienne has found himself so much at home in the pleasing art of paraphrasing Omar Khayyám and Edward Fitzgerald that he has added no less than fifty new quatrains to the new edition of his RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM (Grant Richards, 5s. n.). These fresh verses are quite as good as the old, and only a careful comparison with the edition of 1897 will show where the interpolations occur. The continuity of feeling and of sound is admirably sustained. Here are a few of the new quatrains :—

Love, the fair day is drawing to its close
The stars are rising, and soft wind blows.
The gates of heaven are opening in a dream—
The nightingale sings to the sleeping rose.
Shadows, and dew, and silence, and the stars—
I wonder, love, what is behind those bars
Of twinkling silver—is there aught behind ?—
Venus and Jupiter, Sirius and Mars ;
Aldebaran and the soft Pleiades
Arion ploughing the ethereal seas—
Which are the stars my love, and which your eyes ?
And O the nightingale in yonder trees.

Some of the verses are improved or taken out ; other points to which his critics have drawn attention are ignored. The general result is a very fluent, agreeable book of verses, not great, but graceful and likely to be much enjoyed with the accompaniments of a jug of wine, a loaf of bread, and the not impossible "thou" beside one in the wilderness.

In A WOMAN OF EMOTIONS AND OTHER POEMS (Geo. Allen, 5s. n.) Mr. Rowland Thirlmere, whose "Idylls of Spain" may be remembered, makes a bold dash for fame. We hardly think the ambitious monodrama of some seventy pages with which his book opens will gain for him the poet's crown of bays. Such lines, towards the end, as—

You had a mother once, dear, pallid corpse—
Perchance your latest thought was given to her,
Hence this faint smile of icy happiness prevent the most reckless critic from promising immortality. Mr. Thirlmere is at his worst in "Beatæ Memoræ," a poem about the brave men who have fallen in South Africa. In "An Elegy" he is at his best. These detached stanzas are full of pleasant music :—

For thee deep Arno's flowery meads
Are spread, and Dante lingers there
To show thee how the lily feeds
On sweet Italian air.

At times a glimpse of ocean wakes
Within us what is more than man ;
Or, breathed upon, the spirit makes Music æolian.

So, when in mood exultant sings
The soul, we surely apprehend
That near us beat the unwearied wings
Of some transfigured friend.

"Accepted" also has some verses of merit :—

The light that shone upon her face
Fell from an unknown, fairer sky,
That domes the beatific place
Of love and mystery.

But we fear the bays are still a long way off.

There is a vein of real poetical talent in EYES IN SOLITUDE (Elliot Stock, 5s.), though obscured by the inclusion of a good deal of unnecessary matter. Mr. Moore's stanzas on the Quingentenary of Winchester College are much above the ordinary run of such verses, and his translations into Latin verse give evidence of scholarly training. Once more he handles, in elegiacs, the oft-attempted "Elegy in a Country Churchyard," and does it tolerably enough. We confess to liking these exercises better than his "Wild Flowers and Wild Oats," or "Darkness that may be Felt"—verses that are more strenuous than poetical.

KING MARCHAUNT AND HIS RAGAMUFFIN (Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d.) is a poetical allegory on the evils that have crept into the Universities, written, not without some skill in the employment of blank verse, by a writer calling himself "Helion Bumpstead."

Behold the Stuffer and his loathly art !

sings this curiously-named gentleman at the commencement of Book xvi., and the line shows you what you may expect. The allegory is better done than this quotation might lead you to think.

Very pretty and dainty are some of the verses in A ROSE OF REGRET (1s. 6d.), written by James Hebblethwaite and published in Sydney as No. II. of the Bulletin Booklets. There is good workmanship about his lines, and a subdued and gentle melancholy pervades his poetry. The title-piece, "Ulysses," and "Rejected" strike us as perhaps the best of the collection ; all three are examples of a difficult metre daintily and delicately handled. "Wanderers" is, perhaps, the only poem that strikes a distinctively colonial note.

JOHN OF DAMASCUS (Unicorn Press, 5s. n.) contains a good deal of interesting matter set forth in a long poem, of which the metre and the method of printing are equally peculiar. Now and then Mr. Douglas Ainslie writes well and forcibly ; at other times he perpetrates truly astonishing lines. It is not clear why he should have cast into this mould what is apparently intended for a study in comparative religion. The long note at the end (happily in prose) is interesting as an example of poetic self-consciousness. Mr. Ainslie threatens to return again to the subject—to develop at greater length his "statement of the true Buddhist position and the exposition of the Mahomedan faith."

SURVIVALS (Putnams, 5s.) is the name given to a collection of verses by Mr. Lewis Randolph. They are not particularly distinguished, but many of them have a touch of religious sentiment that will find sympathetic readers. Mr. Randolph has apparently led a busy life, and his booklet is at any rate creditable evidence that his mind has not been all engrossed in commercial affairs. It is rather prettily decorated—"embellished" is the author's word—by Bryson Burroughs.

Those who are interested in folk-lore will no doubt find amusement in BALLADS OF GHOSTLY SHIRES (Greening, 2s. 6d.), wherein Mr. George Bartram—who wrote "The People of Clopton" some years ago—tells in spirited verse such tales as "The Warlock's Wooing" and "The Deadly Sin of the Mavereels." The verse is well enough managed, something after the manner of the "Ingoldsby Legends," and the book is nicely printed and bound.

Mr. Barnard George Hoare has made other ventures in verse. His present work, AS THE WIND STIRS (Simpkin, 4s. 6d.), contains a varied assortment of poems in many moods and in many metres. Misprints occur with alarming frequency, and there are some curious lapses hardly explicable as printer's errors, but there is a certain fluent melody about some of the verses. His chief fault is a tendency towards obscurity of expression, which is not caused by any remarkable depth of meaning.

Mr. Hamish Hendry is better in the first part of his book than in the last. His BURNS FROM HEAVEN (Richards, 3s. 6d.) contains some tolerable imitations of that poet, as he might be supposed to sing on revisiting his native haunts. The "other verses" which eke out the volume are in no way remarkable.

We are glad to notice that Messrs. Blackwood are bringing out a new edition of HORACE IN HOMESpun, by Hugh Haliburton, with illustrations by Mr. A. S. Boyd. The price is 6s. n. Mr. Haliburton is certainly one of the most successful of the numerous band who have essayed to recapture something of the Horatian spirit, and his Lowland Scots dialect gives a happy touch of novelty to his imitations.

The anonymous publisher has done well to reproduce THE OPTIMIST AND OTHER VERSES, most of which have appeared in American papers, by the late Hilda Johnson Wise. The verses are buoyant and spontaneous ; humorous with just the right note of pathos here and there, though a little uneven in merit.

There is some little promise displayed in the volume of verse called THE WISDOM OF NATHAN GRAY, by Denis Davies (Simpkin, Marshall), and the book has a melancholy interest, being published by the author's mother as a memento of her son. IRENE, and other verses, by W. Keppel Honnywill (South-Eastern Herald office, 1s. 6d.), are smooth and occasionally tuneful. SUNSET TOWN, &c., by Paul Gegan (1s. 6d.), is undeniable verse, of the undistinguished order, with a mildly Celtic flavour.

A HAPPY HUMOURIST.

"Painting, music, and women are often admired or criticized by plucky people who are not afraid of exhibiting their ignorance" is one of the wise, if slightly worn, dicta with which Mr. Max O'Rell proposes to delight the readers of his latest book, HER ROYAL HIGHNESS WOMAN (Chatto, 3s. 6d.). Mr. O'Rell is evidently plucky, for while writing some 250 pages on the subject he is most insistent on the point that he knows nothing of the eternal feminine. In the past he tells us he has carried this conviction of ignorance so far as to permit it to influence practical affairs.

I was announced [he says] to give a lecture on women to the students of a large ladies' college in North Carolina. A couple of hours before the lecture, three young ladies from the college called at the hotel where I was staying. I met them in the parlour. Three charming, bright, most intelligent-looking girls they were. After looking at each other for some time, so as to suggest that the other should speak, one at last made up her mind to be the spokeswoman of the little deputation. "We have called on you," she said, "to ask if you would be kind enough to change the subject of your lecture to-night. Our lecture course is instituted for the instruction and the general improvement of the students, and we thought we should like to hear you talk to us on a subject which you know something about."

"I must say" the lecturer adds, "that I felt fearfully small; but I was delighted at the frankness of those young American girls, and at once acceded to their request." Mr. O'Rell loves a good story and it is quite possible that he gave way to those frank and free young Yankee maidens as much because he saw that in so doing he provided himself with an excellent point on which to open his lecture at the ladies' college in North Carolina as from lack of belief in his knowledge of his subject. Indeed he has centred his mind on women and marriage these many days, and the present "unpretentious little volume" is the result of his philosophy. He is a happy humourist who is worldly wise; a happy lover, because he finds that life runs most agreeably that way. His observations are acute but often bourgeois. He appears, occasionally, to make an excellent business of marriage and promises to show us how it can be made to produce, as it were, a fair working profit. All sides of the question have received his attention. The old moot points he is prepared to answer at once. For example:—

I have heard many men and women say that there is no love without jealousy—in fact, that jealousy is the natural consequence of love. St. Augustine said:—"He that is not jealous is not in love." I believe these people are wrong, including St. Augustine, before whose authority on love and women I decline to bow. There is no room for jealousy in the heart that loves really and truly. There is no real love where there is no abandon and complete confidence.

Or on the delicate subject of when a woman begins to grow old. "The Watteau of eighteen will," he says, "become a Rubens at forty. . . . It is at forty that she enjoys the grace of perfect self-possession. She has tact, and dresses faultlessly. Her knowledge of the world, her experience of life, all help to make her a more delightful companion than ever."

His chapters such as "What is a perfect lady?"—with the reply "A lady is a woman who adds to the virtues of a woman the qualities of a gentleman"—and on "Art in Love" and "The French Wife," "The American Woman" and the portrait of "A French Mother," are all excellent in their way. His pages shine with rather rough fun, and occasionally sparkle with an agreeable wit. Thus—"Woman is an angel who seldom appreciates a man who has not a bit of devil in him"; "There is no esprit de corps among women." And of anecdotes there are plenty and to spare; here is one of a literary flavour à propos of polygamy.

Not long ago one of the most popular novelists of England was calling on a lady, one of the most popular novelists of America. That Englishman is, perhaps, the plainest man I have ever set eyes on. He held, in conversation, that every man was born a polygamist. The lady said nothing. But when he had gone she turned towards her guests, and said, "Well, I should like to know who would 'polyg' with him!"

In short, in "Her Royal Highness Woman" Mr. Max O'Rell gives us one more example of his half-humorous, half-utilitarian philosophy. He writes, as he lectures, with a strong intention to be amusing and an inclination to ameliorate the lot of those not so wise or witty as himself.

THE ROMANCE OF A PRIVATEER.

IN PAUL JONES, FOUNDER OF THE AMERICAN NAVY (Kegan Paul, two vols., 12s.), Mr. Augustus C. Buell has written a fascinating book. There are already nearly a dozen lives of Paul Jones, but, alike for scope and for abundance of documentation, these two volumes are easily first. It is curious that despite all that has been written on the subject the details of this astonishing career have been but little known, and though, as Mr. Buell points out, "Captain Paul's" name has been "the sport of novel-writers and the prey of fiction for three generations," novelists do not often secure so rich a prey. Gallant and gay, endowed with a seductive Spanish-like beauty, a dandy, and a man of fashion, so finished a courtier in three languages that no woman could resist him, he was yet brave among the bravest, a roaring bravo of the sea, a splendid sailor and a daring tactician, a clever organizer, and an exceedingly acute merchant and trader. Not the least romantic incident of his life was his devoted, and far from platonic, love for a daughter of no less a personage than the Grand Monarque himself. With all this splendid material Mr. Buell would have been maladroit indeed had he not produced an exceedingly attractive book. To the English reader, no doubt, the details of the foundation of the American navy will not be particularly interesting, while the author's fondness for long foot-notes in very small type cannot be accounted unto him for righteousness. Also it must be remembered that he is an American and the great-grandson of one of Paul Jones' sea-dogs, and that, consequently, in his eyes almost everything that his hero did was well done.

All the world knows that Paul Jones was a Scotsman; but he was born John Paul, the son of a Lowland gardener and fisherman, towards the middle of the eighteenth century, and took the name of Paul upon succeeding to a plantation of 3,000 acres in Virginia. He was a born sailor, and entered the merchant service so early that at little more than one and twenty Paul Jones had already made his third voyage as captain and had been tried on a charge of murder on the high seas and acquitted. Fever had reduced the crew to five or six hands, and Captain Paul was the only officer able to keep the deck when a huge Jamaica mulatto became mutinous and had, in Mr. Buell's judicious phrase, to be "subdued with a belaying pin." No man ever lived who had a more complete or better-founded confidence in himself, and when the Congress of the revolted colonies determined to fit out a naval force he was naturally assigned a prominent part. Indeed, the assistance he gave before a pennant was ever broken on board a western vessel of war would almost have entitled him to be considered the founder of the American navy. On his first cruise as captain of the Alfred Paul Jones captured sixteen British vessels, and as a result he obtained a better ship, the Ranger. It was in the Ranger that he carried to France the news of the surrender of Burgoyne's army—news which, in a couple of months, procured for the States the long-desired French Alliance. In the Ranger it was, too, that he made his memorable cruise round the coasts of Britain, surprising Whitehaven and capturing the Drake off Belfast Lough—the first instance in modern naval warfare of the capture of a regular British man-of-war by a ship of inferior force. On this same voyage he made his famous descent on St. Mary's Isle in the hope of capturing the Earl of Selkirk and holding him as a hostage for the better treatment of American prisoners, but the intended victim was away. His plate was not, however, and some of the invader's men made it prize of war. Captain Paul ransomed it with his own money, and returned it to Lord Selkirk in the most approved style of the gentlemanly pirate of fiction.

A pirate, of course, he was not, even when he sailed again for England in the Bonhomme Richard upon one of the most memorable cruises in naval history. That vessel, given to him by Louis XVI., was a French East Indiaman, and little better than a worn-out old tub. Yet in her he fought the most famous action in naval warfare down to that time. Mr. Buell gives an admirable account of the immortal fight with H.M.S. Serapis, off Scarborough, which took by storm the imagination of the world. The story of how a British ship was captured by a privateer of not more than two-thirds her force, and how the vessel which surrendered destroyed and sunk her conqueror, still forms one of the most exciting episodes in the annals of warfare. The carnage was terrible, and when at last the Serapis had struck and her captain had handed his sword to Paul Jones, the victor had to transfer himself to the British ship. The next morning the Richard went down with all her dead, still flying the flag made from the silk dresses of the New England girls, the first edition of the Stars and Stripes ever seen in Europe. This was the culminating point of Captain Paul's career. The French never gave him another ship, but Louis XVI. made him a Chevalier, and he had leisure to pursue his love affair with Aimée de Telison, a natural daughter of Louis XIV., and to adorn a polished, if corrupt, society, in which his magnetic personality singularly fitted him to shine. He afterwards became a Russian admiral, but after a brief experience of Muscovite ways he was glad to retire from the Empress' service, with health seriously impaired. He came to England after peace with America had been made, and this "rebel" and "pirate" actually dined with the Prince of Wales, and visited at Strawberry Hill. He died at forty-five in 1792, but not in poverty as has so often been stated. He well deserved the monument, solid rather than florid, which Mr. Buell has erected to his memory.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The Alfred Jewel.

The approaching millenary celebration of Alfred at Winchester has caused certain bookmaking of an inferior kind, dealing with Alfred and his times, to blossom forth after a hasty fashion. But there are compensations, for the same event has doubtless led Professor Earle to put forth, at the request of the delegates of the Oxford Press, a monograph, THE ALFRED JEWEL (Clarendon Press, 12s. 6d. n.), on a subject upon which he has often lectured. This well-known jewel is herein admirably illustrated in colours, and has never before received such exhaustive treatment. Found near Athelney in 1693, this exquisite piece of jewelry, consisting of a sitting figure enamelled on a plate of gold, protected in front by a slab of rock crystal, and enshrined in a golden frame of delicately executed filigree work, soon found a home in the Ashmolean Museum, and from that day to this has been the occasional subject of learned descriptions and essays, and of not a little controversy. Interesting and scholarly as every page of this monograph is, it will certainly not set the matter at rest so far as the purport or use of this jewel is concerned, but will, on the contrary, unless we are mistaken, prove a renewal of strife. The inscription, "Alfred had me worked," together with the beauty and costliness of the work, at once on its discovery caused it to be attributed to the great King. This has never been seriously disputed, though some used to think that the very beauty and finish of the work precluded so early a date. On this point, and on the work being English, we think Professor Earle's arguments are as conclusive as well-supported theories can ever be, but his other ideas seem quite conjectural. The Professor's views are that this elaborate jewel was worn by Alfred on his helm, and that he buried it to avoid detection when in retirement at Athelney in 878. If so, it is difficult to imagine why he did not dig up and resume the use of so well-known and regal a symbol when the time of trial had passed away.

Professor Earle is so much satisfied with his own notion as to the use of this jewel that he, perhaps rather coolly, rules all other conjectures (seven in number) as out of court, and "now no more to be thought of." Nevertheless, we cannot but think that he has quite failed to upset the late Bishop Clifford's theory as to its origin, which, in our opinion, still remains by far the most probable. When Alfred sent a copy of his English translation of Gregory's "Pastoralis" to every Bishop in his kingdom, he sent in each book an aestel (staff) of the value of fifty mancuses, or £18 15s., a very large sum for those days. Bishop Clifford explains that the aestel was a book-staff or pointer, made of horn with a handle of precious and durable material. Certainly Professor Earle has so far failed to invalidate the arguments by which this view is supported. The inscription on the jewel would seem utterly out of place if Alfred was himself to wear it, but would be quite suitable in a gift to another or to a particular church. Queen Aelflad, when she worked a beautiful stole for Bishop Frithestan, soon after Alfred's time, had an inscription embroidered very similar to the one on the Alfred jewel; but can we imagine the Queen having such an inscription worked, stating that it was done by her orders, or by her fingers, if she had been going to wear it herself? Moreover, the sacred subject of the enamel is far more suited for use in connexion with a religious book—namely, to follow the lines in reading and to avoid the handling of a very costly work—than for the helmet of a fighting prince.

Be this as it may, the value of this book, in its philology, and in its history of a striking episode in Alfred's life and of the country where it occurred, is very considerable. The illustrations of Anglo-Saxon rings and other comparative jewelry are also excellent.

Africa.

IN BRITAIN'S TITLE IN SOUTH AFRICA (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.) Mr. James Cappon, of the Queen's University, Kingston, Canada, tells the story of Cape Colony to the days of the great Trek after the manner of a rhetorician replying to Dr. Theal at a debating society. He maintains that "the historiographer of Cape Colony and official literary man of the British Empire in that part of the world has not comprehended his task or has been unfaithful to it," and also that Dr. Theal's histories "could hardly have been written by a historiographer of Cape Colony, unless something like an organized conspiracy under the protection of the predominant political party had existed against the British name and British traditions in South Africa." This is strong language; but Mr. Cappon does not confine himself to generalization. He grapples with Dr. Theal at close quarters and particularizes his charges carefully in the matter of the Slachter's Nek rebellion, of the treatment of the coloured races, &c. Like M. Démolins, and one or two other of our friendly Continental critics, Mr. Cappon considers the particular rights of the particular quarrel which brought an ultimatum from Mr. Kruger of less importance than the broader question whether Britons or Boers have made the better use of their South African inheritance; and he formulates the case for the Briton thus:—

He has been the moving spirit of progress in South Africa, the mediator between its various races, and the educator of the native ones; he has been the support of all liberal and enlightened ideas, and at great expense of blood and treasure to himself has maintained a standard of law and justice there, which is on a par with that of the most civilized countries of Europe; it is his presence alone which, as far as one can see, has kept South African civilization from developing into a tremendous slave-holding aristocracy with social and political features as bad as those of the Turkish Empire.

Mr. Cappon is a believer in the Afrikaner conspiracy theory of the origin of the war, though he has no new facts to adduce in support of it; and he will hear of no "compromise" with Krugerism: "You must kill Krugerism or abandon the British population in South Africa, British farmers, shopkeepers, and miners to a system of Dutch Terrorism." A good book in spite of its debating society tone.

THE NEW SOUTH AFRICA, by W. Bleloch (Heinemann, 10s. n.), contains, and indeed principally consists of, a sober and judicious survey of the resources of the two new colonies. It is too heavily loaded with technical details to be suitable for general reading; but it will be welcomed by all those who want to see the data for answering the important question of the Transvaal's contribution to the cost of the war. On this point Mr. Bleloch is more sanguine than the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He does not believe that, when once the Boers have surrendered and been disarmed, it will be necessary to saddle the revenues of the Colony with a large and costly police force; and he gives some pleasant practical indications of the amount of War Debt for which the Transvaal can reasonably be expected to assume liability:—

Egypt has a debt of £106,000,000, and a poverty-stricken population. New Zealand has a debt of £46,000,000, and a population of 756,000. New South Wales has a debt of £63,000,000, and a population of 1,357,000, and so on. The Transvaal is richer than any of these, but doubt is expressed as to its ability to pay a fair share of the War Debt! The Transvaal population (natives included) is over a million, and the Transvaal native is on the average a richer man than the English labourer.

The argument is somewhat vitiated by the fact that, in the countries enumerated, the public debt is represented by a good many tangible assets in the shape of railroads, harbours, irrigation works, &c. But the right to fly the Union Jack in places where the Vierkleur flew before is a commercial asset, as Mr. Rhodes pointed out in a famous speech, since it will bring with it sound finance and the removal of vexatious restrictions on the mining industry.

In the chapter on Administration Mr. Bleloch insists that popular representation must be granted with as little delay as possible. The military government, he thinks, to which of course there has so far been no feasible alternative, has not given satisfaction. Mr. Bleloch, who is by no means a pro-Boer, maintains that "only a few of the appointments made were free from the objection of evident unsuitability." Crown Colony government, he urges, really means government by the capitalists, who alone are likely to have the ear of the Governor, and who can coerce the Governor through the Press which they control.

YEOMAN SERVICE (Smith, Elder, 6s.), by the Lady Maud Rolleston, is announced as the diary of the wife of an Imperial Yeomanry officer during the Boer war. It is quite an uninteresting and quite an unnecessary book. The things which Lady Maud Rolleston saw in South Africa are merely the obvious things that every one already knows to be there.

China.

MANCHURIA (Methuen, 10s. 6d. n.), by Alexander Hosie, formerly in charge of the British Consulate at Newchwang, begins with a relation of two journeys of some, though not very great, interest and importance, and proceeds to a discussion of Manchurian products, industries, and trade. This portion of the work is of the nature of Consular Reports, and the substance of it has probably figured in these documents. In some cases, indeed, the writer quotes textually from his own Reports. He is to be thanked for having assembled an immense amount of information. His book will be invaluable to the compilers of such works of reference as the "Statesman's Year Book," and may be recommended to the careful attention of the arm-chair experts who sit at home at ease. But it will hardly appeal to the general reader who will, indeed, be frightened away by the appallingly long lists of mysterious commodities and the serried columns of statistics showing what becomes of the Manchurian ginseng, and liquorice, and salted crabs, and samshu, and castor oil.

AS THE CHINESE SEE US, by Thomas G. Selby (Unwin, 6s.), is an attempt to explain the intricacies of the Chinese mind by means of imaginary dialogues between typical Celestials and typical Europeans. Opium, missionaries, Imperialism, and Boxers are among the subjects thus discussed. It is moderately well done, but goes on long enough to be tedious.

THE STORY OF THE SIEGE IN PEKING (Elliot Stock, 1s. 6d.), by S. M. Russell, Professor of Mathematics in the Imperial College, is a short matter-of-fact diary of stirring events, supplemented by a few extracts from the Peking Gazette and other sources.

A Journalist at Home and Abroad.

GLIMPSES OF THREE NATIONS (Blackwood, 6s.) is a collection of G. W. Steevens' Daily Mail articles, describing certain aspects of life in London, Paris, and certain German cities. One cannot say much more for the book than that, like all Steevens' work, it is eminently readable. It is at the same time lamentably superficial, the descriptions, more particularly in the section dealing with Paris, being little more than caricatures. The chapter headed "A Nation of Sou-Keepers" is a gross though amusing libel on the French nation. The ridicule poured on the Etablissements Duval is itself ridiculous. They are admirable institutions, meeting the needs of a lower middle-class clientèle far more adequately than the corresponding eating-houses in London. Evidently Steevens knew nothing about Paris before he went there to write his articles, and did not stay there long enough to get any real knowledge of the subject. In Germany he seems more at home, though even there the desire to write effectively rather than veraciously is somewhat obvious. He sees the oddities of German life clearly enough; and his remarks on the German passion for detail, the German submissiveness to the police, and the German delight in scribbling greetings on picture postcards are exceedingly entertaining. But he does not seem to get at the heart of things; and his editor, Mr. Vernon Blackburn, thinks it necessary to throw in a note to the effect that Steevens had changed his mind about many things, and more particularly about the Kaiser and the success of his world policy before he died. Altogether, the volume will hardly increase Steevens' reputation, as it does little to exemplify his really valuable qualities.

An American Dramatic Critic.

Mr. Norman Hapgood is a good dramatic critic, even if he is a little disposed to judge the showman by the canons that are only applicable to the philosopher, and to forget that, in these days of printed books, the man who really has "ideas" is not very likely to choose the theatre as the medium of circulating them when he can circulate them better with the help of his publisher. That, however, is an idea favoured by many earnest students of the drama; and in THE STAGE IN AMERICA (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.) Mr. Hapgood has something really luminous to say. The nature of the limitations of the irritating genius of Dr. Ibsen has seldom been better defined than in this paragraph:—

The law that a tragedy cannot exist unless the author glorifies life, unless he puts magnified characters in ideal situations, working out exceptional plots, was created not by Aristotle, but by the nature of the human mind; and a law which has stood the test of time, from Sophocles to Shakespeare, and from Racine to Goethe, will not yield to theories of novelty. If the contemporary drama neglects it, the law remains, and the drama is condemned.

To find such inspired flashes one has to plough through a good many pages in which there is much ado about nothing; but that is more the fault of the subject than of the author. If it is worth while to read dramatic criticism at all (except for the purpose of following current events) then it is worth while to read this book of Mr. Norman Hapgood's.

The Nineteenth Century.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY (Putnams, 10s. 6d.) is a survey of a hundred years of human progress in a series of essays by many writers, all eminent in their several departments. A few of the papers are on topics more interesting in America than elsewhere—Mr. James W. Alexander's paper on "The Phenomenon of American Life Assurance," and Mr. Russell Sturgis' paper on "The Progress of American Architecture," for example. Others make a wider appeal, Mr. Andrew Lang writing on "Psychical Research of the Century," Mr. Leslie Stephen on "Evolution and Religious Conceptions," and Mr. Louis Heilprin on "Geographical Conquests of the Nineteenth Century." Naturally the skill and methods of the essayists are not quite uniform, some of them preferring the particular to the general, and others the general to the particular. The standard, however, is high; and the book is probably the most thorough of the many books of the kind that have been published. Its appearance is handsome, and it would be a suitable school prize.

Jerusalem.

A PRACTICAL GUIDE TO JERUSALEM AND ITS ENVIRONS, by E. A. Reynolds-Ball (Black). This book contains information on the chief sites of Palestine, omitting all else, and is intended clearly for the "traveller" who has a fortnight or so to see the whole country in. It cannot compare with the standard guides, which remain indispensable for the student, or for the traveller who intends to do things properly. The reader will find all the practical information he requires as to hotels, prices, steamship companies, dragomans, and so forth; and various routes are suggested for seeing the interior. The information is satisfactory as far as it goes; but Mr. Reynolds-Ball, if he knows the country well, might have named one or two trustworthy dragomans who would manage everything for travellers at a much cheaper rate than the very expensive ones he does name. The book is not very well written; "unsuited as" and "unfitted as" are not English phrases; "Pedromos" is not the Greek for "forerunner," nor "teskereh" the right way to spell "teskereh." The author thinks the Russian church on the Mount of Olives is handsome. He might well have recommended the native Keffiyeh as headgear; it can be worn over a hat or cap. The most original thing in the book is a new cure for seasickness. The patient shuts one eye and steadily regards something with the other.

The French Revolution.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION, by Shailer Mathews (Longmans, 5s. n.), is sober and judicious, cold-blooded, level-headed, and professorial. Its proper place in the scheme of things is that of a corrective to Carlyle. Many such correctives exist, but this is better than most of them. The antecedent conditions of the great uprising are treated with particular care, and made particularly clear. Strictly speaking the book would be of little use to any one who would take the trouble to read Mr. Morse Stephens. But Mr. Morse Stephens is somewhat tedious; and indolent readers will prefer to receive the results of his researches filtered through the pages of Mr. Shailer Mathews.

A Darkening of the Dark Ages.

We receive from America many books which, in view of the number of English publications which have to be attended to, it is impossible to notice, or at any rate to notice at length. In some departments of literature the Americans are doing admirable work, and it is a pleasure to commend such admirable books as those noticed by us some time ago on the Sources of History, which English publishers have wisely introduced to the English public. On the other hand, when we receive from America an historical work of considerable pretension making a serious claim on the English historical student, it seems equally important, if the work is unsound, to state our opinion of it. Such a work is THE MIDDLE AGES REVISITED, OR THE ROMAN GOVERNMENT AND RELIGION AND THEIR RELATIONS TO BRITAIN, by Alex. Del Mar. (New York: Cambridge Encyclopædia Co. London: Quaritch.) It is not often that a reviewer is obliged to write with unqualified condemnation of a book which is addressed to scholars. At the present day, certainly, authors who attempt to deal with matters of ancient history, philosophy, or art take pains to prepare themselves by at least an adequate understanding of the sources which they are to employ, and to acquire some appreciation of historical criticism. With religion it is, perhaps, still otherwise, and sciolists rush in where the most rash of mediæval angels would hardly venture. But of the book before us we can only say that it is an exception to the wholesome rule. If it were not for the magnificence of its pretension to almost universal knowledge, it might be dismissed with only a word or two of indignation. But Mr. Del Mar takes himself so seriously that we must take leave to say plainly that he is utterly incompetent to deal with the great subjects he has undertaken. He is destitute of the slightest idea of historical criticism, quoting writers of ages later as evidence on contested points. He is apparently, from several instances we have observed, ignorant of classical and even of modern languages. And his general attitude towards mediæval history shows him to have never studied it seriously at all. The book is a mass of ill-assorted matters, important and trivial, true and false, without a ray of light to illuminate the darkness. We will give a few instances, which are quite sufficient. We pass by a tempting passage on page 5, where practically everything in the world is declared to be of "Indian" origin, from language to the names of the months and "rosaries, altars, and censers" (doubtless Mr. Del Mar means "censers"). We observe that the author considers it doubtful when "the vernal equinox was first kept as a Christian festival," throws doubt on the Nicene council, and adds that "the Rev. Alex. Hislop says that in Babylon the summer solstice was connected with the legend of Joannes, the fish-god, and, that this suggested the Roman legend of Santo Joannes, or Saint John." He absolutely has the audacity to assert that "from the Buddhist term mess are derived the Latin term missa, the English mass, and the German messe." He speaks of "iconolatry" glibly, whereas no latreia of eikons was ever permitted. When he comes to deal with coins he is even more astounding. Offa is declared to have been a pagan, and to have struck gold coins because he held out as a pagan against Rome. His whole theory of sovereignty shown by gold coinage rests on an entirely false statement. "From Augustus to Alexis IV. (doubtless he means Alexis IV.), the gold coins of the Empire, East and West, were struck exclusively by the Basileus. . . . With the exception of an unique and dubious coin now in the Paris collection which bears the effigy of Louis Le Debonnaire, the same is true of France, Germany, Italy, indeed of all the provinces of the Empire whose princes were Christians." Now any one, who knows the elements of the subject, is aware that there is a lavish gold coinage of Charles the Great in Italy, of Louis the Pious, of Louis the German, Lothair, and Charles the Bald, and of Charles the Fat. The Paris Cabinet could show dozens of them. There were also large gold coinages by the Dukes of Benevento and the Norman kings of Naples and Sicily. There are also undoubted English gold coins of Ethelred the Unready, Edward the Confessor, and Archbishop Sigmund. Either Mr. Del Mar is ignorant, or he suppresses these well-known facts to establish his theory. We need only add that he lavishly quotes foreign languages with which he appears to be unacquainted. For instance, Pagnini "Della Moneta de Fiorentin"; the Apocolokintosis of Claudius; the Arcades (for Orkney)—are nice derangements. After this it is perhaps scarcely surprising to learn that "Numa was the son of Tat-Ius. But Tat and Ius or Ies are names of Buddha"!

THE MEMOIRS OF ARTHUR LAURENSEN (Unwin, 6s.), an antiquary and director of public companies in Shetland, are presumably published mainly for the reading of personal friends. The task is competently performed by Catharine Spence.

The special features of the new PRESS DIRECTORY (Mitchell, 2s.) are articles on "The Legal Year in its relation to the Press," by Dr. Hugh Fraser; on "Some War Correspondents of the Year," by Miss Laura Smith; and on "The Chances of a Customs Union," by Mr. Ernest E. Williams.

ART.

THE FRESCOES IN THE SIXTINE CHAPEL, by Evelyn March Phillipps (Murray, 1901, 6s. n.).—Many chapters have been written on the frescoes of the Sixtine Chapel by scholars of every age and race, but no attempt has been hitherto made to give an account of these mural paintings and of the masters to whom they are ascribed in a single volume. The credit of this idea is due to Miss March Phillipps, whose small book, adorned as it is with a medal of Pope Sixtus IV. and twenty-five excellent illustrations, will prove a valuable guide both to students and travellers. Miss March Phillipps has studied the best authorities on the subject with care and attention, and especially acknowledges her obligations to Dr. Steinmann, whose patient researches and penetrating insight have thrown much light on the historical incidents commemorated in some of the frescoes and the contemporary portraits introduced by their respective painters. The only thing that she omits to tell us is the name of the architect of the Sixtine Chapel. This was Baccio Pontelli, the Florentine master whom Pope Sixtus not only employed to build the bridge of Ponte Sisto with blocks taken from the Coliseum, and the Vatican library and chapel, but also to restore most of the Roman churches and add Renaissance façades to S. Maria del Popolo, S. Pietro in Vincula, and the hospital of S. Spirito, that building which figures so prominently in Botticelli's fresco of "The Cleansing of the Leper." The fact that a Tuscan architect should have been chosen by the Pope to design a chapel which was afterwards largely decorated by Florentine painters is another instance of the supremacy of Florentine art at the time. Miss March Phillipps adopts most of the conclusions now generally accepted by modern critics. She follows Morelli in assigning the "Baptism and Journey of Moses" to Pintoricchio, and still more recent authorities in giving "The Passage of the Red Sea" to Cosimo Rosselli's gifted pupil Piero di Cosimo instead of to the elder master. And she is, on the whole, inclined to accept Mr. Berenson's attribution of the "Death of Moses" to Piero Dei, afterwards Abbot of San Clemente of Arezzo, and generally known by the name of Don Bartolommeo della Gatta. This fresco was formerly ascribed to Luca Signorelli on Vasari's authority, but no mention appears of Signorelli's name in the original contract in which the work of painting the chapel was assigned to the four masters, Botticelli, Rosselli, Perugino, and Ghirlandajo; and there is no evidence that he visited Rome before the close of the fifteenth century. On the other hand, Bartolommeo della Gatta is mentioned among the assistants of Perugino, and his style was strongly influenced by Signorelli, with whose work many of the figures in this fresco show a marked affinity. It was Cardinal Guiliano della Rovere, Pope Sixtus the Fourth's nephew, who originally engaged Botticelli and his companions to paint the walls of the Sixtine Chapel, and who, when he became Pope Julius II., employed Michael Angelo to execute the wonderful frescoes of the roof. Miss March Phillipps explains the details of this vast decorative scheme in clear and simple language, and points out the influence of Dante and Signorelli in the "Last Judgment," which the great Florentine painted twenty-three years later on the east wall of the chapel. In conclusion she gives us a very interesting account of the strange adventures which befell both Raphael's cartoons and the Arazzi or tapestries that were executed from his designs for the decoration of the lower part of the walls of the Sixtine Chapel.

Messrs. Christie, who are shortly to sell the wines from the cellars of the late Queen Victoria, held another Royal sale in May, 1853, which it is of some little interest to recall at the present moment. This dispersal was of the 777 pictures belonging to Louis Philippe, ex-King of France. Of these 249 were bequeathed to Louis Philippe by Frank Hall Standish, a descendant, doubtless, of Myles Standish, who sailed with the Mayflower colony to Massachusetts in 1670, and became the champion of the Pilgrims against the Indians. The total of something like £37,500 given for the pictures was in those days regarded as an extraordinarily large one. Seldom have more noteworthy examples by Velasquez come under the hammer in this country. The highest priced picture of all was bought for the National Gallery—at a cost of £2,000, as compared with £4,800 paid for it in 1832 by Louis Philippe—as an early work of the great Spaniard. This was no other than the celebrated "Adoration of the Shepherds," which to-day is regarded as the masterpiece of Francisco Zurbaran. Visitors to the present exhibition at the Guildhall may there study at least three Velasquez from the Louis Philippe assemblage. These are the portraits of Isabel de Bourbon (No. 117), of Count Olivares (No. 129), and of Philip IV. (No. 130), valued in 1853 respectively at £300, £310, and £250. Ten times the amounts would probably not buy the pictures nowadays. Lord Hertford paid 1,600gns. for a full-length portrait of Don Baltazar Carlos; 700gns. for a Watteau landscape with figures. Apart from this "Spanish Gallery," once to be seen at the Louvre, a portrait of Don Andreas di Andrada was bought by Thomas Baring for £1,020, and "La Vierge au Ceinture" by the Due de Montpensier for £1,550.

FICTION.

"DEVAYTIS."

DEVAYTIS. By MARYA RODZIEWICZ. Translated by Count S. C. DE SOISSONS. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

Miss Rodziewicz's "Devaytis" is a far finer novel than her "Anima Vilis" which was translated last year. "Anima Vilis" was aimless and diffuse; "Devaytis" is compact and full of purpose. "Devaytis," the later translated, was the earlier written. It is the book which won Miss Rodziewicz her popularity in Poland; it earned her the prize in the Warsaw Courier's open competition in 1888, and evoked enthusiastic praise in the Polish Reviews.

Devaytis—Lithuanian for a god—is an ancient oak, which stands to the hero in the same relation as a certain famous column stands to a heroine of recent fiction. For Lithuanian Mark it is the embodiment of devotion to soil and race. Mark's father on his death-bed divides his inheritance among his children, giving to the ne'er-do-weels rich land and money in plenty; to the sturdy Mark, his eldest born, a patch of lean soil, together with Devaytis, and the thankless task of administering a large estate for the unknown heir of the Orwids, who have disappeared from the face of Europe for many years. Mark accepts the burden, groaning inwardly. He has in him the root of good—passionate patriotism; and he prospers. The ne'er-do-weels squander their money, and forget their language and their duty to the land; one of them even raises his hand against the sacred oak. Mark struggles on in his silent Lithuanian way, tilling the soil, loving Devaytis, living down slander and injustice. The heiress of the Orwids is found at last; she comes from America in search of her patrimony, becomes an enthusiastic lover of Devaytis, and marries Mark in spite of his conscientious struggles against a wealthy match.

Devaytis is to be found in the pages of history. To the end that the whole Lithuanian nation might join together in common worship, says Narbutt, the historian of Lithuania, Brutenes—brother of Wejdawutas, the legendary founder of the Lithuanian State—chose out a glade at the meeting of two rivers, in the midst of which stood a spreading oak of the evergreen sort; and here he fixed the sanctuary of the three great gods of the race. And the place was called Romnowe, the place of peace. Under this oak, in the fulness of time, Wejdawutas and Brutenes offered themselves on a pyre as a sacrifice; under this oak Litwo, son of Wejdawutas and eponymous hero of the race, swore fidelity to his native gods.

Wejdawutas—at once a prince of the sixth century, the personification of a host of heathen soothsayers (for Wejdawutas is "the giver of Vedas"), and a purely mythical St. George-Bellerophon slayer of dragons—is, no less than Devaytis, the object of Mark's worship. Folk-lorists will find a special interest in the story of Wejdawutas' exploit with the dragons—the story of the hero-herdsman who slew the monsters, and let others take the glory, until the Princess was on the point of rewarding a pretender with her hand. The tale is identical with the Russian tale of Prince Ivan, the Princess Martha, and the Little Man with the Iron Hands; and almost the same as the Norwegian tale of Lillekort, and the Rumanian tale of Petru Firitschell, quoted by Athanasiev in his collection of Russian skazki. But Marya Rodziewicz gives it a special appositeness as a Lithuanian story, by dwelling on the Lithuanian reticence of the hero. Reticence is also "Mark's way," and a very irritating way it is at times.

Patriotism is the keynote of the book; but a curious difficulty must arise in the mind of the impartial reader as to the objective patria of the emotion, whether it is Lithuania or Poland—a difficulty not much simplified by the translator's custom of rendering the Lithuanian phrases which are put into the mouths of many of the characters into English, without indicating that they are Lithuanian and not Polish in the original. The book was hailed in Poland as the expression of Polish patriotism, as a thinly-veiled protest against the Russification of the Poles. And certainly the crime of the ne'er-do-well Czertwans is that they have forgotten how to speak Polish, not Lithuanian. But, on the other hand, the scene is laid in the very heart of Lithuania; the land which Mark loves is Lithuanian; Devaytis and Wejdawutas are no less Lithuanian.

The fact is that Miss Rodziewicz suffers from a kind of blindness common to all the Poles. They cry to Heaven for vengeance against the invading Russians, and forget that the Russians are treating them just as they themselves treated the Lithuanians and the Little-Russians in the days gone by. It is so long since the Poles swallowed up Lithuania that they have come to feel a kind of property in the national sentiment of the Lithuanians and to identify Lithuanian patriotism with their own. They forget that Wejdawutas was just as busy in fighting the Poles as he was in fighting the Germans; and that were it not for the common enmity to Russia there would not be much love between the Lithuanians and themselves. This peculiarly Polish point of view is ingenuously illustrated by Mark's words, "We have for centuries defended two things—our religion and our land. And we have preserved both." As a matter of fact the Lithuanians lost both religion and land to the Poles.

Miss Rodziewicz's fine story has been rendered by M. de Soissons into that dialect known as Baboo English, the language of the cultured Bengalee. Mark is a "petty nobleman" "with eyes like the steel." At first he loves Martha Wojnat, who is "young and not homely." The young man from America is, on the other hand, "homely"—indeed, at one time, owing to an accident, he "becomes a bogey man"—while Mark's dog is both "homely and wicked." Martha's grandfather is a bold fellow. "I was neither afraid of a stepmother, nor did I obey every one," he tells us; "thus I became a man." Devaytis, we learn, was "the protoplast of the grove," the symbol of Lithuania's struggle with certain un-Christian folk described as the "Knights of the cross-apostles." When Mark was on his trial before the noblesse of the district he looked out of window and beheld Irene; "his gloomy looks met two dark eyes, burning with irritation and cordially impressed by the importance of the present moment." Mark's agony at the attempt made to cut down the "protoplast" is almost unspeakable. "Since midnight I hurried here until my horse fell," he says. "Then I ran on like a madman. My despair increased every moment. . . . It has stood here so many centuries. So many generations have defended it and respected it, until for punishment God sent these people who do not respect anything. It is most trying." This is a wonderful achievement in a rhetorical figure which we may call bathos Babooense. And then, "in that moment there came from the depth of his soul a glorious glare of all that he had suffered." The lively Rymko Ragis' swear-word "May Devil!" is as good an oath as "My-Lord!" in the Count's translation of "Anima Vilis."

"I saw our field to-day [says Mark, at p. 82], and I was surprised how well it's cultivated."

"It's with charm, son, with charm," answers Ragis. "What? Well ploughed! Isn't it? Oho, ho! I know that you are already thinking to buy me a blue umbrella and a beautiful pipe for Christmas. Ho, ho! I am a rogue from the first rank to the right! It's time for me to think of getting married. The wedding shall be splendid, for we are already rich, only we lack a housekeeper."

"Aunt Aneta is coming to-morrow. In the morning we must put the room in the rear in order," answers Mark, with ill-placed hospitality.

"Miss Aneta! To, to, to! Let me kiss you."

However, we need not pursue quotation further; there would only be, to borrow a phrase from M. de Soissons, "as much profit from this bother as a cat would cry." We will leave the reader, in conclusion, to ponder over the epigram at p. 243—"Love is not a sin; only happiness gives quiet and satisfaction to very few people, and almost always sorrow."

Anonymous Sequels.

Just as we are beginning to exhaust the subject of "An Englishwoman's Love Letters" and others, come two well-considered and well-written volumes on the subject, THE LOVER'S REPLIES TO AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE LETTERS (Sampson Low, 5s. n.) and THE MISSING ANSWERS TO AN ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE LETTERS (Simpkin, Marshall, 6s.). The authors of both books show a good deal of skill and care in their unnecessary work. As Thackeray once said of love letters, "There was scorn, scandal, jokes, appeals, protests of eternal fidelity; the usual farrago . . ." in the first book and the sequelæ have their share of these things as well. Those who enjoyed "The Love Letters" and "Rosa Amorosa" will find entertainment in the present volumes. The "Lover's Replies," at least, is not quite so artificial and posé as its forerunners. It makes a very serious effort to inform those interested in the subject as to what fact caused the distressing end of the affair. An explanation or preface of the book says:—

The families and friends of both parties are numerous, and the letters will have been identified and discussed by both sides, with feelings which may be better imagined than described; feelings which prompt those who know the true story to publish the answers to the letters in vindication of the honour of a man who is no longer here to speak for himself.

From those answers to both the published and to the suppressed "short notes, not above twenty in all," the reader will be able to form an opinion of the case and attach the responsibility of the broken engagement to the real circumstances which "came whole out of the hands of fate." The letters themselves are very cunningly contrived to show that the Englishwoman was mentally affected. This idea is developed in a last letter to Mrs. N. (M.A.), which contains the following passage from the white-washed lover:—

For one thing I quite failed to interest her in my pursuits, past or in prospect. Her letters, though most beautiful, might, but for her expressions of love and devotion to me, have been written for publication, and, with one or two exceptions, she never answered a question, even the all-important one of the date for our marriage.

To those who are still exercised in their minds as to the fortunes of these people the fact that the lady is mad would seem final. But a later passage, evidently intended to be explanatory, leaves us rather confused:—

She wrote me that she believed my mother thought her mad, and in reply I said that a mischievous rumour had reached my mother concerning hers, Mrs. —, and her voluntary isolation and separation from her husband.

Notwithstanding this ambiguity the "Lover's Replies" make it clear, once for all, that he did not withdraw because, as some have supposed, he found his correspondent an artificial bore, but because the fates intervened and made the situation hopeless.

The writer of "The Missing Answers" is less explicit. In Letter LXVIII. he says, in effect, that all is over between them and gives the already known declaration. "There is no fault in you. The fault is elsewhere. I can no longer love you as I did. . . . I know you will not forget me, but you will forgive me, even because of the great pain I cause you. You are the most generous woman I have known." And this is the last letter, and, like the rest, it must not be looked upon with a humorous eye:—"Obey me. By our slain love I command you. Do what I tell you without question, in this supreme moment, as we stand by the open grave. As the clouds fall upon its coffin put your hand in mine and say good-bye."

Following an ordinary convention the page containing this letter has the words "The end" imprinted thereon; we trust it may be finis that crowns the work of writing sequels to the "Love Letters." Both these books are bound in the worst possible taste; "The Replies," with its pale blue ribbon, is especially foolish.

The wisely anonymous author of THE LETTERS OF HER MOTHER TO ELIZABETH (Fisher Unwin, 2s.) says that readers of "The Visits of Elizabeth" have instinctively asked themselves, "What sort of woman was Elizabeth's mother?" In the thirty letters he gives us he proposes to answer the question. But, unfortunately, the writer of the sequel has none of the lightness, spontaneity, and gaiety of the original author. As we pointed out, Elizabeth was by no means entirely convincing. Her naïveté was somewhat affected and her ingénue air a little artificial. She was an intentional butterfly, not too good or too modest, but determined at all hazards to be entertaining. The mother also makes the greatest efforts to be amusing, but the result is dull, commonplace, distressing. She begins by recommending her daughter to learn to write the grammar of her own language because it may become the fashion to use it in conversation some day; but she does not follow her own precept, nor in any way write as agreeably as her daughter. It is too trivial a performance for serious consideration, and we prefer not to provide the sacrificial wheel for these ephemeral butterflies.

THE DAY OF SMALL THINGS, by Isabel Fry (Unicorn Press, 5s.), is one of the books written about children but hardly for their own reading. It is almost the most attractive and sympathetic thing of the kind that we have come across. The author thoroughly understands children. She has got their very attitude of mind, and either memory or intuition has shown her the proportions of things as they appear to small folk, so that the tragedies and vicissitudes of Lettie and Tib are entirely pathetic and convincing. "Followers of St. Simeon" is, perhaps, the most delightful chapter. It tells how a very beautiful dream was turned into vulgar farce by obtuse but well-meaning grown-up people. Some of the episodes must have been personal experiences. "A mitigated punishment," for instance—most of us have some such memory as that.

Mr. R. S. Warren Bell has the saving grace of originality. He does not write novels precisely like those of any other novelist, for which we are duly grateful, but, on the other hand, his zeal for the good cause is apt to lead him into eccentricities. In LOVE THE LAGGARD, for example (Richards, 6s.), his desire to be original at all hazards is shown in the fact which we commented on the other day that he prefaces his story with a list of characters, as though it were a comedy in three acts. Mr. Bell has a good eye for character, and he deals with actors and baronets and briefless barristers and editors and struggling journalists—all of whom are interesting to that sort of reader who likes to learn how these curious animals subsist. His book is a little overloaded with young men, who fall in love, with a readiness that is beyond all praise, with the heroine, the latter being something more of a flirt than usual. But there is plenty of humour about the story, and not a little truth to nature. It is Mr. Bell's best book so far, and it stands a step or two above the customary machine-made novel. A word of praise is due to the designer of an appropriate and attractive cover.

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—I.

In Longman's Mr. S. G. Tallentyre continues his series of "The Women of the Salons" with an essay on Madame Récamier. We find no fault with it except that it is too short. A graver article is on Mr. Rider Haggard's visit to the dwindling villages of rural England—a subject considered in its connexion with the education of the young in rural schools. The subjects of Mr. Lang's prelections are criminology and the letters of Junius.

"Charity" is the somewhat misleading title given in Blackwood to an account of the Battle of Vaal Krantz—a very graphic piece of writing. "Musings without Method" are mostly about the drama—literary and otherwise. The conditions of the present are thus pessimistically contrasted with those of the past:—

At the outset, then, the actor was paid by the theatre to perform a certain task; now he hires the author to fit him with a part. It is a strange reversal of the rôles, and it explains the dire malady which has long beset our playhouses. What man of letters would accept the new conditions, and see his work cut and slashed to suit the interpreter? What would the painter say if his frame-maker and colourman signed his canvas, and assumed the glory of his work? Would the very minimus among the poets permit the printer and paper-maker to "create" his poems, and set their names upon his title-page? Of course neither the painter nor the poet would submit to so monstrous an outrage, and as no playwright can hope for success who does not obey the actor, so the making of plays has fallen out of distinguished hands and is picked up by the odd cobblers and patchers, who are supposed to entertain us.

A vigorous indictment in Maga's best sledge-hammer style, and written with evident knowledge of the subject.

The Empire Review, while continuing the serious discussion of serious subjects, begins to cater for the weaker brethren who desire to read something besides the solemn prelections of those having authority. The first of a series of papers on "The Slave Trade in Northern Nigeria," by Mr. T. J. Tonkin, late Medical Officer and Naturalist to the Hausa Associations' Central Sudan Expedition, opens thrillingly. We find such sub-headings as "the Child Stealer, the Lady-Killer, the Village Vampire, the Privateer, the Royal Raider, the Baccaroon." Mr. G. Seymour Fort contributes some personal reminiscences of James Chalmers, the New Guinea missionary. Mr. W. H. Helm, who writes of "Travellers Old and New," makes a suggestion to any publisher who envies the fame of the late George Smith:—"We want an Encyclopædia Britannica of a new sort, a gazetteer that shall surpass all predecessors as surely as the "Dictionary of National Biography" has beaten the record in another field of literature." The l.-b.-w. question is discussed by various eminent cricketers, and Viscount de Montmorency Frankfort states the reasons in favour of giving schoolboys a military training with special reference to proposed legislation in the matter of cadet corps.

"Contemporary Gossip concerning Queen Victoria and her two Predecessors" is the best thing in Temple Bar. It is taken from the journal of Tom Raikes, a friend of Beau Brummel, who died in 1848, a great uncle of the late Mr. Henry Cecil Raikes, and is arranged and re-written by the Rev. J. D. Raikes. Many good stories are here presented, though not all of them are new. This, however, is new to us, and shows William IV. in rather a characteristic light:—

Mrs. D. showed me a letter from — which says:—"I went yesterday with their Majesties to the private exhibition at Somerset House. The president of the Royal Society (sic) among other portraits pointed out to the King that of Admiral Napier, who has been commanding the fleet for Dom Pedro. His Majesty did not hesitate to show his political bias on this occasion, by exclaiming immediately, 'Captain Napier may be d—d, Sir, and you may be d—d, Sir; and if the Queen were not here, Sir, I would kick you downstairs, Sir.'"

This example of the humours of the military in the early part of the century also deserves to be quoted :—

In the years between the battle of Waterloo and the Reform Bill there was great distress, and riots were frequent. A mob broke into Downing-street, and approached the sentry posted at the door of the Foreign Office, crying, " Liberty or Death." The soldier levelled his musket, saying, " My lads, I know nothing about liberty ; but if you come a step further, I'll show you what death is."

There is plenty of fiction in the number.

The important feature of the North American Review is a symposium on " Industrial and Railroad Consolidations." Mr. Russell Sage leads off, stating views unfavourable to trusts. Five gentlemen eminent in business circles in the United States follow, and tilt at his opinions. The Rev. Judson Smith defends the missionaries against their critics. In an article on " The New Poetic Drama " Mr. W. D. Howells discusses the works of M. Edmund Rostand and Mr. Stephen Phillips. He finds Mr. Phillips too well acquainted with stagecraft for a poet. In reading Herod, " it was as if the poet had taken instruction of the player, whose business it is most strictly and obediently to take instructions of the poet, if their common art is to prosper in forms of permanent beauty "—a counsel of perfection on which it would be interesting to have the opinions of M. Coquelin and Mr. Beerbohm Tree.

A serial by Frances Hodgson Burnett begins in the Century. There is also a discussion of Tolstoy's theory of art by Mr. John Albert Macy. He particularly objects to Tolstoy's dictum that " good art is always intelligible to every one."

Among the colour pictures in the Badminton is one of the Tottenham Hotspur football team. An interesting paper by Mr. Home Gordon draws attention to the young Marcelli of the cricket-field—players who have shown great promise, but who, unlike Dr. Grace and some others, have been too busy with their work to be always playing. Miss Elsie Fitzgerald discusses " The Dee as a Salmon River," and Mr. Gerard Ferand writes of the horse-bear of Northern Norway.

Dark legal problems are made interesting by the treatment they receive in the Law Magazine and Review. The notes on International law deal with problems of topical importance, and Mr. Jelf's account of " The Inns of Chancery " revives picturesque memories of old London. How many people know that, in the time of Henry VI., there was included " a sort of academy of gymnasium where they learn singing and all kinds of music, dancing, and such other accomplishments and diversions as are suitable to their quality and such as are usually practised at Court ? "

All who have visited the interesting exhibition of old silver at the Burlington Fine Arts Club Gallery will read with pleasure Mr. Aymer Vallance's illustrated article on the exhibition in the Artist, which contains also, among other matters, some excellent reproductions from the work of Mr. Robert Brough, with an account of his work.

The Universal and Ludgate is one of the magazines that are improving. The art editor rises above the ideals of some of his contemporaries, who seem to think that only odd or unexpected pictures are worth publishing. Among the articles we may draw attention to one by Darby Stafford on " George Eliot's Birthplace and early surroundings," and one of Hungarian Tziganes by Bradford Colt de Wolf. There is also a folk-lore story by the Queen of Rumania.

The Smart Set is an American magazine which now makes a bid for the favour of English readers, who may not like the title, but must admit that the contents are at once light and literary. There are twenty poems—a generous allowance—including one by Mr. Bliss Carman ; and there are contributions from writers as well known on " this side " as Mr. Edgar Saltus, Mr. Gelett Burgess, and M. Henri Lavedan, whose short story is not translated, but printed in the original French. As in Lippincotts, a complete novelette—this month by Mrs. Poultney Bigelow—is a feature. On the whole, the magazine is a welcome recruit, though it does not appeal to the multitude.

LIBRARY NOTES.

According to the annual report of the Curators of the Bodleian Library the number of printed and manuscript items added during the year 1900 was as follows :—By gift or exchange, 10,826; under the Copyright Act, 46,940; new purchases, 6,776; and second-hand purchases, 758—total 65,300. The additions under the Copyright Act included 24,479 periodicals, in volumes or parts, 7,689 maps, and music accounts for 4,405 entries. It would seem to be just as well that plans should have been obtained for extended storage room to provide adequately for the accessions of at least half a century to come. Among the chief donations of MSS. are mentioned the Egypt Exploration Fund papyri from Oxyrhynchus, including the famous Logia ; and seventeen letters written by Gilbert White to Archdeacon Churton, whose granddaughter, Mrs. S. M. Inge, has presented them to the Library. The German Emperor has shown once more his interest in Oxford by presenting a volume of fine plates—" Kaiser Friedrich III. Mausoleum zu Potsdam." The Curators report that the year is memorable for the acquisition of thirty-four Sanscrit MSS. on palm-leaves, dating from the eleventh to the sixteenth centuries. One of these valuable documents is entitled Svacechandalalitabhairvamahatantra.

The annual report of the Bristol Public Libraries presents two special points. The penny rate has proved insufficient, and its increase to three-halfpence has been approved by the city council. At a town's meeting, however, a poll was demanded, and this will be postponed for a year. A suitable site has yet to be found for the new central library to be provided out of the late Mr. Stuckey Leans' bequest of £50,000.

The Midland Railway Institute, erected at Derby by the company for the benefit of the staff, has hitherto included a reading and magazine room as well as a library containing some 14,000 volumes, with a restaurant and room for lectures and entertainments. The institute has now been enlarged by the provision of a large dining-hall in which 200 dinners can be served daily. The membership has doubled since the institute was established in 1894.

The late Mr. Pease, banker, of Newcastle, has bequeathed to the public library of that city his collection of drawings and engravings by Thomas Bewick. This is probably unique and includes the only existing set of proofs of Bewick's illustrations to " Æsop's Fables." Valuable illustrations are almost as acceptable as good books in public libraries, and are certainly rarer ; and Bewick's work, of course, occupies an important and instructive place in the history of engraving.

A new library, museum, and lecture-hall, erected at a cost of over £20,000, presented to Kilmarnock by Mr. James Dick was formally opened last month. The burgh has shown its gratitude by conferring its freedom upon the donor.

The park and museum at Lordship-lane, recently presented to the public by Mr. F. J. Horniman, will be opened on June 29.

The annual meeting of the Library Association, beginning on August 26, will be held at Plymouth. The American Library Association is concentrating attention on its forthcoming meeting at Waukesha, Wisconsin. The programme is to undergo a marked change. Technical matters are to be relegated to side meetings, while the general sessions will be devoted to the literary or bookish side of the work. It is curious to note that in England librarians are busily reversing the order, literary questions meeting with slight favour, while technicalities are supreme. The balance may lean towards the American side, which certainly deals in practical fashion with its literary puzzles.

The May number of " Public Libraries " (Chicago) maintains its standard of interest. There are reports of the several associations which appear to flourish wherever two or three librarians are gathered together. There is also an illustrated article on the new library building of the New Britain (Conn.) Institute, which is of the palatial character we now expect in the United States libraries.

THE EDWARDES SALE.

The library of Sir Henry Hope Edwardes which Messrs. Christie sold last week was, in many respects, the most important that has come under the hammer this season. The 665 lots fetched an aggregate of over eleven thousand pounds, which gives the very high average of more than £16 per lot. Most of the books were good examples of notable editions, in exceptionally fine condition, and the greater part of them were in sumptuous bindings representing the best work of such men as Trautz-Bauzonnet, Chambolle-Durn, Roger Payne, Lewis, and Bedford. The following were among the best of the books sold :—

Beaumarchais, "Le Mariage de Figaro" large paper, 1785.	£26.
Boccaccio, "Il Decamerone," an entirely uncut copy of the Elzevir edition of 1665.	£56.
Boccaccio, "Il Decamerone," 1527, the original Giunta edition.	£20.
Ariosto, "Orlando Furioso," 1591.	£42.
Breydenbach, "Peregrinationum," 1480, a fine copy of the first Latin edition.	£120.

Vesputius, "De Ora Antarctica," Argentina, 1505.	£54.
Retham, "Fasciculus Medicine," Venice, 1495.	£61.
"Les Grandes Proesses d'un tres vaillant Chevalier Tristan," Gothic letter, Paris, 1533.	£170.
Braithwaite, "Barnabees Journal," first edition.	£102.
Burton, "The Anatomy of Melancholy," 1621, first edition.	£50.
"The History of Don Quichotte," 1620, Shelton's translation.	£52.
Coryat, "Crudities," 1611.	£50.
"Historie of the Raigne of King Henry VII.," 1622, with autograph inscription by Lord Bacon.	£110.
Chaucer, "Works," Kelmscott edition.	£80.
Dibdin, "Bibliographical Decameron," 1817, large paper.	£38.
Hearne, "Works," a fine and complete set in 86 vols.	£50.
Daniel, "Civile Warres," 1609.	£62.
"Dialogues of Creatures Moralized," black letter.	£325.
Gardyne, "Garden of Grave and Godlie Flowres," 1609.	£88.
Heywood, "The Spider and the Flie," 1556.	£45.
"Expositio in Symbolum Apostolorum," 1478, a very fine copy of the first book printed at Oxford.	£360.
"Dives et Pauper," Pynson's rare print of 1493.	£100.
Drayton, "Poems," 1619, Charles II.'s copy.	£62.
Homer, "Batrachomyomachia," Chapman's translation, with autograph notes by himself.	£170.
Lyon, "Teares for the death of Alexander," Edinburgh, 1622.	£44.
"Mirour for Magistrates," 1587.	£70.
Killigrew, "Comedies and Tragedies," 1664, Charles II.'s copy.	£50.
Nichols, "History and Antiquities of Leicester," 1795-1811, large paper.	£165.
Spenser, "Complaints," 1591.	£40.
Virgil, "The XII. Bukes of Eneados," Copland's print of 1553.	£53.
"Purchas his Pilgrimes," 1625-26.	£100.
Shakespeare, "The Second Folio," a fine copy.	£140.
Shakespeare, "The Fourth Folio," a perfect copy.	£100.
Sidney, "The Countesse of Pembroke's Arcadia," 1613.
This copy belonged to "Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother."	£255.

Correspondence.

THE PROPER AGE FOR A WIFE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In a recently reviewed work by Max O'Rell this writer gives his readers the benefit of a rule for ascertaining the age of the woman whom a man of a given age ought to marry—half his own years plus seven. This has been copied by several newspapers, and its invention seems to be attributed to Max O'Rell himself. It may, therefore, be opportune to state that the rule was communicated to me many years ago by the late Frederick Locker-Lampson, and I am under the impression that he mentioned it as an invention of his own. I believe it will be found in one of his published works.

Yours faithfully,

May 28.

SUUM CUIQUE.

CHEAM SCHOOL SIXTY YEARS AGO.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In the Life of the Right Hon. Hugh C. E. Childers there is a short autobiography dictated by him to his wife descriptive of his early days. I refer particularly in this to his school life, passed for seven years at Cheam School, which had been for many years rather well known. There is a sentence in this autobiography which greatly surprised me, and which, as a contemporary of Mr. Childers at Cheam, though a junior, I can by no means confirm by my own remembrance of his time—from 1839 to 1842—nor by what I have heard from others, from 1836 to 1843. As to the methods and discipline of the school there is room for different opinions. School life varies, and boys carry away their individual opinions of school influence. But the sentence to which I take exception is too positive and too sweeping to pass without notice. It is this :—

Evangelicism, not of the manly type which now prevails, seemed to teach us that the first duty of a schoolboy was to watch the conduct of his fellows and to report it to the master; hence spying and sneaking were universal.

This relates to the years from 1836 to 1843, and I have had letters from half-a-dozen old schoolfellows of position, whose experience runs through that time, which repudiate in strong terms the accuracy of these three propositions—the effect of the Evangelicism of that day, the teaching of the school, and the practice of the boys. Dr. Mayo was a man of high character, respected by all who knew him and beloved by many, who was incapable of this dishonourable teaching; his boys came from a good class, and were not, to our knowledge, encouraged in tale-bearing, but had the usual sense of honour and comradeship held by English boys. My correspondents take the first part of the charge to be absolutely incorrect and unwarrantable, and the second part, to say the least, to be a gross exaggeration.

From my knowledge of Mr. Childers I should have said that he was too amiable and cautious a man to have made such a sweeping charge against his schoolfellows. But it may be observed from the Life that he dictated this autobiography to his wife (who predeceased him) shortly before his death, and that it appears probable that he never revised it. This may account for some confusion of memory and for some want of precision in expression, which may have made the sentence convey rather a different impression from that which he intended.

I forward you my name, though to avoid personality I beg here to subscribe myself

A CHEAMITE OF SIXTY YEARS AGO.

May 25.

P.S.—It may be worth while stating that there were at least three periods of Cheam School, which were entirely independent of one another :—

1. An early period; Mr. Addington, the Prime Minister, and, later, Archbishop Longley were educated there.
2. Dr. Mayo's school, afterwards carried on for a few years by his brother-in-law, the Rev. H. Shephard.
3. The Rev. G. S. Tabor's preparatory school for younger boys, now conducted by his son, Mr. Arthur Tabor.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL AND THE HUMANITARIAN LEAGUE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—As Sir Herbert Maxwell, in his review of Mr. Dale's book on sport, has gone out of his way to refer to the Humanitarian League, perhaps you will kindly let me point out that he has entirely misapprehended our principles. Our "primary doctrine," he says, is that "man is bound to apply the same treatment to the lower animals as to his fellow-men." We have never professed any such doctrine. What we hold is that the rights of animals are the same in kind, but not in degree, as those of human beings. This, as your readers will observe, is a very different doctrine from that which Sir H. Maxwell attributes to us.

The statement that we have attacked Sir H. Maxwell "on account of his opinion that a sportsman is not an inhuman monster" is equally incorrect. We have repeatedly said that, while we hold sport to be cruel, we are well aware that sportsmen are often kind-hearted men in other directions. What we have objected to is Sir H. Maxwell's favourite argument that sport is per se a kindness to animals because it "preserves" certain species for the sportsman's amusement.

There are many matters on which humanitarians and sportsmen can never agree, but there is no reason why they should misrepresent each other.

Yours faithfully,

HENRY S. SALT, Hon. Sec. Humanitarian League.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The Navy's share in the South African campaign is being handsomely recorded. Mr. Laird Clowes' "History of the Royal Navy" is being enlarged to include the Boer war, and the publishers of this work (Sampson Low) now announce a separate book on the subject, under the title of "Naval Brigades in the South African War," written by officers who took part in the operations. The editor is Surgeon T. T. Jeans, R.N., who contributes the chapter dealing with the march from Enslin to Bloemfontein. The other chapters and their authors are:—"In Cape Colony," by Captain W. T. C. Jones, D.S.O., R.M.L.I., and Major A. E. Marchmont, C.B., R.M.L.I. "Bloemfontein to Belfast," Captain L. O. Wilson, D.S.O., R.M.L.I. "Belfast to Koomati Poort," From the Diary of an Officer. "Ladysmith," Chief Engineer C. C. Sheen, R.N. "Natal," Fleet-Surgeon F. J. Lilly, R.N., Lieutenant Hunt, R.N., and Lieutenant C. M. Steel, R.N. "Blockade Work at Koomati Poort," Lieutenant Massey-Dawson, R.N.

On June 4th Mr. Grant Richards will begin a cheap series of "The World's Classics"—in shilling and two-shilling forms—by the issue of three volumes; "The Poems of Lord Tennyson, 1830-1858"; "The Essays of Elia," and "Jane Eyre." Mr. Lawrence Housman has designed the cover for the series; notes and introduction have been dispensed with.

Among Mr. Murray's early publications will be "Sunday and the Sabbath," the "Golden Lectures for 1900-1," by the Rev. H. R. Gamble, Rector of St. Botolph's, Bishopsgate, and "Suffolk in the XVII. Century," being the breviary of Suffolk, by Robert Ryece, 1618, now published for the first time from the MS. in the British Museum, with notes by Lord Francis Hervey.

The fourth volume of Mr. Nutt's series of "Scottish History from Contemporary Writers" will deal with "The Chevalier de St. George and the Jacobite Movement in his Favour, 1701-1720," edited by Mr. C. Sanford Terry, who edited "The Rising of 1745."

"Apostles of the Lord," the six lectures on pastoral theology which Canon Newbolt delivered during Lent term in the Divinity School, Cambridge, will be published by Messrs. Longmans.

Mr. Bryce has written an introduction to the translation of M. Ostrogorski's "Democracy and the Organization of Political Parties" (which Messrs. Macmillan announce as nearly ready), a systematic history of party organization, both in England and the United States. Another book, to be published by Messrs. Macmillan shortly, is the series of "Lectures illustrating the Changes in the English Law during the Nineteenth Century," edited by Mr. W. Blake Odgers. The contributors include, besides the editor, Mr. Augustine Birrell, and Sir Harry Poland, who celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of his call-day on the 13th inst.

Mr. Fisher Unwin will shortly publish Mr. Booker T. Washington's autobiography, entitled "Up From Slavery." The author was born a slave in Virginia and has risen to the position of principal of the Tuskegee College, with a staff of eighty teachers under him. He was the first negro to receive an American degree—conferred upon him by Harvard—and when he came to England he was received by the late Queen Victoria. Mr. Booker Washington has a good deal to say in his book on the racial problem in the United States.

In fiction Mr. Fisher Unwin is about to publish Mr. Crockett's new romance "Cinderella," which has been appearing serially; a story of New Zealand life thirty years ago entitled "A Thousand Pities," by Ellen Taylor; and "Jestere," by "Vartenie," which gives a picture of Armenian life of to-day.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall announce a volume of poems entitled "Passion-flowers," by the Baroness de Bertouch, to be published in a limited large paper edition. The authoress inherits her turn for versification from the Earl of Rochester, of Charles II.'s time.

Mr. A. H. Norway, the author of "Highways and Byways in Cornwall and Devon," has written "Naples, Past and Present" for Messrs. Methuen.

Mr. Elliot Stock announces "I. Y. on the Imperial Yeoman at War," the experience of an Imperial Yeoman at the front.

Messrs. H. Virtue and Co. will move on June 5 from Ivy-lane to 13, Henrietta-street.

Messrs. Freemantle announce a collection of essays on literature, music, and art, by the Count S. C. de Soissons, entitled "In the Path of the Soul," illustrated with eighteen portraits reproduced from drawings by Sargent, Burne-Jones, Max Liebermann, Zorn, Roussel, and others. The work will be limited to 100 copies (published by subscription) at £5 5s. each.

(a) White desired an original game, and hence started with the Zukertort opening. As is often the case with this start, the game runs into an irregular queen's pawn opening.

(b) The opening appears to be original enough to satisfy the most exacting taste. The play is, however, not particularly captivating, though sound and good.

(c) White has gained a little the better of the position. So far, both players have fought well behind their intrenchments, this being the first entry into the enemy's lines.

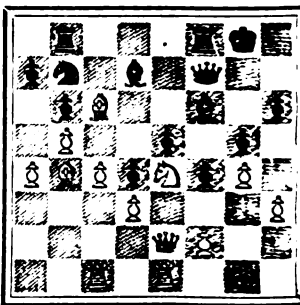

(d) We hardly like this move. Black, however, is such an experienced and successful correspondence player that we take it for granted every move has received careful attention. White has his eye on Kt-K 4, and this move of Black's allows him to get there.

(e) Now Black is uncomfortable. He could not play 32. BxK 3: 31. PxR. Kt-R 4; 32. P-B 7. QxP; 33. Kt-B 4, ch., and Black's game is gone.

(f) Unexpected, sound, and good, for Black still cannot take B, while White is threatening to take either B or Kt, and then advances the P. And if 31. PxP, after exchanges the K P will be lost. Black's reply is one way of losing.

(g) The position requires close analysis. White threatens to double rooks, if Black plays B-Q 4; and if the BxR, the two united P's must win. A very interesting position.—Notes by Mr. J. J. White ("Leeds Mercury").

BLACK. Mr. LAMBERT.

WHITE. Mr. WRIGHT.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the "LITERATURE" PORTRAIT for next week will be Mr. Edmund Gosse. The appreciation of Mr. Gosse's work will be written by Mr. Stephen Gwynn.

The number will also contain an article on "The Future of the Drama," by Mr. Walter Raleigh, Professor of English Language and Literature at Glasgow University.

In another column we publish in full the poem by Mr. Rudyard Kipling, which appeared in The Times of Wednesday, entitled "Bridge-Guard in the Karroo."

M. Rostand, whose L'Aiglon is now being performed at Her Majesty's, has been elected a member of the French Academy. He is a worthy successor to M. de Bornier. If he has written nothing so elevated in style as La Fille de Roland, and has damaged his reputation among purists, including some Academicians, by some slipshod work in L'Aiglon, Cyrano de Bergerac is a masterpiece of lyric and romantic verse as well as a good play. M. Rostand is now thirty-three years of age. Victor Hugo did not become a member until thirty-nine, although Villemain, it is stated, was elected at thirty-one.

M. Rostand's name has been familiar to the public only since the year 1894, when Mme. Sarah Bernhardt began to stage his pieces—the Romanesques, the Princesse Loïtaine (1895), the Samaritaine (1897), and then Cyrano de Bergerac (1897). The great actress must be credited with her share in his success—how considerable a share is realized when one sees any one of his plays staged and spoken in the French provinces. But the youthful dramatist has time on his side in which to temper his exuberant genius and acquire the knowledge of human nature in which his plays are wanting. Such experience, and almost equal natural gifts, mark the talent of the historian, M. Frederic Masson, whom the Academy rejected in favour of M. Rostand. The fight was a famous one. It was only after the sixth ballot that by seventeen votes to fourteen, with two defections, M. Rostand became an "immortal." In spite of the support of the poets of the Academy, M. Masson must bide his time.

On the same day, the Marquis de Vogüé, the ex-diplomatist and archæologist—we recently referred to him as the head of the committee for the publication of Semitic epigraphy—was elected as successor to the Duc de Broglie. He received twenty-four votes, there being ten blanks. The election was natural and appropriate. The Marquis represents what is best in contemporary French society. He is at the head of the French Agricultural Society, and president of one of the most fashionable of the Paris clubs. He has been for more than thirty years one of the most active members of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. Archæologists know the value of his "Églises de la Terre Sainte," "L'Architecture de la Syrie Centrale," the "Temple de Jérusalem" and his "Mélanges d'Archéologie Orientale." He has published the "Mémoires" of Marshal de Villars and a book on "Événements en Syrie," which no doubt won him his appointment as Ambassador at Constantinople in 1871. In 1875 he was transported to Vienna. He is one of the few moderns whom Richelieu would have chosen as an Academician.

While all London is talking of the great French tragédienne now playing at Her Majesty's Theatre it is interesting to remember that to-day is the seventieth anniversary of the death of Mrs. Siddons—in the judgment of competent judges probably the greatest tragic actress the world has known. There is a strong difference between her age and ours in the opportunities enjoyed by young actors of learning their art. In a single season, when she was only twenty-two, Mrs. Siddons played Portia (the first part she played in her first engagement by Garrick), Juliet, Imogen, the Queen in Hamlet, and in Richard III., Mrs. Candour, Bellario in Philastes, Belvidera in Venice Preserved, Imoinda in Oronooko, Lady Randolph in Douglas, Euphrasia, Jane Shore, Rosamond, Sigismunda, and no less than a dozen other distinct and important parts. With her natural gifts fortified by this experience she produced emotional effects so formidable that her spectators were continually being carried off in fainting fits—an effect not commonly produced in our modern theatre except by overheating. Actors have sometimes been consoled with on the transiency of their triumphs; but Mrs. Siddons lives in the portraits of Reynolds and Gainsborough, and in the praises of a multitude of critics and gossips, while Johnson and Byron and Hazlitt are rivals in rhapsodies of eulogy. Perhaps, indeed, literature and art have never combined to pay a finer homage to the stage, than when Samuel Johnson wrote his name on the hem of her garment in Reynolds' picture of her as The Tragic Muse.

It is instructive to note that of the six artists to whom medals have been awarded at Dresden, one only is represented at the present Academy. These medals go to Messrs. Whistler, Tom Graham, Maurice Greiffenhagen, Henry Muhrman, Robert Brough, and Joseph Pennell, who sent some of his genuinely interpretative London aquatints. In Gallery XI. of Burlington House is Mr. Brough's portrait of Mr. Richard Myddleton; but for examples by the other artists, each of whom works with distinction, we may search in vain.

The portrait of Dr. Conan Doyle which we reproduce in this number is from an original water-colour drawing by Mr. Mortimer Menpes, and forms one of the series of pictures reproduced in "War Impressions," written by Mr. Mortimer Menpes, which we review elsewhere (A. and C. Black).

The fourth International Publishers' Congress, to which we have already referred, opens at Leipzig from the 9th to the 12th of this month under the presidency of Mr. Albert Brockhaus. This country will be represented by Mr. John Murray, Mr. Frederick Macmillan, Mr. Unwin, and Mr. Heinemann. One of the best-known figures among the German publishers will be Christian Carl Bernhard, second Baron von Tauchnitz, who celebrated his sixtieth birthday a week ago. It is just sixty years since Herr Tauchnitz, as his father was then called, inaugurated his famous collection of British and American authors, with Bulwer Lytton's "Pelham" and Dickens' "Pickwick." The founder of the series was a nephew of another celebrated printer and bookseller of Leipzig, Karl Cristoph Traugott Tauchnitz, whose business dated back to the eighteenth century. The present Baron's father was ennobled in 1866—the year in which his son joined him—and died in 1895, by which time the Tauchnitz Edition numbered close upon 3,000 volumes. It still increases at the rate of about sixty volumes a year. The present Baron is highly popular with authors and publishers alike, and speaks English fluently.

* * * *

It seems almost a pity that the publishers who are gathering at Leipzig will miss the famous book-fair which has so long been the pride of the German booksellers. Like so many other survivals of a more picturesque age, this fair has no doubt been shorn of some of its old-time glories. It is still, however, a great institution in the German book-trade, and would have given a fine touch of local colour to the programme prepared for the coming congress. Easter is the time of the fair, when the booksellers from every large town in Germany assemble with their collections of books published during the preceding twelve months. The German trade has a common exchange and clearing-house at Leipzig and there is an annual settlement of accounts at the fair. Leipzig fair accounts are still run by certain English publishers who act as agents over here for foreign publishers. The business done is enormous, countless books are bought, sold, or exchanged. It used to be a recognized rule—which probably still holds good—that no bargain could be considered binding unless completed over a friendly glass of wine. In bygone days the fair was held at Frankfurt-on-the-Maine; but Leipzig, with its more central position, has been the scene of the annual gathering for about a hundred and fifty years. The German trade has to deal with three or four times as many publications every year as we have—usually with educational and theological works at the head of the list. Practically every publisher has his agent in Leipzig, and the rule is to keep books in stock for a year and a day after publication. All volumes then remaining unsold are returned to the publisher under the dubious term of "Crabs." Among our own publishers there is an even more fanciful trade term for such books—"Cold Pig"!

The tomb of William Hazlitt in the churchyard of St. Anne's, Soho, has lately been restored by the great critic's grandson, Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt, who has placed thereon the following curious inscription:—

On the northern side of this ground lie the remains of William Hazlitt, painter, critic, and essayist. Born at Maidstone, April 10, 1778. Died in Soho, September 18, 1830. Restored by his grandson, February, 1901.

Hazlitt can hardly be called fortunate in respect of his epitaphs, whether we consider the turgid periods of the original inscription or the express declaration in the new one here quoted, that after dying in 1830 he was restored in 1901.

On Saturday, June 8, a new daily paper will make its appearance, with Mr. Raymond Blathwayt as editor. The title chosen is the Morning Summary.

The Pension Fund Committee of the Society of Authors has awarded a pension of £60 a year to Mrs. J. H. Riddell, author of "George Geith of Fen Court," "The Senior Partner," and many other well-known novels.

The estate of Mr. George Murray Smith, of Smith, Elder, and Co., has been valued at £839,522 2s. 5d., that of Sir John Stainer at £34,374 16s. 6d., and that of Mr. Douglas Gordon MacRae, editor and chief proprietor of the Financial Times, at £13,025 4s. 7d.

M. Rostand is slightly indisposed, and his doctor has ordered a complete rest.

Mrs. Craigie, in addressing the Dante Society on Wednesday, spoke of Dante and Botticelli as having both arrived, through the experience of life, at the same Catholic point of view. The Roman Catholic spirit in the Renaissance was a question of feeling, not of intellect, and was entirely misunderstood by Walter Pater and John Addington Symonds.

Mrs. Creighton has now recovered from her serious illness and is at work on the Biography of the late Bishop of London. She would be much indebted to any persons who may have letters from Bishop Creighton if they would kindly send them to her now at the Palace, Hampton Court.

At the next performance given by the Stage Society two new English plays will be produced. They are The Unseen Helmsman, by Miss Laurence Alma-Tadema, and a three-act comedy called Windmills by Mr. Kingsley Tarpey.

On the 2nd of June Mr. Thomas Hardy entered his sixty-second year.

Two genuine pictures by Titian and Velasquez have been discovered. All trace of them had been lost for nearly half a century, and the Italian Government has already offered £8,000 for the Titian.

Dr. A. W. Ward, Master of Peterhouse, has been elected Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University.

Mr. A. C. Bradley gave on Wednesday his inaugural lecture as Professor of Poetry at Oxford, the subject being "Poetry for Poetry's Sake." Subsequent lectures will be on particular Poems or Poets, and a course of lectures will be given once a year specially for undergraduates.

The Daily Chronicle says that the St. Petersburg papers have been forbidden by the Russian Government to write anything about Tolstoy and his works, even those published long ago.

The Paris University and French literature have sustained a great loss in the person of M. Eugène Manuel, who died on Sunday at the age of 78.

Mr. J. M. Barrie's new play, it is stated, is to be produced in Washington in the late autumn.

The Queen of Rumania is said to be making arrangements for providing every rural commune in the kingdom with one dramatic performance a week, for the purpose of "inculcating the precepts of morality and social duties."

Mr. Ben Greet has arranged for the production of a series of pastoral plays at the Botanic Gardens in June and July.

The goldsmiths of Florence have erected a fountain on the Ponte Vecchio in honour of Benvenuto Cellini. A little while ago a commemorative tablet was also unveiled, which is placed on the outside of the house where he was born on Nov. 3, 1500.

In Chicago a weekly newspaper has been started, entitled Name on the Sky, and "signed" articles are published from President Lincoln, Martin Luther, Mr. Moody, Henry Ward Beecher, and others.

The Gibraltar Chronicle attained its hundredth year a few days ago. Its first editor was a Frenchman, M. Charles Buisson by name, who took up his residence on the Rock in May, 1801.

A cricket-match will take place at Esher towards the end of June in which Mr. J. M. Barrie, Dr. Conan Doyle, Mr. Frankfort Moore, Mr. Shan F. Bullock, and other authors are likely to participate.

We regret to hear that Mr. Phil May, who was to lecture in America, is suffering from a serious attack of pleurisy, and that Mr. Jerome K. Jerome is laid up by a carriage accident.

In an article published last week on Paul Jones we referred to "his love affair with Aimée de Telison, a natural daughter of Louis XIV." This, as a correspondent points out, was a misprint for Louis XV.

HALL CAINE v. C. ARTHUR PEARSON, Ltd.

It is not expected that the law suit which has begun between Mr. Hall Caine and Messrs. Pearson can be tried much before the end of the year, but there seems to be little doubt that both parties are determined to fight out the case in Court. Messrs. Lewis and Lewis are acting for Mr. Hall Caine and Messrs. Harrison and Davis for Messrs. Pearson. The serial rights of "The Eternal City" were bought by Messrs. Pearson to give a good start to their new Lady's Magazine, the first number of which appeared in January last. All went well until the June instalment of the story was received, when the proprietors objected to certain matter on the ground that it was altogether unsuitable, in their opinion, for publication in the Lady's Magazine. Negotiations were entered into, but without result; Mr. Hall Caine contended that the matter objected to was essential; and in the June number of the magazine, to be published on Monday next, the following notice will be found under the usual heading by Fred. Pegram illustrating the title of the story:—

The proprietors of this magazine announce with regret that they have felt compelled to discontinue the publication of "The Eternal City." Differences have arisen between them and the author as to the suitability of the story for the Lady's Magazine and the proprietors have, in consequence, commenced proceedings against Mr. Hall Caine.

It would be obviously improper to comment further upon matters which are the subject of pending litigation, but the proprietors feel assured that the reasons for their action will commend themselves to their readers when the facts are in due course disclosed in a Court of Law.

It is said that there was an understanding to the effect that the story should not include such matter as that to which the proprietors of the magazine have taken exception, and they are suing the author for the return of the £2,000 already paid for the serial rights, and for damages. The first instalment of Mrs. Croker's new story, "The Cat's Paw," takes the place of "The Eternal City" in this month's number of the magazine. In ordinary circumstances Mr. Hall Caine's story would have run through five more numbers, and there was a balance of £1,000 to be paid to him by Messrs. Pearson. He has accordingly entered a counter claim against them. Meantime Mr. Heinemann is apparently willing enough to take the risk of publishing the story as it stands. He will publish it in volume form in August.

Precedents for such a situation as this may not be numerous, but they can be found. The case of "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" is one instance in point. This admirable, but not particularly reticent, romance was published as a serial in the Graphic. It contained one chapter which the editor feared would give offence, and the offending chapter was omitted. It was printed as a contribution to the National Observer, and was duly incorporated in the book when it afterwards appeared in volume form. Another author who has had similar difficulties is M. Zola. In 1836 M. Zola was contributing a story called "Le Vœu d'une Morte" to the Événement—a daily paper belonging to de Villemessant and subsequently amalgamated with the Figaro. Letters poured in from the subscribers, who threatened to discontinue their subscriptions. De Villemessant bowed before the storm, and stopped the publication of the story before M. Zola was half way through it, and "Le Vœu d'une Morte" remains unfinished to this day. There is also the case of "L'Assommoir." This appeared en feuilleton in a democratic journal entitled Le Bien Public, the price of the serial rights being £400. It was expected that a story about the lower orders would please the lower orders; but, as it turned out, the lower orders considered themselves insulted by it. Once again there were angry letters to the editor, many of the writers going so far as to threaten him with personal violence, and the story was stopped in order that the paper might not be ruined. M. Catulle Mendès, however, came to the rescue, and offered £40 for the right to publish the remainder of the story in La République des Lettres, which he was then editing. The offer was accepted, and the editor had no reason to regret having made it as, in his columns, "L'Assommoir" was well received.

One cannot, of course, say much by way of comment, partly because we have not seen the matter characterized as unsuitable, and partly because the case is sub judice. The dispute is one of those that will always be liable to occur so long as the practice prevails of "marketing" fiction before it is written. Seeing that one of the virtues of a good story consists in the fact that it is different from any stories ever written before, whether by the same or any other author, there is an obvious opening for surprises and disappointments; while the merits of a particular story and its suitability for a particular public are not matters that can be tested as simply as, say, the quality of the paper on which it is written, or the accuracy with which it has been typed. The moral would seem, at the first blush, to be that publishers should not try to buy, and that authors should not try to sell, the literary "pig in a poke"; but, of course, the habit of doing so has its advantages as well as its drawbacks. Otherwise it could not have grown up. Under modern conditions no editor can afford to trust to the off chance of a suitable serial turning up at the last moment. He prefers to see his way a year or even two years ahead. On the other hand, no author likes to think that, after he has written the story, he will have to wait two years before seeing it in print or deriving any profit from it. Consequently business in "pigs in pokes" has to be done, and the risk of its turning out badly has to be taken. It is simply a result of the commercial conditions under which both publisher and author live and work. If misunderstandings become frequent, the method will, no doubt, be altered. But in the case, at any rate, of authors whose work many publishers regard it as a privilege to handle, the custom is likely to die hard. For such are the inevitable consequences of competition.

Literature Portraits.—V.

DR. ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE.

Popularity and the good word of the critic do not often go together. In fact, critics are too often concerned to discover reasons why the popular writer should be despised of all good judges, whereas they would perhaps be better employed in searching for the cause of his success. For, in eternal contempt of all criticism, there is always some solid ground discoverable for an author's popularity. It may be some quality that has nothing to do with literature (as in the case of several admired novelists of the present day), but it is none the less adequate. It is possible to perpetrate solecisms in grammar and in good taste, and yet to appeal forcibly to the emotions; and there are many story-tellers, whose characters have no more life in them than a wooden image, who can nevertheless please by the ingenuity of their plot and the skilful accumulation of incident. In the case of Dr. Conan Doyle, however, there is no need of an apologetic explanation. His is one of the rare instances where criticism and the popular voice are nearly, if not quite, in accord. He has had the good fortune to please everybody—not perhaps with the whole body of his works, but at any rate with some one of them—and he is certainly at the present moment one of the most popular writers not only in England but wherever the English language is spoken.

Dr. Doyle has a long list of the qualities most useful to the profession of author. His versatility is remarkable. He has tried his hand at most sorts of writing—poetry, history, the drama, novels in various periods and in various climes, detective stories, sea stories, war stories—and he has done them all to the satisfaction of one section, at all events, of his numerous audience. His English is not always impeccable—and it is rather curious that his history of the Boer War, in some respects his most ambitious work, should appear to be written less carefully than certain of his novels—but there is in general a flavour of literature about his books. They have style enough to keep them sweet, and they are pleasantly free from mannerism or affectation. In "The Great Boer War" it may be admitted that Dr. Doyle did not wholly please the critics. It is difficult to write history on the spot, and those who essay the task are apt to find that they are merely jotting down journalistic impressions in more stilted language than usual. Probably the novelist felt, on this occasion, that he was engaged upon something unfamiliar, that some approach to the orthodox historical manner would be proper to the matter in hand, and yet that, on the whole, he would prefer to employ the old forthright style that had served him so well before. The result is not altogether satisfactory, but the book remains, for all that, one of the most interesting that the campaign in South Africa has produced. It would be difficult for this author to be uninteresting even in a controversial article on the defence of the Empire by means of rifle clubs.

The most valuable asset that a writer of fiction can possess is what we are pleased to call (for want of a better term) Humanity, and this invaluable quality has been granted to the author of "The White Company" in as full measure as to any other living writer. He has the widest sympathies. To no one else among novelists of the present day can the Latin tag be more fitly applied—homo est, humani nihil a se alienum putat. He is emphatically a man, and, what is of considerable importance to his work, he is also a good sportsman. It is not for nothing that he plays cricket as well as many county players, that he can hold his own at most exercises demanding nerve and quickness of hand and eye, and that he volunteered something more than a year ago for active service in South Africa. The fruits of this temperament are seen in such admirable pieces of description as that of the prize-fight in "Rodney Stone"—a description that will bear comparison with that famous one of Hazlitt's—and in the more serious bits of fighting scattered through such books as "Micah Clarke" and "The Refugees."

Indeed, it is evident that this author loves a good fighter, be he big or little, but, perhaps, with a mental reservation in favour of the giant. Hordle John and Micah Clarke were men of inches, but, like Alan Breck, Sir Nigel Loring was also a "bonny fighter." So, too, was Master Decimus Saxon, to say nothing of the two young gentlemen in "The Refugees." Even Sherlock Holmes was by no means to be despised in a hand-to-hand encounter. But the same man who has so lofty an appreciation of the manly virtues can also write—and this is a convincing proof of catholic sympathy—a quiet domestic idyll like "A Duet." There were many readers, no doubt, to whom this pretty little picture of married life was something of a disappointment. It was not the Conan Doyle they knew; tender sentiment was not at all what they had expected; and a good many admirers, we may be sure, laid the book aside with a feeling of surprise that their favourite author should condescend to such frivolities instead of weaving further adventures for his immortal detective. It is true enough that "A Duet" contains no very startling or exciting incidents; but, of its kind, it is none the less a very charming book, and it is the more interesting to us because it is in most respects so essentially different from all the writer's other work. It has a wonderful tenderness—the tenderness of a strong character. And it may be added that Mrs. Frank Crosse is a very life-like woman—a sort of character that is not very easily discoverable in some of the more admired novels of the same author.

With the exception of this story, the history of the war which we have mentioned above, two short plays, of which the monologue "Waterloo" is the better known, and the "Songs of Action," which contain some spirited and stirring poems that should live, the more important of Dr. Doyle's books fall naturally into certain well-defined divisions. The historical novel proper is represented by a very sound trio. "The White Company" and "Micah Clarke" are certainly the two best novels of this sort that have made their appearance for many years; "The Refugees" is long, and something overcrowded with incident, but it certainly cannot be accused of lack of spirit. Probably these three books are, if we except the two volumes of "Sherlock Holmes" stories, the most popular of all our author's writings, and they deserve their popularity. The periods are carefully studied, but the information gained is not unnecessarily obtruded upon our notice. The writing is simple, natural, and to the point; it is noticeable that in "The White Company" there is no trace of that Wardour-street English in narrative or dialogue which most historical novelists would have thought essential to the treatment of the fourteenth century. And the writer is never long-winded; he has that very useful art of arresting the attention at the start; the opening of his stories is not marred by tedious and prosy introductions. Some striking picture stands out before you have read the first three pages and gives the key-note of the story—the expulsion of John of Hordle from the monastery, or the portrait of Cornet Clarke, the old Ironside turned sober tradesman, but still retaining a touch of the ancient spirit.

The later novels in this kind are, to tell the truth, rather studies in an interesting period than historical novels. They lack the spacious atmosphere of the earlier books; they are altogether conceived on a smaller scale; and, good reading as they undoubtedly are, they display a rather melancholy reluctance to grapple boldly with a big subject, and carry it through to a satisfactory conclusion. "Rodney Stone" is, in many ways, an excellent study of the palmy days of the prize ring, and Beau Brummell, and heavy card-playing, and the new palace at Brighton. But the story is at once weak and melodramatic—almost as melodramatic as that of "Uncle Bernac," which is saved from mediocrity only by the character sketch of Napoleon. And "The Tragedy of the Korosko" is a slighter matter still, being nothing more nor less than a passable short story expanded.

The author's medical experiences have been turned to account in a volume of stories called "Round the Red Lamp" and in a more important book "The Stark Munro Letters."

The form of this story has probably militated against its prosperity, for fiction by epistolary correspondence (except in the case of love-letters) has not enjoyed much popularity since the days of Richardson. But "The Stark Munro Letters" are very well worth reading, not only for the sake of the realistic picture of the young doctor's early struggles, but for the very life-like character-sketch of Cullingworth, the genius with the methods of a charlatan. And the book contains a larger proportion than most of Dr. Conan Doyle's peculiar humour—a humour that is far from being subtle or in any way difficult of apprehension, but is always eminently laugh-provoking. Cullingworth's description of the way in which he won the Humane Society's medal is a case in point. The merit of this sort of humour lies in a keen sense of the ludicrous, a quick eye for the incongruous, and a very straightforward manner of exposing it. It is good-natured, strong common sense, that delights in shearing through a sophism or in exposing pretentiousness. The companionship of the young Canadian and the officer of the Court of Versailles in "The Refugees" is fruitful in good-humoured, sensible repartee of this kind. It is true, the humour is apt occasionally to sink below this level, and to descend to something perilously near a "catch-word," as with Sir Nigel Loring and his perpetual "prospect of honourable advancement," or Sir Oliver Buttethorn's too persistent longing for fat pullets. Sometimes, too, a farcical incident must serve its turn, as with Master Tetheridge hiding in the meal-chest after the battle of Sedgemoor. But on the whole there is abundance of honest, wholesome laughter, untinged with any suspicion of satire, to be found in these volumes.

"The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard" and the two volumes of "Sherlock Holmes" are both examples of a form of fiction that the exigencies of magazine publication have made very popular of late years. Of the famous detective it is unnecessary to say much now—with many he stands as the sole representative of his creator's work, and, although his inductive method may owe something to Edgar Allan Poe and certain Frenchmen, it is sufficient tribute to his worth to say that he has been, and probably will be, the model of a host of more or less praiseworthy imitations. Since his arrival in the pages of the Strand Magazine a decade or so since, an ever-increasing army of detectives and investigators, male and female, public and private, have been narrating their experiences; but it is pretty safe to say that none of them will ever quite fill the void caused by the death of the great master at the hands of his inveterate enemy. It is understood that Dr. Doyle proposes to resuscitate the popular favourite, or rather, to write a novel dealing with one of his earlier experiences. Some credit is due to him for holding out so long against the amiable persecution of a flattering public. For our part, we would almost prefer to hear more of the gallant Brigadier, whose adventures were in the author's happiest style of historical romance. And, rather than either of these, we would like to see another story, conceived on the spacious scale and executed with the careful fidelity of "Micah Clarke" or "The White Company."

E. H. LACON WATSON.

Dr. Conan Doyle was studying medicine at Edinburgh when he first appeared as an author with a short story entitled "The Mystery of the Sassassa Valley." That was twenty-three years ago and the story appeared in Chambers' Journal. A year or so later he was sailing the Arctic as doctor of the Scotch whaler Hope, the ship which foundered only a few months ago near the Magdalen Islands, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. He kept to medicine on his return to Edinburgh, and it was not until he started practising at Southsea—where he remained eight years—that he thought seriously of turning his attention to literature. It was a long and trying apprenticeship. In his characteristic contribution to "My First Book" (Chatto and Windus) he tells us that for ten years he averaged less than £50 a year from his pen. The Cornhill, Temple Bar, and other journals published fifty or sixty of his stories, but they had to be published anonymously, and "after ten years of such work I was as unknown as if I had never dipped a pen into an ink-bottle." A selection of the tales, however, was published by Messrs. Longmans in 1888 under the title of "The Captain of the Pole-star" and has since passed through numerous editions. But Dr. Doyle had two other books out before that volume was published. "A Study in Scarlet," after many refusals, was bought for £25 in 1887, and appeared in "Beeton's Christmas Annual" for that year. It was Sherlock Holmes' first appearance. Messrs. Ward, Lock brought the book out in more substantial form in the following year, and it has been reprinted, on an average, every year since then—the later editions including a paper on the famous detective by Conan Doyle's old master, Dr. Joseph Bell, the original of Sherlock Holmes. "A Study in Scarlet" has been translated in French, German, and Italian, and has made Dr. Doyle, with his later books, one of the best-known English authors on the Continent. "Micah Clarke," his story of the Monmouth Rebellion, appeared in the same year (1888), and, according to "My First Book," it was this work which opened the door for him into the Temple of the Muses.

A year's reading and five months' writing finished it, and I thought I had a tool in my hand that would cut a path for me. . . . I sent it to a friend, whose opinion I deeply respected in London, who read for one of the leading houses, but he had been bitten by the historical novel, and very naturally he distrusted it. From him it went to house after house, and house after house would have none of it. Blackwood found that the people did not talk so in the seventeenth century; Bentley that its principal defect was that there was a complete absence of interest; Cassell's that experience had shown that an historical novel could never be a commercial success. I remember smoking over my dog-eared manuscript when it returned for a whiff of country air after one of its descents upon town, and wondering what I should do if some sporting, reckless kind of publisher were suddenly to stride in and make me a bid of forty shillings or so for the lot. And then suddenly I bethought me to send it to Messrs. Longmans, where it was fortunate enough to fall into the hands of Mr. Andrew Lang. From that day the way was smoothed to it, and, as things turned out, I was spared that keenest sting of ill-success, that those who had believed in your work should suffer pecuniarily for their belief.

"Micah Clarke," indeed, was hailed as one of the best historical tales written for many years previously, and was a great success. It was adapted for school use in 1894. After "Micah Clarke" came a return to Sherlock Holmes in "The Sign of Four," published by Mr. Spencer Blackett in 1889; but the novelist's mind seems to have been set on historical fiction rather than detective tales at that time, and two years of study of fourteenth century life in England resulted in "The White Company," which Messrs. Smith, Elder published in three volumes in 1890. The circulation of this book has been remarkable and consistent; last year it reached its twenty-third edition. "The Firm of Girdlestone" was issued by Messrs. Chatto and Windus in the same year, and still has a steady sale—it has just been reprinted. The public, however, began to ask for more about the great detective, and the doctor, though by this time (1890) he had left Southsea to practise in London, abandoned medicine altogether and started writing "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes" for the Strand Magazine. The boom which followed is too well known to need more than a passing reference. The sales in volume form have been prodigious, and we understand that hundreds of thousands of copies have been sold of the sixpenny editions. In 1893 "The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes" started on an equally successful career—through the Strand to a six-shilling volume, and afterwards at three-and-sixpence; and both have been selling well ever since. It is now announced that Dr. Doyle is engaged in resuscitating Sherlock Holmes for a new serial which is expected to run to some 30,000 or 50,000 words. The play founded upon the detective's former adventures—which has been running for many months in America—is to be produced in London at the end of the summer; and the new Sherlock Holmes story will begin in the Strand at the same time.

The early nineties were extremely busy years with Dr. Conan Doyle. In between his two Sherlock Holmes books he published "The Great Shadow" as Arrowsmith's Christmas Annual for 1892; wrote the twenty-fourth part of that curious experiment in literary collaboration entitled "The Fate of Fenella" which Messrs. Hutchinson issued after its passage serially through the Gentlewoman; and published "The Doings of Raffles Haw" through Messrs. Cassell in the same year. In 1893, besides "The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes," he not only brought out "The Refugees: A Tale of Two Continents" in three volumes—published in a new edition in one volume in the same year—but produced the comic opera at the Savoy entitled Jane Annie; or, The Good Conduct Prize, which he wrote in collaboration with Mr. J. M. Barrie, with music by Mr.

Ernest Ford. His happiest effort as a playwright, however, is seen in Waterloo, the one-act piece which Sir Henry Irving gives before The Bells—to be repeated, by the way, on Wednesday next. In 1894 Dr. Doyle published his volume of medical stories, "Round the Red Lamp" (Methuen), which still has a steady sale in its seventh edition at six shillings; and "The Parasite," which formed No. 1 of Messrs. Constable's Acme Library. "The Stark Munro Letters" (Longmans) came in 1895, and "The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard" (Newnes) in 1896. The last-named made the fourth book by Conan Doyle published by Messrs. Newnes, as they took over "The Sign of Four" from Mr. Spencer Blackett; and all four have excellent sales, both in their sixpenny and three-and-sixpenny editions. One of Conan Doyle's tales—one of his earliest—lost its way in the post, and has not been heard of since; another, "The Mystery of Cloomer," was published in 1889 by Ward and Downey, but has long been out of print and unobtainable. The lost manuscript was called "The Narrative of John Smith," and, of course, as the author has remarked, it was the best thing he ever wrote. "Whoever," he asks, "lost a manuscript that wasn't? But I must in all honesty confess that my shock at its disappearance would be as nothing to my horror if it were suddenly to appear again—in print. If one or two other of my earlier efforts had also been lost in the post my conscience would have been the lighter." After "The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard" Dr. Conan Doyle settled down with Messrs. Smith, Elder, who, with the exception of "A Duet with an Occasional Chorus" (issued by Mr. Grant Richards in 1899), have published all his subsequent books. Their titles and dates, to complete our bibliography, are—"Rodney Stone" (1896), a new and cheaper edition of which has just appeared; "Uncle Bernac: A Memory of the Empire" (1897)—rewritten and lengthened by a third after appearing in serial form—"The Tragedy of Korosko" (1898); "Songs of Action" (1898); "The Green Flag and other Tales of War and Sport" (1900); and "The Great Boer War" (1900). The history of the war has been enormously successful. It has already reached its twelfth edition, and is still in constant demand. The narrative is now running serially through the Wide World Magazine, and an American edition of the book is published by Messrs. McClure, Phillips, and Co.; The author has dedicated the history to Mr. John L. Langman—"who devoted his fortune, and that which was more valuable to him than his fortune, to the service of his country, and to the relief of suffering." Mr. Langman, it is hardly necessary to add, sent the splendid field hospital to South Africa which had Dr. Doyle for its secretary and medical registrar. The novelist's one failure, it will be remembered, was his fight for Central Edinburgh last year, when, like Anthony Hope and Rider Haggard in earlier days—and Thackeray and Trollope, too, to go still further back—he sought the suffrages of the electorate in vain. And, by the irony of fate, he was defeated by a publisher (Mr. George Mackenzie Brown); but he had the satisfaction of knowing that he had reduced the last majority by more than 1,400 votes.

In the Highlands nearly every hill and every loch has its story. The Lowlands, too, have their traditions and their romances. The "Hawick tradition" was a small affair, to start with. Some Hawick "callants" (Anglicè, lads) captured a flag from a party of Englishmen whom they defeated at Hornshole, near Hawick, in 1514, subsequent to Flodden. The truth of the tradition has been questioned, but there is good reason to accept it. It has inspired the poet and the painter. It is commemorated every year, as the supposed anniversary comes round. It gave birth to a song which fires the blood of Hawick men all over the world, and which has come to be regarded as the Hawick slogan. The song transgresses all the rules of metre, but what it lacks technically it makes up in fire. The chorus runs—

Teribus ye Teri Oden,
Sons of heroes slain at Flodden,
Imitating Border bowmen,
Aye defend your right and Common.

Recently the incident which the tradition preserves was painted by Mr. Tom Scott, R.S.A., to be hung in the Council-room at Hawick. And on Saturday last a memorial which has been erected on the spot where the skirmish is said to have taken place was unveiled. The stone bears the inscription—"1514. Lest we forget." It is not a very exact use of Kipling's words; but there is little likelihood of the Hawick man ever forgetting.

IS SCOTTISH FICTION EXHAUSTED?

A "Personal View"

By WILLIAM WALLACE.

"There's a story in every line of it, a history in every check." Thus ecstatically speaks Baron Lomond of the tartan in the latest of Scottish romances, and the assertion does not seem to justify the prediction that the fiction of which Stevenson and Barrie were the pioneers will be exhausted in forty years, like the Lanarkshire coalfields which have given Glasgow its pre-eminence in commerce and in industrial exhibitions. Certainly also the extraordinary output of Scottish history and romance during the last quarter of the nineteenth century seems to prove that a very great number of able Scotsmen are of the same mind as the Baron. But it is death, not life, that brings the eagles together in congress. They are struggling over the carcase of a Jacobitism which is absolutely dead and, having been cut up, is seen to have had rottenness as well as romance in it—the Jacobitism of Lochiel and Flora Macdonald, but also of Pickle the Spy and Balhaldie and now—thanks to Mr. Neil Munro—of Simon MacTaggart. "Doom Castle" is in some respects the best and most sincere Highland historical romance that has ever been published, even although Simon is not quite so delectable a personage as Alan Breck, and although the company in the inn, flageolet and all, is not so enticing as that in "Gilian the Dreamer." It shows that Mr. Munro has come into his kingdom, that he can work out a political intrigue, that he can make a full-blooded passion throb beneath an agitated bodice, that, as Lamb said of Webster, he can "move a horror quickly." He is our literary Somerled or Regulus of Argyll—that romantic if somewhat disconcerting Argyll, in which there is a "smirr" of rain every day and a hail of bullets at least three times a week. And if he does not go beyond his depth like the original Somerled, or Mr. Barrie when he tries his hand, but not his heart, at a problem play, Argyll and Inveraray will be to him what Wessex and Budmouth have been to Mr. Hardy.

But Wessex—not being Shakespeare's country—is not the heart of England; and the Regulus of Argyll, although he was often the thorn in the flesh of the King of Scotland, never succeeded in deposing that monarch and in having himself crowned in his place. The successes of Mr. Munro like those of the best of our novelists, are the successes of literary decentralization. But decentralization is fatal to a revival of nationalities. The Cheviots are a geographical expression. There will be no repeal of the Union, no second Bannockburn to compel the King to give up styling himself "Edward VII." "There is still in Edinburgh," says Mr. R. S. Rait in his excellent little book on the life and death, and, above all, the death-in-life, of the old Scots Parliament, "a 'ghost of speech' which reminds the curious that men once did more in the Scottish capital than merely administer the law; but the 'Parliament House' is only a name—vox et præterea nihil." There will soon be but a ghost of the old Scots vernacular even in the precincts of the Kailyard. There is not such a ghost in Mr. Crockett's latest story, "The Silver Skull"; and the young Scotsman who figures in it as lover and aide-de-camp to the English General Church is the feeblest specimen of the walking gentleman that romance can show, except the Lovel of "The Antiquary." Mr. Munro is sparing of that "broad Doric," which, by the way, Dr. Murray has conclusively shown to be a variety of northern English. No doubt, when Mungo Boyd who, as a Scots serving man, is worthy to be ranked with Andrew Fairservice and even Caleb Balderstone, gets into a passion, the "ghost of speech" becomes as vigorously flesh—and blood as "the full, voluptuous but not o'er-grown bulk" of that other fascinating ghost in "Don Juan." "D—n ye, ye skirlin' auld bitch! can ye no steek yer jaw, and let them dae the howlin' outside?"—here, surely, we are far away from the leeks, and "lowliness" of Thrums and Drumtochty, and back again to the company of delightful and immortal Miss Ferrier, listening in Mrs. Violet McShake's Edinburgh flat to the true "siller soun"! "Hae bairn, tak a cookie, tak it up, what are ye feared for! it'll no bite ye. Here's t'ye Glenfern, an' your wife an' your wean; puir tead, it's no had a very chancy ootset, weel a wat." And we feel as if we had been pitchforked into worthy Mrs. Hamilton's "Cottagers of Glenburnie," the excellent moralities of which, as middle-aged Scotsmen cannot fail to remember, were as popular in villages as in the present day have been the humours of Mr. Barrie's pig-stye or the tears of Ian Maclaren's sermon-tasters, and as if the little boy were once again saying to his horse, "Come on, ye muckle brute, ye had as weel come on! I'll gar ye! I'll gar ye! That's a gude beast noo, come awa! That's it! Aye, y'ere a gude beast noo!" But the majority of the characters in "Doom Castle"—the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, the Baron, even Simon MacTaggart—speak Inverness or Edinburgh boarding-school English, and use a "dialect" word like "glaur" awkwardly and apologetically. As for Mrs. Petullo, wife to the Provost, mistress to the Chamberlain, and in spite of Olivia Lamond and her crushed jasmine, the true heroine of the book, she expresses unimpeachable French passions in such unimpeachable English as "I'm to be dismissed with just that amount of politeness that will save my feelings. I thought you knew me better, Sim. I thought you could make a more plausible excuse for the dirty transaction when it had to be done as they say it must be done some time with all who are in our position." What with School Boards in towns and Secondary Education committees in counties, Merit Certificates and Leaving Certificates, Continuation Schools and Technical Colleges, the patriotic (but not parochial) perseverance of Sir Henry Craik and the munificence of Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the ghost of the old Scots speech will be finally laid in a quarter of a century. Great Scottish novels, even great novels dealing exclusively with Scotland, may be written in the future. But they will be written in Leaving Certificate English; their writers, reversing the bitter experience of Stevenson, will complain that the Scots they may be compelled to put into the mouths of their characters is a foreign tongue.

But Scottish character, the whole world of Scottish manners, Scottish religion, and Scottish drink—are they not bound to remain even after the Scots tongue has gone, or has passed, as it is passing now—in the music of what are popularly known as the "Drumsheugh English" of Edinburgh and the "Kelvinside accent" of Glasgow—out of sight and out of mind? Did Scott and Stevenson live by dialect alone? Was the triumph of the Kailyard—even if it was but a temporary triumph—simply a victory for "Sal" and "Michty"? Certainly not. But the burgh-Homeric genius of Scott and the "golden art" of Stevenson would have conquered in any country and under any conditions in virtue of the "universality"—in Mr. Pater's sense—of the human interests with which they deal. Neither confined himself to his country. Stevenson was the nineteenth century representative of those Scottish cosmopolitan adventurers who, like the Admirable Crichton, regarded the world as their oyster, and took their lives in their hand while they opened it with their swords. Of Scott it may be said as he said of his impartial moss-trooper,

He sought the beeves that made his broth
In Scotland and in England both.

Regarded as Scottish artists they had unquestionably their limitations. I thoroughly agree with Mr. Stephen Gwynn (Literature, April 6) that "Scott is great by his Lowland folk, not his Highlanders"; he is great by them because he knows them. And similarly Stevenson never really got beyond middle-class Edinburgh and the Parliament House. His Alan Breck is a superbly artificial Highlander, the creation of a most capable Lowlander who has read deeply and to purpose in the Advocates' Library; but he is not such a reality as Weir of Hermiston, who is the incarnation—though they say he hath a devil—of the Parliament House. Nor is Catriona to be named in the same breath with Miss Grant, of whose Christian name one somehow never thinks. The artists of the Kailyard merited the success they attained, because for the first time they did justice at once to the lighter and to the purely pathetic side of that Secederism which has played an important part in the national life of Scotland and which was at one time, as Carlyle said, synonymous with earnestness.

But now, as the dirge of Jacobitism puts it, "all is done that man can do," though it would be inaccurate to go further and say "And all is done in vain." Secederism, Jacobitism, every national "ism" and stream of tendency has had ample justice done it. What Christopher North styled "the lights and shadows of Scottish life" have been reproduced by an apostolic succession of artists—Lockhart, Hogg, Norman Macleod, William Black, and, above all, Mrs. Oliphant, who, if leisure had been allowed her, could have done for Scotland what George Eliot did for England in "Middlemarch." The broad lines of Scottish character have been traced for all time by Scott and still more by Galt—Galt of the "Annals" and "The Provost" and the "Entail," who somewhat ominously, we are told, no longer "pays." Doubtless we shall have many Scottish novelists in the future, and many English travellers in search of Scottish oddities. There is no reason why every important district in Scotland should not have its Mr. Munro. There is no reason why another Charles Reade should not invent another Lord Ipsden to say "How do you do?" to another Jean Carnie and to receive for answer "Fine, hoo's yoursel'?" The humours of our ecclesiastical and municipal politics, the play of our seaside resorts and our hydropathic establishments, "the hideousness and immense ennui" of our bourgeoisie, may prove an irresistible temptation to many an adventurer strong in "local colour." But these things are no more peculiar to the world of Scottish manners, Scottish religion, and Scottish drink than poor Mrs. Petullo who is as cosmopolitan as Potiphar's wife or Cleopatra or Emma Bovary. Robert Burns was the last word in truly national Scottish poetry; Mr. Barrie is the last word in truly national Scottish fiction.

Mr. John Reid's new guide to Edinburgh is one which deserves a welcome. Its title is ELLIOT'S NEW ILLUSTRATED GUIDE TO EDINBURGH (Andrew Elliot, 6d.). It has a good plan of the city, and is very clearly printed and arranged. Mr. Reid weaves into his picture a good deal of historical matter, but he is eminently practical in his directions to the tourist how best to explore the city and all the places of interest in its neighbourhood, while he devotes special chapters to Edinburgh institutions and industries, to drama, and to sport.

THE SCOTT MONUMENT, EDINBURGH.

THE LITERATURE OF EDINBURGH.

I.—FROM DUNBAR TO SCOTT.

The literary history of Edinburgh, now extending over five centuries, is long and distinguished. "From an early date," says Sir Daniel Wilson, "special associations with the national literature have been identified with the ancient capital." It generally happens that the metropolis of a country draws men of letters to it; we all know that the ambition of the young English writer will be contented with nothing less than setting the Thames on fire, and Balzac has shown us, in many brilliant pages, how the talent of France still drew to the capital in the nineteenth century as surely as in the days when poor Villon sang that Il n'est bon bec que de Paris.

It is impossible in such a cursory survey as is here designed to make any pretence of covering the whole of the literary associations of Edinburgh, but it will be interesting even to glance at the most striking features of that brilliant past which culminated in earning for "the grey metropolis of the North" the designation of the Modern Athens.

The beginnings of Scottish literature, indeed, sprang up outside Edinburgh, which had barely begun to exist as the "Maiden Castle," the "Magh Dun" or "Castrum Puellarum," about which Mr. Oldbuck and Sir Arthur Wardour nearly came to blows, when Adamnan, the Abbot of Iona, produced in Latin the first book that we can definitely call Scottish. Although Edinburgh soon afterwards became the capital of Northumbria, and so perhaps gained its modern name from King Edwin, it had no literature of which we know anything till a century after Robert the Bruce gave it the dignity of a Royal Burgh of Scotland, in 1329. The earliest writers in the Scottish vernacular had no connexion with Edinburgh. Thomas the Rhymer—if that very mythical author ever had a local habitation—was the native of a Border valley, like his better known contemporaries of the thirteenth century, Michael Scot and Duns Scotus, who wrote in Latin. The War of Independence, which did so much to foster the growth of a Scottish literature, did not at first connect it with Edinburgh. Barbour was Archdeacon of Aberdeen; Blind Harry, as far as we know anything about him, was probably a hanger-on of the Court at Stirling; Wyntoun was a Canon of Lochleven. James I.—whom we shall persist, in spite of Mr. J. T. T. Brown, in claiming as a poet—had little to do with Edinburgh, and appears to have conceived his charming "Kingis Quair" at Windsor, when he was the prisoner of England, while he probably wrote or polished it at Stirling. Henryson was a schoolmaster in Dunfermline; there is, indeed, no conspicuous literary figure that we can in any way connect with Edinburgh before the close of the fifteenth century.

The assassination of James I. in 1436—familiar even to English readers by the beautiful ballad of Rossetti—caused Edinburgh, the centre of a comparatively civilized district, and more remote than Stirling from "the land of the wild Scots" in which it was so easy to hatch treason, to be adopted as the regular home of the Court and the meeting-place of Parliament. From this time onwards the town was generally recognized as the national capital, and it became, as a necessary consequence, the centre of Scottish literary activity. The third James inherited the literary tastes of his grandfather, and was accused by his rough and hard-handed barons of preferring the society of poets and painters to that of men of action. But it was under James IV.—the most attractive of all the Stuarts after James I.—that the first great period of Edinburgh literature began.

The chief name in it, of course, is that of William Dunbar, who is now generally recognized—in spite of such attacks as that of Lowell—as the greatest English poet between Chaucer and Spenser. In his purely national line, he is allowed to be, as Dr. Hume Brown has well said, "the first Scottish writer in whom are unmistakably present the distinctive traits of the national character as it has expressed itself in literature." Dunbar lived the greater part of his life—at any rate, of his literary life—in Edinburgh, and has left us many striking pictures of the streets of the city at the beginning of the sixteenth century. In his strong and highly-coloured verse is mirrored all the society of the Court—"its jovial freedom, its eager greed, its motley crowd of 'solicitaris,' its amusements, revelries, and coarse indecours"—no less than the bourgeois life of the town. The "Satire on Edinburgh" gives a graphic but unflattering picture, as Mr. Henderson points out, of the street scenes of "Auld Reekie," its smells—that were to last nearly into our own day—and squalor, its craftsmen, minstrels, street sellers, and shouting crowds of sturdy beggars, crossed here and there with the splendid armour of a knight going to joust or the kilted silks of a lady seeking the Court in the economic fashion still characteristic of Edinburgh. Dunbar, by the way, lays a good deal of stress on eating and drinking, which have always played a very important part in Edinburgh literature. In the "Satire" aforesaid he complains, with an obvious zest for the good things that he pretends to despise,

At your hie Croce, quhair gold and silk
Sould be, thair is bot crudis and milk;
And at zour Trone bot cokill and wilk,
Panches, pudingis of Jok and Jame;
Think zo nocht schamo?

Elsewhere he implies that the joys of Edinburgh life in his time were as full of good living as in the days of Adam Smith and Lord Kames. He summons James IV. to return from Stirling to the Court at Edinburgh,

That sone out of zour painis fell,
Ze may in hevin heir with us dwell,
To eit swan, cran, pertrik, and plever
And every fische that swymmis in rever ;
To drynk with us the new fresche wyne,
That grew upoun the rever of Ryne,
Ffresche fragrant clarettis out of France
Of Angerss and of Orliance,
With mony ane course of grit dyntie.

Another poet who walked the streets of Edinburgh with Dunbar was Gavin Douglas, the only scion of his family—according to the tradition utilized by Scott—who had ever learnt to write. He put his pen to good use by translating Virgil, for the first time in any dialect of English. For twelve years or more he was Provost of St. Giles' Collegiate Church, and it is on record that in 1513 he was granted the freedom of the city of Edinburgh, two months after the completion of his Virgil. Six years before that the first printing press had been set up in Edinburgh, and some of Dunbar's verses furnished the first fruit of a tree off which so much, of both native and foreign growth, has since been gathered to the advantage of the world. We must not linger over this first period of Edinburgh literature, however, further than to remark that it was completed by a third poet, Sir David Lyndsay of the Mount, Lord Lyon King at Arms, whose popularity survived to the time of Scott. He has a special interest, too, as the first Scottish dramatist; his Pleasant Satyre of the Thrie Estaitis in Commendatioun of Vertew and Vituperation of Vice—the very title is a small sweet idyl—was played at Edinburgh before the Queen Regent in 1554. Edinburgh would be shocked by it now!

With Lyndsay's death in 1555 the first great period of Edinburgh poetry came to an end, and an era of sturdy and contentions prose set in. The Reformation was in the air, and the times were unpropitious to the flourishing of pure literature. The two great names that next occur in Edinburgh's literary history are those of George Buchanan and John Knox, both closely connected with the Reformation in Scotland. Buchanan, indeed, was known all over Europe as one of the best poets of the time, but it was his Latin verse that won him this title, and it is rather as a humanist and a great scholar than as a writer of the vernacular that he falls within our survey. The Scottish version of the Detection of Queen Mary, long attributed to his pen, seems certainly to have been the work of another and an unknown hand. Knox holds a different position, and his great work, the "History of the Reformation of the Church of Scotland," whether we consider its nervous and characteristic style or its brilliant pictures of events in which the Apostle of Scotland had taken a leading share, is perhaps the most remarkable piece of sustained prose that had appeared in our language at the time of Knox's death. We may even yet go so far as to say, with Mr. Hume Brown, that "the impress of the writer's individuality, stamped on every page, renders his work possibly unique in English literature." It is not easy, indeed, to recall any similar narrative of an epoch-making time by its protagonist; in later years the makers of history have usually been too busy to write it. Perhaps Clarendon affords the closest parallel, though his influence on the Rebellion is not to be compared with that of Knox on the Scottish Reformation.

The seventeenth century saw the literary impulses which had given Edinburgh so distinguished a history in the sixteenth dying away. The removal of the Court to London took with it most of the Scots who might otherwise have carried on the national literature, and the only names that we need mention are those of William Drummond of Hawthornden, who was to all intents and purposes an Edinburgh man, though he cannot strictly be said to have lived "within a mile of Edinburgh town," James VI., whose literary work was chiefly done in his old capital, and who is at this moment being brought to our notice in the sumptuous and interesting volume published by Messrs. Constable, and edited by Mr. R. S. Rait, under the title "Lusus Regius," and Napier of Merchiston. Napier, it is true, did not write in the vernacular, and was hardly a man of letters, but one can no more omit him than Mill or Darwin from a survey of literature. Buckle said that "down even to the beginning of the eighteenth century Scotland could only boast of two authors whose works have benefited mankind, Buchanan and Napier"; and though Buckle is not loved in Scotland, his words carry weight even there. Certainly the "Description of the Wonderful Canon of Logarithms," published in Latin in 1614, had more influence on the future of mathematics than any book that had been written since Euclid, and it was so purely an Edinburgh work that to omit it would be unjust to the peaceful and sublimed hermit of Merchiston. During the rest of the seventeenth century Edinburgh, like the rest of Scotland, produced no literature worthy of note, though a useful work was being done in bringing the literary tongue into a sufficiently close conformity with English to open up a far wider field to its coming writers than was possible to Dunbar or even to Knox.

The union of Scotland with England, though it might have been expected to complete the intellectual paralysis which seemed to have been creeping over Edinburgh, really heralded "the great literary revival," as Mr. Harrison calls it, "which has made the town known over the world." Previous writers whom we have mentioned had been Scottish in the first place, and Edinburgh men rather by accident than in essence. But the town was about to develop a literature which was at once local, in the best sense, and universal. We may say roughly that it dates from 1719, when Allan Ramsay, who had begun life as a wigmaker in the Grassmarket, was encouraged by his growing reputation as a poet to abandon the outside of men's heads for their lining, and opened a bookselling business in the High Street. He not only published work of his own, like the still delightful "Gentle Shepherd," which revealed the artistic possibilities of the softened and civilized Scots tongue to men who could hardly read Dunbar or Barbour, but he collected the best work of earlier poets in two excellent anthologies, and by opening the first circulating library that had been seen in Scotland he gave the "poor and proud" folk of Edinburgh a chance of informing themselves about the contemporary writers who were inaugurating modern English literature. "His shop," says Mr. Graham in his interesting book on Eighteenth Century Scotland, "was the resort of all that was literary and genial; his presence the merriest and vainest at the Easy Club, where 'men of parts' recited their own verses and heard mild essays, and men of good fellowship sang jovially, and drank copiously, till long past 'the drum.'" The importance of such literary centres in the literary life of a town can hardly be over-rated, and the new outburst of Edinburgh writers owed more than readers of Ramsay's work alone can easily perceive to his encouraging and humane incentive, which was continued till past the middle of the century. There was still keen competition from the South; Thomson and Smollett were both drawn to London by the prospect of better rewards than the Scottish public was yet disposed or able to give the mere writer.

But the intellectual life of Edinburgh was developing, under the influence of French thought and the style of Addison and Swift. Soon after the middle of the century was past there came an outburst of Scots thinkers who wrote—often admirably, often stiffly, but always with painful care—in English. The histories of Hume and Robertson, Hume's philosophy, the criticism of Hugh Blair, the epoch-making work of Adam Smith—all held a foremost place in the estimation of English as well as Scottish readers, and the sums which Robertson in especial extracted from the pockets of the booksellers had no small influence in moulding the destinies of many rising young Scotsmen who wrote none the worse for seeing that literature might be made to pay as well as law or medicine. Meantime Robert Fergusson, that striking, sickly, and dissipated poet who, according to Stevenson's strange fancy, was reincarnated in the author of "Kidnapped," showed the way to revive the vernacular poetry, which also found a shy but beautiful expression in the mouths of ladies like Anne Lindsay and Jean Elliot. Fergusson's great successor, of course, had no connexion with Edinburgh of which the town can be proud. But the greatest of all Scottish writers was an Edinburgh man born and bred. It was during the thirty years of Scott's vigorous and rapid production that Edinburgh saw its palmiest time in the history of letters. The author of "The Lady of the Lake" and of the Waverley Novels would alone have made his "own romantic town" one of the places of the world's pilgrimage; but, like Shakespeare, he was only "primus inter pares"—no lonely sun, but by far the brightest star in a brilliant constellation. Thanks to Lockhart, the Edinburgh life of Scott's time is so well known that we need hardly dwell upon it here, though it has been dwarfed in the historical perspective by the figure of Scott, which seems to tower up higher, like Mont Blanc among its neighbouring Alps, the further we get away from it. There is the less need to speak of this period, as everybody has read of it in the pages of Lockhart; and indeed all praise would be poor and all comment on the literary importance of Edinburgh at this time superfluous when we have said that it was the birthplace and for most of his life the home of Sir Walter Scott.

At the same time, it is impossible to omit all mention of some of Scott's contemporaries, although their pretty star-shine was swallowed up in the full blaze of his meridian splendour. He himself did full justice to the talent of Miss Ferrier, "the great mistress of the novel of manners in Scotland." She was born and bred in Edinburgh, where she did most of the literary work about which, with the good old feeling of Scottish authoresses, she preserved so jealous a silence before the world that only in 1851 did she consent to place her name on the title-page of books that had been admitted as classics for nearly a generation. She has lately been described as one of the "Blackwood set," though few contrasts could be stronger than that between the aristocratic, rather narrow and "finicky" world which she describes and the rollicking, coarse, Philistine life of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ." The uproar of "Christopher North" and his friends is scarcely heard now, though its echoes linger in text-books of literature. We very much doubt if any one less than fifty years old has read a line of Wilson's work except for the purposes of business, but in his time he was regarded as a kind of compound of Plato and Shakespeare by his admiring friends. His best work was done for "Maga.," of which, as of Jeffrey and the Edinburgh Review, we speak elsewhere. Lockhart, who was a far cleverer man and better writer than the boisterous Wilson, had migrated to London before his immortal biography was undertaken, so that we need say no more of him than will be found in the same article. One figure that came into the literary life of Edinburgh just before the end of Scott's day may be mentioned here in conclusion, as it formed a link with the later generation of Hugh Miller and John Brown. De Quincey, who had already contributed to Blackwood the wonderful "Murder Considered as one of the Fine Arts," came to settle in Edinburgh in 1828, and lived there or in the neighbouring village of Lasswade until his death in 1859. "For all in Edinburgh who had any special passion for literature," says Professor Masson, "or thought they had, De Quincey from 1845 onwards was most emphatically one of the 'characters' of the place. He was talked of and gossiped about at dinner-tables and tea-tables, and to see him, even by stratagem, was worth an effort." Hill Burton has described some of his "little ways" very happily in "The Book-Hunter." Of course De Quincey was only an Edinburgh man through the accident—in his case truly so termed—of his settling there, though his years in the east-windy town were more profitable than those of Carlyle. It was there, of course, that he wrote the immortal "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater," which is perhaps the most indubitable work of genius that has been penned or typewritten in Edinburgh and its vicinity since the death of Scott. But with De Quincey we are brought in contact with a period within the memory of people still living, which it will be the task of another article to describe.

THE LITERATURE OF EDINBURGH.

II.—THE LAST HALF-CENTURY.

In the year 1850, to take a convenient date for starting point, many men were living who had either made a name for themselves or were destined to make it in the immediate future. Times had changed in Edinburgh since Carlyle, tired of schoolmastering, toiled for bread-and-butter wages at translation, and pitied De Quincey because he found it necessary to write for "that king of donkeys, the proprietor of the Saturday Post." In those days there were still a few literary giants in the land. No Scott, it is true, walked the streets of the Scottish capital; no Burns came from the plough to set society in a blaze; Literary Edinburgh in the old sense had practically ceased to exist. Yet it was not without its lights in the world of letters. Professor Wilson had closed his literary record and was just about to resign the Chair which he had held for thirty years; De Quincey had ceased to be an active force, and was interesting only for his owl-like habits and the general sense of mystery which surrounded him. These were the two great names, the afterglow, as it were, of the radiance cast upon Edinburgh by the commanding genius of Sir Walter Scott. But what a galaxy of little stars there was besides!

One thinks first, perhaps, of Aytoun, who had married the daughter of Professor Wilson, and so linked himself in a very real manner with the old ranting, happy-go-lucky days of literary Edinburgh, the days of Hogg and the heroes of the "Noctes Ambrosianae." Aytoun, according to Mrs. Oliphant, had the air of being one of the ancient lights, but had little of their warmth or radiance. He certainly made a brilliant figure in the Blackwood coterie of his time, and if he was not actually the first, he was one of the first to give real distinction to the Chair of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres. That he had the Scotsman's "guilt conceit" of himself seems plain enough. When he was elected honorary president of the Associated Societies of the University in preference to the author of "Esmond," he remarked: "I should not like to have been beaten on Scottish ground by Thackeray or any other literary man ranking nearly as my contemporary." In those days people talked a good deal about the curiously satirical "Firmilian," in which the so-called "Spasmodic School" of poetry was held up to ridicule, but Aytoun is remembered for other things now. The Bon Gualtier Ballads, sparkling, if somewhat thin, have still something of their early attraction, and there is no good Scotsman whose pulse is not set throbbing by the rattling, rapid, drum-like rhythm of the "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers." Aytoun was called to his rest in the August of 1865, shortly after his friend James Frederick Ferrier, whose name is still revered in a small circle of philosophic thinkers; and in the following October Professor Masson was appointed to fill his Chair at the University. Thus by another link is the romantic past connected with the prosaic present.

Speaking in Edinburgh four years ago, Lord Rosebery remarked that if Macaulay's New Zealander were to come to Edinburgh he would find that the one great survival of the Augustan age of letters in the capital was, by unanimous consent, Professor David Masson. The remark was essentially true, notwithstanding Mr. Russell Lowell's unfeeling reference to the "broad, damp print of the hippopotamus." There is a certain solemnity, even a certain ponderousness, about Professor Masson, no doubt, but that he has in his time done a great deal of valuable work in literary history no one would attempt to deny. In his "Milton," as the best of critics have admitted, all that honest and critical industry can do is done to clarify and settle the text; and the same is true of his less monumental works on De Quincey and Goldsmith. He has written critical notices of our chief novelists and poets, and on Drummond of Hawthornden and Chatterton he must be regarded as a specialist. When he was appointed to his Chair, one of the candidates who opposed him was Dr. George Macdonald. It would be interesting to speculate on the influence which Macdonald might have exerted in Scotland had he been the successful candidate; but Professor Masson's influence at any rate has been wholly beneficial. He has given his students knowledge and something better, and it is not surprising that so many men at home and in lands afar off should, as Mr. Barrie phrases it, recall the name of this instructor of their youth with something of personal devotion. Of Professor Saintsbury, his successor in the Chair, not much need be said here. The Professor has not yet brought himself into anything like close touch with the literary life of Edinburgh; nor, indeed, is he ever likely to do so, not having been caught young enough. He is in the capital and yet not of it.

But we have wandered far from our starting-point in following out the links of our chain. There are still several names reaching away back to the fifties which must not be forgotten. First one must mention Hugh Miller, the remarkable man who joined geology and literature with ecclesiastical controversy, and who, from being a humble country stonemason, rose to a position which enabled him to fill twenty busy years in the career of journalism and authorship. Miller died by his own hand in 1856, his mind having evidently become unhinged by incessant literary toil. He left behind him a large number of works, in the better parts of which there is "a remarkable style, extremely popular and unpretentious, but never trivial or slipshod, which is not far below the best styles of the century for its special purpose." He is not much read now, but as a geologist at least he did important service, particularly in his "Old Red Sandstone." Coming close behind him in point of date was Alexander Smith, who, strange as it now seems, was once accepted as the rival of Tennyson. Alas, how quickly does oblivion scatter her poppies! To-day Smith is known only to the select few, and that, too, not as a poet, but as the author of "Dreamthorp," a series of delightful essays which, if Lamb had not written, would be regarded as almost the best things of their kind. The "Life Drama" and the "City Poems," once the subject of enthusiastic discussion and heated controversy, have been all but completely forgotten, and have to be sought in the catalogues of the second-hand booksellers. When Smith was discovered by George Gilfillan he was working as a pattern designer, but those who discerned his gifts immediately set about getting him some more fitting employment, and he was presently appointed to the Secretaryship of Edinburgh University. The patronage of this post lay with the town council, and the worthy Lord Provost actually deemed it necessary to advise the young poet to send in his application "in simple prose"! Smith wrote himself out all too early, dying in 1867, like Byron and Burns, at the fatal age of thirty-seven. He had "chummed" it with Sydney Dobell when the latter was staying near Edinburgh in 1854, and his essay on the poet of "Balder" was the last piece of literary work that came from his pen. Something should certainly be done to revive an interest in his writings.

A list of Smith's friends in his later Edinburgh days would include nearly all the literary leaders of the time. Naturally he came a good deal into contact with Professor Blackie, who was then in the flush of his manhood, throwing witty sallies at the heads of his students, and marching through the streets, carrying his breeze with him, like another Christopher North. One thinks of Professor Blackie less as a literary man than as a "character"—one of those striking individualities who force themselves upon the attention of the public more by their eccentricities than by their genuine merits. There was undoubtedly something of the poseur about Blackie; yet it would be unfair to deny him a place among the literary notables of the city whose West-end foibles he so often satirized. Probably little that he wrote will live, but the memory of the man himself must remain green for several generations to come. Of a very different stamp was Sir John Skelton, the essayist of Fraser's Magazine, who borrowed his pen-name of "Shirley" from Charlotte Brontë, and was, indeed, one of her sanest critics. Skelton had early conceived a warm admiration for Disraeli, and when the grateful statesman came into power he rewarded his admirer by making him Secretary of the Board of Supervision. From that post he retired only in 1897, shortly before his death, but few people in Edinburgh thought of him as other than a purely literary man, spending studious days and studious nights in his charming retreat, "The Hermitage," at the foot of the Braid Hills. Skelton's great theme was Mary Stuart. He was a zealous, even a frantic, champion of the unfortunate Queen, and disbelieved entirely in the Casket Letters. This, however, did not preclude an intimacy with a man of such opposing views as Mr. Froude, who was often a guest at "The Hermitage" along with other literary celebrities of the time. In respect of certain qualities Dr. John Hill Burton was not unlike "Shirley," though he had none of that writer's literary grace. He was the historian pure and simple, distinguished more by industry, by learning, and by sound and impartial judgment than by any of the higher qualities of genius. His name was, and indeed still is, highly honoured in the capital; for, in addition to his own merits, he had known De Quincey and many more of the dii majores, and borrowed from them a kind of reflected light which attracted the lover of literature. Burton had been Historiographer Royal of Scotland, and in that post he was succeeded by a scholar equally eminent with himself in his own particular department. Dr. W. F. Skene was the great authority of his time on Celtic Scotland, and his book bearing that title is still quoted as a standard work. And what shall be said about Dr. John Brown, the inimitable author of "Rab and his Friends," the intimate of Thackeray and Ruskin, the man towards whom English and American literary visitors in Edinburgh gravitated for so many years? Dr. Brown has been called the Charles Lamb of Scottish literature, and the designation is not inapt. His "Horæ Subsecivæ" enshrine some of the finest literary work in the language. He shed a halo around everything he touched, and glorified, as few of his countrymen have been able to do, the commonest things of life. "Rab and his Friends" has surely been read by everybody who reads books at all. Some one has said of the author that "a man can scarcely hope for immortality by possessing the name of John Brown, but the epithet of 'Rab and his Friends' may enable him to walk down to posterity with tolerable equanimity." As a matter of fact, the Edinburgh people have long since settled the question of individuality by speaking familiarly of Dr. "Rab" Brown—as sure a way, perhaps, of rendering an author immortal as the commoner method of depriving him of his Christian name.

Of course the one outstanding figure in Edinburgh's later literary history is the figure of Stevenson. But in dealing with Stevenson in such an article as this one is confronted by the double difficulty represented by the circumstances that Stevenson loved Edinburgh only in a sentimental sense, and that, by reason of his many wanderings, to say nothing of his literary product, he belongs, not to the place of his birth, but to the universe. Nevertheless, in spite of the many cruel things which he has said about Edinburgh, particularly about its weather and its ecclesiastical wranglings, Stevenson must always be regarded as, before all things, a son of the Scottish capital. He was born there, he was educated there—so far as he found it convenient to look in at his classes; and it was to "the cold old huddle of grey hills" above Swanston-cottage that his thoughts most frequently wandered when a fit of depression seized him in the land of the stranger in far-away Samoa. If, like the exile in Goldsmith's poem, his heart did not exactly pant after "the place from whence at first he flew," one feels that he must have often entertained the hope of returning thither, to "die at home at last." Stevenson's place in literature has still to be determined; his place in the hearts of the Edinburgh people, many of whom knew him well, is secure. The memorial for which his friends and admirers subscribed in St. Giles' Cathedral will remind the visitor that he was born within sound of the cathedral chimes, but the native needs no such reminder of his erstwhile fellow-citizen.

Of the living men who cultivate literature in Edinburgh on something better than "a little oatmeal" it is not easy to speak in a closing paragraph. Reference has already been made to Professor Masson. In his "line" perhaps the most notable name is that of Dr. Hume Brown, whose masterly study of Knox prepared one for the admirable "History of Scotland" which he has now in progress. Dr. Hay Fleming, formerly of St. Andrews, but now apparently settled in Edinburgh, has done some good work as an historian, notably in connexion with the tangled and ever-attractive theme of Mary, Queen of Scots. Mr. Hector C. Macpherson, one of the deepest philosophical thinkers in the country, has proved himself by his splendid book on Herbert Spencer, as well as by his monographs on Carlyle and Adam Smith. A coming work on Hume will doubtless add to his reputation. Professor Flint has to be honoured as a scholar as well as a teacher. With Dr. Hutchison Stirling, Professor Pringle Pattison, Professor Campbell Fraser, and the other names just mentioned, he represents what may be called the higher departments of intellectual activity. On the more ordinary level of letters one finds quite a little crowd of honoured workers, some of whose names are fairly well known in the wider world of letters. Mr. Alexander Anderson, the "Surfaceman" poet, does not sing of the rail so often as he used to do, but he still finds time for an occasional verse in the midst of his duties at the University Library. In Mr. J. Logie Robertson, better known by his pen-name of "Hugh Haliburton," the poet and the literary critic are happily combined. Mr. Robertson's command of the Doric is especially noteworthy, his "Horace in Homespun," of which a new edition, finely illustrated by Mr. A. S. Boyd, has just appeared, being perhaps the best thing of its kind which has been published in recent years. Mr. Robertson was at Edinburgh University in Stevenson's days as a student, and wrote along with the novelist in the University Magazine, where Oliver Wendell Holmes found a sonnet of his which he afterwards reprinted in the Atlantic Monthly. Other names might be mentioned, such as Mr. Oliphant Smeaton, Miss E. Blantyre Simpson, a daughter of the inventor of chloroform; Miss Rosaline Masson, who has inherited much of the literary talent of her father; Mr. T. N. Hepburn ("Gabriel Setoun"); Mr. Cuthbert Hadden, and several besides, all of whom go to swell the ranks of the capital's literary workers. Literary Edinburgh can never be what it was in the old days, but if it continues at its present level of excellence it need not be ashamed to speak with its enemies—if it has any—in the gate.

LITERARY LANDMARKS OF EDINBURGH.

For its size there is no city in the world that has more literary landmarks than Edinburgh. Boston perhaps comes near it, but Boston had no Sir Walter Scott, the dominating influence of whose personality no one can fail to observe in the Scottish capital of to-day. The Scott Monument (figured on page 482) attracts the eye of the visitor as soon as he sets foot in Princes-street. The railway station is named after the earliest of the Waverley Novels. Restaurants, coaches, bridges, Forth excursion steamers, pens of local manufacture borrow the titles of the Great Unknown's stories and poems. There is a Sir Walter Scott Club, and the publications of an Abbotsford Club are to be found on the shelves of all the libraries. In short, it is Scott everywhere.

Practically one finds the same thing when it comes to the matter of literary landmarks. There are Scott houses, or houses associated in some way with Scott, in almost every quarter of the town. The house where he was born is no longer standing, but one may still look upon 25, George-square exactly as it was when Jeffrey found the young law student "in a small den in the sunk floor of his father's house, surrounded with books." On the other side of the town we have the house at 108, George-street, where Scott first lodged after leaving the paternal roof, and to which he brought his newly-married wife, whose custom, as Lockhart records, of using the best rooms for sitting in on ordinary days quite shocked the worthy landlady. This house, like the one in George-square, remains unchanged with the exception of a slight alteration in the entrance. Away at the West-end, again, at No. 6, Shandwick-place, we are reminded how, in the February of 1830, Scott was here stricken with paralysis one afternoon after his return from the Parliament House. He rallied for a time, and was abroad again after a short interval, but when he removed from Shandwick-place it was never to return permanently to the capital. The house at No. 6, North St. David-street has equally painful memories, for it is intimately associated with the fallen fortunes of the great novelist. Here he came to lodge with a Mrs. Brown, shortly before the death of his wife, when he remarked pathetically with Touchstone :—"When I was at home I was in a better place." Curiously enough, the only other lodger in the house was a Mr. Shandy, a clergyman, and, "despite his name, said to be a very quiet one." But, of course, the house of all others connected with Scott is the famous 39, North Castle-street. Basil Hall says it was in Scott's time "a house befitting a rich baronet." The novelist came to it in 1798, soon after his marriage. Every lover of Scott, every reader of Lockhart's great biography, knows about the busy, stirring, strenuous life that was lived for twenty-six years at "dear old 39," about the many interesting incidents which make it memorable to us. Of his early years in George-square Scott modestly remarks that they were the only years of his life in which he applied to learning with stern, steady, and undeviating industry. He was certainly industrious enough at Castle-street. Perhaps there is no incident that comes more readily to the mind in connexion with the house than that which tells of the neighbour looking through the window of Sir Walter's study and seeing the hand for ever going with the pen. Scott may have had all the vulgar ambition with which Carlyle has charged him, but at least he did not attain that ambition without working hard for its realization.

After Scott, one naturally thinks of Burns, with whom the future novelist had the famous meeting in a house which the antiquaries have not been able to identify with certainty. Unfortunately, no very interesting landmark remains to connect the great poet of that memorable first visit of 1786 with the world of to-day. One may still walk around the unsavoury purlieus of Baxter's Close where the ploughman bard found a lodging with an old acquaintance, but the place has been reduced to the very lowest social level, so that a room which in the poet's time contained only "a deal table, a sanded floor, and a chaff bed" can hardly have any attractions for the literary visitor, even if he is a Burns enthusiast. There are hazy records of the poet's erratic appearances in other localities, notably in Buccleuch-place, where he seems to have shared with his friend William Nicoll that "violent propensity for the bottle," which Nicoll had attributed to him by Lockhart. He was lodging in James'-square when he made the acquaintance of "Clarinda," that absurd goddess who drew from him so many stilted pieces of bombastic prose. The house remains much the same as it was in Burns' time. It is numbered 30, and stands in the south-west corner of the square, with the poet's window looking towards the General Post Office. Needless to say, it is an attic room—"the proper story," as Burns himself remarked, "for a poet's lodging." From the Clarinda letters we gather that the divinity had gone one morning to see if she could catch a glimpse of her "Sylvander," but had not looked high enough, which quite spoiled the poet's peace for the day! Of Clarinda herself there are practically no memorials left. In Burns' time she lived in the Potter-row, but the house has long since disappeared before the march of city improvement. Perhaps one should note as a further "landmark" connected with the poet the somewhat grim-looking Lodge of the Freemasons on the west side of St. John-street, in the dingy Canongate district. Burns somehow found himself among the Masons here in the early days of January, 1787, when the Grand Master gave the toast of "Caledonia and Caledonia's bard," to his great astonishment and no less great embarrassment. Burns was subsequently made poet-laureate of the Lodge; and the ceremony of his inauguration has been rendered generally familiar by the painting of Mr. William Stewart Watson.

Not far from this interesting building, in the house numbered 13, Lord Monboddo lived with his pretty daughter, Miss Burnet, to whom Burns paid his well-known compliment in verse. This part of the old town, once the home of the great and the wealthy of the capital, is, indeed, full of literary associations. There is Smollett's house, for example, still practically unchanged from the condition in which the novelist found it when he came hither in 1766. It stands in the Canongate over the archway leading into St. John-street, of which we have just been speaking, and can hardly be mistaken by any one who knows where to look for its curious round-tower-like bulging walls. In Smollett's day the Canongate seems to have been a favourite residence of literary notables. Here, in Pannure-house, a roomy mansion removed some twelve years ago, Adam Smith spent the last dozen years of his life, to be carried when he died in 1790 to the churchyard near by, where a tall mural tablet now points out to the careless visitor the grave of the distinguished economist. And while the visitor is here he should take a look at the last resting place of Robert Fergusson (see p. 484), the ill-starred poet whom Burns acknowledged as his master, and who, indeed, owes it to Burns that his remains do not lie to-day unmarked among those of the "ignoble dead." The memorial stone which now "directs Pale Scotia's way to pour her Sorrows o'er her Poet's Dust" was placed there by Burns to remain "an unalienable property" to the poet's "deathless fame." Dugald Stewart, the philosopher, also rests in the Canongate Churchyard, under a large altar tomb, not very far from the grave of Adam Smith. Another of the Canongate celebrities was David Hume, who lived for some time in a house directly opposite that of Smollett. It was there—the number is 229—that he finished his "History of England," with such friends as Adam Smith, Adam Ferguson, Lord Elibank, and Dr. Blair to fill up his evening hours around the supper table.

Away further up, almost opposite the Tron Church, "at the sign of the Mercury," Allan Ramsay lived and laboured, first as wigmaker, then as author, printer, and publisher; but, alas! honest Allan's modest shop has finally disappeared, after having been deprived of its two upper stories, a victim to the craze for so-called "improvement." Ramsay has been especially unfortunate in the matter of "landmarks." The theatre which he built for the benefit of his fellow-citizens, who, as it turned out, were too Puritan to take a theatre even as a gift, has long since vanished; while even the house which he erected for himself on the Castle-hill has been absorbed in the architectural monstrosity—dignified by the name of University-hall—which Professor Geddes conceived as a residential scheme for students. It was a pleasing thing for the lover of Scottish literature to look upwards from Ramsay's statue in Princes-street to the "goose-pie"—as the poet's friends derisively called his house—crowning the grassy ridge of the Castle-hill; but that, too, has gone, and by-and-by the very existence of the ancient landmark will be as forgotten as "The Gentle Shepherd" itself already seems to be.

Within a stone's-throw of what was formerly known as Ramsay-lodge we have the building in James'-court, which enjoys the triple distinction of being associated with Boswell, with David Hume, and with Hugh Blair, the fortunate divine who made a reputation by his "Lectures on Rhetoric and the Belles Lettres," and got a pension of £200 a year from George III. as the result of some of his sermons being read to the King by Lord Mansfield. Hume was the first of the three celebrities to enter the old court as a tenant, which he did in 1762. When he went to France Blair occupied his rooms; and then Boswell seems to have followed, being here when Johnson arrived in Edinburgh on his way to the Hebrides in 1773. The prince of biographers evidently thought himself well rid of Hume as a neighbour. "I always lived on good terms with Mr. Hume," says he, "though I have frankly told him I was not clear that it was right of me to keep company with him." The philosopher presently built himself the house 8, St. Andrew's-square. It was a corner house and began the street afterwards called St. David-street. The latter name, it is said, was applied after a witty passer-by had chalked on the wall of Hume's house the words "St. David-street." The allusion was obvious. Hume's maid pointed out the writing in great excitement to her master. "Never mind, lassie," said he, "many a better man has been made a saint of before." And so St. David-street remains, a link, it is pleasant to imagine, with the philosopher who wrote his own funeral oration and gave a large order for candles on his deathbed.

Coming somewhat nearer our own day, the "landmarks" are naturally more numerous, though not many of them are associated with giants of the old-time stature. There is De Quincey, who lies in a forlorn, neglected grave in St. Cuthbert's Churchyard, at the west end of Princes-street. The little Opium Eater flitted about bat-like and mysteriously from lodging to lodging, but so far as Edinburgh is concerned he is easily traced. When he came north with his wife and family in 1830 he took a large furnished house at 9, Great King-street, but had soon to leave it on account of the expense. In his later years he resided at 42, Lothian-street, where, indeed, he died, and where a tablet now reminds the literary visitor of his sad career. But the real De Quincey shrine is the little cottage near Lasswade, familiar to all readers of the Opium Eater's life and letters as Mavisbush. How he ever contrived to live in this house at all is a puzzle to every one who has seen it, for it is sunk away down in the hollow of the Esk, with no prospect from its windows but a huge blank wall on the other side of the road. Had De Quincey first taken to laudanum-drinking here, one could have understood it. How much more pleasant it is to walk up through the woods to Hawthornden and look at the lovely spot where Drummond lived and wrote and received Ben Jonson in those far away days. But one may wander far enough afield if one ventures beyond the city boundary in search of landmarks. Carlyle's house at 21, Comely-bank must have been regarded as well in the country when he and Jane Welsh first took possession of it in 1826. It stands now exactly as it stood then, and one can still imagine the newly-married philosopher smoking his pipe in the little flower garden around the front door. There are other Carlyle landmarks in the capital, though they are not much visited. When he was a student and a tutor he moved constantly from lodging to lodging in both the Old and the New Towns, grumbling at his landladies, and always seeking the quiet and the solitude which he never seems to have obtained.

The literary landmarks of Edinburgh might indeed be made an almost endless theme. We have mentioned many names, yet they do not half exhaust the list. John Wilson, the guiding spirit of the "Noctes Ambrosianæ"; Henry Mackenzie, the author of the practically forgotten "Man of Feeling"; John Gibson Lockhart, the "scorpion" of nineteenth century criticism; Hugh Miller, the stonemason who wrote about geology as well as he handled the trowel; Dr. John Brown, lover of "Rab" and of all good dogs and men; Louis Stevenson, her most famous son of recent years—these and many others have left landmarks which Edinburgh proudly cherishes, and must cherish more and more as the years pass. It has been said of Edinburgh that her face is her fortune. The lover of literature looks more deeply, while not the less enjoying those natural beauties and graces which make the modern Athens, in the opinion at least of her own people, "the joy of all the earth."

LEADING PUBLISHERS AND PERIODICALS OF EDINBURGH.

It is not very easy to say exactly when, in Edinburgh as in London, the booksellers developed into publishers. It seems, however, that we may attribute the transformation to the last third of the eighteenth century. Perhaps the first of Edinburgh publishers, in the modern sense of the word, was Alexander Donaldson, the founder of the Edinburgh Advertiser, and the father of that James Donaldson whose Hospital is so conspicuous and munificent a monument to his name. Donaldson, as Robert Chambers tells us, was a kind of "pirate," in the estimation of his London colleagues. His great achievement lay in the direction of cheapening books that were acknowledged to be classics. At that time the author had only fourteen years of copyright. This was extended, in practice, by the agreement of all the London booksellers not to trench on one another's preserves, even after the legal term had elapsed. Donaldson saw an opening here, and set up a shop in London for the sale of the cheap editions of books whose copyright had legally lapsed, that he had printed at one of the score or so of Edinburgh printing offices. This caused much ill feeling and, ultimately, a famous law-suit, which decided that there was no copyright beyond the fourteen year term. Donaldson's cheap editions, as a worthier successor of his observed, "met an immense sale, and proved of obvious service to the public, especially to those of limited means; though, as Johnson remarked, this made Donaldson 'no better than Robin Hood, who robbed the rich in order to give to the poor.' . . . Waiving all question on this point. Donaldson may be considered as a sort of morning-star of that reformation which has resulted in the universal cheapening of literary publications."

It was not until the beginning of the nineteenth century that Edinburgh really assumed a leading place in the book trade. The great writers of the eighteenth century had mostly written in English and appealed to an English market through a London bookseller. The vernacular writers of purely local fame, from Allan Ramsay to Burns, were the chief exceptions to this rule. But in the first third of the nineteenth century there arose three great publishing houses in Edinburgh, each possessing its own periodical, which had an incalculable effect on the later developments of the book trade in all its branches, such as perhaps only the house of Murray, among contemporary firms still surviving, could claim in the South. These were the houses of Constable, with the Edinburgh Review, Blackwood, with the Magazine, and Chambers, with the Journal.

The first of these in chronological order—as perhaps in ambition and in influence—was that of Archibald Constable, whose connexion with Scott, tragic in its results, would alone suffice to immortalize his name. This "grand Napoleon of the realms of print," as he wished to be called in his epitaph, began business about 1794. At first a mere bookseller, he speedily made his shop such a meeting-place for the literary world of Edinburgh as Allan Ramsay had done seventy years before him. In the introduction to "The Fortunes of Nigel," Scott has left a graphic picture of "that labyrinth of small dark rooms. . . . which form the extensive back-settlements of that celebrated publishing-house." Lockhart has drawn Constable's character and outlined his connexion with Scott so brilliantly that even the three volumes of his correspondence add nothing essential. "Though with a strong dash of the sanguine," says Lockhart, ". . . . Archibald Constable was one of the most sagacious persons that ever followed his profession. A brother poet of Scott says to him. . . . 'Our butteracious friend at the Cross turns out a deep draw-well'; and another eminent literator, still more closely connected with Constable, had already, I believe, christened him 'The Crafty.' . . . I confess I now doubt whether he rated himself too high as a master in the true science of the bookseller. He had, indeed, in his mercantile character, one deep and fatal flaw—for he hated accounts, and systematically refused, during the most vigorous years of his life, to examine or sign a balance-sheet; but for casting a keen eye over the remotest indications of popular taste—for anticipating the chances of success and failure in any given variety of adventure—for the planning and invention of his calling—he was not, in his own day at least, surpassed; and among all his myriad of undertakings, I question if any one that really originated with himself and continued to be superintended by his own care ever did fail. He was as bold as far-sighted—and his disposition was as liberal as his views were wide." The circumstances of Constable's connexion, during more than a quarter of a century, with Scott—originating in his "sporting offer," then unprecedented, of a thousand guineas for the unseen poem of "Marmion," continuing until the publisher was able to assert in his pride that he was "all but the author" of the "Waverley Novels," and terminating in the crash for which only half the responsibility can be laid justly at his door—are too well known for us to dwell on them here. More important, perhaps, in its consequences was the foundation of the Edinburgh Review—the only one of Constable's "myriad undertakings" that still flourishes in the same form that he first impressed on the "blue-and-yellow."

In 1801 Constable, who was then recognized as the most enterprising of Edinburgh booksellers, acquired the copyright of the old Scots Magazine, which had been founded in 1739 on the model set seven years earlier by Cave in the famous Gentleman's Magazine. But it was felt that some more potent and literary periodical was needed. Twice at least in the eighteenth century attempts had been made—by Adam Smith and Hugh Blair, among others—to supply the want of an independent and outspoken critical journal which should not be under the thumb of the booksellers, but the times were not ripe. In 1802 a little knot of high-spirited and brilliant young men, among whom the leaders were Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, then hear-leading in Edinburgh, Horner and Brougham, decided to make a fresh attempt. Constable was taken into their councils, and the result was the Edinburgh Review, which has preserved down to our own time the reputation that it speedily acquired for independence, critical sanity, and fairness combined with hard hitting, both in literary and political questions. Though after Constable's failure its habitation was ultimately transferred to London, its early years were spent in Edinburgh, and it was there, under the editorship of Jeffrey and Napier, that its fame was acquired. Its influence upon our critical journals can hardly be overrated.

Another service which Constable performed for our literature was more truly his own conception than any that has been mentioned. This was his Miscellany, conceived when his failure was at hand and carried out with remarkable courage in his last days. Almost contemporary with the very similar enterprise of Charles Knight in London, it first showed the possibility of bringing out new and important books at a price far lower than had then been dreamed of as possible. "I have now settled my outline of operations," said Constable in 1825; "a three-shilling or half-crown volume every month, which must and shall sell not by thousands or tens of thousands, but by hundreds of thousands—ay, by millions! Twelve volumes in the year, a halfpenny of profit upon every copy of which will make me richer than the possession of all the copyrights of all the quartos that ever were, or will be, hot-pressed!—twelve volumes, so good that millions must wish to have them, and so cheap that every butcher's callant may have them, if he pleases to let me tax him sixpence a week!" In these terms did Constable enunciate the first conception of the great revolution in the book trade, which has been so powerful an adjunct to the crusade in favour of universal education, and in whose achievement two young fellow-townsmen of his were to out-do even his dreams.

Perhaps there has never been a publisher to whom the world owes more than to Constable for his great schemes, the Edinburgh Review and the Miscellany—the birth of high-class periodical criticism and the cheapening of literature. In the one case his beginning was carried on by Blackwood, in the other by the Chambers Brothers. William Blackwood, who also began life as a second-hand bookseller, thought in 1817 that his growing prosperity would be enhanced if he could bring out a political and literary rival to the Edinburgh Review. At that time, though Scotland was strongly Tory, the "Whig dogs" had things pretty much their own way in the Press. There was no organ in the country which had any pretension to contend on equal terms with the "notable horn" which was wielded for Constable by the Duke of Craigcrook. As far as actual effect on politics went, this was not of great importance. The Tories had a solid hold on power, and so long as they could manage the jobs and keep the places, they could endure the free and incisive criticism of the envious Whigs. But in regard to literature, the case was quite different. For one thing, the blue-and-yellow corps had control of the book market; more than half the country book clubs bought what they recommended, and refused what they condemned with the vigour demanded by their motto. For another thing, the more intelligent among the Scottish Tories did not like to see their books and the books of their friends systematically decried by these holders of false principles; at any rate, they thought that that was a game that two parties ought to play at. The foundation of the Quarterly Review had already arisen out of such considerations; but that was far away in the South; it was still desirable to meet the "crafty" enemy on his own ground.

There were a knot of young Tories, cleverer even (and less scrupulous) than the original founders of the Edinburgh Review, among whom two briefless advocates then parading the Scottish "Salle des Pas Perdus"—the Parliament Hall of Edinburgh—happened to possess an incisive wit and an overflowing fancy which could find but an imperfect outlet in the poems of the one and the caricatures which the other drew when he should have been taking notes of cases of multiplepointing and vicious intromission. One of them was the Squire of Elloray, the other the future biographer of Scott. To them was joined the Edinburgh bookseller William Blackwood, a man of resolute and enterprising mind, who was desirous of "commencing publisher," and to that end wished to possess a critical organ which should carry his fame abroad, help him to "choose his authors" and to advertise and defend their books; such was the object of a critical review in those unenlightened days. His Edinburgh Monthly Magazine, however, was first started under unpromising auspices. The original editors, one of whom was the future South African poet, Thomas Pringle, were unfit for their position, and deserted "old Elony" for his rival Constable. Then a happy chance brought Wilson and Lockhart into touch with Blackwood. Under their hands the almost moribund magazine tricked its beams and flamed out as the famous "Maga." which lately celebrated the appearance of its thousandth number. All the qualities, good and bad, that earned its reputation were present in this first—nominally seventh—issue. There was the assault on Coleridge, who was described as "an obscure creature," a "quack," and a compound of "egotism and malignity." There was the first of the famous articles on the Cockney School of poetry, in which Leigh Hunt was chosen as the corpus vile of the demonstration that, if Jeffrey could whip Tory poets with rods, Wilson and Lockhart had scorpions for the Radicals. The crescendo of wit and venom culminated in the famous "Chaldee Manuscript," that satire on Constable and his crew which made such a coil in Edinburgh that it had to be suppressed in the second edition, and Blackwood—then as meek as he soon became haughty—had to deprecate libel actions by a humble appeal to the public not to regard its publication as "an offence worthy of being visited with a punishment that would involve in it his ruin as a Bookseller and Publisher." From that time "Maga." was firmly established, though for many years it was, with all its frequent wit, a rather extravagantly offensive production. Fortunately the calculated literary brutality and blustering of those days are for ever out of date, and we can all agree that the house of Blackwood has done much for our literature, as the three volumes in which its history has lately been written, with their account of writers like Michael Scott and George Eliot, Kinglake and Hill Burton, help to show.

The third great step in the history of Edinburgh publishers and periodicals was taken in 1832, when Chambers's Edinburgh Journal was founded, about six weeks before the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge brought out its Penny Magazine. The two periodicals of which we have already spoken were only for the well-to-do, who could afford to pay six shillings a quarter or half-a-crown a month for their instruction. Chambers's Journal started on the popular basis of "bawbees," and it is generally considered to have been "the pioneer of that class of cheap and popular periodicals of a wholesome kind now so generally diffused." William Chambers, who founded the Journal, speedily united with his brother Robert, whose literary talent admirably supplemented the elder brother's business faculties.

to found the still well-known publishing firm of W. and R. Chambers. Its first aim, carried out in a humble fashion, was "to take advantage of the universal appetite for instruction" which existed at the time of the Reform Bill, and to supply it with food of the best kind. Hence sprang that series of excellent works known as "Chambers's Miscellany," "Information for the People," "Cyclopædia of English Literature," &c. To Robert Chambers we owe the "Book of Days," an improvement of a scheme that had been initiated by Hone, and one of the most entertaining and instructive compilations that exist.

Last, but not least, we must call attention to the well-known "Chambers's Encyclopædia," originally—in 1859—modelled on the German work of Brockhaus, and since recast into a form which renders it one of the best encyclopædias for all purposes of rapid reference. In this connexion we must remember that Edinburgh was also the home of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," which is to the student what "Chambers" is to the busy man or the newspaper reader. This great work was originated, "by a society of gentlemen in Scotland," in 1771. Its great advance on all previous works of the kind consisted in the arrangement—"on the one hand keeping important subjects together, and on the other facilitating reference by numerous separate articles." New editions were called for almost as fast as the editors could prepare them, and when Constable acquired the copyrights and entrusted the work of preparing a supplement to Macvey Napier, the book received by common consent that place as the leading English dictionary of universal knowledge which it has held down to our own time. After Constable's fall, the "Britannica," like the "Waverley Novels," passed into the hands of Messrs. A. and C. Black, who succeeded Robert Cadell. With the eighth, and especially the ninth, edition of that great work, which Messrs. Black brought out at great expense, the "Britannica" took its place at the head of all encyclopædias which aim first at aiding study and next at facilitating reference. Messrs. Black have distinguished themselves in other lines of publishing, and their standard edition of De Quincey, to name only one of their recent books, is in every well-equipped library.

Among the many later publishers who have flourished in Edinburgh none perhaps has achieved the position of the Blackwoods or the popularity of the Chamberses. But there are several that we cannot omit to name, though the limits of our space prevent us from doing much more. Mr. David Douglas—the survivor of the firm of Edmonstone and Douglas—is dear to all lovers of literature for the care that he has given to the editing of Scott's Journal and Letters from the original MSS. which Lockhart was unable to use in full or at all. He, too, gave us the works of Dr. John Brown, of which the little pamphlets containing "Marjorie Fleming" and "Rab" have gone into uncounted editions. His ornithological publications and his Scottish books—notably those edited by Dr. Hume Brown—are dear to collectors. Messrs. Nelson, again, have made a world-wide reputation of a very different kind with their school-books and prizes—a field in which the house of Chambers has also competed with success. A younger firm, Messrs. Oliver and Boyd, though they publish little but their almanac, and Mr. Andrew Elliot, the bookseller, one of whose guides we note elsewhere. Of many law publishers, such as the old house of Bell and Bradgate, those who are best known out of Edinburgh are Messrs. W. Green and Sons, whose great enterprise of a standard and uniform edition of all the English law reports has recently been begun. Their medical encyclopædia also out-did anything attempted by the regular medical publishers, with whom Edinburgh naturally swarms. The maps made in Edinburgh are as good as any outside Germany, and the firms of Bartholomew, W. and A. K. Johnston, and Gall and Inglis (the educational publishers) have a well-won reputation in this field. A complete list of Edinburgh publishers would, however, take far more space than we have room to give—one remembers such useful contributions to it as Mr. Thin's edition of John Knox, edited by Laing, and Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack's "Centenary Burns," as well as the new Scott that they have begun—and we can only apologize on the score of such limitation for omissions that every owner of a well-selected library may be able to note.

EDINBURGH TO-DAY: ITS UNIVERSITY AND LIBRARIES.

EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY.

[From "Picturesque Notes on Edinburgh" by permission of Messrs. Seeley.]

If Edinburgh is not cultured and literary it ought to be. Somebody once asked a native what was its staple industry. "Education," was the reply. Even the casual observer walking about the town can see that there was truth in the remark, for the great teaching institutions, some of them, such as Heriot's Hospital School, founded by wealthy citizens of a bygone time, rise up on every hand, an evidence of middle and upper class.

Edinburgh's practical independence of the School Board. Strange to say, its University was the last to be established of all the four Scottish Universities. The first professors of St. Andrews had begun their labours so early as 1410, to be cheered three years later by the arrival of the then essential pontifical charter. On the 7th of January, 1450, Pope Nicholas V. issued a bull for the erection of a studium generale, or University, in Glasgow, the place being commended, curiously enough as it would now seem, as specially suitable "by reason of the salubrity of its climate, the plenty of victuals, and of everything necessary for the use of man." Aberdeen got its University forty-four years after this, when James IV. applied for the papal bull on the ground that "the inhabitants are ignorant of letters, and almost uncivilized."

What the state of the Edinburgh people was at this time we have no precise means of ascertaining; but it is certainly curious that the capital of the country should be without a University until more than 170 years after St. Andrews enjoyed the distinction. No papal bull gave privileges and immunities to this now celebrated seat of learning, as had been the case with its predecessors. The reverence for the Pope had departed before the metropolitan University had a being. Immediately after the Reformation, however, as the historian of the Church of Scotland tells us, the Edinburgh magistrates resolved to apply some of the ecclesiastical spoil which had come into their hands towards the erection of a college, and the Kirk of St. Mary-in-the-Fields was bought from its last Provost for a site. In 1580 the building was begun; two years afterwards a charter of erection was obtained from James VI. ratifying previous grants of his mother; and in 1583 students were enrolled to be taught humanity by David Rollock, at first the only professor of whom the college could boast. When other professors were added Rollock was raised to the Principalship. The academy thus humbly begun flourished mightily. Regents were appointed, public disputations were held, students were laureated; and when King James came from England to revisit his native country in 1617 he was so proud of the school which he had helped to rear that he expressed a desire to have it called by his name. Since that time hundreds of men who afterwards rose to fame and honour have passed through its gates, and to-day it is as useful and distinguished among institutions of its kind as ever it was. Carlyle, in the person of Teufelsdröckh, declared that he had attended "the worst of all discovered Universities," where "the hungry young looked up to their spiritual nurses and for food were bidden eat the east wind." But what University would have satisfied that stormy spirit? Would Oxford, would Cambridge have served him any better than Edinburgh did?

Next in importance to its University and its numerous teaching institutions one must place the libraries of Edinburgh. In this case there is no difficulty about which should come first. The late Mr. William Chambers, the publisher, declared that if the Advocates' Library were by any chance to be shut up to public investigation, his firm would probably have to remove to London, and "an expenditure of about £20,000 per annum amongst a miscellaneous body of persons will be abstracted from Edinburgh." Things have changed considerably since that computation was made; but for the great body of serious workers in Scotland the Advocates' Library remains what it has always been—the one great source of literary investigation and research in the country. This, indeed, it could hardly fail to be, since from 1700 onwards it has enjoyed the privilege of claiming a copy of every book issued by the British publisher. When that privilege was granted the Advocates' Library shared it with the University libraries of Edinburgh, Glasgow, St. Andrews, and Aberdeen, but each of these institutions in 1837 commuted the right in consideration of the payment of an annual sum, with the result that the Advocates' Library rapidly shot ahead of all others in Scotland. Now it is the third largest library in the kingdom, the British Museum and the Bodleian alone ranking before it. More than 350,000 volumes rest on its shelves, and the annual additions have become so numerous that an extra "wing" has been added to the buildings for the accommodation of the ever-increasing stores.

The history of the library has been very interesting. Readers of Macaulay may remember the unfavourable portrait which he draws of Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh—the terror of the Covenanters, the man "whose eloquence and learning, long prostituted to the service of tyranny, had made him more odious to the Presbyterians than any other man of the gown." Whether this portrait be true or not is of no consequence here. The point is that it was Mackenzie who, as head of the Scottish Bar, took the initiative, more than two centuries ago, in founding what now forms "the grandest national monument that could be erected in Scotland." The collection began very modestly, but by the end of its first decade—in 1692—it had run up to a total of 3,140 volumes. From the first the library has been hampered by a lack of funds; and, indeed, at one time a portion of the building had to be sold to enable it to be kept open. Though it is not actually necessary to expend money on the purchase of books, there are all the costs of the upkeep of the institution—the salaries of the library staff, &c.—to be met, and when one remembers that these are defrayed by the advocates themselves, a body of some 500 members, the advantages secured by the library must be considered all the greater. Now and again, as the funds have permitted, valuable purchases have been made for the library. Thus, on Lockhart's recommendation, the great collection of the Marquis of Astorza, rich in early editions of Cervantes and the classics of Spain, was bought in 1824 for £4,000. Some notable men have occupied the post of librarian, including Thomas Ruddiman, David Hume, Adam Ferguson, and David Irving. The present librarian is Mr. J. T. Clark, while the sub-librarian is Mr. George Stronach, M.A., who has done some excellent literary work, especially in connexion with the "Dictionary of National Biography."

After the Advocates' comes the Signet Library. Dr. Dibdin, the enthusiastic bibliographer, was in Edinburgh in 1837, when, of course, he visited both libraries. He went to the Advocates' Library first, the underground solitudes of which he described as labyrinths of Cimmerian darkness, through which he could guide his steps only with the greatest difficulty. "We put on our hats," says he, "and it is scarcely more than a hundred paces to the neighbouring paradise of books called the Signet Library. It is like the 'purple light' of Virgil's Elysian fields after the combined darkness and narrow limits from which we have emerged. The site as well as the approaches to the library are everything we can wish them to be. Spacious, ornamental, commodious, and replenished thickly with goodly and gorgeous tomes, the whole has an absolutely palatial air. Grandees with fur cloaks should be the inmates." The institution thus grandiloquently described is not yet 170 years old, yet it contains at the present time 100,000 volumes, and is growing at the rate of a thousand volumes annually.

It was founded in 1722 mainly as a means of acquiring and preserving the Scots' law books in print and in course of publication. At this time there were no regular funds set apart for the library, and even now it possesses no endowment. It has been raised from first to last, without any extraneous aid, by the annual income of the Society of Writers to the Signet, the fees of intrants and the contributions of members; and it may be safely said that no other professional community—whether legal, medical, or ecclesiastical—no scientific academy or society in the whole of the United Kingdom can point to a collection of equal dimensions formed by similar means. For many years the object was simply to get together a collection of law books, but the strides being made by the Advocates' Library stimulated the society to begin in 1778 the formation of a general library. Even then the progress was apparently slow, for it is said that light literature was for a long time represented solely by "Tristram Shandy" and "The Sentimental Journey." At this time there was no proper library room, and no official librarian. Scott's father took an active part in urging the acquisition of a set of rooms, and as a result of his and other members' efforts the present handsome building was begun in November, 1812, to be finished in March, 1815. Like the Advocates' Library, the institution has had several notable librarians, including Mr. Macvey Napier, the editor of the Edinburgh Review, and Dr. David Laing, the prince of Scottish antiquaries, whose father kept a bookseller's shop in the neighbouring High-street. The present librarian is Mr. T. G. Law, who follows worthily in the footsteps of his predecessors, and has done a great deal of valuable work in the department of ancient Scottish history. He is ably assisted by Mr. Alexander Mill, whose courtesy and helpful attentions are greatly appreciated by all who come in contact with him. In theory the Advocates' and the Signet Libraries are private property, but in practice every facility is offered by both to the genuine literary worker. The officials object only, as Mr. Stronach, of the Advocates' Library, puts it, to dilettanti inquirers "stepping down for refuge from the rain to pass an idle hour, and asking the assistants for books with imaginary titles by imaginary authors." Some day, however, the Advocates' Library at least will doubtless be nationalized so as to put it on a par with the British Museum.

So recently as 1881 a proposal to adopt the Public Libraries Act in Edinburgh was rejected by a majority of over 8,000 votes. It was only when Mr. Carnegie came forward with the handsome sum of £50,000 to defray the cost of the building that the citizens became alive to the advantages of the Act. The foundation-stone of the Library, which occupies a prominent position in George IV. Bridge quite close to the Advocates' and Signet Libraries, was laid in July, 1887, and the opening ceremony was performed by Lord Rosebery in 1890, a few months after the opening of the Forth-bridge. Edinburgh required a Public Library less than any other town of its size, for libraries in abundance existed there already. Nevertheless, the new supply of books being provided, the demand soon became very great, until now there is a total issue of between seven and eight thousand volumes a month. The lending department contains about 55,000 volumes, and the reference department is not far behind with 51,000. The news room is, of course, largely frequented, but the loafing element is here somewhat more predominant than the genuinely interested reader finds to be altogether convenient. In connexion with the circulating library there is an excellently equipped Juvenile Room, containing over 6,000 volumes suitable for the young. "We take a kind of oversight of the young," says Mr. Hew Morrison, the librarian, "by holding out to them the inducement that those who are able to show that they have made good use of the books in their own department will, by way of reward, be allowed to avail themselves of the privileges of the adult library. This brings them into contact with myself and the sub-librarian, and it is interesting to see how widely read some of the young people are." A special feature of the institution is the series of lectures which are given every winter to workingmen. Lectures, to take a few examples, have been delivered on Sanitation, by Dr. Rowand Anderson; on Printing, by Mr. Walter Blaikie; on Bookbinding, by Mr. Archibald Orrock; on Book Illustration, by Mr. W. J. Hay; and so on. These lectures are always remarkably well attended, and are generally allowed to have been productive of much good. Branch libraries in connexion with the parent institution have recently been established with great success; but in the development of these the committee is, of course, considerably hindered by want of funds. That committee has from the first included several well-known names. Professor Masson, for instance, has been a leading member, while the late Sir Thomas Clark, of the publishing firm of T. and T. Clark, was Chairman from the establishment of the Library until just before his death in December last. At present a scheme is under consideration for the extension of the Library building, that being rendered necessary to provide room for the additions which are constantly being made to the catalogue.

A word or two must be said about the University Library, whose foundation was somewhat anterior to that of the University itself. It was at first a "town's library," which had been placed in 1580 under the care of James Lawson, the minister of St. Giles' Church. Lawson having died in 1584 the Town Council ordained that "the Town's Library, shelves and boards thereof, be transported forth of the lodging some time occupied by Mr. James Lawson, and set up in the Town's College." By-and-by it became the custom for graduates to pay tribute to this "town's library," either in the shape of books or money; and, on the other hand, it was augmented from time to time by gifts and legacies of books from the citizens and neighbours of Edinburgh. William Drummond, the poet and scholar of Hawthornden, gave away nearly all his books, amounting to some 500 volumes, in 1626. It grew as other libraries grow; a special building was in time provided for it, and regular librarians were appointed, though not until 1854, before which date one of the professors had always filled the appointment. For a hundred years it was the sole public library in Edinburgh, and readers in general were allowed to make use of it under more or less stringent conditions. The essential purpose of its existence to-day is, however, the convenience of the University student, though its stores are not altogether closed to outsiders who can show that they are honestly engaged in literary research. The Library numbers close upon 150,000 volumes, which include the famous collection of Shakespeareana presented by Dr. J. O. Halliwell-Phillips, the Laing collection of MSS., bearing on Scottish history, and the rich collection of works on Political Economy gathered together by the late Professor Hodgson. It has also its curiosities, the most famous of which is perhaps the original parchment of the Bohemian Protest (1415) against the procedure of the Council of Constance in burning John Huss, with one hundred seals of the Bohemian nobles attached to it.

When we add to these four great collections of books the libraries of the Free Church College (40,000 volumes), of the United Presbyterian College (21,000), of the Royal Society (15,000), of the Royal Medical Society (20,000), and of the Philosophical Institution (30,000), it will be seen that Edinburgh is not badly equipped for literary labour. From the publisher's point of view the sole drawback is the distance from London in forwarding goods; for after all the absorbing power of England is immensely greater than Scotland, as every Scotsman has learned since the ill-fated Darien Expedition.

In connexion with the memorial to Burns' "Chloris" unveiled the other day, which was noticed in Literature last week, it may be remembered that another of the heroines of the poet's muse rests in an Edinburgh churchyard. Mrs. Maclehose, the "Clarinda" of numerous songs and letters, lies in the Canon-gate Churchyard—where is also the tomb (pictured on another page) of Robert Ferguson, to whose poetry Burns acknowledged himself indebted, and to whose memory he erected a monument. It was "Clarinda" who inspired the passionate outburst which Sir Walter Scott declared to contain the essence of a thousand love tales, and which captivated the fancy of Byron:—

Had we never loved so kindly,
Had we never loved so blindly,
Never met, and never parted,
We had ne'er been broken-hearted.

"Clarinda" has her memorial too— or rather had, for it has been allowed to fall into disrepair, and the tablet has disappeared. She was interred in the family burial-place of Lord Craig, who was a kinsman, and it appears that there is some difficulty in discovering the representatives of that Judge—he was a Lord of Session—and the consent of these representatives (if there are any) is required before anything can be done in the way of renovations and repairs. It is understood that this difficulty is likely to be got over soon now, and that "Clarinda's" grave like that of "Chloris" will be marked. It is not very generally known that William Nicol and Allan Masterton, who, with Burns himself, formed the trio of the Bacchanalian song

Oh, Willie brew'd a peck o' maut
And Rob and Allan cam to pree both lie in Edinburgh churchyards—the one in the Calton Burying-ground and the other in the Canon-gate Churchyard. The Earl of Glencairn, a patron and friend of the poet—he who inspired the fine "Lament"—lies in St. Cuthbert's Churchyard, and several others with whom Burns was connected have their graves in the Scottish capital.

THE DRAMA.

"WOMEN ARE SO SERIOUS"—"A LADY FROM TEXAS."

On two successive evenings a week ago two plays were produced with precisely the same plot. This will seem odd only to those who do not know that there are certain themes in fiction which can be worked out in but one way. Given a comedy turning upon the flirtation of a married lady, and the plot—so far as the English theatre is concerned—may be said to write itself. In this statement the two words "comedy" and "English" are all-important. The point is that, before an English audience, comedy must make for morality; no cynical conclusion will be tolerated. Hence the married couple must in the end be reconciled and the lover be shown the door. It follows that the relation of lady and lover must be devoid of sincere passion, and the lover, if not the lady, must be a light-weight. It follows also that the estrangement of husband and wife must not be the result of fundamental differences of character, but of some merely temporary inadvertence on the husband's part to which a sharp lesson will put an end. The lady, then, must be romantic and athirst for affection, the husband must be prosaic and forgetful of his wife in the ardent pursuit of his own masculine business or amusements. And the lady's eyes must be opened by the discovery that her lover is only a lover and by no means a possible second husband. How is this discovery to be effected? By making the lady seriously propose to attain her freedom by divorce. The lover, terrified at the project, withdraws, and the disgusted lady returns to a husband who promises to be more attentive in future. Years ago this formula was established in La Petite Marquise of MM. Meilhac and Halévy. The husband was a dry-as-dust archaeologist, neglecting his young wife to compile a history of the Troubadours. The wife had her head turned by reading romantic novels. The lover declined to elope with her because he had no idea of resigning the liberty of bachelorhood. Then there was The Canary, in which Mrs. Patrick Campbell also played a wife with romantic ideas derived from "Hill Top" novels. The husband was a healthy animal with no thought save for lawn-tennis. The lover declined to elope, because he had just been at the expense of putting a new bath into his flat. So in Mr. Brandon Thomas' Women are so Serious (adapted from M. Pierre Wolff's Celles qu'on respecte) the wife pines for theatres and music-halls and the joie de vivre. The husband is a healthy animal with no thought save for bicycling. The lover has no intention of marrying a divorced woman any more than Don Juan intended to marry one of his "thousand and three." So, finally, in Mrs. T. P. O'Connor's A Lady from Texas the wife yearns for sentiment and demonstrative affection. The husband is a busy politician (see also the husband in Wheels within Wheels now at the Criterion) who cannot find time to gratify his wife's yearnings. And, again, the lover declines to marry a divorced woman, who longs to accompany him to the ends of the earth, since he knows that financially "it would only run to" Hastings or Eastbourne.

But, as regards the last two plays, though their plots are the same, their treatment is very different, and an evening spent at the theatre in Sloane-square in no wise resembles an evening spent at the theatre in Great Queen-street. Mr. Brandon Thomas' play is a true comedy. Its characters belong to the world of reality. The wife (Miss Ellis Jeffreys) and the lover (Mr. Frederick Kerr) are people we recognize at a glance—with just an added touch of "irresponsibility" to give their adventures the comic note. Mrs. O'Connor's play, on the other hand, is a nondescript entertainment—comedy alternating with sentimental drama and both submerged in broad farce. When the husband (Mr. Cartwright) and wife (Miss Cynthia Brooke) are on the stage we are apparently expected to take the story quite seriously. But we must not take the lover (Mr. Leonard Boyne) seriously or the play ceases to be comedy at all. Then comes in the lady from Texas (Miss Kitty Cheatham), who takes possession of the stage, driving the play clear off it while she exhibits her outrageous Transatlantic drolleries. This is Mrs. O'Connor's first play, or at any rate her first play to be publicly performed in a regular fashion, and she has yet many things to learn—among others, the unity and proportion which are the dramatic equivalents for the painter's "atmosphere" and "values." It is at once evident, however, that she has a keen sense of humour, and that lively spirit which our forefathers called "gusto"—qualities which give reasonable expectation of good work by-and-by, when their possessor has learnt that a play must be not an omnium gatherum of details but a harmonious whole. It is to be hoped, by the way, that she will learn to discard the conventional language of the stage. In A Lady from Texas there are such utterances as "Our futures lie apart" and "Yes, a thousand times Yes." I am quite sure that she has never heard any human being use such expressions in real life.

A. B. WALKLEY.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

[In consequence of the space occupied by our special articles on Edinburgh, we are compelled to hold over the consideration of many recent books.]

MR. BROADHURST.

Times change and things seem different when you get used to them. We can remember leading articles in important papers treating the return of Mr. Broadhurst to the Parliament as a menace to the stability of the Constitution. After reading HENRY BROADHURST, M.P., which gives "the story of his life from a stonemason's bench to the Treasury Bench" (Hutchinson, 16s.), we are lost in amazement at our recollection. Never, it now seems to us, was the cause of labour represented, in Parliament or out of it, by a less dangerous man. Never has a labour member done more solid work, and engaged in less sensational agitation. If only Mr. Broadhurst had grown rich he would have ranked with the ideal men beloved and belauded by Dr. Samuel Smiles. He has been more usefully occupied than in growing rich; and now that, presumably, the best part of his life's work is done, he has written the record of it well and picturesquely and not in the least vaingloriously. He is the only member of Parliament who has worked at the masonry of the House of Commons as well as at the legislation within its walls; and the only member claiming to have been "at Christ Church" whose connexion with "the House" consisted solely in fixing the chimney pots. He has organized strikes and composed them. He has tramped the country in search of work with empty pockets, and he has been entertained at Sandringham. He tells us all about it modestly and cheerily.

Perhaps the fact that stands out most saliently in the book is that the career of a labour leader, and even of a labour member, is by no means an easy one, and is indeed only possible to a man of sturdy character and also iron constitution. Those that imagine that such gentlemen live in the lap of ease and luxury should read Mr. Broadhurst's description of the years when he was trade union delegate and stonemason both:—

Those were years of extraordinary exertion, making heavy demands upon one's physical strength. During the whole of this period I scarcely ever lost a single hour's work in the morning, though I seldom retired to bed before midnight, and was always up again at 4.30 a.m. Nearly all my work as a delegate was entirely gratuitous; occasionally, indeed, I received a shilling a day when engaged on behalf of my trades-union, but this sum never sufficed to remunerate me for my out-of-pocket expenses, such as cost of travelling and similar outlay. The scanty leisure which my employment left me was divided between the affairs of my trades-union and the Reform Movement.

Nor was Mr. Broadhurst very much better off when he had won his seat in Parliament. He had a salary of £150 a year.

out of which he had to pay for any clerical assistance that he required. It was a difficult situation, but it had to be met :—

I met it by maintaining the same habits at home and abroad as before my election, with the exception of such changes as were unavoidable when Parliament was sitting. In the matter of dress I followed the same line of conduct. For years past all my clothes had been made at home by my wife, and for several years of my Parliamentary life my wife remained my only tailor—a circumstance which I fancy is unique in the history of the English Parliament.

Later on, digressing to discuss the question of the payment of members, Mr. Broadhurst enlarges on the terrible petty cash calls of Parliamentary life :—

Cabs are out of the question, except in pressing emergencies, and to meet the exceptional outlay retrenchment in other directions must follow. You must eat and drink, and the most frugal meal will cost you twice the amount of a meal taken at home. You cannot tell a visitor, especially a constituent, that to give him a cup of tea will put an inconvenient strain on your resources. Your dress must be decent. Postage is one of the most constant and serious burdens to a poor man: the most moderate estimate on this head is sixteen-pence a day, and woe betide the luckless victim who has charge of a motion or a Bill which attracts even partial interest in the country! Equally to be deplored is your fate if a considerable body of your constituents take a deep interest in a Bill promoted by another member and express by letter their desire that you should support the measure. You may reply by postcard certainly, but a couple of hundred postcards cost a good deal of money.

Political students will find plenty to interest them in Mr. Broadhurst's account of the labour legislation which he has helped to bring about. For the general reader the interest lies rather in the anecdotal reminiscences and the picturesque self-revelations. The discomforts of the long tramp for work; the joy of clearing disturbers of the peace out of public meetings; the difficulty of attending a Leveé without a Court suit, and of dining with the Prince of Wales without dress clothes—all these things are set forth by Mr. Broadhurst with an engaging candour. And, with that touch of human nature which makes us all prouder of some subsidiary achievement than of our real life's work, Mr. Broadhurst never seems quite so pleased with himself as when he chronicles a bon mot of his at a Greenwich dinner with Lord James in the chair. It was at the time of the Liberal split over the Home Rule question, and the conversation flagged :—

Our resourceful host exerted all his marvellous powers of ingenuity to infuse life into the company, and presently addressed an inquiry to me across the table as to the state of health of my bull-terrier, asking whether I had lately brought him to the House of Commons. I replied that he had not recently visited that place with me, but I thought the time was coming when it would be necessary to bring him in order to clear out the rats. The tone, the occasion, and the manner prevented the remark from being considered offensive, and no one joined more heartily in the laughter which greeted my hint than Mr. Chamberlain and his friend Mr. Jesse Collings.

We recommend the book to those who desire entertainment as well as to those who are curious about the career of Mr. Broadhurst. It has an amusing introduction by Mr. Birrell, to which we have already referred.

To a request for a donation of £1,000 for the maintenance of a library, Mr. Carnegie's secretary has replied as follows :—

Mr. Carnegie in giving donations for a library confines himself to the supplying of funds for library building. He considers that when a town has a suitable building the community should see that the library is properly kept up. As you have a building and library running, your case is not within Mr. Carnegie's scope.

THE WAR.

The War with Pen and Paint-brush.

Though war books pour forth in an unceasing stream, the jaded reader can still welcome those of them that are unconventional, and written by an observer with a seeing eye and a detached and critical temper. Mr. Mortimer Menpes' WAR IMPRESSIONS—a record in colour, transcribed by Dorothy Menpes (Black, 20s. n.)—has all these qualities. The main attraction of his book consists, no doubt, in its ninety-nine coloured illustrations—portraits which are speaking likenesses, and views which render alike the gloom and the grandeur of the veld with the fidelity and skill that every one familiar with Mr. Menpes' work would expect. No praise seems to us too high for this "colour record of the war," or for the care and art with which the pictures have been reproduced. But the book is by no means to be regarded merely as a picture-book. On the contrary, it would do more than hold its own in the literature of the war if all the pictures had been left out.

It is not, of course, a narrative of the campaign or of any portion of the campaign. Mr. Mortimer Menpes is an impressionist, not an amateur of tactics and strategy. His interest is in the men, not in the manoeuvres. He writes chattily and unpretentiously, and with a gift of humour that never degenerates into mere jocularity. What one gets from him is illuminating anecdote and delightful thumbnail sketches, mainly of the great protagonists of the drama, but also of the choruses, both male and female. Seeking to quote, one is embarrassed by the richness of the choice of quotable passages. One has many sympathetic glimpses, for instance, of Lord Milner, who gave several sittings and talked freely of the plague of women, of the threatened incursion of personally conducted tourists, and of other matters :—

How he worked! Interviewing people all day long, writing despatches—secretaries and A. D. C.'s coming in and out in two continual streams with messages and bundles of correspondence. No one in England has any idea how that man works—he is the hardest worked in all South Africa, for he works not only all day long but half the night as well.

And again, at the end of a sitting given by the unsatisfactory light of an incandescent burner :—

That night there was one of the most touching incidents that I have ever witnessed. All the evening, clerks and A. D. C.'s had been coming in and out in two continual streams with large bundles of correspondence for the Commissioner's superintendence, and the pile of letters by his side, all to be read that night, was reaching abnormal proportions. Sir Alfred's face was becoming drawn and pale with fatigue, when a wretched clerk came staggering in with a still larger batch, ready to dump it down on the pile, and I felt inclined to shed a tear as Sir Alfred wearily put out his hand and murmured, "Enough—enough!"

Lord Roberts, Mr. Rhodes, General Pole-Carew, Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Mr. Winston Churchill are only a few of the other figures that flit across the stage—drawn for us much as Stevens used to draw, though more casually and anecdotally. The great enthusiasm is for the Commander-in-Chief; and this paragraph of contrast is strikingly interesting :—

One had the chance on that day (at Osfontein) of comparing him with such men as Lord Kitchener. These two men were an interesting study as they stood side by side viewing the battle of Osfontein—two totally different characters working on totally different principles. One was human, sensitive, full of imagination; the other was hard, inscrutable. As an artist, naturally I thought Lord Roberts the greater. Everything about Lord Kitchener somehow suggested to me the man without imagination. You could picture him, as he stood there, viciously chewing the ends of unlighted cigarettes, preferring a frontal attack to the brilliantly conceived flanking movements practised by Lord Roberts. . . . Thus I mused to myself as I sat sketching on the kopje, oblivious of the battle and the "movements" going on round me, and thinking what tremendous value a man like Kitchener would have been to England fifty years ago. Then I looked at Lord Roberts. He seemed to me to be an ideal leader of men—humane, kind, full of imagination—I was quite sure that he was a lover of Art and Nature.

The book is full of things as good. It combines the gorgeous splendour of the gift book with the "readableness" that too many of the war books have lacked.

The Imperial Yeomanry.

TROOPER 8008 I.Y. (Arnold, 7s. 6d.), by the Hon. Sidney Peel, who went through the Prieska campaign with Lord Kitchener and was with Lord Methuen at Boshof and afterwards, is rather a picture of the humour and hardships of campaigning than a consecutive narrative of military operations. In the way of military criticism, indeed, there is little more than the significant sentence that, "As for the rank and file I can only say that the news of General Colville's recall was no surprise to us." Mr. Peel's statement of the qualifications of the Imperial Yeomanry will also interest those who have accepted Dr. Conan Doyle's views on the subject of National Defence:—

Not more than five or six of my company had ever shot at anything else than a target, or at uncertain ranges; most had never fired a rifle in their lives. But for some reason or other we were given no practice at all, and most of us never discharged the rifles we carried in the field, until we fired them at the enemy. We had two great advantages—the men as a whole were of fine physique, and they were enthusiastic and keenly eager to learn. We were fortunate enough to escape paying any serious penalty for our ignorance, and there is no teacher like experience. Yet unquestionably to place so untrained a force in a field was a dangerous experiment, and though it may be said to have been justified by results nothing but the most urgent necessity could justify its repetition.

The Imperial Yeomanry, however, were good at learning. When their education was completed they were paid this compliment by a member of the Colonial Division:—

I saw a good deal of your lot near Zeerust, and a very useful lot they are. We in the Colonial Division think we're pretty smart; we think we understand campaigning and that anybody would have to get up pretty early in the morning to get round us: but when we came in contact with your fellows, they stole our horses.

A bright book and well worth reading.

"THE CRISIS."

THE CRISIS (Macmillan, 6s.), we may say at once, is as well executed a novel as we have come across for many a long day. It deals with a subject handled by most American and many English novelists—the American Civil War—and it introduces, more familiarly than most writers have cared to, such historical characters as Grant and Sherman and the great President. All three portraits are life-like enough; Lincoln's in particular is drawn with great tenderness. But these, after all, are not the most important of Mr. Churchill's creations. The handful of St. Louis citizens that he sets before us—Colonel Carvel and his daughter, Judge Whipple, and the Colfaxes—step at once (as only the characters of a master in fiction can) into the ranks of our chosen friends. Mr. Churchill's popularity, both in England and America, is something to marvel at, but "The Crisis" shows that it is not undeserved. He has the gift of sympathy—the most valuable of all gifts in an author's equipment. There is a touch of Thackeray about him, and not only in the manner of writing, but in the essentials. His are novels to be read slowly—to be tasted—which is more than can be said of most novels in these days. With all this, there is something that keeps this book from the first rank. Where most of the dramatis personæ are drawn so well, the character of Mr. Eliphalet Hopper cannot but seem a little out of place. His figure is not in harmony with the rest; he is alternately farcical and melodramatic; and his attempts to secure Virginia's hand by threatening first her father's honour and then his life make rather a hackneyed device to arouse interest. But Mr. Churchill's work is in the true vein. He is probably the best writer of fiction now living on the other side of the Atlantic, and it is likely enough that his powers will improve with maturity. Certainly "The Crisis" deserves to rank as high as any story of the war. When we consider the number of novels founded upon those troublous times, this is no light praise.

BRIDGE-GUARD IN THE KARROO.

"and will supply details to guard the Blood River Bridge."

District Orders—Lines of Communication.

Sudden the desert changes—
The raw glare softens and clings,
Till the aching Oudtshoorn ranges
Stand up like the thrones of kings—
Ramparts of slaughter and peril—
Blazing, amazing—aglow
'Twixt the sky-line's belting beryl
And the wine-dark flats below.
Royal the pageant closes,
Lit by the last of the sun—
Opal and ash-of-roses,
Cinnamon, umber, and dun.
The twilight swallows the thicket,
The starlight reveals the ridge;
The whistle shrills to the picket—
We are changing guard on the bridge.
(Few, forgotten and lonely,
Where the empty metals shine—
No, not combatants—only
Details guarding the line.)
We slip through the broken panel
Of fence by the ganger's shed—
We drop to the waterless channel
And the lean track overhead;
We stumble on refuse of rations—
The beef and the biscuit tins—
We take our appointed stations,
And the endless night begins.
We hear the Hottentot herders
As the sheep click past to the fold—
And the click of the restless girders
As the steel contracts in the cold—
Voices of jackals calling
And, loud in the hush between,
A morsel of dry earth falling
From the flanks of the scarred ravine.
And the solemn firmament marches,
And the hosts of heaven rise
Framed through the iron arches—
Banded and barred by the ties,
Till we hear the far track humming,
And we see her headlight plain,
And we gather and wait her coming—
The wonderful north-bound train.
(Few, forgotten and lonely,
Where the white car-windows shine—
No, not combatants—only
Details guarding the line.)
Quick, ere the gift escape us,
Out of the darkness we reach
For a handful of week-old papers
And a mouthful of human speech!
And the monstrous heaven rejoices,
And the earth allows again
Meetings, greetings, and voices
Of women talking with men.
So we return to our places
As out on the bridge she rolls;
And the darkness covers our faces,
And the darkness re-enters our souls.

More than a little lonely
Where the lessening tail-lights shine,
No—not combatants—only
Details guarding the line !

FINE ART AT GLASGOW.

[FIRST NOTICE.]

The Fine Art Section of the Glasgow International Exhibition would alone justify even so purely utilitarian an enterprise. The new art gallery and museum building, which is to be the future home of the Art and Science collections of the Corporation of Glasgow, is entirely devoted to the purposes of the section ; and it is astounding. A new light is thrown upon the art of the Glasgow school, for here, in the foreign section, are the prototypes which have stirred the modern Glasgow painters, the Corots, the Monticellis, the Marises, the Mauves, the Rousseaus, the Milletts, and the Troyons. The presence of a collection of masterpieces of the French and Dutch Romanticists here is the more remarkable since they are lent by men of the commercial world such as W. A. Coats, David Tullis, Robert Ramsey, Edmund Pullar, J. J. Cowan, Alex. Rose, C. J. Galloway, Geo. McCulloch, and W. B. Robertson ; and they are lent to a committee who think it worthy of note that "the building, which is of stone," has concrete floors ! So also, this commercial city is careful to state, in the General Prospectus, the exact cost of the building—a trifle of £130,000 ! And yet ! The marvel is the maze of contradictions that it presents—this collection of masterpieces of the most emotional of modern painters in a mammoth city, where a rush of busy life goes on under a network of overhead wires. A sense of rectitude should fill the Scottish collectors with an abiding pride. As collectors of works of art they stand confessed as amongst the most far-seeing of men. They have, with very few exceptions, bought wisely and well ; they have let nothing hinder their apparent design to become possessed of works of art which do credit alike to their taste and their fine sense of a good investment. They have left the "Academy Pictures" of many years to find a resting-place elsewhere and they need never be disappointed of their bargain ; they have gone rather to the little and comparatively unknown Dutch Gallery in Brook-street than to the vast emporiums of the Haymarket and of Bond-street. The result is twofold—Glasgow is enabled to open an exhibition of works of art, lent by local collectors, which has seldom been excelled, and the owners need fear nothing at the fall of the auctioneer's hammer, should it ever fall.

And this brings us to a consideration of the dividing-line which is so apparent between Galleries XIX. and XX. and the rest of the exhibition, between the works lent from all over Great Britain and those contributed from Scottish collections. Not that the works catalogued under the headings of pictures in oils and water-colours by deceased and living British artists are either devoid of interest or entirely unworthy, but that they differ from the collection of pictures by foreign artists in the mass of their effectiveness. When we say that a portrait of Queen Victoria by Professor von Angeli, a "very pleasing domestic piece" painted smugly and smoothly, dominates the committee of selection in the British section, it may very easily be considered that sentiments of loyalty have quite overcome the critical faculty. Then again, subject has, it would seem, appealed with pressing persistency to the hanging committee, and there is a surfeit in this British section of pictures with such titles as "Auld Robin Gray," "The Last Sleep of Argyll" (with never a note of his awakening), "We twa hae pall'd in the Burn" (as if anybody really minded), "The Baggage Waggon entering Carlyle," "Grandmother's Gown," "We twa hae rin about the Braes," "Bairnies, Cuddle Doon," and a plethora of Lochs, Glens, Pools, Broomielaws, Kelvins, and Castles which have nothing better than a very old-fashioned pretence to artistic interest. It is a vast mistake this encouragement of local incident, and but a poor look-out for the heirs to the owners of the pictures. Not merely a commercial blunder and an example of unexpected artistic ineptitude—an unworthy display of the very primitive taste for the superficial thing easily understood. Still, and in spite of the local flavour, there is much left which is of the best, and there is hardly a wall that is devoid of interest, that has not something to tell the student of art, for the good or the bad of his understanding, and we will take the galleries as they come on a future occasion.

THE HUMANITARIAN LEAGUE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I hope Mr. Salt will accept my assurance that, if I have in any way misrepresented the principles of the Humanitarian League, it has been done inadvertently. I have so much sympathy with any organized attempt to procure humane treatment for animals that when the league was first brought to my notice I examined its proposed action with considerable care, in order, if possible, to contribute any help that might be in my power. But, in truth, I have found it impossible to obtain a clear view of what its principles are. Mr. Salt complains because I described its primary doctrine as binding "man to apply the same treatment to lower animals as to his fellow-men," and explains that the league only prescribes treatment "the same in kind, but not in degree."

How will that work out in application ? Immemorial custom sanctions the slaughter of certain animals for food ; civilization has brought about their confinement and special treatment, in order that each may produce an abnormal weight of meat ; but custom, law, and morals combine to prohibit me from dealing with my neighbour with a view to turning him into cutlets. Is this merely a question of degree ? Does not the treatment of man and beast differ radically in kind ? Leaving food supply out of the question, Mr. Salt and I agree that it would be a moral offence if either of us were to settle our difference by slaying the other. The same principle, he says, applies in kind, but not in degree, to our duty towards the lower animals. If that means anything it is that we may kill a little, but not more than the Humanitarian League thinks reasonable.

Your columns are not the proper place for discussing such questions, but perhaps I may put forward a familiar case for consideration.

Anglers are naturally anxious for the preservation of plenty of fish in our streams, and spend, collectively, immense sums for that purpose. Manufacturers are naturally anxious for a good profit on their industry and spend individually immense sums on the erection of dye-works, woollen mills, &c. The angler goes home happy from a hard day's work with a salmon or two, or a few brace of trout. The manufacturer turns his refuse into the river and destroys, not only thousands of salmon and trout, but every living creature in the waters. Which ought to stand worst with the Humanitarian League, the retail or the wholesale slayer ? Yet because, whenever I can, I go afishing, I have been repeatedly denounced in the league journal ; although, in the marked copies sent to me, I have never seen a word of protest against the pollution of rivers.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

HERBERT MAXWELL.

ENGLISH VERSIONS OF FOREIGN POEMS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Apropos of Mr. Harvey's translation of the Swedish poem published in this week's Literature, it seems to me a good plan for more translations of foreign poems to be published in English papers. In the earlier centuries much of what was written on the Continent was "Englished." Now there is more translation of English prose and poetry into foreign languages than of translation into English of the classics of the Continent. Good translations of Shakespeare and Tennyson are current in French and German, but how few, comparatively speaking, of the works of the French drama or of the German masters are read in English ! Surely an effort should be made to obtain the good of the writings of foreign poets and avoid their being confined to their own tongues and to students of the languages.

I remain, Sir, yours faithfully

THE PROPER AGE FOR A WIFE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Some months ago a few friends and myself discussed in my house what should be the proper ages of a man and a woman who wish to enjoy matrimony for a long time. Many propositions were made. One man suggested that the age of the woman should be half the man's plus five. Then many other propositions were made. Mine, suggesting half the man's age plus seven was adopted. I have never read the works of the late Frederick Locker-Lampson, and, let it be said to my shame, never heard his name in my life.

I hate these coups de Jarnac that some English people (very few, I must say) delight in dealing in the back of successful book writers—in the name of the well-known British sense of Fair Play, I suppose.

Your obedient servant,

June 3, 1901.

MAX O'RELL.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Your correspondent "Suum Cuique" is quite right. This is the passage from Mr. Frederick Locker's "Patchwork" (Smith, Elder, 1879) to which he refers :—

I have a well-considered opinion as to the proper ages for man and wife. A wife should be half the age of her husband with seven years added. Thus, if the gentleman is twenty, his wife should be seventeen. If he is thirty-six, she should be twenty-five; and so on. No lady of the ripe age of fifty-seven has a right to indulge in the luxury of a spouse who (even though he may not be a magnificent ruin) is less than a century.

Yours faithfully,

Dublin, June 3.

A CHILD'S EPITAPH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Literature for April 20, in the Article headed "The Voice of Old London," the following inscription of date about 1625 is quoted, from a tomb in the church, now long destroyed, of St. Mary in Bromley-by-Bow.

As nurses strue theire Babes in bed to lay
When they too ly-berally the wantons play.
Soe to preuente his farther growinge crimes,
Nature his nurse, gott him to bed betimes.

An inscription very closely resembling this is to be seen upon the Hutton Monument erected in 1629 in the parish church of Richmond, Yorkshire. It is in memory of a son Matthaëus and runs as follows :—

As careful Mothers do to sleeping lay
Their babes that would too long the wantons play
So to prevent my youth's approaching crimes
Nature my nurse had me to bed betimes.

The resemblances and differences are such as would easily occur in an attempt to quote from memory and it would be interesting to know whether these two epitaphs represent one which was common property, or whether there was any other reason to explain the coincidence.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

F. C. POYNTER.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The first publishing season of the century does not seem to have brought much encouragement to the bookselling trade in the shape of increased sales. The surprises of the season—the books that have sold exceptionally well—could be counted on the fingers of one hand, and many of the more important books announced a few months ago have again been shelved for the autumn. There is plenty of new fiction to go on with; one trade list for June includes nearly fifty novels—all issued within the last few weeks.

Messrs. Dent have a reissue of Boswell's Life of Johnson in preparation. Mr. Austin Dobson, who has helped in the choice of illustrations, will contribute a topographical introduction, and the work will be edited by Mr. Arnold Glover. Mr. Herbert Railton will contribute a series of nearly 100 topographical drawings based on existing localities and old prints, and there will also be portraits. A limited large paper edition will contain a series of 30 portraits reproduced in tinted photogravure.

Mr. Stephen Gwynn has completed a novel which Messrs. Macmillan will publish in England and America in the early autumn. Its title is "The Old Knowledge" and its chief character a modern mystic and visionary. The scene is laid in Donegal and a good deal of salmon fishing is accomplished in the course of the story.

Next Monday there will be given at the British Museum the first of a course of five lectures by Mr. J. Frederick Hodgetts on "The Life and Times of Alfred the Great." The subject of Monday's lecture is "Alfred and his England," and on the following Monday "Alfred as an Author" will be dealt with. Tickets for the course (price one guinea) are to be had of Messrs. Hatchards, Piccadilly.

Messrs. Constable will have Mr. Francis Gribble's "Lake Geneva and its Literary Landmarks" ready for publication about the middle of this month. The book is an anecdotal account of the literary celebrities associated with Geneva from Bonivard, who was an historian as well as the Prisoner of Chillon, to the poets of the Caveau Genevois. Some of the Reformers—notably Farel—appear in rather a new light; the accuracy of Rousseau's version of his relations with Madame de Warens is impugned; and much matter hitherto only accessible in the Proceedings of the Genevan Historical Society is popularized. A few extracts from the book have appeared, from time to time, as articles in our columns.

Messrs. Ward, Lock are winding up their spring season proper with a new detective story ("High Stakes") by the authoress who writes under the name of Lawrence L. Lynch. We understand that Messrs. Ward, Lock have sold two million copies of her books—"Shadowed by Three," "Moina," and her eighteen other volumes—in this country alone. Another detective story—"The Millionaire Mystery," by Fergus Hume—will shortly wind up the season for Messrs. Chatto and Windus. Messrs. Methuen's last book will probably be "Selections from William Blake," edited by M. Perugini, in their "Little Library."

Among the books to come from Messrs. Longmans this month (besides Mr. H. F. B. Lynch's work on Armenia, published this week) are "A Diary of the Siege of the Legations of Peking," by Mr. Nigel Oliphant, who was a volunteer with the defence force; Mr. Andrew Lang's "Magic and Early Religion"; and a cheaper and revised edition of Dr. Gardiner's "Oliver Cromwell," published in the Goupil illustrated series of historical volumes.

Among the other books expected this month—apart from those included in our weekly list—are "His Most Gracious Majesty King Edward VII.," by Mrs. Belloc Lowndes (Grant Richards); a history of West Somerset by Mr. Chadwyck-Healey, K.C. (Messrs. H. Sotheman); Gabriele d'Annunzio's play Gioconda translated by Mr. Arthur Symonds (Heinemann); and the first volume of Mr. Heinemann's series on "The Regions of the World, 1900," edited by Mr. H. J. Mackinder.

Messrs. Smith, Elder will close their season next week with a new novel by Mrs. de la Pasture, entitled "Catherine of Calais." One of Mr. Fisher Unwin's last books of the season will be a new edition of "The Gods, Some Mortals, and Lord Wickenham," uniform with "Another Englishwoman's Love Letters" and "The Letters of Her Mother to Elizabeth"; Mr. Unwin, too, is just issuing a sixpenny edition of Mrs. Craigie's "A Bundle of Life."

Messrs. Macmillan announce for next week a new volume of the "New History of the English Church," edited by Dean Stephens and the Rev. W. Hunt. This volume is by Dean Stephens, and covers the period from the Norman Conquest to the accession of Edward I. The work is to be completed in seven volumes. Messrs. Macmillan also announce "Selections from the Poems of S. Weir Mitchell, M.D., LL.D., Edinburgh," author of "Hugh Wynne," and a volume of Walter Pater's "Essays from the Guardian," bound uniform with the édition de luxe of Pater's works.

The next volume of the Cambridge Historical Essays, to be published shortly by the Cambridge University Press, is "The Fallen Stuarts," by F. W. Head, M.A., Fellow of Emmanuel—the essay which obtained the Prince Consort prize and the Seeley medal in 1900.

A new volume by Professor Skeat, entitled "Notes on English Etymology," is being published by the Oxford University Press. The book contains an autobiographical introduction, and may be described as a companion volume to "A Student's Pastime."

"The Letters of Lady Hesketh" to the Rev. John Johnson (Johnny of Norfolk) concerning William Cowper are to be published by Messrs. Jarrold, of Norwich. They are edited by Mrs. Catharine Bodham Johnson, who is a kinswoman of the Mrs. Bodham who sent Cowper his "mother's picture." Her husband is the grandson of Johnny of Norfolk. The volume will be illustrated by portraits.

"The Early Stars," by the American writer, Albert Kinross, the author of "An Opera and Lady Grasmere," will be published in England by J. W. Arrowsmith on June 14th.

Mr. Macquenn announces a novel entitled "The Golden Fleecce," a translation from the French of "La Toison d'Or" by Amédée Achard, the contemporary of Dumas. This story relates the adventures of a young Gascon officer in the army sent by Louis XIV. to assist the Austrians in repelling the Turkish Invasion under Ahmet Kinperli.

The next volume of Messrs. Putnam's "International Handbooks to the New Testament" will be "Epistles to the Hebrews, Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, the Pastoral Epistles, the Epistles of James, Peter, and Jude," by Dr. Orello Cone, who will include a sketch of the Canon of the New Testament. Messrs. Putnam also announce "The Passing and the Permanent in Religion," by Dr. Minot Savage, whose volume on "Life Beyond Death," published at the beginning of last year, is now in its third edition.

NOTES.—The tournaments at Glasgow began May 24. It is curious that local support was not very liberally given, some preferring to play away from home. Dr. McDonald and D. Y. Mills tied for first place in the chief tourney, with eight entries. The tie was played off and McDonald won creditably. C. A. Jonas did well in the minor tourney, 16 entries.—At Folkestone Messrs. Atkins and Blake divided honours in the chief tourney—Kent County Association.—A great match, North of England v. Scotland, at Glasgow, 25 a-side, was won by Scotland easily.—The Dutch players have a summer tourney at Haarlem, and the Scandinavians have arranged a special event at Gothenburg, August 4-16.—The Swiss Chess Association meet at St. Gallen to-day.—The extinction of the masters is proceeding apace, and these amateur meetings, if the players are not drawn into a semi-professional manner, will be of great interest and benefit.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The subject of the "LITERATURE" PORTRAIT next week will be

* MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL. *

Sir Walter Besant and Mr. Buchanan were the two authors whose views on the subject of the relation of author and publisher were, perhaps, best known. Mark Twain is another author who has ventured into the field of controversy and experiment. He tried commission publishing once. "When I took up the publication of a book," he said not long ago, in referring to his experiences in this direction, "I called in a publisher and said to him, 'I want you to publish this book along lines which I shall lay down. I am the employer, you are the employé. I am going to show them some new kinks in the publishing business. And I want you to draw on me for money as you go along'—which he did. He drew on me for 56,000 dollars. Then I asked him to take the book and call it off; but he refused to do that."

* * * *

Sir Walter Besant did not often pay for the production of his own books; and he delivered many homilies on the subject in the Author; but that was how the early novels of Besant and Rice were published. Robert Buchanan tried to do the whole thing himself, but did not get much satisfaction out of it. It is interesting to read the following open letter addressed by Buchanan to Sir Walter Besant (it was quoted in the Westminster Gazette on Tuesday), and to remember that the poet was still his own publisher when he wrote it:—

"I say to you now, out of the fullness of my experience, that had I a Son who thought of turning to Literature as a means of livelihood and whom I could not dower with independent means of keeping Barabbas and the markets at bay, I would elect, were the choice mine, to save that Son from future misery by striking him dead with my own hand! 'Whom the gods love die young,' I would say to myself; 'whom the gods and Barabbas preserve survive on for despondency, sadness, madness, and despair'; and my Son should surely die. For what I have seen I have seen, and what I have suffered I have suffered."

"The very stones of the street cry out and rebuke you, sir," he concludes his letter, "when you invite the young and unwary, and above all the honestly inspired, to enter the blood-stained gates of this Inferno."

England has no warmer friend among patriotic Frenchmen than Monsieur A. Beljame, a Professor of the University of Paris, who has been representing his University this week at the Glasgow University Jubilee functions. He has done much to introduce French readers to the masterpieces of English Literature by his translations of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" and of Shelley's "Alastor" and of more than one of Shakespeare's plays, while his "Le Public et les Hommes de Lettres en Angleterre au XVIIIe. Siècle" was "Couronné" by the French Academy.

* * * *

Another visitor is Count Goblet D'Alviella, the late Rector of Brussels University. The honorary degree of LL.D. which is being conferred upon him is the first British honour of the kind that has gone to Belgium. But Count D'Alviella's sympathy with advanced thought and inquiry in England links him even more strongly with us than the three letters, LL.D. In his recent work, "Ce que l'Inde doit à la Grèce; des Influences Classiques dans la Civilisation de l'Inde," he upholds the theory that no race is better qualified to reform the native than the Anglo-Saxon. In 1891 the Count delivered the Hibbert Lectures at Oxford, choosing "The Origin and Growth of the Conception of God" as his subject, and as correspondent of the Indépendance Belge he accompanied Edward VII., then Prince of Wales, on his Indian tour. He was for a long time director of the Revue de Belgique, and has been a Senator. He lives on his ancestral estate in Brabant, and in regard to his personality and congenial surroundings he has been compared to men like Samuel Rogers or George Grote.

* * * *

There are signs that the deluge of sixpenny novels is subsiding—or rather that the demand for them is falling off. But publishers, seemingly intent on working a good idea to death, are still pouring hundreds of thousands of fresh copies into the flooded market. It seems like being a repetition of the sixpenny boom and the subsequent slump of 1899. In the present case, however, there has been little attempt to experiment with new fiction in this form. Not that the ordinary sixpenny novel has seen its best days. It is too firmly established for that; but, like so many good things in the publishing world, it has been overdone. Booksellers, we hear, are fighting shy of many of the later reprints, and orders are beginning to decrease in consequence. Messrs. Simpkin's last list of sixpenny books included close upon three hundred different novels, and the total must be well into the fourth hundred by this time. No wonder some of them go to the wall—or back to the paper mill whence they came. If only publishers could agree to a short close season there would soon be a healthy cry for more.

* * * * *

A correspondent reminds us of yet another precedent for the Hall Caine case. It was a case in which the editor of an American magazine agreed to buy a story by an eminent humorist. The humorist wrote and duly delivered a story, but not a humorous story. The editor declined to publish on the ground that when a humorist undertook to provide stories there was an implied contract that they should be funny. Whether his view of the law was correct or not was never settled. The story—which was a very good story, though of a gloomy and depressing character—was placed elsewhere without difficulty, and the matter never came into Court.

* * * * *

We noticed the other day the enterprise shown by a Strand bookseller in using his shop window for the display of laudatory book notices. A bolder use of book advertisement is now being developed at Boston, U.S.A. The space occupied in street cars by an exposition of the merits of patent medicines or soaps is now devoted to books. While the patient traveller is hanging on to a strap, or bearing on his knee the weight of some portly person unable to find a seat, it is suggested that “in the pauses between the ejaculatory prayers prescribed for such occasions, the book advertisements will be a delicate solace.”

The Rev. George Everard, formerly vicar of St. Mark's, Wolverhampton, who died on Friday last, was a most prolific writer of the evangelical school. Messrs. Nisbet have nearly forty of his books in their catalogue, and others have been published by the Religious Tract Society. Besides his books, he, for many years, issued two annual addresses, which were printed and sold by tens of thousands. Twenty-five years ago Mr. Everard's books had enormous sales, but latterly the demand had fallen off, though they still sell fairly steadily. Among his last works were “Salvation and Service,” “Fight and Win: Talks with Lads about the Battle of Life,” “Before the Footstool: Family Prayers for One Month,” and “Merry and Wise.” It is estimated that considerably over half-a-million copies of his books have been sold by Messrs. Nisbet alone.

MEMORY'S BITTER-SWEET.

(Villanelle.)

In sunny June, when the daisies blow,
We met—and life took a fairer hue.
Dear daisies, why did you fade and go?

Backward the streams of memory flow,
Till earth holds only our love and you
In sunny June when the daisies blow.

O big moon-daisies, with hearts aglow
And petals which always augur true,
Dear daisies, why did you fade and go?

She picked one: “Loves he me? daisy, show!
“No, yes, no . . . Yes!”—Ah! we rapture knew
In sunny June when the daisies blow.

But death has laid the moon-daisies low
And left me only the mournful rue.
Dear daisies, why did you fade and go?

Now is there naught but the winter's woe
In heart and Nature, though skies be blue
In sunny June when the daisies blow.
—Dear daisies! Why did you fade and go?

MARGARET THEODORA GRIFFITH.

The King has resigned his trusteeship of the British Museum. His Majesty has held the office since 1881, and, as a member of the standing committee of the trustees, has taken an active personal share in the administration of the Museum.

The King has been pleased to approve the appointment of the Rev. Thomas Banks Strong, B.D., to be Dean of Christ Church.

The funeral of Sir Walter Besant took place on Wednesday at Hampstead.

The University of Glasgow celebrated this week the 450th anniversary of its foundation by William Turnbull, Bishop of Glasgow.

A new sixpenny weekly is announced to come from the Sphere office, called the Tatler. It is to be an illustrated journal of society and the stage, edited by Mr. Clement Shorter.

The New Vagabond Club on Wednesday evening entertained the Bishop of London, who made an excellent speech, remarking in the course of it that in the presence of so many authors he was obliged to confess that his own publications could be bought at 4½d. each at the S.P.C.K., or at 4d. if a quantity were taken. Mr. Rider Haggard gave a tribute to the memory of Sir Walter Besant, whose funeral he had just attended.

Count Tolstoy has completely recovered and has left Moscow for his country residence.

Sir Edwin Arnold was sixty-nine years of age last Monday.

A society for the study of the history of the drama has been formed in Paris, under the presidency of M. Sardou. The list of members includes M. Edouard Détaillé; M. d'Estournelles de Constant; M. Gustave Larroumet; M. Henri Lavedan, and M. Saint-Saëns.

There is a report that Madame Sarah Bernhardt and Miss Maud Adams will appear respectively as Romeo and Juliet in English.

A legacy of 30,000 marks bequeathed to the town of Erlangen, in Bavaria, to pay for a monument to Heine, has been rejected on the ground that Heine was not a sufficiently good German to deserve a statue. In accordance with the terms of the will, the money passes to the city of Budapest and the poet will have his statue there.

The Times announces the death of Dr. Andrew Garran, some time editor of the Sydney Morning Herald.

In yesterday's cricket match between London and Provincial Actors in aid of the Actors' Benevolent Fund and the Actors' Orphanage, Mr. Stephen Phillips and Mr. F. R. Benson figure upon the list of strikers for the Provinces.

Mrs. Archibald Little is coming back to England by the overland route through Siberia and Russia, and will probably lecture on her recent experiences in China.

The latest accounts of the health of Mr. W. J. Stillman are, we are glad to hear, more satisfactory.

News has been received of the death of the Rev. Dr. Byington, of Boston, Mass. Dr. Byington was well-known from his works relative to New England.

The University of Chicago is about to open preparatory schools in Europe, in order that the children of Americans travelling abroad may be able to receive an American education—whatever that may be.

The Modern Language Association is to hold a meeting in London on June 26, at which Sir Richard Jebb, M.P., is to take the chair.

The Women Writers' dinner will take place at the Criterion Restaurant on Monday, June 17.

Our appreciation of Sir Walter Besant's work as a man of letters will be found in another column. Here we wish to speak of the services which he rendered to literature by the creation of the Society of Authors, and of the scope of the work which, as he conceived, such a society could accomplish. At first that society was sadly misrepresented, and it is not impossible that misconceptions still prevail as to its aims. But its objects really are, and always have been, very simple; and the ideas which inspire its energies can be, and indeed often have been, expressed in two or three simple propositions. These are:—

1. Literature has as good a claim to rank among the learned professions as Law, Physic, and Divinity.

2. There is a popular contempt for men of letters based upon the belief that their calling is a beggarly one in which there is no money to be made.

3. Men of letters would make a vast deal more money than they do if they knew enough of the ins and outs of the publishing trade to be able to enter into business relations with the publishers upon equal terms.

4. In order that this knowledge may be collected and disseminated authors must combine.

Authors were so little accustomed to combining that it was no easy task to impress these simple ideas upon their minds. But Sir Walter Besant had a genius for this kind of task, and he hammered on till the ideas were driven home. Authors gradually realized two things; first that the society they were invited to join was not a Mutual Admiration Society, but a Society for the Defence of Literary Property; secondly, that there was no more objection to such a society than to a Landlords' Protection Association or a Liberty and Property Defence League. One after another they came in with their guineas, enabling the society to get to work; and the society naturally found plenty of work to do. Authors had shown a confiding innocence in their commercial transactions, and it is hardly too much to say that any man with a little capital had only to call himself a publisher in order to make very questionable profits, without being brought to book. The society changed this condition of things. Such profits could no longer be made with impunity. But, of course, the society has done more than expose indefensible practices. Without in any way presuming to interfere with freedom of contract between author and publisher, it has effectually prevented any ignorance as to the meaning of contracts, and the possible consequences of acceding to their terms. It has shown, for instance, what it costs to produce any given kind of book, and what can or cannot be claimed as the custom of the trade; and on various points on which the law seemed doubtful it has taken and published the opinion of counsel. And this, of course, to the benefit not only of authors, but also of those publishers who wanted to act fairly. For, of course, the many who wished to act fairly had nothing to lose and everything to gain from the removal of the competition of the men who wished to act unfairly. Some of them, like Mr. Andrew Tuer, joined the society. Others, like Messrs. Longmans, showed their general approval of its purposes by voluntarily admitting certain of its claims—the right, for instance, of an author who had not sold his copyright to inspection of his publishers' books. Unquestionably Sir Walter Besant did a great work in founding a society which has become so powerful an instrument for good. It is still more to his credit that he established it on such a basis that it ceased to be dependent on him. He retired from the position of chairman of the committee of management some years ago. He has had worthy successors in Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir William Conway, Mr. Rider Haggard, and Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins. He did not want to be necessary to the society, and he was not. The work will go on, as he would have wished it to.

Literature Portraits.—VI.

EDMUND GOSSE.

In the British Museum catalogue the entries under the name of Mr. Edmund William Gosse occupy close on eight full columns. This, it will be admitted, is a fair allowance for a man who has indeed written poetically about the symptoms of advancing age, but who cannot by any means take rank with the greybeards; and if Mr. Gosse were really responsible for even a quarter of the volumes catalogued the overcrowded institution might have good cause to grumble. But, of course, in nine-tenths of the cases he figures merely as a kind of sponsor; as a critic discharging his most grateful function. For the business of criticism is really positive not negative, and consists in telling people what to read and why to read it; and the most valuable critics are not the reviewers of current literature, but those who spend their energy in endeavouring to communicate to the general public something of their enthusiasm for the best of what has been done in the past. Few men have written so many introductions as Mr. Gosse, and the list of authors who have been presented to the world in a new dress with his prefatory commendations seems at first sight extremely miscellaneous. But on closer inspection lines of affinity disclose themselves. Mr. Gosse is revealed, in the first place, as a student of English poetry; in the second, as a writer on Scandinavian literature; in the third, as something of an authority on art.

About the last of these branches of the critic's accomplishment it is not necessary to say much; but an element of the connoisseur, the virtuoso, the dilettante enters into all Mr. Gosse's writings. He is acutely sensitive to perfection of form, and to perfection in the lesser kinds as well as the greater. Somewhat in contrast with this aspect of his critical faculty is the predilection for the rugged genius of northern Europe, which set him writing of early Scandinavian customs, and enrolled him among the pioneers in the cult of Ibsen. At present whoever professes an enthusiasm for the author of Brand is preaching to a converted audience, so far as the intelligent public is concerned (I except, of course, the considerable section of intelligent students of literature who condemn Ibsen without taking the trouble to read him). But Mr. Gosse preached in a day when converts were none too numerous; he attacked with courage the rampart of serried prejudices which resists any innovation in the field of dramatic art; and his work on this enterprise must always be accounted yeoman service in the cause of general literature. But his main achievement lies in the criticism of English literature; by that the world in general knows him, and, with the exception of Mr. Lang and Professor Dowden, there is probably no living critic whom the English-speaking world knows so well.

English literature is a large field, and no man can be fully familiar with every corner; it has been urged that in the matter of minute facts and dates Mr. Gosse shows no meticulous accuracy. The question is not very interesting nor is it very important. Beyond question, however, Mr. Gosse has given in his "History of English Literature" just about as good a summary sketch of the whole subject, following the natural lines of development, as would be possible. The book shows a fine sense of proportion, a catholic sympathy, and an indefatigable power of retaining interest. The same qualities appear in his history of a restricted portion—the eighteenth century—but perhaps less conspicuously. Good as the book is, one could readily imagine a better, and for a good reason—Mr. Gosse is primarily a critic of poetry. On poetry he speaks with authority, and the eighteenth century was an age of prose.

I restrict my qualification a little further. Mr. Gosse would be a good critic of any poetry, but every man criticizes best what he enjoys most, and I doubt whether the austere muse—the muse of Milton and Wordsworth—would not leave him a little cold. For Shelley the exquisite lyrist he would have the enthusiasm inevitable to all who care for lyric poetry; but for Shelley the theorist and the thinker only a limited sympathy. And it is probably by a natural selection that his more specialized essays in criticism have avoided the greatest names. For Mr. Humphry Ward's anthology of the English poets, which contains the best collection of critical estimates known to me, no one man did more good work than Mr. Gosse, but he was throughout the exponent of the lesser muses. The group of University wits who were Shakespeare's forerunners—Greene, Lodge, and Peele—the group of cavalier lyrists who were "sealed of the tribe of Ben"—Herrick, Carew, Lovelace, and Suckling—the songwriters of the Restoration—all these were committed to him and with good reason (Lovelace alone has reason and good reason to complain of his commentator). In the eighteenth century and the nineteenth he figured more or less as the protector of the oubliés et dédaignés; of lights very far inferior to Herrick. It is only right to remember that Mr. Ward's book appeared in 1880 when Mr. Gosse's reputation was only crescent. But since then the three men to whom he has devoted most study have been Beddoes in the last century, Gray in the eighteenth, while in the seventeenth his latest, and perhaps his most important work, was the Life of Dr. Donne. That is to say, that, as a critic, he has consistently preferred a subject which he could hope to exhaust or make his own. It seemed to him better to be the one man who had written a considerable book on Donne than one of the crowd who have written considerable books on Shakespeare or on Milton. No doubt, like any one else, he finds "new points in Hamlet's soul undreamt of by the Germans"; but he prefers to follow the less trodden paths. This is no doubt why he has not the name of a weighty critic; he avoids by instinct the weightiest writers. But perhaps a simpler explanation is to be found in the fact that Mr. Gosse himself is never ponderous. Lightness and grace are the special qualities of what is most characteristic in his critical work—those shorter and less formal essays which fill up volumes with the record of his recreations—Gossip in a Library, Critical Kitcats, and such like.

And, of course, criticism is Mr. Gosse's business in life; but there is only one way to become a critic of any consequence and that is by practising the art you criticize. This is the truth that is distorted in Disraeli's famous aphorism. "Who are the critics?" "The critics," said Mr. Phœbus, "are those who have failed in literature and art." The saying was meant spitefully, but I think that critics ought to accept it in a cheerful spirit. Nobody, I suppose, would choose to be a critic if he could be a great artist; but in order to be a successful critic one ought, I think, to have grappled seriously with the business of some art. Of course, as we all know, in painting, for instance, the most authoritative pronouncements are delivered by gentlemen who have never painted; but when I see Mr. Maccoll exhibiting meekly his representation of two pansies in a glass of water, I think that his is the more excellent way. Mr. Gosse has got a long way beyond the pansies and the glass of water. If he were not better known for his criticism he would in any case be known to all lovers of poetry for his verses; and like most authors, and especially like most critics, he began with verse. The first of his volumes goes back to 1873, and it was "On Viol and Flute." One may even go so far as to say that Mr. Gosse helped to found a school. Along with Mr. Austin Dobson and Mr. Lang he introduced a revival of the old French forms, and a poetry of exquisite and dainty workmanship dealing not with passions but with moods and sentiments, aiming before all things at grace—a kind of fan-painting in verses. Naturally, these poets did not limit themselves to that; Mr. Gosse has shared the common fate and written a tragedy in verse, which no doubt, while writing it, he thought one day to see acted. How many cupboards enclose a similar skeleton? But the poetry by which these men are known, and will as I believe continue to be known, is the poetry of things graceful and elegant—brilliant trifling if I may use the phrase which Sidney thought it no dishonour to apply to work far more tragic when he wrote at the end of "Astrophel and Stella," Splendidis longum valedico nugis. Mr. Gosse has never said that farewell, nor is likely to say it; though in his latest book of poems he laments over the extinction of his own band, the "Joyous Poets," the lovers of exquisite form. And I confess to finding in his later work a more enduring charm than in the earlier; a finer manner, less of a mannerism. Throughout the pages of "On Viol and Flute" one is conscious of a young man's delight in life, his poignant sense of beauty; but one is also conscious of his delight in other people's poetry, the echoes of which are always ringing in his ears; and perhaps the echoes are most numerous when the expression of the personality is most complete, as in the opening poem. In the fine wrought sonnets, upon which Mr. Gosse contrives to throw a Corinthian grace, very unlike the austerities of Milton, the thing said is less personal; the manner of saying it more individual. But in the later volume "In Russet and Silver" (how characteristic these dainty titles are of the man and his work!) Mr. Gosse can express a mood that is perfectly characteristic of his temperament in a way that is purely his own. Here for instance is a poem called "Clasping the Cloud:"—

I yearn not for the fighting fate
That holds and has achieved:
I live to watch, and meditate,
And dream—and be deceived.

Mine be the visionary star
That vibrates on the sea;
I deem Ixion happier far Than Jupiter could be.

Those verses are simply and absolutely perfect in their kind; they have the charm of Horace in his lesser odes, saying a common thing in a way that gives distinction and individuality to one of the permanent sentiments of human beings; and, they rank, it seems to me, a long way above a composition even so charming and so felicitous as the sonnet on a Lute found in a Sarcophagus; though, that also has taken its place in the anthologies and is not likely to lose it. And, to survive in the anthologies, as for instance Carew survives—perhaps after three centuries to be resuscitated bodily for the lovers of verse, as Campion has been—is surely no bad fate for a poet, and that is the fate that one would predict for Mr. Gosse.

I have not attempted to give any conspectus of Mr. Gosse's writings; nor do I feel called on to say anything about his one excursion into prose fiction, "The Secret of Narcisse," except that it shows oddly how in his conception of mediæval times the sense of pervading picturesqueness and artistic endeavour entirely dominates his knowledge of the underlying savagery. About Mr. Gosse himself it is only needful to recall that he was connected with the British Museum (which in these latter days has become a "nest of singing birds") before he went to Cambridge as Clark Lecturer in English Literature (I wish that in Oxford we had had in those days any one half so fit to awaken an interest in that subject); and that his present official station is that of interpreter to the Board of Trade, a public department even more vocal with song than the Museum itself. Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse presiding over its finance, Mr. Austin Dobson and Mr. Samuel Waddington assisting him, with Mr. Gosse at hand to be consulted, must surely make its presidency the ideal post for a scholar and man of letters like Mr. Gerald Balfour.

Further than this what is to be said? We all know that Mr. Gosse has not gone through life without enemies; we also know that he has been rich in most enviable friends. His reminiscences of Browning have given the most agreeable picture of that great man that is known to me; he has sketched Stevenson with the same happy hand, but not so completely as Stevenson has displayed himself in numbers of his very best and most characteristic epistles addressed to Mr. Gosse. If, as it may be argued, every man gets the letters that he deserves, Mr. Gosse as a correspondent must have deserved surpassingly well of Stevenson. And lastly it may be permissible to add what was said, by one more than usually competent to judge, in a discussion about the decay, or supposed decay, of the art of conversation—that Mr. Gosse almost alone in a degenerate age maintained the tradition.

STEPHEN GWYNN.

The first book of which Mr. Edmund Gosse appeared as an author is an almost forgotten volume of "Madrigals, Songs, and Sonnets" which he wrote in collaboration with Mr. John A. Blaikie—each piece being initialled—and published in 1870 with Messrs. Longmans. Bibliographically, this is one of Mr. Gosse's most interesting books, as it has long been out of print, and is now, we believe, very scarce indeed. The germ of Mr. Gosse's reputation as an authority upon Northern literary subjects, and of the subsequent vogue of Scandinavian authors in England, was a paper on "The Ethical Condition of the Early Scandinavian Peoples," read before the Victoria Institute in April, 1874, and subsequently reprinted from the journal of the society's transactions. But even before this—in his collection of verse "On Viol and Flute," originally brought out by Messrs. H. S. King and Co. (1873), and now published by Mr. Heinemann—Mr. Gosse had written an ode "To Henrik Ibsen in Dresden," bemoaning England's ignorance of the Norseman's work:—

But oh! to win my people's eyes
To stand with me—to gaze, admire,
To praise the statue's form and size,
That is the goal of my desire;
But, friend, you dream not of the weight
Of insular phlegmatic pride,
The sturdy self-sufficient hate
Of all the world beside.

Three years later came "King Erik: A Tragedy"—another interesting volume from the bibliographical point of view. Seventeen years after its appearance through Messrs. Chatto and Windus, its first publishers, a "remainder" of 250 unbound copies was discovered, and these copies, as may be remembered, were reissued by Mr. Heinemann in 1893 with an introductory essay by Mr. Theodore Watts. The essay was the lengthy review of "King Erik" by Mr. Theodore Watts, which appeared in the Examiner for February 5, 1876, and was specially interesting from the fact that it was Mr. Watts' earliest contribution to the periodical Press. Mr. Gosse's "New Poems" (Kegan Paul) appeared in 1879 and is no longer in print; his "Firdausi in Exile and Other Poems"—dedicated to Mr. Austin Dobson—was published by Kegan Paul in 1885, but now appears in a second edition through Mr. Heinemann, like its companion volume "On Viol and Flute." Mr. Gosse's last collection of verse, "In Russet and Silver" (1894), is also issued by Mr. Heinemann, and is now in its third edition.

In his prose writings Mr. Gosse has been almost too prolific to be dealt with adequately in our bibliographical note. There are no fewer than seventy-seven items under his name in the British Museum catalogue, and though these include his poetry, his new editions, and his minor contributions on miscellaneous subjects, the balance left of important works is very considerable. "Northern Studies" first appeared in the Camelot Classics in 1879 and is now included in the Scott Library. His "Life of Gray" appeared in Macmillan's "English Men of Letters" Series in 1882 (revised editions 1889 and 1896), and he edited the fine edition of Gray's works in prose and verse, in four volumes, issued by the same publishers. It was Mr. Gosse, too, who edited the "Selected Poems of Gray" published by the Oxford University Press, which also appears in a cheaper edition, with supplementary notes for schools, by Mr. Foster Watson. With the press of the sister University—where he was Clark Lecturer in English Literature at Trinity College from 1884 to 1890—Mr. Gosse is represented by his volume on "Shakespeare to Pope: An Inquiry into the Causes and Phenomena of the Rise of Classical Poetry in England." In 1883 Messrs. Kegan Paul published his "Seventeenth Century Studies"—now issued in a third edition by Mr. Heinemann. In 1889 Messrs. Macmillan brought out his "History of Eighteenth Century Literature"—one of his most successful works (fourth edition 1899). In the following year Mr. Gosse published the life of his father, Philip Henry Gosse, F.R.S., through Messrs. Kegan Paul, and this also is now issued by Mr. Heinemann—under the title of "The Naturalist of the Sea-Shore." One of the most interesting items under his name in the British Museum Reading Room is the "Catalogue of a Portion of the Library of Edmund Gosse," by R. J. Lister (1893), privately printed for subscribers, and containing dedicatory verses by Lord de Tabley and Mr. Arthur C. Benson. There is also an interesting letter, dated 1892, from D. G. Rossetti to W. Bell Scott, referring to his design for the cover of "On Viol and Flute." It runs:—

If Gosse intends a paper cover, I think it should be of the grey kind stretched on boards which was so common formerly, with the title-page repeated on the front side. I would look at such a book if I were you, and let your vignette tend to the Bewick and Thurston styles. This would look new—being so very old—and strike people. A flimsy paper cover is always uncomfortable, and brings a book to grief.

In his preface to the catalogue Mr. Gosse traces the beginning of his bibliomania to the purchase, in 1837—the year, by the way, in which he was appointed Assistant Librarian at the British Museum—of a copy of William Morris' "The Defence of Guenevere" for 6s., much to his good father's indignation, who described the book as "rubbishy minor verse." Mr. Gosse's library is specially rich in two departments. "In the Restoration Dramatists," he writes, "I have reason to believe that I have no rival, public or private; I possess between 300 and 400 first editions of this class of literature, and have but few lacunæ to fill up." It has been his pride, he adds, to lend his treasures to the editors of the best and latest editions of these playwrights, and many editors have had recourse to his shelves for that purpose. Mr. Gosse is something of a playwright himself, for in 1878 he published his drama for private acting, entitled The Unknown Lover (Chatto and Windus), with an essay on the chamber drama in England; and in 1885 he wrote "The Masque of Painters" for the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours—given before the Prince and Princess of Wales at the newly-opened galleries of the R. I. in Piccadilly, when Mr. Forbes Robertson took the part of Virgil, called up for the occasion from the Shades to act as Chorus. "The Masque" now appears in Mr. Gosse's volume of poems "In Russet and Silver." The second department of Mr. Gosse's library which is regarded by its owner with special satisfaction is his modern collection.

My recent books are largely records of friendships which are the most sacred memories of my life, and which the passage of years can but continue to sanctify with accessions of vain regrets. When ambition sinks to a close, and we are left with our many presumptuous hopes unrealized, so little done of all we gaily started out to do, I am not sure that much will be more consoling than to have at hand the proof that those who passed us in the race regarded us, while the race was being run, with esteem, and sometimes with affection. If I have taken the egotistic step of printing this Catalogue it is, most of all, that I am preserving, against the possibility of extinction, these precious memorials of friendship. At least my children shall discover, even if they do so with surprise, that I have possessed the confidence of men and women whose praise is better than rubies—yes, and better than all the manuscripts in the Vatican.

"Gossip in a Library" (Heinemann, 1891; third edition 1894) is largely made up of a series of essays which Mr. Gosse contributed to a New York periodical on the subject of some of his literary treasures. "Questions at Issue"—dedicated to Mr. J. H. Shorthouse and published by Mr. Heinemann in 1893—is another volume of Anglo-American essays, about half of them having previously appeared in an American review. It also includes the satirical sketch on "An Election at the Royal Academy," which appeared in the form of an anonymous letter to R. L. Stevenson in the Fortnightly in 1891, when it was associated with such eminent names "that I almost hesitate," remarked Mr. Gosse in republishing it, "to have to claim it at last as my own." In the following year his University extension manual on "The Jacobean Poets" was published by Mr. Murray; and in 1896 came his volume of "Critical Kit-Kats" (Heinemann), dedicated to Mr. Thomas Hardy "as a landmark in the friendship, to me inestimably precious, which has now lasted more than twenty years." This volume includes the essays on "The Sonnets from the Portuguese" and "Thomas Lovell Beddoes," both written at the desire of Robert Browning, and originally printed as prefaces to editions of the poems published by Messrs. Dent. The Brownings figure prominently in the bibliography of Mr. Gosse, and Beddoes appears again in the volume of letters of that strange lyrical genius which Mr. Gosse edited for Mr. Lane—thus completing the trust made to the editor by Robert Browning, to whom all the MSS. and details referring to Beddoes had been bequeathed by his old friend Kelsall. "King Erik" was dedicated to Robert Browning by Mr. Gosse just a quarter of a century ago; and among Mr. Gosse's American books is one entitled "Robert Browning: Personalities" (Houghton, Mifflin, and Co.), in which the author describes the early career of the poet, 1812-1846, and gives personal impressions of the later period.

Each of the important series which Mr. Gosse edits for Mr. Heinemann has been well supported by the public. Nineteen volumes have appeared in the International Library—with an introduction by the editor to each volume—and ten in the series of "Short Histories of the Literatures of the World," one of the most successful of which was the editor's "Modern English Literature" (1897; third edition 1900). His uniform edition of the novels of Björnstjerne Björnson is another series which still sells well. Mr. Gosse's last important work was his "Life and Letters of John Donne, Dean of St. Paul's," in two volumes (Heinemann, 1899)—dedicated to the late Bishop of London, who, by a strange coincidence, had suggested such a work to Mr. Gosse while the volumes were in actual preparation. Our bibliography is necessarily incomplete, but the following items will help to make it thoroughly representative:—

"The Secret of Narcisse"—Mr. Gosse's one volume of fiction. Heinemann. 1892.

"The Life of Henrik Ibsen," by Henrik Jæger; translated by Clara Bell. With the verse done into English from the Norwegian original by Edmund Gosse. 1890. Heinemann.

"Prose Dramas of Ibsen." Translated by William Archer and others, with a bibliographical and critical introduction by Edmund Gosse. Lovell's Series of Foreign Literature.

"The Master Builder." Translated by Edmund Gosse and William Archer. Heinemann. 1890.

"Hedda Gabler." Translated by Edmund Gosse. Heinemann. 1891.

"The Best Plays of James Shirley." Edited by Edmund Gosse. ("Mermaid Series of Old Dramatists.") Fisher Unwin.

Fouqué's "Undine." Translated by Edmund Gosse. (Published by Messrs. Lawrence and Bullen, but still obtainable, we believe, through Mr. Bullen, 18, Cecil-court.)

"Life of Congreve." By Edmund Gosse. ("Great Writers" Series.) Walter Scott. 1888.

"A Memoir of Thomas Lodge." By Edmund Gosse. Privately printed, 1882—ten copies only.

"Six Lectures Written to be Delivered before the Lowell Institute." By Edmund Gosse. Privately printed, 1884—four copies only.

"An Epistle in Verse to Oliver Wendell Holmes on his Seventy-fifth Birthday." 1884—forty copies printed.

"The Works of Henry Fielding." With an introduction by Edmund Gosse. Constable. 1898, &c.

Contributions to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," including histories of the literatures of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, and biographical and critical studies upon Cowley, Holberg, Oehlenschläger, and others.

It would be impossible to find a more appropriate town in which to hold a congress of publishers and booksellers than Leipzig, for here in 1525 was founded the first Booksellers' Association. It was, however, in later years when bookselling was passing through its most trying period, when discounts were large and profits small, that the great association known as the "Börsenverein" was established at Leipzig, which now regulates and controls the entire bookselling trade of Germany. The fourth International Congress of publishers was inaugurated on June 9 with a reception by the President, Herr Albert Brockhaus, at 17, Salomonstrasse, which was attended by a crowd of delegates. Among the invited guests were many from France, Germany, Italy, Russia, America, and England; from the latter were Messrs. John Murray, F. Macmillan, W. Heinemann, F. Houlston, F. Unwin, and the secretary, E. G. Fairholme. The three preceding congresses were held respectively at Paris, in 1896, Brussels, in 1897, and London, in 1899. The business of the present Congress was opened on June 10 by Herr Brockhaus, who delivered an address welcoming the members of the Congress. He paid a special tribute to the memory of M. Georges Masson, former President of the Cercle de la Librairie, in Paris, and President of the Paris Chamber of Commerce. There was discussion upon Dr. Karl Trübner's paper on "The Copyright Relations between the United States of America and the European States," and the Congress resolved that a Memorandum should be submitted to the European and American Governments, and expressed its desire that the amendment to the law of March 3, 1891, as proposed by the Copyright League, should be accepted by Congress.

M. Paul Ollendorff roused some hostility by his caustic remarks on the French Press. He said that no French newspaper gave a notice of any books containing the most rudimentary knowledge of literary criticism. Mr. W. Heinemann, in his paper in the same section on "The system of sending books on sale or return," said that though this system was accepted in France, Germany, and Italy, he would not say that it would be successful in England. His object was to secure some uniform system in all the countries belonging to the International Association of Publishers. The arrangements made by the organizing committees of the Congress were excellent, and a correspondent speaks with enthusiasm of the "almost regal entertainments" provided by the publishers of Leipzig.

SIR WALTER BESANT.

We, of this paper, lose a valued friend, as well as an occasional contributor, by the death of Sir Walter Besant. His appreciation of our aims was frequently expressed in print. When he disagreed with us, as he sometimes did on controversial questions, he never failed to express his disagreement with a courtesy which made it a pleasure to dispute with him. Consequently it is with something akin to a sense of personal bereavement that we address ourselves to the melancholy task of discussing and estimating his life's work.

His own view would probably have been that his most valuable work did not consist in the writing of books, though it was work which only a writer of books could have done. He was a fellow labourer with Sir Charles Warren and Lord Kitchener, then Lieutenant Kitchener, in the work of the Palestine Exploration, and there are also, apart from his books, two other enduring monuments to his memory still remaining—the People's Palace and the Incorporated Society of Authors. The People's Palace of fact is not exactly the People's Palace that Sir Walter Besant dreamed of. He would have preferred to see it more joyous—more frivolous—less given over to technical education. But the idea was his, and was set forth in ample detail in "All Sorts and Conditions of Men"—that rare example of a novel with a purpose which has achieved its purpose. One can still remember the popular indignation expressed when the honour of knighthood was conferred upon the man who had put down the money for the People's Palace, while the services of the man who had invented it were left unrecognized.

The services for which Sir Walter Besant was subsequently knighted were those which he rendered to literature in connexion with the Society of Authors. Lord Rosebery told him so in the letter in which he informed him of the honour it was proposed to confer upon him. He quoted the letter with satisfaction at the complimentary dinner given to him by the members of the Society; and the general feeling among men of letters was then, and is still, that no knighthood had ever been better earned. For, as even his enemies must admit, his motives in founding the Society were purely altruistic. He needed no such Society to protect his own interests. But he heard of the hard cases of certain other authors of whose ignorance certain publishers had taken an unfair advantage; and he had, by publishing a book at his own expense, acquired a knowledge of the technicalities of the publishing trade which enabled him to judge the merits of the cases and filled him with a burning indignation. So he founded a Society to protect literary property by supplying authors with the information which would enable them to understand the full meaning of the agreements put in front of them, and to bargain with their publishers upon equal terms. The best publishers quite approved of the aims of the Society, recognizing that the exposure of dishonest practices made the path of honesty smoother. Some of them—the late Andrew Tuer, for instance—showed their approval by joining it. But the management of the Society was always, very properly, kept in the hands of authors, with the result that it grew from strength to strength, and is to-day a power in the land. Sir Walter Besant was probably prouder of having founded it than of any of his purely literary achievements.

Yet his literary achievements were great and various. One thinks of him mainly as a novelist; but one could ignore his novels and still discuss his position as a man of letters. He brought the graphic powers of the novelist to bear upon many other branches of literature—mainly upon biography and archæology. It is an open question whether his life of Captain Cook or Grant Allen's life of Darwin was the best of an excellent series of lives of English Worthies. For another series he wrote an excellent life of Admiral Coligny. Of all the many retrospects of the Victorian era brought out in the year of Jubilee his was the only one that really made it clear to us what life was like in 1837. His many books on the history of London were, from the point of view of the average man, the best books of the kind ever written. They remind one of the verdict passed, in "The Cambridge Freshman," on an eminent Littlego Coach who had short, sharp methods with all the cruces of the classics. When Liddell and Scott tell you that an obscure passage may mean this, and other authorities suggest that it might mean that, this coach, it was said, tells you what it is. Very similar was Sir Walter Besant's treatment of the riddles that perplex antiquaries. He did not fumble with them publicly. The fumbling was all done when he was alone in his study. Emerging from the study he gaily tossed you the solution. You carried away a graphic picture, a definite impression. Unless you were a rival antiquary it was what you wanted.

It was as a novelist, however, that Sir Walter Besant was most conspicuously before the public; and it is his work as a novelist that it is most difficult to estimate. It would be hard to find a reader who has not, at one time or another, derived great pleasure from it. It would be nearly as hard to find a modern critic of repute who did not profess to despise it. "It does not exist," is one sweeping condemnation that we remember. "Providence and Sir Walter Besant have exhausted the obvious" is another. The two verdicts are really pretty much the same; and neither of them really means much more than that Sir Walter was not, as the French say, dans le mouvement. He did not belong to the new school of novelists who concern themselves with human character, origin, and destiny. It was the panorama of life, and not the mechanism behind the panorama, that interested him. He could not have written "Jude the Obscure." Or, if he had tried to do so, Jude would have come out as a purely comic character. But is this necessarily a condemnation? Would it have been otherwise if Dickens had tried to write "Jude the Obscure"?

Dickens, indeed, was obviously Sir Walter Besant's great exemplar—more particularly in the books which he and James Rice wrote together, and which, as the work of the two collaborators cannot be separated, must be treated as his for the purposes of this article. It was not for nothing that he won Calverley's prize for answering questions on the Pickwick Papers. He was Dickens' superior in knowledge, though his inferior in genius. He moved in a different social milieu from Dickens. Above all, his early recollections were very different from Dickens'. But the point of view is similar, though not the same. There are the same set scenes, both comic and pathetic; there is the same joy in caricature, in presenting the odd and the grotesque. Dickens would not have been ashamed to have written the account of the dinner-party at the Langham in the "Golden Butterfly," or the description of the run on the bank in "Ready Money Mortiboy," or to have told the story of the ship that went down with all hands, while the Prima Donna sang "Abide with Me," as Besant told it in "My Little Girl." Dickens would have been proud to have drawn such characters as Gilead P. Beck, and Humphrey and Cornelius Jagenal, and Gregory Shovel, "Doctor of Divinity," and the boy in "The Seamy Side," and the unwashed labourer in the vineyard of the British Museum in "With Harp and Crown." The disciple was worthy of the master, though less great.

One might add that Sir Walter Besant, like Dickens, leaves the impression of having been the most profound of the superficial and the most superficial of the profound. His philosophy of life was very much that of the ordinary, healthy, hearty Englishman. His gospel, so far as he had a gospel, was one of work, and joy, and of the suppression of all shams. Perhaps he carried his hatred of shams to the point of doing injustice to deserving men and excellent institutions—as when he said that the Marlborough masters were all prigs, and that the Church Catechism ought to be thrown out of window, or when he represented curates as ninecompoops whose claims to apostolical succession only furnished an additional reason for playing practical jokes on them. But he said it all in a genial way, and he went about his tasks without ever feeling existence a burden, without ever being harassed by the undiscovered mysteries which torture the souls of so many writers—working hard and playing hard, and exhorting others to work hard, and play hard likewise. His philosophy in this matter, indeed, could probably have been summed up in the simple sentence that is inscribed upon Sir John Brand's tomb at Bloemfontein:—"Alles zal recht komen." It is a good enough philosophy for most of us, though not all of us are able to be satisfied with it.

Sir Walter Besant was thirty years old when he published his first book, shortly after returning to England from Mauritius, where he had been Senior Professor in the Royal College. Thirteen years previously—in 1855—he had gone up to Cambridge (Christ's College) with a scholarship from King's College, London, and an elder brother, who had been Senior Wrangler in 1850, coached him for the Mathematical Tripos. He came out eighteenth wrangler, and went to Mauritius as Professor of Mathematics to avoid entering the Church. Yet his heart was not in mathematics, and it was not until ill-health drove him back to England in 1867 that he found his vocation in letters. "Studies in Early French Poetry," "The French Humorists" (both published by Bentley and long since out of print), and smaller studies of Rabelais and Coligny were the result. He became a regular contributor to the Daily News in the year that his first book appeared, and three years later began the literary alliance which continued to the death of James Rice in 1882. "Ready Money Mortiboy," first of the series, was the outcome of Walter Besant's contributions to Once a Week, a periodical which had just been sold to young Rice, a barrister who had not long come down from Cambridge, and who acted as editor as well as proprietor. Rice sold the paper after a gallant but hopeless struggle to make it pay, although "Ready Money Mortiboy" put a little life into it while the serial lasted. The novel was Rice's idea and Besant fell in with it at once—many modifications being made, however, when they came to hammer it out together. Sir Walter's story of its appearance in book form has been told in "My First Book," but it will bear retelling:—

When the time came for publishing it, we were faced with the fact that a new and anonymous novel is naturally regarded with doubt by publishers. Nothing seems more risky than such a venture. On the other hand, we were perfectly satisfied that there was no risk in our novel at all. This, of course, we had found out, not only from the assurance of Vanity, but also from the reception the work had met with during its progress through the magazine. Therefore we had it printed and bound at our own expense, and we placed the book, ready for publication, in the hands of Mr. William Tinsley. We so arranged the business that the printer's bill was not due till the first returns came from the publisher. By this artful plan we avoided paying anything at all. We had only printed a modest edition of 600, and these all went off, leaving, of course, a very encouraging margin. The cheap edition was sold to Henry S. King and Co. for a period of five years. Then the novel was purchased outright by Chatto and Windus, who still continue to publish it—and, I believe, to sell it.

"Ready Money Mortiboy," indeed, has always been one of the most popular novels of the Rice and Besant series, about 80,000 copies, roughly speaking, having been sold since Messrs. Chatto and Windus took it over. But neither the Besant and Rice series nor the books by Besant alone have ever had what could properly be termed tremendous sales. "I have never had a boom; I have never engineered one," Walter Besant used to say. But, although he had none of Wilkie Collins' hankering after the wider public touched by the sixpenny editions, he was much gratified to hear of the success which attended the experiments in that direction with two of his own novels, "All Sorts and Conditions of Men" and "The Orange Girl," and also with "The Golden Butterfly." Sir Walter did not believe in this lowering of the price of copyright books—this "ying of publishers with each other in the madness of the sixpenny book," as he wrote in the Author when declaiming that the paper-covered edition was threatening the six-shilling book with extinction. It was curious to see to what extent Sir Walter, in his capacity of authors' guardian, persistently broke his own rules. He was always warning writers against signing agreements which ignored any possible source of future profit, yet, with one exception, we believe that he invariably sold his books outright to his own publishers, Messrs. Chatto and Windus—sometimes, however, reserving the dramatic rights. The exception was his "Eulogy of Richard Jefferies," two-thirds of the profits of which he arranged, with the ready generosity which was characteristic of the man, to have paid to Jefferies' relatives. The "Eulogy" was beneficial in more ways than one, for it gave an immediate impetus to the sale of Jefferies' neglected works. Sir Walter's zeal on behalf of the unfortunate author was unbounded, but it was sometimes carried to excess. "No worker in the world," he wrote in 1892, "not even the needlewoman, is more helpless, more ignorant, more cruelly sweated than the author." After that it is surprising to learn from Mr. Chatto that Sir Walter's relations with his own publishers were always of an exceptionally cordial nature—as a bundle of letters from the novelist abundantly testifies.

The twelve Besant and Rice novels which are now published appear in a three-and-sixpenny and a six-shilling library edition, though "Ready Money Mortiboy" and "The Golden Butterfly" are out of print in the more expensive form. Taking them all round the Besant and Rice books were rather more successful than the novels by Besant alone, though it is true none of them had such a large sale as "All Sorts and Conditions of Men" (1882), the first of Sir Walter's books to appear after his partner's death. And certainly none of them did so much practical good. "It is the greatest thing that could have happened to a man," he once said, "to have had that People's Palace built in response to a novel he had written." Among the most successful of his other two score novels or so are "Dorothy Forster," "The World Went Very Well Then," "For Faith and Freedom," "St. Katherine's by the Tower," "Children of Gibeon," "The Chaplain of the Fleet," and "The Orange Girl."

Besides being first chairman of the Society of Authors Sir Walter was for seventeen years secretary of the Palestine Exploration Fund, and as such edited "The Survey of Western Palestine," and wrote the "History of Jerusalem" with Professor Palmer, whose life he afterwards wrote in a volume published by Mr. Murray, which is now out of print. The "History of Jerusalem" was originally issued by Bentley, and is now published in a fourth edition by Messrs. Chatto, from whom also come his well-known topographical books on London. Jerusalem Sir Walter had never seen, though he used to say that he knew every important stone there; but naturally he knew his London infinitely better—better, probably, than any one living. There is a little "History of London" by him published by Messrs. Longmans in two forms—one as a half-crown prize-book for schools. His larger history (1892, 7s. 6d.) is brought out by Messrs. Chatto, who had settled with him before his fatal illness for a volume dealing with North London in the same style, to complete the series which now comprises "London," "Westminster," "South London," and "East London." The monumental "Survey of London," upon which he had been engaged for Messrs. A. and C. Black during the last few years as editor, director, and principal writer, is not merely an up-to-date reproduction of Stowe, but an entirely new work on a different plan, illustrated by new records and documents. The publishers had fitted up a special room for Sir Walter in their publishing house in Soho, and here, until lately, he did most of his work in connexion with the Survey. In a letter to Mr. Chatto on another subject he wrote:—"The Survey is an immense job. I dare not look ahead—but I hope to worry through." That was in 1894—seven years ago—yet he did not live to see the appearance of his first volume. The greater part of the work, however, was done; the thing was mapped out and the material arranged for, while Sir Walter's own contributions were practically finished. There are to be at least eight royal quarto volumes, of which the fourth is now in type.

Three other books have been left by him to be published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus—"A Lady of Lynn," the historical romance now running in the Queen, with which the publishers will open their autumn season early in September; and an eighteenth-century novel and a shorter story dealing incidentally with the women's side of a Debtors' Prison—somewhat on the lines of "The Orange Girl." A little book on Alfred the Great, by Sir Walter Besant, is also announced, but this, it is said, is to be completed by his friend Dr. Sprigge, the editor of the Lancet.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

[BY WALTER HERRIES POLLOCK.]

I have been asked to give a few personal reminiscences of my dear and lamented friend Sir Walter Besant. Brief let me be. He was the very type of a scholar and a gentleman, his knowledge was great and unusual, but he never paraded it in conversation. His tolerance for people younger or less instructed, or both, than himself, was as unfailing as his courtesy to great and small. His nature was compact of a kindness which showed itself in his usual manner. He could be indignant enough upon good occasion, and yet even in indignation I do not remember to have ever heard him utter what could rightly be called an unkind word of any one. I fancy that he may have had a naturally quick temper; if so he kept it in wonderful control. I have had the privilege of collaborating with him both in The Ballad Monger, our joint version of Banville's Gringoire, and also in certain stories and in a volume of "Drawing-room Plays." Now collaboration is almost as great a trial to the temper as matrimony is sometimes said to be. In all my work with Besant I never had a cross look or a cross word from him. He took hints from his inferior and younger colleague with the most perfect temper, and it was characteristic of him that when The Ballad Monger was produced, he insisted on leaving all the arrangements in my hands, because, he said, he knew much less about the stage than I did. His conversation, like his nature, was always kindly and interesting and frequently witty with that best kind of wit that never gives a real wound. Therefore his arrival at any of the clubs he frequented was always eagerly welcomed, and, however he might be worried or suffering himself, he always managed to infuse good spirits and cheerfulness into any friends who might be for the moment suffering from depression, mental or bodily. His first book, I think, was an essay on Rabelais, and certainly from that philosopher he had learnt all the good that was in the great Frenchman and none of the harm. He, Mr. Leland, and myself founded the Rabelais Club—an institution which flourished for some time and dropped only because we all became too busy to give full attention to it. He was a man essentially sympathetic, and, as is not always the case, also receptive of sympathy. In short, he was a man altogether lovable and helpful to others. I could give many instances, were it permissible to do so, of his kindness to younger people, competent or incompetent, who were struggling to make their way in literature. He never encouraged those whom he perceived to be entirely unfitted for such a calling, but his discouragement was always kindly and gently expressed. He was a close friend of the late Professor Palmer, and better company than he and Palmer made together can hardly be imagined. The high spirits of Besant and the dry wit of Palmer made the happiest contrast and combination. More might be said about his good and great qualities, but let it be enough to say that no one who knew him well could help loving him or can ever cease to feel his absence.

ROBERT BUCHANAN.

The story of Robert Buchanan's literary life, if it were written frankly and with knowledge, would present a record of as much adventure and emotion as that of any of his own adventurous novels. It started in a spirit of the eighteenth century, and it ran the gamut of almost all the varied interests of the last half of the nineteenth; it joined hands, either in friendship or in combat, with most of the representative writers of the time, and it was above all things the career of a man passionately interested in his fellowmen, a creature of impulse, a child of emotion, capable alike of generous friendship and of equally ungenerous enmity; unreasoning, unreasonable, but often instinctively right, and generally downright and sincere. Judged externally, it would be pronounced successful; for while Buchanan came up to London, like the waifs and Whittingtons of a Lygone age, without money or prospects, he passed in his time through most of the phases of popularity and material comfort; he had a hard struggle as a boy, but he enjoyed in his manhood more of the moderate plenty of life than falls to the lot of many men of greater ability and equal industry. And yet his career is one that criticism cannot regard altogether complacently, for Buchanan certainly did not do quite the good things that at the outset he promised to do; he achieved a great deal, but only a small portion of it was on a distinctively high level. Mr. William Archer has said that he was "guilty of the most unpardonable sin a craftsman can commit—that of not doing his best." But this is, perhaps, rather too uncompromising a judgment; and we may arrive at a juster estimate by distinguishing rather more carefully some of the issues and necessities of the situation.

Yours truly

Buchanan arrived in London (in 1860), with the romantic confidence of boyhood, "to seek his fortune." He was nineteen years old, the son of a Stafford socialistic missionary, and of Scots descent. He had been educated at Glasgow High School and University, and he brought with him to London a fellow student of the same ambition, the pair having sworn comradeship in the pursuit of literary fame. The story of the early struggles of Buchanan and his friend David Gray is generally familiar. It is the story of privation in a Grub-street garret, which recalls the early misfortunes of Richard Savage, and it ended for one of the combatants in a premature and pitiful death. Buchanan's was the stronger temperament; he lived through the lean years of half-starvation, and overcame the obstacles which bristle about the start of a literary career, and in a few years he was making his way steadily upon the newspaper Press. Those, however, who watched Buchanan's career closely were inclined to think that the experiences of those early days in London had set a mark upon him which the easier circumstances of later life never wholly obliterated. Privation is a cruel taskmistress, and in those probationary years he learnt that to please the public you must provide what the public wants. Material success was essential to one in Buchanan's position. He had not the provision which might have enabled him to choose the work he would have preferred; he was obliged to write what he could find a market for. And so it was not, perhaps, so much the case that he deliberately did not do his best, as that he fell more and more unconsciously into the habit of working upon lines which he saw elsewhere successful, and in which he knew he could himself succeed most easily. The result in any case was much the same; a true artist was wasted in the necessary pursuit of popular favour.

For the unfortunate part of this compromise with necessity was that it fostered in Buchanan the very defects to which his work was most fatally prone. He was, as we have said, a creature of emotion, and his temperament was always swaying between emotional excesses. When for a moment the balance lay level, he would produce, as he often did in his early career, poems of intense and poignant humanity, genuine and sincere utterances of a man of high feeling and deep sympathy. But the balance was momentary, and with its decline he plunged at once into melodramatic exaggeration. Over-emphasis both of detraction and of admiration marred his loyalty to what were often most commendable causes, and in his creative work the same over-emphasis dragged him into lurid and hyperbolic effects which were quite unworthy of his talent. He became the victim of untutored emotion, playing into the hands of the crowd.

And yet he was at heart a true poet, of the vigorous and emotional order. He began to write, perhaps, in an unfortunate time, for the spasmodic, sentimental, and rather formless poetic movement of the 'sixties was precisely the sort of movement to call out in him the qualities which he most needed to restrain, and he yielded himself readily to its fascination. A natural melodist, he was content with loose and flaccid metrical excesses, and his harmony often dissolves itself into the mechanical jingle of the barrel-organ. A rapid and volcanic thinker, he indulged himself in unshapely diffuseness; form became the last thing to be considered; effect, effect, and always effect was the mainspring of his work. Later on, too, he assumed subjects far beyond the range of his imagination, and the nebulous and rather pretentious parables in which he attempted to set forth some sort of philosophy of the divine will are found, on careful analysis, to be often very tawdry and always theatrical. But poetry was undoubtedly his sphere. Here, more than anywhere else, he found expression for the most humane and sincere trait in his nature—his generous care and sympathy for the sufferings of the unfortunate. Here, too, he often wrote with persuasive, simplicity and directness. It was in his early poetry that he held out promise richer, alas! than any later fulfilment.

Poetry, however, is a poor staff upon which to support a household; and Buchanan, like so many others, turned in time to the more popular field of fiction. Some of his earlier novels are full of power, even if it be rather crudely employed. "The Shadow of the Sword" is not without taint of his besetting sin; it is over-emphatic and over-eager; but it has fine passages and is marked by open and broad sincerity. "God and the Man," again, has theatrical faults (indeed, it was afterwards recast as a melodrama); but there are scenes of abounding vigour, and in working up emotion to a fever heat Buchanan was not only adroit, but electrically effective. Still, as time went on, Buchanan's fiction declined in quality more than any other side of his work. As he began to give his attention more and more to the stage, the influence of the theatre affected his fiction to such a degree that one seemed to see in every new novel the process by which it had been hastily recast from a first rough dramatic draft. No doubt, this was not actually the case; and many of the novels which looked like readjusted melodramas may have begun and ended their history in their final form of fiction. Still, the pervading influence of the theatre was fatal to good work in the novel, the dialogue became stagey, the effects suggested the footlights, and there was no "conviction" in the whole of the workmanship.

Meanwhile, Buchanan was gaining much popularity in the theatre. It cannot, indeed, be said that he enriched the stage with literature, but he turned out many workmanlike dramas which served their purpose, and were upon the whole healthy and vigorous enough in tone. Sentimentality, a perverted form of his emotionalism, warped some of his effects; and in his adaptations of Fielding and Richardson in particular he imported into the stage version of the eighteenth-century novel a sugary sort of sentiment which was not much in harmony with the virile savour of the originals. On the other hand, he was thoroughly aware of the value of stage-craft, and some of his melodramas, such, for example, as the adapted "Man's Shadow," were in their theatrical way genuinely impressive. It is doubtful, however, if any of them would stand literary criticism if printed; and this, it need scarcely be said, is rather a serious consideration when applied to the work of a professedly literary man.

Finally, some reference is demanded to Buchanan's excursions into literary controversy, the best-remembered instance of which is his attack upon the Pre-Raphaelites in the article he called "The Fleshly School of Poetry." Buchanan was, of course, no critic; the violence of his temperament were against him. But he was a tremendous fighter, and he loved controversy, if not for its own sake, at any rate for the opportunity it gave him of venting opinions which increased in emphasis with every fresh outburst of opposition. As a combatant he lacked every grace and chivalry of the lists; urbanity and persuasiveness were apparently distasteful to him, for he lost no opportunity of outraging them with diversities of violence. His attack upon Rossetti was quite without method or stability of judgment; it wounded its victim to the quick, but it probably persuaded no one of its justice. "The Coming Terror," a volume of controversial essays which aroused some interest ten years ago, contains some sensible ideas intermingled with a great deal of indiscriminate striking in the air, and this defect is representative of all his critical arguments. Yet his enthusiasm was as generous in praise as it was violent in difference. The consideration of dates renders it unlikely that Buchanan spoke by the book when he said that he was one of the first to give Browning welcome at a time when all the critical world was condemning him; but it is at least true that among the voices raised to proclaim a new talent Buchanan's was often among the earliest and the most hearty. His view was not always sound, and the hyperbole with which it was expressed was almost invariably unsound, but he gave encouragement to many literary beginners at a time when they needed it most urgently. Here, too, perhaps the memories of his own early struggles prompted him, and to a better purpose.

We take leave, then, of Robert Buchanan with a sense of kindly and sincere regret. He was a man of real talent and of generous emotion, driven, as we believe, by the force of circumstance to make less of his abilities than might have been made under advantages of leisure and of competency. The struggle of life affects different men in different ways. Some go down under it altogether; some, but these are very few, rise above it and seem to thrive upon opposition; others, and these the great majority, compromise with it, and are content to swim with the tide. Buchanan went with the tide and the majority. The compromise brought him success and his reward; but it would be an injustice to his memory to pretend that, under other circumstances and with other advantages, the success might not have been on higher levels and the reward itself more enduring.

Most of Robert Buchanan's early verse was published by Alexander Strahan, and to him—"their true friend from the beginning"—he dedicated the first collected edition of his poetical works, published in 1874 by H. S. King and Co. The late Mr. George Smith almost became the publisher of his second book, "Idyls and Legends of Inverburn," for George Lewes, one of the first to lend Buchanan a helping hand in his bitter struggle for fame, had praised the manuscript to the future founder of the "Dictionary of National Biography," who offered the poet a good round sum—as it seemed to him at the time—for the copyright. But Strahan offered even better terms and secured the manuscript. Both this and his first London volume "Undertones" (his earliest literary efforts appeared in Glasgow before he came to London) were very well reviewed, and the praise they received seemed almost too much for him. "Poor little pigmy in a cockle-boat," he wrote, "I thought Creation was ringing with my name." It was Strahan who republished the famous essay on "The Fleshly School of Poetry," which made its author so many enemies upon its first appearance in the Contemporary Review in 1871; and in the preface to the booklet Mr. Buchanan explained that the editor of the Contemporary had put the signature of "Robert Maitland" to his essay without his knowledge, the idea being to let the criticism stand upon its merits and gain nothing through the name of the real author. But the pseudonym and the amiable references to his own poems were errors of taste and judgment which did Buchanan an incalculable amount of harm. "The Wandering Jew" (Chatto and Windus) was another of his books to cause a tumult and a correspondence—this time in the religious world, though several sermons were preached upon it as being rather a helpful indictment of Christianity than otherwise. "The Wandering Jew" was the only volume of verse which Mr. Buchanan left with Messrs. Chatto and Windus when he rose in revolt against publishers in general in 1896, and brought out his books himself. Messrs. Chatto had previously published (1884) a collected edition of his poetical works in one volume—ten years after the collected edition issued in three volumes by H. S. King and Co.—but he took that with him as well. His publishing experiences, however, were never very happy, and the only new books of importance that he issued were his last volumes of verse—"The Outcast," "The Ballad of Mary the Mother," and "The Devil's Case." Not long ago the collected edition—with the separate volumes—came back to Messrs. Chatto, who agreed to bring it out with a second volume made up of Mr. Buchanan's later poetry; and this complete edition of his verse is now in preparation for publication in the autumn. The collection will include "The City of Dream"—out of print in its original form—which won the eulogy from Mr. Lecky at a Royal Academy banquet.

In 1882 Messrs. Chatto brought out a volume of Buchanan's "Selected Poems," to which the author added a condensed account of his tragic story of the life of his friend David Gray. "A Poet's Sketch Book," giving selections from Buchanan's prose writings, was a companion volume, published a year later. In 1892 Messrs. Heddon and Co. placed a cheap volume of "The Buchanan Ballads" on the market, which, besides several new poems, contained a number of pieces which had long been used at public recitations—"Wake of O'Hara," "Phil Blood's Leap," "Fra Giacomo," and others.

Mr. Buchanan's first novel, "The Shadow of the Sword," published as a "three-decker" in 1876, has always been one of his best selling books (Chatto and Windus). Most of his other novels are issued by the same firm in a uniform three-and-sixpenny edition, the most popular of which, besides "The Shadow of the Sword," are "God and the Man" and "Foxglove Manor." They also publish "The Charlatan," which Buchanan wrote in collaboration with Mr. Henry Murray—a book which was fairly successful, as was the last novel by Buchanan published by them, "Andromeda: An Idyll of the Great River" (1900), which is still in its six-shilling form. Buchanan's last great success was "Father Anthony" (John Long), of which some 70,000 copies have been sold. Three other tales by him are published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, "Diana's Hunting," "A Marriage by Capture," and "Edie Hetherington"—of which a sixpenny edition was recently placed on the market. Another of his novels, "Come Live with Me and be my Love," is published by Mr. Heinemann, who also issues his two-act opera The Piper of Hamelin.

THE FUTURE OF THE DRAMA.

A "Personal View"

By PROFESSOR WALTER RALEIGH.

The nineteenth century has gone to its account, and has left the English theatre, as it found it, divorced from what is best and most strenuous in the living imagination and thought of the race. The history of our nineteenth-century dramatic literature, if it shall ever find an historian, will be a history of the books that have been written by students and admirers of older dramatists. The history of the stage, on the other hand, will be a record of the various renderings of the chief Shakespearian characters, of some gallant attempts to impose the plays of Shelley and Tennyson and Browning on a reluctant public, of a few—a very few—original works that rose above mediocrity and succeeded, and, for the rest, of the evening recreations of a people.

Is the new century to make the divorce absolute, or will it see a revival of the drama, of tragedy and comedy, handling eternal topics, written in modern English by living men, and acted on the public stage? Some eager apologists for the stage as it is assert that the living man has only to come forward; he was never more ardently desired and sought after by managers. And the literary critics have done something to foster the idea that the qualities necessary for good dramatic writing are so many and so rare that only a very fortunate generation can hope to see produced upon the stage that miracle of art, a good original play. It is surely long starvation that has taught us to think food a rare luxury. We do not speak in this way of books, but, with more or less confidence, expect them every year, new and good. And drama, from childhood upwards, is one of the most natural and irrepressible instincts of the human imagination, to gesticulate is as natural as to speak, to invent speeches and actions for others is as natural as to speak for oneself. Indeed there has been no dearth, during the past century, of that first essential for the drama, the dramatic imagination. Scores of writers have been distinguished for that, and that alone. Who that reads her "Literary History of England" (1785-1824) would ever suspect that Mrs. Oliphant was a woman of genius? Who that reads "Salem Chapel," or "Phoebe Junior," or any other of her finer novels, would dare to deny it? Anthony Trollope, again, while he speaks for himself, is often flat and dull, but he has only to rig up his stage and speak through the mouths of his puppets to become a marvel of vivacity, sympathy, insight, and conviction. The dramatic imagination is not rare, except on the stage; and the reasons for its rarity there must be sought elsewhere than in the imaginative poverty and creative impotence of the men of our time.

Is the public to blame? It is the fashionable, broad-shouldered scape-goat, and any one who stands forth as its representative to vindicate its intelligence may very readily be flattered out of his position. To be coherent in speech and argument, to have taste and judgment, is, by hypothesis, to stand aloof from the great insensate, inarticulate mob. Yet the reflection will occur that there is a public—in some cases a regular and sufficient public—for good music and good books. Why should good plays alone be incapable of attracting an audience?

It would be truer, I think, on the whole, to say that in any attempt to bring dramatic thought and dramatic imagination into touch with the modern theatre, the actor bars the way. The control of the theatres, the choice of plays, the mode of presenting them in action, are all practically in the hands of the acting profession. It is no discredit to that hardworking profession, containing as it does many enthusiasts and many artists, to say that literature can expect but little at its hands. Of the motives that lead men and women into the profession a zeal for the finer imaginative and dramatic capabilities of human speech is surely among the rarest. Once there, the actor finds himself in a world of his own, bound to the revolving wheel of rehearsals and performances, exhausted and exhilarated by turns, but always absorbed in his profession. A large part of his experience of life thenceforward will come to him across the foot-lights, and most of the lessons that it teaches him will be false. The temptations that are familiar to all who have so much as spoken in public will beset him, the irrelevant sympathies offered in the sweet form of applause. He may not have asked for them, but human nature is frail, and perhaps, before long, he will pocket them and ask for more. Like the best dramas, the best impersonations admit of no applause save at the end, for the parts are all strictly subordinated to the whole effect. Such subordination, enforced throughout a play, is the business of a dramatist; it is not likely, except in rare cases, to be the business of an actor.

I am defending so moderate a proposition that I should be sorry if it were supposed that I am attacking a profession. Printing is a beautiful art, but we do not expect a master-printer, except by accident, to devote his labours wholly to the service of literature. He, like the actor, has a technique and a pride of his own. Under the control of the acting profession two forms, at least, of dramatic art are very much alive in England at this day—burlesque, and what, for want of a better name, I shall call charade—the representation on the stage of commonplace characters and manners in the midst of comic or sentimental intrigue. The pleasure to be derived from this depends not a little on the preservation of a low pitch, so to say; the characters seem to have walked on to the stage by mistake and are behaving as any one might behave in a suburban drawing room. We are a nation of individualists and humorists, and these two forms of the dramatic art appeal to our practised sensibilities. The intervention of the foot-lights gives piquancy to the situation in either case, by reminding us dimly that the stage is a place where characters are assumed. But here are characters with no trace of assumption, they treat us confidentially, and, as it were, make themselves at home. If only the humoristic talent that is so rife in the music-halls were given free scope, and encouraged to produce concerted dramatic sketches, we might, in time, have a native burlesque drama, strong in criticism and humour, and all our own.

But tragedy! And high comedy, appealing to the intellect, tickling the young, not asking to be punctuated throughout by sentiments of approval or disapproval—how and where are we to get these? How many actors now on the stage can recite verse with ease, music, and meaning? How many actresses of tragic parts can distinguish tragedy from hysteria and violence; how many have the faintest understanding that tragedy without solemnity, dignity, deliberation, measure, proportion, and harmony is impossible? The absurd mimicry of natural passions in their physical effects, the restless indulgence of individual foibles have made tragedy, which is as much an affair of law and convention as ever was music or architecture, a stranger to our stage. When Lamb complained that to see Lear acted was merely to see an old man in a pitiful state of nervous prostration and excitement, he expressed what many thousands since have felt. But must we always be made to feel it?

Our hopes for the future may perhaps be defined by an interrogation of the past. The English drama rose suddenly to its greatness when the control of the companies of actors came into the hands of the authors. When Marlowe, Kyd, Greene, Peele, and Shakespeare began writing for the stage they found ready to their hand a body of skilled comic actors, men of the type of Tarleton and Kemp. These men gave delight to the populace, and not a little trouble to the dramatists. Shakespeare alone, of the names mentioned above, seems to have adapted his plays perfectly, though not without protest, to the requirements of the professional clown—and perhaps the much discussed mixture of mirth with tragedy was his necessity not his choice. But the rest of the actors, and especially the actors of the great tragic parts, were all to train, and they can have got their instructions from no one but the playwrights; Alleyn, perhaps, chiefly from Marlowe; Burbage from Shakespeare.

The case of France is yet more striking. When the Renaissance drama, which was to develop, a century later, into the drama of Corneille and Racine, first arose in France, it found the stage already in possession of fully organized and highly privileged companies of actors, who devoted their energies entirely to the production (how modern it all sounds!) of Moralities and Farces. To secure the services of these men was impossible, even had it been desirable; and the plays of Jodelle and his successors were produced by friends of the authors, companies of amateurs, who, for all their lack of technical training, understood the ideas that inspired the new attempt.

I conclude with a conditional prophecy. If the new century shall be lucky enough to witness a dramatic revival, that revival will be the work not of actors, but of dramatic authors, who will collect their own companies, train their own actors, secure, if need be, their own patrons, find their own public in the service of their own ideas. The difficulties of such an attempt are great; by professional actors they will be represented as insuperable. Stage-craft, it will be said, is a business that takes some learning; Lamb, in his farce of Mr. H., Browning, in A Blot on the 'Scutcheon, failed from ignorance of the rudimentary principle that an audience must not be kept ignorant of a secret that is influencing the behaviour of the chief characters on the stage. So be it; but perhaps it is easier for Lamb and Browning to acquaint themselves with these matters, which, after all, are within the reach of a very ordinary intelligence, than it is for the seasoned deviser of "curtains" to come by a live dramatic idea. It may well be easier to teach selected amateurs to speak audibly than to teach an average professional company to forgo the over-emphasis, the dreadful mechanical liveliness, that murders poetry.

I know that there exists a strong movement to maintain and revive the "classical" English drama on our stage, and if I make little account of it in this connexion it is because the credit of literature cannot be maintained solely by reprints, or reproductions, of the classics. It would be an encouraging sign if a little more boldness in revival were possible. Is this generation never to set eyes on the matchless comedies of Congreve and Vanbrugh? It is true that to set them before an audience accustomed to the modern composite of sentiment and farce would be like trying to introduce chess into a skittle alley. And while the revivalists deserve gratitude, honour must also be paid to those actors and managers who have shown themselves willing to produce new plays of more than merely popular pretensions. But the redemption of the drama, it may safely be predicted, will not come from these. The actor-manager, in fact, is related to real dramatic literature very much as the speculative builder is related to architecture. There are many speculative builders; some of them are good and honest men. They are not hostile to good art—if their public wants it and will pay for it. They think poorly of architecture, for they have notions of their own, effective and original, with which, even to the diminution of their profits, they indulge themselves and their clients. The suburbs of modern large cities are the monuments of their industry. Now, if a speculative builder were to offer employment to a promising architect (I am not sure that the thing has ever been heard of), would the acceptance of the offer inaugurate a renaissance in domestic architecture? Would it not rather mean that the architect had set himself to work under impossible conditions, and would find that he must either escape from his engagement or adapt himself violently to the requirements and ideas of his ill-chosen patron? The parable needs no moral; reason and experience show that when the modern theatre patronizes literature, it is not the theatre that becomes literary, but literature that becomes stagey.

THE "BOZ," AND OTHER LITERARY CLUBS.

The "annual gathering" of the "Boz" Club took place at Rochester last Saturday, and its proceedings were duly reported in the daily Press. It is not so very long ago that a morning paper was instituting inquiries as to whether there was, or was going to be, a "Boz" Club. Now that the club has entertained the Mayor of Rochester at the "Bull," there can be no question of its corporate existence, and it takes an honourable place in a class of association which is more popular in America than it is here.

This is, of course, the age of clubs. Of literary clubs, or societies, some are of that social, not to say Bohemian, type which was characteristic of the days of Dr. Johnson, when coteries of authors foregathered at coffee-houses to smoke, drink, and "have a good talk." At the "Turk's Head," in Gerrard-street, Soho, was held the "Literary Club" founded by Dr. Johnson, Burke, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and others. The same tavern had been the rendezvous of the Society of Artists, and from it (as recorded in Fry's "London") was presented the petition to George III for patronage, which resulted in the founding of the Royal Academy of Arts.

Many clubs have been founded in honour of and named after famous writers with the object of encouraging the study of their authors' works. Such clubs as the Urban, the Savage, the Whitefriars, and that known by the quaint designation, "The Sette of Odde Volumes," do not devote their attention exclusively to a particular writer; their scope is broader, their lectures and discussions (if they have any) bearing generally upon matters of literary or artistic interest. Of clubs bearing the cognomen of great writers a number exist both in Great Britain and America. In Forster's "Life of Dickens" mention is made of the Shakespeare Society, of which Procter, Talfourd, Macready, Thackeray, Blanchard, Charles Knight, Douglas Jerrold, Maclise, Stanfield, George Cattermole, Tom Landseer, Frank Stone, Forster, and Dickens himself were members, and at the meetings (says Forster) "out of much enjoyment and many disputings, there arose, from Dickens and the rest of us, plenty of after-dinner oratory." To-day we have the New Shakespeare Society, with Mr. P. Z. Round as Hon. Sec., which is presumably a revival of the older institution.

The Chaucer Society is mainly concerned in fostering the publication of the works of that author. The same remark applies to the Bacon Society, of which Mrs. Kindersley is hon. secretary, and which issues a periodical called "Baconiana"; and there is an English Goethe Society. There are clubs, too, named after Dr. Johnson and Oliver Goldsmith. The brotherhood of the Johnson Club dined a little while ago at the worthy Doctor's favourite house-of-call, the Cheshire Cheese. This club flourishes greatly, and at the last annual dinner a paper on "Rasselas" was read by the then newly-elected Prior, Colonel Keene of Bath, which became a text for witty speeches by Mr. Augustine Birrell and other good Johnsonians. The members of the Goldsmith Society, besides indicating their reverence for the poet in more substantial ways, render homage to his memory by placing wreaths upon his tombstone in the Temple on the anniversaries of his death, and on the last occasion of observing this event an aged admirer recited selections from "The Traveller" and "The Deserted Village." The recently-organized Cowper Society (of which Mr. Thomas Wright of Olney is hon. secretary) has for its object "the publication of the unpublished writings of William Cowper, and of manuscripts and original essays relating to him and his circle." The Ruskin Society of Birmingham was founded in 1896 by Mr. J. Howard Whitehouse, the hon. secretary. Writing to Mr. Whitehouse at the time of its inception, Mr. Ruskin said: "I think that you might with grace and truth take the name of 'The Society of the Rose'—meaning the English wild rose—the object of the society being to promote such English learning and life as can abide where it grows." This name was therefore incorporated in the title of the society, which pledges itself to endeavour "to form a centre of Union for Students and others interested in Mr. Ruskin's writings; to promote the study and circulation of his works by means of lectures, discussions, and the issuing of such publications as may be deemed advisable; to influence public opinion, in relation to Arts and Ethics, on lines which he has indicated; and, generally, to encourage such life and learning as may fitly and usefully abide in this country." The society issues a quarterly journal called Saint George, in which are printed the lectures delivered before the members, and other matter; a library of Ruskin's works is available for the use of members; and annual excursions are made to places of interest. A few days after the Master's death, a Ruskin union was formed in London to promote the study of his writings, and it has already received the support of many distinguished men and women. The Edinburgh Sir Walter Scott Club is a flourishing institution. Robert Burns is similarly honoured by the existence of two clubs bearing his name, one in Edinburgh and the other in Carlisle; the former has lately been endeavouring to incite the school children of Edinburgh to a closer study of the works of the Ayrshire poet by the offer of various prizes, and a good deal of success has attended this effort.

In America—that is, the United States—Literary Clubs are domiciled largely. Chicago can boast a Dante Society; Cambridge, a Shakespeare Society, with Dr. William Rolfe as President; Boston, a Browning Society, the members of which direct their attention exclusively to the writings of Robert Browning; Waltham (near Boston), a Browning-Emerson Club, presided over by Mr. Charles Malloy—a close friend and conservator of the fame of Emerson. Some years ago there was a monthly gathering of scholars, including such men as Lowell, Longfellow, Parsons, &c., with Professor Charles Eliot Norton as president, who devoted their attention to Dante. For these particulars of American Literary Societies the writer is indebted to Mrs. Adelaide H. Garland, herself the founder and president of one of the most successful institutions of this character, viz., the All Around Dickens Club, whose headquarters are in Boston, Mass. Organized in 1894, this Club (essentially a ladies' club) numbers some fifty members, these being supplemented by honorary members and corresponding members of both sexes. The list of honorary members includes the names of members of the Dickens family and of many who are distinguished in literature, both in England and America. The object of the All Around Dickens Club is "to study the writings of Charles Dickens, to create a greater interest in them, and to promote united intellectual and social alliance"; its motto is "Stand by"—"Do everything at your best."

In England there is a Dickens Club, an informal affair, the home of which is in Birmingham. Mr. William Farrow is its president, and its members meet to read and discuss the writings of their hero, and indulge in summer excursions to Dickensland, &c. Strange to say, until quite lately, no Club devoted to the study of Dickens was to be found in London. It is true that there has existed during the past few years a fraternity calling itself "The Dickens Society," of which Mr. Edwin Drew is the ruling spirit; but, like the Birmingham Club, it is not a formal organization, confining itself merely to the anniversary celebration of Dickens' birthday by means of concerts, and of his death-day by the placing of floral offerings upon his tomb in Poets' Corner. Some months ago Mr. Percy Fitzgerald—one of the most ardent of Dickens' disciples—gave to the Press some particulars as to the formation of the "Boz" Club. Its headquarters are at the Athenæum, and it originally consisted of members of the Athenæum who knew Dickens personally, including Lord James of Hereford, Mr. Marcus Stone, R.A. (the illustrator of "Our Mutual Friend"), Mr. Luke Fildes, R.A. (the illustrator of "Edwin Drood"), and others who foregathered at the Athenæum, about a year ago, to dine together by invitation of the genial host, Mr. Fitzgerald himself. So pleasant was the "love feast" that the worthy host determined it should be the germ of something in the form of a club commemorative of Dickens. Accordingly, a "Boz" Club was instituted, and at the first regular Dinner, also given at the Athenæum Club, on June 24, 1900, the members present were:—Lord James of Hereford in the chair (Boz's own Gadshill chair, now the property of the Athenæum), Lord Acton, Mr. Marcus Stone, Mr. Luke Fildes, the Rev. Professor Bonney, F.R.S., Mr. Augustine Birrell, K.C., Mr. Henry F. Dickens, K.C., and the Hon. W. Warren Vernon; some guests intimately associated with the study of Boz's writings were invited—Mr. S. L. Clemens (Mark Twain), Judge Bompas, Hon. F. Latham, Mr. Egerton Castle, and Mr. Edward Dicey, C.B. Mr. Fitzgerald himself, who originated the idea of the "Boz" Club, acts as hon. sec., and is responsible for the production of No. 1 of "The Boz Club Papers," recently issued to the members, in which an account is given of the Club's inception. At the first regular dinner it was felt that the rule as to membership being confined to those admirers of Dickens who were already members of the Athenæum Club—and so constituting a club within a club—was against the spirit of the Athenæum rules. The President's suggestion that it should comprehend all Dickensians of whatever degree met with approval, and a small committee was appointed to deal with the question, with the result that, besides the original members (which included, in addition to those already mentioned, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, G.C.B., Sir Henry Irving, the late Sir Walter Besant, Mr. Andrew Lang, and Mr. Charles Kent), the following were elected: Mr. W. P. Frith, R.A., the Very Rev. Dean Hole, Mr. F. C. Burnand, Professor J. Churton Collins, Mr. Moy Thomas, Mr. Hamilton Aidé, Mr. F. Inderwick, K.C., Mr. Frederic G. Kitton, Sir Lewis Morris, Mr. G. Storey, A.R.A., the Hon. F. Latham, Mr. Egerton Castle, Sir Squire Bancroft, Mr. Clement Scott, Mr. John Hollingshead, Mr. Francesco Berger, Mr. George Herbert, Mr. George Gissing, Mr. J. Ashby-Sterry, Mr. Oscar Browning, Mr. J. C. Parkinson, Mr. R. Brudenell Carter, and Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and one or two others have since joined. Of this number, one half knew Dickens intimately, which (as Mr. Fitzgerald observes) is surprising when we recall the fact that thirty-one years have elapsed since the novelist's death. Some may perhaps urge that the "Boz" Club is still of too exclusive a character, and that what is wanted is a Dickens Club in London to which admirers and students of the great novelist may be admitted as members by election, on payment of a moderate fee. As a matter of fact, the All Around Dickens Club, of Boston, U.S.A., has been organized on these lines. Perhaps the proposed Dickens Museum, when realized, could be utilized as the home of a Dickens Club. Meanwhile the "Boz" Club is worthy of its eponymous hero, and rules for its guidance have been judiciously drafted. It is proposed that the members shall dine together on the anniversaries of Dickens' birth and death, and some subject of Dickensian interest be brought forward at each dinner; while in the summer there may be expeditions to localities associated with Dickens, such as that recently undertaken to Rochester. Certainly Mr. Fitzgerald's idea that other members of the "Boz" Club should be induced to imitate him in supplying periodically, at their own expense, further numbers of "The Boz Club Papers" is worthy of serious consideration, for in this way many interesting reminiscences of the Novelist might see the light which perhaps might not be "of sufficient importance to be dealt with in more official shape." The wrapper bears an excellent portrait of Dickens, from an unfamiliar photograph.

THE DRAMA.

"L'AIGLON."

There is, I fancy, a general feeling of disappointment over L'Aiglon, now that Londoners have had the opportunity of seeing it played. Its strong patriotic appeal ceases, of course, to be operative in London, where the play comes to judgment merely as a play, like any other. For similar reasons Henry V., say, could not claim the critical indulgence in Paris which it is always sure of obtaining in London. Considered merely as a play, L'Aiglon is essentially undramatic, because it lacks unity of theatrical impression, nor does it even present a series of definite and decisive actions. What unity it has is a unity of idea; it raises the ghost of the Napoleonic legend; but, in the language of the spiritualistic séance, the ghost will not consent to "materialize." It may be said that the unity of some of Shakespeare's chronicle-plays (and L'Aiglon is a chronicle-play—the "tragical historie" of the education, futile aspirations, and premature death of the Duke of Reichstadt) is also a unity of idea only, but then there is no chronicle-play of Shakespeare which fails, as this play fails, to present a series of definite and decisive actions. It may also be said that indecision and inaction are of the very essence of the story, which is that of a Napoleonic Hamlet, a "Hamlet blanc," as they call him. The answer is that Hamlet, tragedy of irresolution though it be at its core, does on its surface contrive to present much bustling and even violently melodramatic action.

In lieu of action, M. Rostand gives us curious details, "documentary" bric-à-brac and "literary" embroidery. These details make amusing reading—L'Aiglon from first to last is excellent reading—but are mere waste in the theatre. Thus, Metternich says the French must not

. . . laisser trop Monsieur Royer-Collard
Venir devant le roi déplier son foulard.

The allusion to Royer-Collard and his "foulard" passes unperceived. Some one mentions "Les Méditations." "Ah!" cries Marie-Louise—

Ah! je connais l'auteur!—Ce sera moins maussade!—
Il a dîné chez nous—L'Attaché d'Ambassade!

M. Rostand is evidently pleased with the idea that Marie-Louise would naturally think of Lamartine merely as a young diplomat who had dined at her table. But on the stage this little touch is quite valueless. A young man from Paris is asked by the Duke of Reichstadt who he is and why he has turned Bonapartist conspirator. M. Rostand cannot resist the chance of giving us an 1830 "cours de littérature romantique."

Ce que je suis? Je ne sais pas. Voilà mon mal.
Suis-je? Je voudrais être—et ce n'est pas commode.
Je lis Victor Hugo. Je récite son Ode
A la Colonne. Je vous conte tout cela
Parce que tout cela, mon Dieu, c'est toute la Jeunesse! Je m'ennuie avec extravagance;
Et je suis, Monseigneur, artiste et Jeune France.
De plus, carbonaro, pour vous servir.

In the theatre all this goes for nothing.

Details of this kind are purely irrelevant. Others, though intended to have dramatic significance, are, in practice, ineffective. Thus, there is the set of Austrian toy-soldiers which Flambeau turns into toy-Frenchmen, in order that the Duke may go into raptures over the Grande Armée. There is the collection of Napoleonic odds and ends which Flambeau takes from his pocket to convince the Duke that Paris is still Bonapartist. There is Napoleon's old hat, which is placed on the table, in order that Metternich may apostrophize it -

Toi, dont il s'éventait après chaque conquête,
Toi, qui ne pouvais pas, de cette main distraite,
Tomber sans qu'aussitôt un roi te ramassât,
Tu n'es plus aujourd'hui qu'un décrochez-moi-ça,
Et si je te jetais, ce soir, par la croisée,
Où donc finirais-tu, vieux bicorne ?

Flambeau answers "au musée !" and herein speaks more truly than he knows, for one feels that all these toys and curios are articles whose proper place is a museum, not a playhouse.

Leaving the miscellaneous assortment of 1830 allusions and Napoleonic relics, one finds two really fine imaginative moments in the play. One is at the close of the third act, when Metternich drags the young Duke to a mirror, to show him by his features that he is his mother's not his father's son, a Hapsburg not a Napoleon. The other is at the end of the fifth act, on the field of Wagram, where under the hallucination of night and nervous exaltation the Duke hears the moans of the wounded and battle-cries and "drums and trappings" (how, by the way, that great dreamer Sir Thomas Browne would have appreciated this idea !) and sees the spectres of the innumerable dead. In reading that scene, as it is sketched out in print, one feels that John Bright's "Angel of Death" has passed over the scene, and "you can almost hear the beating of his wings." Both these scenes, I say, are inspired by a fine imagination, but it is the imagination of a poet rather than a dramatist, for neither scene on the stage at Her Majesty's gives you the thrill which you can hardly fail to get from reading it in the book.

I have tried to account for the vague feeling of disappointment produced by the play as acted. Nevertheless, undramatic as it is, L'Aiglon is a remarkable piece, one which no spectator is likely to forget in a hurry. The subject has a silent pathos of its own—sunt lacrymæ rerum. M. Rostand has turned a rather obscure bit of history to good artistic if not entirely to good theatrical purpose; and his workmanship is always delicate and distinguished. These two qualities, delicacy and distinction, are also the qualities of Mme. Bernhardt's acting as the hero of the play. As there is something womanish in this part, we are not offended by her sex; indeed, in her white uniform, she makes a very gallant youth. For she still contrives—wonderful woman!—to look quite young, her bearing is grace itself, and her voice has regained something of its old quality. The only criticism we will venture on her make-up is that she is a little too "wiggly" for our taste. She is the whitest of "white Hamlets," a sweet prince, a melancholy prince, and—what Hamlet was not but the Duke of Reichstadt was—an anæmic prince. As a tonic for the anæmia you have the "Vieux Grogard" of M. Coquelin, whose voice stirs the blood like a trumpet in his opening tirade—

Et nous, les petits, les obscurs, les sans-grades,
Nous qui marchions fourbus, blessés, crottés, malades

Et nous battant, maigres, nus, noirs et gais,
Nous, nous ne l'étions pas, peut-être, fatigués ?

He cocks his eye, drops the corner of his mouth, is "égrillard" at times (as over the "sein" of the "nounou"), swaggers like Mascarille, is nimble-fingered like Scapin, or "digne" like Poirier, or flamboyant and superb like Cyrano—is, in short, the inimitable Coquelin that we all know. There is a "gusto"—that, at any rate, is the word Hazlitt and his contemporaries would have used—in M. Coquelin's acting which, crowning and combining all his other qualities, puts him at the head of living comic actors. He is a comedian "in the grand style," and I for one consider it no hyperbole to say that the present chance of seeing him at Her Majesty's makes life for the moment distinctly worth living.

THE BOOK OF THE BOXERS.

CHINA AND THE ALLIES. By A. HENRY SAVAGE LANDOR.
(Heinemann. 30s. n.)

Since his interchange of recriminations with Mr. Douglas Freshfield, acting as the spokesman of the Royal Geographical Society, there have been two opinions as to Mr. Savage Landor's accuracy as an observer and reporter; but he is, at least, a picturesque and lively writer, and in the case of recent events in China, a few inaccuracies and exaggerations more or less can add but little to the perplexity of the seeker after truth. On the whole, therefore, we can welcome and praise his book. It is long; it covers all the ground; it is richly illustrated; it is entertaining. It is not the work of an expert or of a political philosopher. But it is the work of a man who says what he thinks—and this must be taken for what it is worth.

Mr. Savage Landor has his own theory of the origin of the Boxer movement. He attributes it to the fanaticism of Buddhist priests. He had his own little trouble with the Buddhists a few years ago, and possibly the personal equation must be reckoned with in accepting this opinion. This argument practically amounts to little more than that they must be guilty of the atrocities because they are capable of them. As a matter of fact, one of the most redoubtable of the leaders of the revolt against "foreign devils" was a Mahomedan, so that the solidarity of Chinese exclusiveness seems to depend on something less than religious conviction, and Buddhist superstition to have been rather its instrument than its originating cause. But Buddhist fanaticism is not the only fanaticism that Mr. Savage Landor criticizes. That of the Christian missionaries also excites his derision. A few of the missionaries, he admits, are men of tact who have done good. The majority, he maintains, both male and female, only make themselves ridiculous. In particular he maintains that their habit of adopting the Chinese dress is a mistake.

It has so far been the impression among supporters of missions in the East that, to spread the Gospel—and with it civilization—among the heathen, anybody is good enough. Thereupon, and presumably infatuated by the good they imagine they can accomplish, and partly attracted by the apparently handsome salary offered, a great number of unattractive young women with suburban ideas and education have found their way to the remotest corners of China. There, while faithfully preserving their characteristic Anglo-Saxon stride and stiffness of body, they parade about in ungracefully-worn Chinese robes, quite as inappropriate and unbecoming to them as European clothes to Chinese or Japanese women. One would suppose it obvious that one should never begin serious work by turning the laugh on oneself, and it is with sorrow, even with pain, that one sees these poor girls of one's own nationality driven to make themselves ridiculous. Not only are they made ridiculous, they are also looked down upon by the natives, for, with Chinese clothes, Chinese etiquette needs to be adopted to cover endless misunderstandings and avoid insult; for as we ourselves wear clothes appropriate to various seasons and to special occasions, and as we wear our garments in certain recognized ways only—not the wrong way up or inside out—so do the Chinese, and the breach of these complicated rules, very difficult to master in their infinitesimal details, invariably leads to unpleasantness, offence, and contempt—just the three things, one would suppose, that missionaries ought to avoid in trying to earn the respect of the natives.

The folly of sending these ladies into the interior where they are exposed to the most appalling dangers is insisted upon in emphatic language. We can hardly regret the fact that Mr. Landor gives a fuller recital than does any other writer whom we have read of the atrocities committed in the various mission centres. The facts, though they have not been actually suppressed, have been kept very much in the background by the official representatives of the Powers: no doubt for fear lest a popular indignation, akin to that which sent America to war with Spain, should commit them to a crusade which they are afraid of. None the less, in view of Sir Robert Hart's ingenuous proposal that we should abandon the principle of extra-territoriality in our dealings with China, they are facts that ought to be made widely known. Public opinion on this matter will hardly be unaffected by Mr. Savage Landor's careful and painful relation.

There is humour as well as horror, however, in Mr. Savage Landor's pages. He naturally has a good deal to say about the looting both at Tien-tsin and at Peking. He admits that there was plenty of it; but he holds that, in the circumstances, it was justified, and he contradicts the allegations so frequently heard that the methods of the Russians were particularly savage, and those of the Americans particularly honest. According to Mr. Landor, the favourite amusement of the Americans was the smashing of costly porcelain; what they wanted to carry off was gold or silver. Tommy Atkins, on the other hand, began by chasing fowls and ducks, and then proceeded to annex embroidered silk gowns for his lady friends at home; while the French delighted in looting hams, the great joy of the Russian was to steal musical boxes, and the Japanese went through the shops and houses in the spirit of connoisseurs of works of art.

Mr. Savage Landor entered Peking with the troops. He gives a good account of the fighting, and a still better account of the proceedings after the Legations had been relieved. The description of the march through the Forbidden City is particularly illustrative of Mr. Landor's method:—

In front stood prominent the lumbering, bony figure of Sir Claude MacDonald, in an ample grey suit of tennis clothes and a rakish Panama slouch hat, which he wore at a dangerous angle. He walked jauntily and with gigantic strides, moving his arms about as if preparing for a boxing match. To his right the Russian Minister seemed quite reposeful by contrast. He was clad in dark clothes, and bore himself with dignity. Next to him came the representative of the French Republic, in a garb which combined the requirements of the Bois de Boulogne on a Sunday with the conveniences of tropical attire on a weekday. Mr. Conger, the American Minister, strode ponderously behind, dressed in white cottons and military gaiters, while a horde of secretaries, students, and interpreters, in various fancy garbs, made part of the distinguished crowd.

A striking incident of the march, which is new to us, is recorded:—

Much to the evident annoyance of General Linievitch, a number of officers of the allies made direct for these coffers, smashed them open, and filled their pockets with what they could get, regardless of the feelings of the spectators, who stood aghast. A worse thing happened. Out in the court, as one of the Chinese officials who was escorting the visitors stood impassive, with his white tasselled hat, and a long necklace of amber and jade, with pendants, the emblem of his rank, dangling on his chest, a military officer approached him and with a bow removed the valued necklace from the Chinaman's neck, placed it round his own, and with a "Ta-ta" and graceful wave of the hand, walked away with it. A complaint was later made of this to Sir Robert Hart, but, unfortunately, the necklace could never be recovered.

And we may conclude this review of the most readable, if not the best, book that has been written on the strange events of last summer with a story of an American practical joke:—

The west side of the Chinese city outside the Ch'ien gate was placed under their protection, and when the Chinese began to return to their homes, a few days after our entry, they implored the soldiers to write them notices to post on the front doors of their houses so as to keep out looters. A soldier wrote, in gigantic letters:—"U. S. A. Boys, plenty of whisky and tobacco in here."

Every soldier that passed the door banged it open with a kick, and demanded a smoke and a drink, while the puzzled and concerned Chinaman inside pointed to the notice on the door, until it was explained that the writing on it was the principal reason of the many calls he received.

MODERN ITALY.

ITALY TO-DAY. By BOLTON KING and THOMAS OKEY.
(Nisbet. 12s. n.)

This volume may, we suppose, be regarded as a kind of sequel to Mr. Bolton King's "History of Italian Unity." The preface contains a long list of persons who have supplied information, but does not specify the share of the work which each of the two writers has individually contributed. It is embarrassing to deal with authorship in the plural; we shall therefore, simply for convenience, speak of Mr. King as the writer.

He claims to have "approached the various problems without prepossessions"; yet, true as this may be with regard to economic or strictly social questions, no reader will fail to detect in political matters a strong leaning to the party of the Extreme Left, especially its Socialist wing. Unstinted praise is bestowed on this party in the review of the various groups, and there are straws showing from which quarter mainly the wind of information has blown. There is the allegation that Depretis "bought" Crispi from opposition by a seat in the Cabinet in 1887; there is the unfavourable view of the character of the late King, who is said to have lowered the popularity of the Throne; there is finally the assertion that our South African policy has aroused "very strong resentment" against England among all classes. Englishmen visiting the country have not heard much of this resentment except in the mouths of extreme politicians. It may be, as Mr. King thinks, that the future of Italy rests largely with the ultra-Radical groups in the Chamber. But at present they are untried men; and if they are to win and keep the confidence of a country in which Conservative forces are strong (and with prosperity are likely to be stronger) they will have to discard their crude theories and cultivate a statesmanlike moderation not generally characteristic of extremists. For the moment their outlook is promising from the deep-seated corruption which has discredited the older parties; but they will find it more difficult to govern than to obstruct, harder also to remedy abuses than to denounce them. The "minimum programme" of the Socialists seems in some respects moderate; but in a country where political education is at a low ebb, and where the electorate is now barely seven per cent. of the population, "universal suffrage for adults of both sexes" sounds rather a large order.

For many years to come the supreme need of Italy is peace—peace internal as well as external. The new King struck the right note when he urged upon the nation the necessity of honesty and concord. Yet the prospects of concord do not look bright in Mr. King's pages, partly from the unequal development of the North and the South, but still more from the variety of causes at work to produce disorder. No one who was in Milan from May 7 to May 11, 1898, could doubt that there is dangerously inflammable material in the larger cities; had Mr. King been there, he would hardly describe the riots of those days as a pitiless massacre of innocent victims by a brutal soldiery, nor would he throw all the blame, as he tries to do, upon the "Moderates" and the authorities. He says that these riots were the result of "accident." It may be so, in the sense that the outbreak was unpremeditated; but "accidents" like these do not happen in well-regulated States. If Mr. Burns, for instance, like the Milan Deputy, were to tell his constituents that their weapons were "the vote and the carbine," and if, shortly after, the people of Battersea were to barricade the street-tear up the railways and tramways and meet the order to disperse with volleys of paving-stones, the occurrence would not seem quite accidental. No Government worthy of the name could have hesitated to proclaim martial law, although it may be granted that the penal and repressive measures which followed were a monument of political un wisdom. Mr. King thinks that the Milan riots have done good "by creating a plain issue between progress and reaction." This is very probable; and so too has the tragedy at Monza, by accentuating the national dread of anarchy.

In one quarter especially a more conciliatory spirit is said to prevail. The Clericals have too often acted in the past as if Italy's difficulty were the Pope's opportunity, and the forbearance of the Italian Government has been rewarded by the order to Catholics not to vote at the elections. Mr. King, however, adduces evidence to show that this veto is largely disregarded; and he thinks that the next Pope will probably remove it altogether. M. Ollivier said that "a Pope reconciled to Italy would lose the rest of the world." If so, the Vatican is in an awkward dilemma. For it is becoming plain that any attempt to restore the Temporal Power by compulsion from without would mean the ruin of Italian Catholicism. Is there then no chance of a compromise? Mr. King has it "on excellent authority" that the Vatican would be satisfied with the Leonine City—i.e., St. Peter's and part of the Janiculum—in full sovereignty and the transference of the Italian capital to Florence or some other city. But this is an impossible solution. It would mean surrendering a point on which Italy is practically unanimous. And as it is a first principle with the Papacy never explicitly to abandon its aims, the deadlock seems likely to continue.

We can only deal briefly with the interesting chapters on the general state of the country. The condition of the finances is deplorable; but, in spite of the mistakes of her rulers, Italy has progressed marvellously since she achieved her unity. Mr. King passes in review the various systems of land tenure, the statistics of emigration, the wretched state of the peasantry in many districts, and the defects in education and in poor relief despite the extensive charities; but he has a remarkable story to tell of the growth of manufactures and trade, and of the efforts recently made to improve agriculture. That so much should have been done already in these respects in a country so poor as Italy should give Englishmen food for reflection. Her principal industry of silk has nearly doubled its exports in the last four years; in cotton manufacture she is becoming a serious rival to ourselves; and if the power latent in her rivers could be made available by electricity she would overcome the great drawback of the want of native coal. In agriculture the small proprietor is learning to look for improvement to his own initiative rather than to the State. Village banks are supplying him with capital on easy terms; agrarian syndicates and co-operative dairies are teaching him the power of association; and a system of local instruction is springing up which would put our backward districts to shame. If Italy could only find some heaven-born statesman to bring purity and economy into her finance, and to readjust her local government, she would, given peace and domestic tranquillity, rank in time among the most prosperous of the nations. But till then her rulers should be content to let her play a more modest part.

In the closing chapter the authors give a rapid but able sketch of recent achievements in Italian literature. If it be really a fact that no poet, and hardly a novelist, makes a livelihood by his pen, those achievements must be pronounced considerable. In Carducci Italy possesses a poet of the first order, and by his critical studies on the great writers of the past (not mentioned here) he has raised the level of Italian scholarship. Villari as historian, Lombroso as criminologist, D'Annunzio and Fogazzaro as novelists, have all found fame beyond the bounds of their native land; and in these pages there is a useful, if cursory, estimate of their work. But it is strange, so soon after the death of Verdi, to find no word upon the subject of Italian music.

MR. MEREDITH'S POEMS.

A READING OF LIFE, WITH OTHER POEMS. By GEORGE MEREDITH. (Constable. 6s. n.)

In his new volume of poems Mr. George Meredith supplies a sort of companion to "A Reading of Earth." In that collection he set forth, more clearly perhaps than elsewhere, his sense of the earth-spirit which stirs in all sensitive natures, and institutes a relationship of brotherhood between man and the inanimate children of earth. In the present instance the point of view is changed, and life is regarded from its spiritual side, and as engaged in a species of perpetual conflict. As so often in Mr. Meredith's poetry, the animating thought is involved in so many subtle, interlacing tendrils of imagination and under-thought that at first sight it appears more elaborate and intricate than it really is; but reduced to its lowest denomination the thesis of the poem is exceedingly simple. Two spirits are in conflict in man's nature; the athletic, energetic instinct, which Mr. Meredith portrays as the spirit of Artemis, and the indulgent, languorous instinct, which is the spirit of Aphrodite. Both alike make insistent appeal to human nature, but neither is to be trusted exclusively. The man of unimpeded action starves his spiritual side; the man of passion loses the name of actor and dissipates his power in futile imaginings. It is in the middle way that sanity lies; the sane mind in the sane body is secured by a divided allegiance to the two goddesses.

This is a simple enough theme, but in its treatment Mr. Meredith, as is his wont, illuminates his work with penetrating and poignant thoughts no less than with many delicate and exquisite touches of the imagination. The two pictures of Artemis and Aphrodite, in particular, afford him opportunity for well-wrought and carefully arranged contrast. Here is Artemis:—

Nought of perilous she recks;
Valour clothes her open breast;
Sweet beyond the thrill of sex;
Hallowed by the sex confessed.
Huntress arrowy to pursue,
Colder she than sunless dew,
She, that breath of upper air;
Ay, but never lyrist sang,
Draught of Bacchus never sprang
Blood the bliss of gods to share,
High o'er sweep of eagle wings,
Like the run with her, when rings
Clear her rally, and her dart
In the forest's cavern heart,
Tells of her victorious aim.

And here Aphrodite:—

Shorn of attendant Graces she can use
Her natural snares to make her will supreme.
A simple nymph it is, inclined to muse
Before the leader foot shall dip in stream;
One arm at curve along a rounded thigh;
Her firm new breasts each pointing its own way.
A knee half bent to shade its fellow shy,
Where innocence, not nature, signals nay.

It is needless to point out the extreme felicity of this beautiful picture, or to expatiate upon the subtle and sincere intention of the line "Hallowed by the sex confessed" in the equally vivid interpretation of Artemis. Such beauties are clear upon the surface. But it may be added that the whole volume is marked by a much greater degree of lucidity and poetic grace than Mr. Meredith sometimes allows himself in poetry, and that the corresponding gain in charm and persuasiveness is clearly marked. It is true that there are still a few of those discordant and manufactured words from which his later manner is never, unfortunately, free, and that there are sometimes lines, more especially in the hexametrical versions of Homer, where eccentricity gets the better of melody. But these are rather exceptions than commonplaces ; and the prevailing note of the volume is one of diverse and delicate harmonies.

They have no song, the sedges dry,
And still they sing.
It is within my breast they sing,
As I pass by.
Within my breast they touch a string,
They wake a sigh.
There is but sound of sedges dry ;
In me they sing.

And again :—

If that thou hast the gift of strength, then know
Thy part is to uplift the trodden low ;
Else in a giant's grasp until the end
A hopeless wrestler shall thy soul contend.

There is in the first of these a melody, and in the second a lucidity, that could not be surpassed for simplicity and directness of effect. Mr. Meredith is certainly at his best when he is content with these clear and searching methods of expression.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

Old Parish Life.

Dr. Jessopp writes so well that we are always glad when he collects his magazine articles into a volume. BEFORE THE GREAT PILLAGE (Unwin, 7s. 6d.) is as good as any of its predecessors, which is saying a great deal. Its history is sound, its expression vivid, its enthusiasm restrained by judgment, its humour fresh and cheering. What better can we say of the literary recreation of a country parson ? Such books as Dr. Jessopp writes make us recognize the truth of the oft-quoted saying that in English country vicarages some of the best work for English literature and learning has been done ; they make us regret, too, that it is so rarely rewarded. Three lectures on parish life in England in the Middle Ages are the core of the book. The points emphasized (perhaps, in view of the recent work of Professor Ashley and others, a little too strongly) are that the parish was "the community of the township organized for church purposes," and the nature of the corporate ownership of parochial property. On that follows a severe indictment of the robbers of Edward VI.'s day even more than of Henry VIII. A practical plea, which every historian and archaeologist should endorse, is added for the handing over the custody and ownership of the churches all over England to "somebody," so that the members of the Church of England should not be the only religious body in the land which cannot "call their churches their own." After this comes a remark by the way, that "only once in the history of the Reformed Church of England have the Bishops as a body known their own mind." A paper on the baptism of Clovis shows that Dr. Jessopp is well up in French historical criticism, and some charming natural history sketches remind us that he is a man of many accomplishments. "Before the Great Pillage" is the book, in the delightful old phrase, of a scholar and a gentleman.

Lady Margaret Sackville's Poems.

We noted with pleasure the appearance in the Thrush last month of a remarkable poem by Lady Margaret Sackville, and her POEMS, which have just been published by Mr. John Lane (3s. 6d. n.), confirm the impression suggested by "Harmodius and Aristogeiton"—the impression that here we have a writer who may in time achieve something worthy of the traditions of English poetry. "Harmodius and Aristogeiton" was too obviously Swinburnian. So is "The Helots" in the volume before us. But nearly every other piece it contains is the fruit of an original talent—of a gift for expression that is clearly derived from close study and enjoyment, not of one master alone, but of all the best poetry in the language. The book reveals an urgent striving after thoughts and forms that shall arouse noble and pleasurable emotion. The first piece, "Pan and the Maiden," gives the clue to the mood in which most of these poems have been written. It is the mood in which the spirit that yearns after the beautiful casts itself back upon the early world that owned the sway of Pan to the times "when the light wave lisp'd 'Greece.'" The other poems of classical origin are interesting mainly as testimony that the writer has sought inspiration in a period that is the safest, on the whole, in which young poets can let their thoughts wander at will, the next desirable being the period of Dante's Italy. To this Lady Margaret Sackville is no stranger, as we may see from "The Death of Beatrice" and "Lorenzo dei Medici." But, after all, it is to the poems of more individual and modern feeling that most readers will turn with greater interest. "The Poet" is a rhapsody full of beautiful, true images, from which we quote two stanzas :—

Beneath the faint far sky at night,
When a cold harvesting of stars
The moon reaps and the dim moonlight
Pours down 'twixt cloudy prison bars,
He moved as one whom no grief mars,

And with wide rapture lost all sense
Of self within the night's cool breath,
Grew portion of all things immense,
Tides infinite of life and death,
And those great words the ocean saith.

We should like to quote all three sonnets on "Nightfall," but must be content with one—"The Earth" :—

Pale, patient with her throbbing heart at rest,
Waiting with half-closed, half-expectant eyes,
Till slumber's lips shall cleave in pitying wise,
Full of sweet comfort, to her brows and breast,
She feels by one and one in the bright West
Fade the long trails of gold, and wavering shades
Leap from lone forests and forgotten glades,
And dance and shimmer at the moon's behest.
What change is on the fields ? The old known land Spreads, by some goddess of the twilight planned,
A cloudy world of formless trees and flowers,
Where with cool hands the placid gardener, night,
Waters the blossoms of the pale moonlight
With quiet dews of unregarded hours.

"Autumn" and "December" are exquisite little impressions, emotional as well as descriptive. We do not think, though, that the wild swan's wings can be said to "creak." "The Man who found Truth" gives fine expression to an idea that has often brought rest to fevered souls. Some lines in it suggest the influence of Clough. Lady Margaret Sackville has clearly the true spirit of poetry in her. Time alone can show whether she will wrap her talent in a napkin or, as we hope rather, increase it a hundredfold, and leave the world the richer for its use.

A Lady at the War.

Miss Violet Brooke-Hunt, already known as a good friend to soldiers, got leave to go to Africa to continue her kind offices to them and make herself generally useful. In A WOMAN'S MEMORIES OF THE WAR (Nisbet, 5s.) she tells us what she was able to do. She writes pleasantly and unpretentiously, and has the gifts of humour and pathos. Our recommendation of the book is warm, though our review of it cannot be long. There are many good anecdotes bearing on the relations between officers and men, and we must find space for one of them :—

A subaltern I know had to bring up a number of cavalry details, chiefly reservists, from Cape Town, and did his best to make his men comfortable, under very uncomfortable conditions. On a cold wet night, for instance, he used up four out of six tins of Maggi soup he had with him, to give them all something hot to drink the last thing. They were all bivouacking out, and one morning he woke up to find a tent-like arrangement of blankets fixed round him. Greatly astonished, he asked his servant what it meant. "It came on to rain pretty stiff, sir," was the answer, "and the men were afraid it would be too much for you, not being hardened to the job as they were. So they drew lots as to who should give up their blankets to keep you dry, and we fixed all this up without waking you."

There would have been no talk of the "plague of women" if all the women had understood their duty as Miss Brooke-Hunt did.

CHINA UNDER THE SEARCHLIGHT, by William Arthur Cornaby (Unwin 6s.), contains much miscellaneous information about Chinese affairs indifferently expressed and arranged. The author appears to know his subject; but he does not know how to make the most of it when writing a book.

IN SIXTY YEARS ON THE TURF (Grant Richards, 21s.) Mr. Charles R. Warren relates the racing experiences of Mr. George Hodgman on his behalf. The book is neither edifying nor well written—few collections of racing men's reminiscences are—but there are a few good stories on matters not connected with the racecourse. The story which tells how the Tichborne claimant gave himself away is one of them:—

Mr. Warner, of the Welsh Harp, was at the time, one of his chief backers, and used to have him out to dine with him at Hendon. But one Sunday came disillusionment. The carving knife cut rather badly, and Mr. Warner could not coax an edge on. "Give it me," said "Sir Roger." And the deftness with which he handled carver and steel was an eye opener for Mr. Warner, who, when their guest was absent from the room, said to his wife "We're done, He's a butcher right enough."

FICTION.

"The Divine Adventurer."

Not since "John Inglesant" has the glamour of Italy so fallen across the pages of a book as in Edward Hutton's FREDERIC UVEDALE (Blackwood, 6s.). As in that classic, the environment is a symbolic setting to a spiritual drama; a dreamer's quest of the perfect life. But the dreamer in this case is of our own more complex and less picturesque time. Frederic Uvedale is the son of a convert to Rome, heir to ideals and exaltations. He justifies his heritage. His boyhood is spent at Farley Court, the Devon home of his family, under the care of Father Antonelli, a scholarly and simple-hearted ecclesiastic. When his pupil passes into the care of the rector of Monksmead, the priest's parting counsel is, "Trust God and follow the light." The years of study there give Frederic the companionship of the child Elianor. Her love of the natural world and joy in its sunshine break across the boy's introspective moods. At Oxford he is swayed by many influences and seeks to steady himself by return to the services of the Roman Catholic Church. Under his brief passion for Elianor stir the deep currents of spiritual unrest. The death of his betrothed frees him with a stunning shock from the thralldom of sense, and he takes refuge in a pilgrimage to Rome, trusting to find there guidance to the higher life. In the salons of the "Blacks" he meets political cardinals and schemers for the restoration of the temporal sovereignty of the Church. He becomes engaged to a passionate woman, Maria, daughter of the Prince San Michele. The Prince is a Bourbon enthusiast, who lives only to serve the King—disrowned and dead. For his dream's sake he becomes the head of a great socialist conspiracy, believing that a democratic uprising might serve the cause of the Church, then be itself disowned and crushed. Life in the old castle of San Michele, with the peasants hailing in hope a new Messiah, and the Prince and his household entombed in futile allegiance to a ghostly King, is a picture as realistic as the grim mountain world, as visionary as the dream-enfolding sky. Frederic Uvedale, still seeking the perfect life, is sent to Milan during the bread riots to safeguard the interests of the Church. The way of peace opens to him when, striving to save the people from the soldiery, the first shot enrols him, the doubting dreamer, in the noble army of martyrs. Intriguing cardinals, unscrupulous socialists, grande dames, and solitary monks are convincingly sketched; while the study of Uvedale himself is one of great psychological insight and literary skill. In the few pages from the diary of Princess Maria is laid bare a woman's heart, quivering beneath the mortmain of that inherited service. The book is full of Italy, of the gold of its sun, of the purple of its twilight, of the wine of its air, across an immemorial Appian Way.

An Egoist.

It is almost impossible, in dealing with Mr. George Gissing's last book, OUR FRIEND THE CHARLATAN (Chapman and Hall, 6s.), to avoid a comparison with "The Egoist" of Mr. Meredith. In many points Dyce Lashmar (who is the charlatan of Mr. Gissing's novel) bears a strong resemblance to the great Sir Willoughby. True, he is not quite the gentleman, and the head of the house of Patterne, with all his faults, was always well-bred; he has no sense of chivalry whatsoever, whereas the baronet preserved some touch of the true feeling even in the most adverse circumstances. But both men laboured under a magnified sense of their own importance; both, curiously enough, found themselves engaged at different times—once at the same time—to three several ladies; and both ended by marrying, as a last resort, the woman whom they had at first ruthlessly sacrificed for the sake of greater attractions. These coincidences are sufficiently remarkable to make some comparison almost inevitable, and it is a comparison from which very few of our novelists could emerge unscathed. Mr. Gissing's work is always interesting; he writes far better than the mob of novelists, and his psychology is wonderfully subtle and acute. Dyce Lashmar is drawn with great power and delicacy; as a character study he is hardly inferior to the Egoist himself, and, indeed, the characters, one and all, with the possible exception of Mrs. Toplady, are unmistakably living men and women. But the story has not the breadth and spacious atmosphere of Mr. Meredith's masterpiece—there is no Crossjay, and no Clara Middleton. This, of course, is to try the book by a lofty standard, but Mr. Gissing invites comparison with the best. His work is very good indeed; his insight and observation very much above the ordinary. He has probed Dyce Lashmar relentlessly—perhaps almost too relentlessly—until we are all but forced to feel pity for a fellow mortal whose soul is so laid bare to the world. And, after all, was the conveyance of that "bio-sociological" theory (from the French of M. Jean Izoulet) so very terrible a matter? Miss Constance Bride, to our thinking, was a little hard on the unhappy man about this business, in spite of the plausibility with which he argued his case. And Miss Bride herself, for some little time, seems to accept Lashmar at his own valuation. We confess that this very sensible young lady rather fails to carry conviction during her engagement. But the book is good enough to read without halting to examine flaws. The characterization is as strong as we get from any writer in these days, and the example of Dyce Lashmar may well be useful to young men with a tendency towards plagiarism and Parliamentary life.

Those who are never tired of the stirring story of military adventure will find that MY LADY OF ORANGE, by H. C. Bailey (Longmans, 6s.), "fills the bill" with entire satisfaction. It is a tale of William the Silent's Netherlands forces pitted against the cruel troops of Alva, and the interest gathers about the exploits of one John Newstead, an English mercenary who in truth is no saint, as he constantly reminds the reader, and is willing to fight for the cause that affords the greater likelihood of the best pay for his three hundred men. To-day he is in Alva's camp, to-morrow planning for Dutch success, anon arraigned as a traitor by each side in turn, and one is not sure that he does not deserve it. But, as he repeats, he is no saint, and as he is a brave fighter he is a fit enough hero. In the end consistency is given to his conduct by a "love interest" without which no such story was ever yet written. The tale is spirited, possesses humour and descriptive power, and represents very fairly the condition of things during this time of turmoil.

THE BARROIS-ASHBURNHAM MSS.

"Purchase for me, without thinking further, all that you discover of rarity. My friend, do not spare my purse." Thus wrote Cicero to Atticus nineteen hundred years ago and the great Roman orator was one of the most enthusiastic collectors of whom we have record. Bertram, fourth Earl of Ashburnham, was actuated by a like desire to possess objects of beauty and of rarity. For the most part, instead of employing an Atticus, he himself made the purchases, guided by fine taste and judgment. The collection of MSS. dispersed by Messrs. Sotheby this week forms a small part only of the vast library brought together by the late Earl. Onward from the year 1814, when as a Westminster boy he bought a copy of the "Secrets of Albertus Magnus" for one-and-sixpence at Ginger's shop in Great College-street, till within a few months of his death in 1878, he was an ardent collector, one of his last purchases being the Bramhall MS. of the Wycliffe Bible, sold in May, 1899, for £1,750. A propos of the present Lord Ashburnham's offer, made in 1879, to treat for the sale of the library as a whole, with the British Museum alone or jointly with the French Government, £160,000 being named as the price, it may be recalled that in 1897-98 the 4,075 lots of printed books brought at auction £62,700 odd, including £4,000 for the Mazarin Bible on vellum; on May 1, 1899, a section of the MSS. known as the "Appendix," brought £8,500; a few months ago the "Evangelia Quatuor," whose binding is studded with precious stones, was sold privately by Messrs. Sotheby for £10,000; and this leaves out of account altogether the great Stowe collection, obtained by Lord Ashburnham for £8,000 and sold to the British Museum for something like £30,000; and the Libri assemblage, which, again, cost the late Earl £8,000.

The Barrois collection of MSS., which is now being sold, was brought together by M. Paul Barrois, Deputy for Lille before the Paris Revolution of 1848. In that year it was offered to the British Museum for £6,000; but although, after examination, the keeper recommended the purchase, no application appears to have been made to the Treasury, and the collection soon afterwards passed into the hands of Lord Ashburnham, according to some for £6,000, to others for £8,000. At that time it consisted of 702 MSS. Thereafter, however, M. Leopold Delisle proved that between sixty and seventy of the MSS. had been stolen from the Paris National Library; hence, some thirteen years ago, these wrongfully acquired volumes were re-purchased from the present Earl by the French Government. As catalogued, there are 628 lots—and it may be noted in passing that the catalogue, with its fine autotype reproductions, reflects great credit on the compiler. A majority of the items appeal to the scholar rather than to the collector; the average of general interest is not so high, for example, as in the case of the portion of the Hamilton collection which came under the hammer in 1889. On the other hand, competition for carefully-wrought painted and illuminated volumes of the past is much keener now than twelve years ago.

The chief items during the first three days of the sale are:—

1. "La Vie du vaillant Bertrand du Guesclin." Small folio. Sæc. XIV. MS. on vellum, 290ff., *lettres bâtarde*s. 14 miniatures, 5×3½in., in camaieu gris, heightened with gold, representing incidents in the life of the hero. Old French olive morocco by Derome, from the La Vallière collection, No. 2,778. (179.) ... 1,500
2. "Chronique Générale dite de la Bourcchardière." By Jehan de Courey. Two large folio vols. Sæc. XV. MS., on vellum, 337ff., bold *lettres bâtarde*s. Six large paintings, 9×8in., 8 illuminated miniatures, 4×3½in. From La Vallière collection, No. 4,601, and Count MacCarthy's, No. 3,945. (301.)... 1,420
3. "Høræ." 4to. Mid-fifteenth century MS., on vellum, 225ll., bold Gothic letters, red and black. Ten fine miniatures, several hundred large and small illuminated ornamental initials with inner borders and details, humorous and satirical figures of men and animals introduced into the borders of leafy scrolls. Work of illuminator unfinished, thus showing progressive stages of decoration. (282.) ... 1,160
4. "Histoire Universelle," compilée d'Orose, de Salluste, de Lucain, &c. Two vols., large folio. Sæc. XV. MS., on vellum, 452ff., *lettres bâtarde*s. 76 illuminations in camaieu gris, 76 large illuminated initials, with marginal decorations of floreate scrolls. (279.) ... 910
5. "La Genesi de Nostre Dame Sainte Marie," par Prêtre Herman, known as "La Bible d'Herman."

- Folio. Sæc. XIV. MS., on vellum, 43ff., French *lettres bâtarde*s. 223 miniatures, 2½×3½in.; many ornamental pen letters. (263.) ... 715
6. "Evangelistarium." 4to MS. of eighth or ninth century, on vellum, 154ff., bold semi-Roman letters. 10 full-page illuminations, 7½×5½in., in leafy frames, akin in character to decorations in Book of Kells. Ancient ivory plaque inserted in cover. (189.) ... 700
7. "Le Livre du Gouvernement des Princes." 8vo. Sæc. XIV. MS., on vellum, 136ff., Gothic letters. 120 small illuminations, about 1½×2in., of Anglo-Norman character. An anonymous work. From Hanrott's sale, No. 304. (240.) ... 685
8. "Œuvres Poétiques de Gilles li Muisis." Small folio. Sæc. XIV. MS., on vellum, 267ff., Gothic letters. 25 painted and illuminated miniatures, large and small, with marginal decoration of spiked ivy leaves. Formerly belonged to Abbey of St. Martin at Tournay; bought by Richard Heber for £43 from Nicol's collection; Heber library, Feb. 1836, 125 gs. (236.) ... 660
9. "Hystoria . . . Beatissimi Augustini." Small folio. Sæc. XV. MS., on vellum, 35ff., 136 tinted drawings of incidents in life of St. Augustine. Written and illustrated in manner of ancient Netherlands Block Books. (40.) ... 655
10. "Dante: La Commedia," with Commentary by Boccaccio. Small folio. Sæc. XIV. MS., on vellum, 129ff., semi-Roman letters. 5 illuminated initials, 2½×2in., the first containing a miniature portrait of Dante. (153.) ... 630
11. "Boethius, Book V.," with unpublished Commentary by Robert Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln. Folio. Sæc. XV. MS., on vellum, 103ff., small Gothic and *lettres bâtarde*s. Six miniatures of scenes in life of Boethius. Possibly executed for Philip IV. of France. (68.) ... 540
12. "Evangelia Quatuor." Prologue by S. Jerome. 4to. MS. of ninth or tenth century, on vellum, 119ff., Roman letters. 8 full-page paintings in wash, character of old Irish illustrations. Ivory plaque of Our Lord blessing inserted in cover. (191.) ... 490
13. "Le Livre du . . . Conte d'Artois et de sa Femme." Small 4to. Sæc. XV. MS., on vellum, 115ff., French *lettres bâtarde*s. 84 painted and illuminated miniatures, 4×5in. Edited by Barrois in 1837. (25.) ... 455
14. "La Bible Hystoriaus." Old Testament only. Translated from Latin of Petrus Comestor. Large folio. Sæc. XIV. MS., on vellum, 416ff., Gothic letters. 70 miniatures, 3×3½in., 72 illuminated initials. (144.) ... 390
15. "Dylogue des Créatures." Translated by Collard Mansion. Folio. Sæc. XV. MS., on vellum, 148ff., bold *lettres bâtarde*s. Two large miniatures, about 6×6½in., one probably showing Collard Mansion and two scribes in Bruges study; 120 small miniatures, 2½×3in. (164.) ... 350
16. "La Première Guerre Punique," from the Latin of Brunus Aretinus Leonardus. Small folio. Sæc. XV. MS., on vellum, 74ff., *lettres bâtarde*s. 34 miniatures, 4×2½in. (335.) ... 335
17. "The Heart of Pity," by Hugo de Folieto. Small 4to. Sæc. XIII. MS., on vellum, 104ff., small cursive Gothic, probably by English scribe. 68 painted and illuminated figures of fabulous birds and animals, most on rich gold ground, and a remarkable drawing in colours of Christ and the Devil dividing the sheep from the goats. (288.) ... 325
18. "Evangelistarium." 4to. Sæc. IX. MS. on vellum 111ff., legible Roman letters, rubrics in gold, within ornamental borders of colour. Ancient ivory floreate carving, 21 emeralds and carbuncles inserted in cover. (190.) ... 320
19. "S. Augustine: Sermons." Small 4to. MS. of sixth or seventh century, on thick vellum, 67ff., in Merovingian characters, rubrics in capital letters, red and green. (28) ... 315
20. Anglo-Norman Charters, State Documents, &c. collection of 1,179, A.D. 1269-1771. 8 folio vols. (102.) ... 305
21. "Glanville, Des Propriétés des Choses." Translated by Jehan Corbichon. Large folio. Sæc. XIV. MS., on vellum, 335ff., neat cursive *lettres bâtarde*s. 18 large historiated miniatures, 38 smaller ones. Old French calf gilt. (237.) ... 295

£13,185

It will be seen that the twenty-one most valuable MSS. sold during the first three days yield a total of more than double the sum at which the entire assemblage of 702 works was offered to the British Museum in 1848. The totals are, first day, 120 lots, £3,980 17s. 6d.; second day, 125 lots, £7,614 9s.; third day, 131 lots, £7,215 19s., or an aggregate for the 376 lots of £18,811 5s. 6d. The principal buyers have been Messrs. S. C. Cockerell, Quaritch, Ellis, Belin of Paris, Baer and Co. of Frankfurt, and, of private collectors, Mr. Fairfax Murray and Mr. Money.

AMONG THE REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES.—II.

The Fortnightly is the best of the reviews this month. "A Fool's Paradise," by Lieutenant-Colonel Willoughby Verner, frightens us with the allegation that our position in the Mediterranean is insecure. Mr. J. Holt Schooling brings out another bogey—the declining birth-rate. Professor Macaulay Posnett, discusses the Federal Constitution of Australia. Mr. Arthur Symonds argues with Mr. Churton Collins, but on the whole agrees with him. Baron Pierre de Coubertin has a notable paper on "The Conditions of Franco-British Peace." One of those conditions, we note, is that France should not betray undue anxiety to pull chestnuts out of the fire for Russia. The article should be read side by side with that of "Calchas" on "Russia and her Problem," wherein it is maintained that "the greatest of all necessities for Russia is peace at almost any price," and also that "the origin of the Peace Conference is to be found in Russia's sense of her almost overwhelming disadvantage in view of the economic awakening of the last thirty years, in which she has had the least share." Other contributions are a sonnet by the editor, a short story by the author of "The Column," and an article on "Eros in French Fiction and Fact," by the author of "An Englishman in Paris."

The Nineteenth Century and After has secured an article on "The Queen Victoria Memorial Hall in India," by the Viceroy. "The Next Coronation," by L. W. Vernon Harcourt, proposes the revival of certain ancient and gorgeous ceremonials. Art criticism is supplied by Mr. H. Hamilton Fyfe, who writes of "Mr. Sargent at the Royal Academy." Mr. Fyfe holds that Mr. Sargent lacks "imagination, striving towards the noble and the beautiful, shrinking from the commonplace and all that is not lovely and of good report"; but he sees "a gleam of hope" that this want may be supplied in time. "Some Real Love-letters," by the Hon. Mrs. Chapman, recalls the memory of Mlle. de Lespinasse, who loved General Guibert, also beloved, in early girlhood, by Madame de Staël. Mr. Arthur H. Lee, M.P., faces the recruiting question. His knowledge of the conditions of the American army and the efficiency of American soldiers leads him to businesslike conclusions:

It is very difficult in this world to get anything good without paying the market price for it, and the United States Government is humdrum enough to recognize that fact. Our Government takes a more original view. It says in effect: "The proper pay of a British soldier is one shilling a day."

Three Scenes from M. Rostand's L'Aiglon are rendered into rhyming decasyllables by Earl Cowper—not very effectively; and Mr. Frederic Harrison gives his "Impressions of America." These leave us with the belief that Mr. Frederic Harrison did not penetrate very far beneath the surface. He says he "never saw or heard of" the Yellow Press or of "official corruption and political intrigue."

The National Review is as usual distinguished by actuality. Any one who aspires to know the precise nature and bearings of the colossal financial operations of Mr. Pierpont Morgan will find exactly what he wants in Mr. H. R. Lawson's lucid paper on "Morganeering"; and a point not the less important because it has been neglected is raised in Mr. Sydney Brooks' article "Our next Blunder in South Africa." This is an urgent plea for the suppression, whether immediate or gradual, of the Taal. "Our supremacy will not be assured till English is the only language permitted in the schools, Law Courts, Legislature, and Government offices of the Transvaal, Orange River, and Cape Colonies." The experience of Canada is generally supposed to point in the contrary direction; but Mr. Brooks maintains that even there the permission to speak French rekindles memories that had better die away. He finds a good object lesson in support of his own opinions in "the polyglot chaos of Austria-Hungary," which country "began to decline from the moment the Czechs and Magyars were allowed to revive their dialects." They certainly use those dialects principally for purposes of mutual recrimination. It is interesting to note the statement that "the movement that culminated in Hungarian independence, like the movement that must eventually end in Bohemian autonomy, was in its inception a purely literary movement," and "sprang from archæologists, ballad singers, and historians delving in the parts of the Kingdoms of St. Václav and St. Stephen, and endeavouring to resurrect the Czech and Magyar folklore and dialects." There is also an article by Sir Charles Roe on "The Indian Civil Service as a Career," full of the facts that the young man in search of a career requires to know. May we suggest that similar articles on some other branches of the public service—Woods and Forests Department, Indian Public Works Department, Levant Consular Service, &c.—are badly wanted?

In the Monthly Review the art paper on "Florentine Painting of the Fourteenth Century," by Roger E. Fry, excellently illustrated, is the best feature; and Mr. Harold Bindloss writes like a good journalist who knows his subject of "Nigeria and its Trade."

Dr. T. Miller Maguire's article on "Guerilla or Partisan Warfare" in the United Service Magazine throws light on a subject singularly neglected in English military literature. Captain Jeffreys, who writes of "Extravagance of Army Life," fears that economy would lower the social status of officers. This surely might be prevented by introducing some such system of "nomination" as prevails in the Navy. The difficulty of making both ends meet certainly keeps many good men out of the service—the men who now go into the various higher branches of the Civil Service, or become masters in the public schools. Colonel Maude's notes on the evolution of cavalry are concluded.

Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's serial "The Making of a Marchioness" is appearing in Cornhill as well as the Century. Mr. William Watson contributes a sonnet, Mrs. Richmond Ritchie some random reminiscences of Brighton, and the Rev. W. H. Hutton "Some Memories of George Crabbe." Mrs. Ritchie claims that Brighton has been ignored by the novelists, and mentions Dickens among those who have never "sent any heroes or heroines to revive there." But was it not at Brighton that Paul Dombey went to school? Mr. Hutton's remarks on Crabbe as a preacher are amusing as well as instructive:—

No longer do the clergy mingle their secular with their spiritual affairs so simply as did Crabbe, or perform their duties in a manner so unconventional without being irreverent. "I must have some money, gentlemen," Crabbe used to say as he walked down from the fine Jacobean three-decker at Muston, meaning that the tithes were due. Sometimes he would stop his sermon when it grew dark, with "Upon my word I cannot see; I must give you the rest when we meet again," or walk into a pew near a window and finish his sermon standing on a seat.

Mr. Edgar Fawcett's spirited memorial stanzas on Andrée in the Thrush are better than the many poems of a similar character which have this year flooded the magazines. But the poet unduly praises the object of Andrée's expedition in referring to it as "for large help to the living," and invidiously contrasts it with warfare involving bloodshed. Whether the motive of this particular expedition was truly "large help to the living" or the satisfaction of the tramp-fever and spirit of exploration which might be more useful in other directions is a matter of opinion. Mr. Dawson's ballad "Blake's Homecoming" preserves well the old ballad tradition, as well as that of the sea songs which flourished last century in Campbell and others. It bears some resemblance in spirit to "The Revenge," and makes us proud of the race to which Blake belonged.

In the Antiquary there is an article by A. Bertram R. Wallis on "Charles Dickens as an Antiquary." There is not much to be said; but it is made clear that Dickens was more of an antiquary than is generally supposed. "His antiquary was the antiquary of Rowlandson's caricature, an elderly monomaniac living in a cobwebby world of his own, engrossed in the past, opposed to progress, and slatternly in person." But this, of course, was the general feeling about antiquaries of that age.

THE HUMANITARIAN LEAGUE.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I fully accept Sir Herbert Maxwell's assurance as to the sincerity of his criticism, and I trust he will believe that we humanitarians, on our part, are equally devoid of any wish to attack him unfairly. We gladly recognize the humanity which has prompted him to condemn such cruel practices as the caging of wild birds and the use of the pole-trap, and our disagreement with him has turned solely on the question of "sport."

Sir H. Maxwell has found it impossible "to obtain a clear view" of the principles of the Humanitarian League. Its main principle is this, that "it is iniquitous to inflict avoidable suffering on any sentient being, whether human or non-human." We hold that all sentient beings have rights, though these rights vary in degree according to the sensibility possessed. While it is obvious that many differences of opinion will arise in the application of this principle to individual cases, I submit that the principle itself is intelligible enough, and is proof against the objection brought to bear on it by Sir H. Maxwell, viz. :—That, while it is allowable to kill animals, it is not allowable to kill men, and that from killing to not killing is more than a matter of "degree."

Humanitarians do not allow that the prohibition "Thou shalt not kill" either includes men absolutely or absolutely excludes animals. The killing of men is commonly held to be justified by the plea of necessity, as in legitimate warfare or self-defence. According to the humanitarian principle the same plea of necessity is needed for the just killing of animals; but the degree of responsibility is lower; we are compelled, in self-preservation, to kill a large number of animals, and the lower the organization and sensibility of the animal the less our repugnance to killing. That is why I denied Sir H. Maxwell's statement that humanitarians would apply "the same treatment" to the lower animals as to mankind. The treatment varies widely according to the conditions of each case; the principle is the same throughout. We are not bound to treat all human beings alike, much less to treat all animals as human beings.

With respect to what Sir H. Maxwell says of the injury done by the polluting of rivers, I of course agree with him; but I do not see that the crass commercial selfishness which, without thinking or caring for anything but profit, poisons a number of fish incidentally, is in any way analogous to a deliberate eulogy of angling as a justifiable practice. The morality of "sport," in its various forms, must surely be discussed independently and on its own merits.

May I say, in conclusion, that in sending Sir H. Maxwell marked copies of Humanity we have only followed our usual custom of making our friends and foes acquainted with what is said of them in our journal? It would give us much greater pleasure to count Sir H. Maxwell among our friends than among our foes. We cannot but hope that the same humane feelings which have led him to discountenance the steel trap may yet lead him to abjure those so-called sports of which the steel trap is an accessory.

Yours faithfully,

HENRY S. SALT,

Hon. Sec. Humanitarian League.

EDINBURGH PUBLISHERS.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Will you allow me to correct a slight error into which your writer of the article on the "Leading Publishers of Edinburgh" in your last number has fallen? In writing of my firm, Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier, he terms it "a younger firm." This is hardly correct. It is one of the oldest Edinburgh firms, having been in existence for nearly a century.

It was founded by William Oliphant, who had served in the house of William Creech, the publisher of the first Edinburgh edition of Burns, and who himself issued the first popular monthly magazine, the Scotch Repository, five years before Miller of Haddington's Cheap Magazine, which was long regarded as the pioneer of Scottish magazines. This said magazine was edited by Dr. Henry Duncan, of Ruthwell, the founder of savings banks, and had among its contributors Charles Kilpatrick Sharpe. Some of the contributions had a popularity—in separate publications—of seventy years. I am, &c.,

A CHILD'S EPITAPH.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Re "A Child's Epitaph" (Literature, June 8, 1901), the second version of the lines in Mr. Poynder's letter occur also on a gravestone in the old churchyard at Weybridge, Surrey. The tomb is close to that of H.R.H. the Duchess of York's.

Believe me yours faithfully,

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Mr. Philip Wellby expects to have the book on Robert Buchanan, by Mr. Henry Murray, ready in about a fortnight. Mr. Murray was a life-long friend of Robert Buchanan and his collaborator in "The Charlatan," and also, we believe, wrote several plays with him. The book will be both critical and anecdotal, and an authentic account will be given of "The Fleshly School" controversy.

A year or so ago a volume of reminiscences by Buchanan was announced—if we remember rightly—by Mr. George Redway. It would be interesting to know what arrangements were made as to it when Mr. Redway left the business.

Dr. Sigerson, of Dublin, who is author of the "Bards of the Gael and Gall" and other works devoted to Irish literature, besides being well known as an historical and medical writer and one of the contributors to Lord Acton's Cambridge History, has completed a book which will interest those who believe with Matthew Arnold that the Irish were the inventors of rhyme, a theory which has been long held by Dr. Sigerson himself. He has now translated, for the first time, the writings of Sedulius, the Latin rhyming poet of the sixth century, who was an Irishman. There have been many editions of the works of Sedulius, but they have never been translated; and Dr. Sigerson, whose scholarship was widely recognized when he published his "Bards of the Gael and Gall," and whose poetical abilities are also well known, may be expected to do justice to his subject. The book will probably be published in the autumn. The author is the father of Mrs. Shorter, the poetess, better known as Dora Sigerson.

Nearly half a century has passed since Gabriele Rossetti died. At last we are to have his versified autobiography, translated and supplemented by the sole survivor of his family, William Michael Rossetti. Gabriele Rossetti composed his autobiography in 1850, when he knew that his life was drawing to a close, and he wrote it in rhymed sextets. These his son, for ease and literalness, has rendered into blank verse, adding his own prose where necessary to complete the story, and afterwards dealing briefly with the events of the four years of his father's life subsequent to the date of the autobiography. There are five illustrative appendices:—

1. Extracts from six of the domestic letters of Gabriele Rossetti.
2. Extracts from eight letters which he addressed to Mr. Charles Lyall, father of the geologist and godfather of Dante Gabriele Rossetti, on the subject of his Dantesque and other literary researches.
3. Extracts from three letters of Baron Kirkup regarding Dante.

4. Twelve letters from Mazzini, all but one addressed to Gabriele Rossetti.

5. Six examples of Rossetti's poetry in Italian.

The book will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Sands.

The Scottish History Society, of which Lord Rosebery is President, and in which he takes an active personal interest, is to publish the Register of Lindores Abbey, in Fifeshire, one of the old ruined ecclesiastical establishments of Scotland. The Register contains several Papal Bulls, and is likely to be of considerable interest. It is to be edited by Dr. Dowden, Bishop of Edinburgh, who is a member of the Council. But there are many volumes due before this one can be reached. Indeed, the society is in arrear with its publications. The volume of Despatches of the Papal Envoys to Mary Queen of Scots, which is being edited by Father Hungerford Pollen for the society, was promised last year, but has not made its appearance yet. It has been delayed by the discovery of further documents, but will soon be ready now, and is looked forward to with much curiosity. There is no reason to believe, however, that it will throw any additional light on the character of the unfortunate Queen.

Ollendorff, the Paris publisher, is issuing a volume of literary criticisms upon eighteen of our living writers—George Meredith, Thomas Hardy, J. M. Barrie, Pinero, Jones, &c. The book is written by M. Charles Legras, a young French journalist, who spent several years in England. For the sake of seeing ourselves as others see us it is interesting to know what a French writer, who is also a good English scholar, thinks of our contemporary literature. The author has mingled with his own appreciations of the writers selected a great many reflections and criticisms gathered from the authors themselves.

The American Publishers' Association, which we recently referred to, are having their first fight with the department store in New York, owned by R. H. Macy and Co. One of the first books to be issued after the agreement was made was "Tarry Thou till I Come," published by Funk and Wagnall at $1.40. Macy and Co. immediately cut the price to $1.34, and the Publishers' Association has refused to supply them with any more books. Doubtless, they can obtain the books they want from other sources, and not direct from the publishers; but it is the intention of the Association to break down all these channels and stop the supply, not only to Macy's but to any one who sells to them.

According to the Bookman Mr. Kipling's "Jungle Books" will be produced on the stage of the Garrick Theatre in December next.

On June 19 Sir Martin Conway will publish through Messrs. Harper the account of his climbing and exploration of the Bolivian Andes, with copious illustrations and a bibliography.

A new publication will be issued from the Punch office at the end of June, under the editorship of Mr. E. T. Reed—viz., "Mr. Punch's Holiday Book"—containing original contributions by writers and artists whose work is well known in the pages of Punch.

Prince Nikita, of Montenegro, who, as is known, has written a drama, The Empress of the Balkans, is now occupied with an historical novel treating of the history of Duke Stephan of Herzegovina and the founders of the dynasty of Montenegro.

Messrs. Harper announce a new book of stories by W. D. Howells entitled, "A Pair of Patient Lovers."

Mr. Quaritch is issuing a volume on "Buddhist Art," being a translation of the new edition of Professor A. Grünwedel's Buddhistische Kunst, largely augmented by Dr. J. Burgess. It contains upwards of 150 illustrations of Buddhist sculptures, and is intended as a handbook for the visitor to any collection of these reliefs.

Messrs. Robinson announce a pamphlet, written by a British Field Officer, defending the Army against the attacks which were made on it by the Press during 1900.

Part I. of a second volume of "The Book of Book Plates" will be issued next week by Mr. Brimley Johnson.

THE RICE GAMBIT.—On December 8, 1900, we gave a very remarkable game played by Lasker and other experts to test this opening by Professor Rice, New York. A feature of that contest was the numerous and varied sacrificial combinations and complicated play.

Recently, in the new American Chess World, attention has been devoted to the defence, chiefly by Mr. W. E. Napier, a well-known young expert. We cannot do better than give his analysis, which is as follows:—

ANALYSIS—RICE GAMBIT.

WHITE.	BLACK.	WHITE.	BLACK.
1. P-K 4	P-K 4	12. Kt-Q 2	QxP
2. P-K B 4	PxP	13. Kt-B 3	Q-B 3
3. Kt-K B 3	P-K Kt 4	14. Q-R 4 ch	B-Q 2
4. P-K R 4	P-Kt 5	15. Q-Kt 4	Kt-Q B 3
5. Kt-K 5	Kt-K B 3	16. PxKt	B-P
6. B-B 4	P-Q 4	17. P-Q 5 (c)	P-Q R 4
7. PxP	B-Q 3	18. Q-B 5 (d)	Castles
8. Castles	BxKt	19. Kt-B 6 (e)	Kt-Kt
9. R-K sq (a)	Q-K 2	20. R-Kt (f)	Q-R 7 ch
10. P-B 3	P-Kt 6	21. K-B sq	P-B 6
11. P-Q 4	Kt-Kt 5	22. Q-Kt sq	Q-B 5 (g)

(a) The Rice Gambit is thus formed and continued, the sacrifice of the bishop being the point.

BLACK. 12 pieces.

WHITE. 12 pieces.
White to play and save the game? (Move 24) (h).

(h) From position in diagram Mr. Napier suggests 24. B-K 3 (threatening mate, &c.) B-Q 5 (very fine!); 25. QxP, PxP, or QxR P all lead to a loss for White.

Now let us take up the position at move 9, and here Mr.

J. P. Doyle (Hoboken) comes to our assistance in the May issue of the American Chess World. He plays for Black here a simple defence not mentioned in the book of the Rice Gambit—viz., 9.—K-B sq! Now, of course, 10. R-B seems forced for White, and is well answered by Kt-Q B 3. Obviously if 11. P-Kt, Q-Q 5 ch wins the rook. Otherwise 11. R-K sq, Kt-P; 12. P-Q 4, B-K 3; 13. BxKt, BxP; 14. BxP, Q-R P with a fine game. [(a) If 14. QxP, R-K Kt sq; 15. QxBP, RxP ch; 16. K-B sq, R-Kt 3, &c.]. Or 11. R-Kt 5, P-KR 3; 12. P-Kt, PxR; 13. P-Q Kt P, BxP, &c.

BLACK. 15 pieces.
RICE GAMBIT—Move 9.

WHITE. 14 pieces.
Black to play.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The "LITERATURE" PORTRAIT for next week will be that of MR. ARTHUR SYMONS.

In the same number special attention will be given to books on Travel and on Gardening, with many illustrations.

* * * *

It was at the beginning of last year that Mr. George Moore announced his deliberate intention of turning his back on London. He and his friends had "considered the reformation of London. After some doubts, some hesitation, it suddenly came upon us that it was impossible." Nevertheless, we gather from the July number of the Pall Mall Magazine, which is just out, that the process of shaking the dust of London from Mr. Moore's feet is still proceeding. Mr. Archer finds him still choking for fresh air, still asking why he should live in London, still "going to find a primitive people" in Dublin. His conversation on the Irish movement with Mr. Archer (whom he does not convince) is interesting, particularly in one statement, which will be new to many who watch that movement with interest—viz., that its promoters are not agreed as to the Irish language which is to be employed. There are already two schools of writers. "Some—like Dr. Douglas Hyde, for instance—would use no words that are not common to all dialects and understood over the length and breadth of Ireland. Others would give free scope to the vernacular of every district."

* * * *

The Irish Festival, by-the-by, recently held in Dublin, brought to light a great number of Irish writers. Essays were written on a great number of subjects connected with Ireland, and though the money prizes only averaged about £5 each there VOL. VIII. No. 25.

were an immense number of essays written, many of them of great merit. The "Proceedings" are to be published in book form and will contain all the prize essays, poems, &c.

* * * *

The final performance of the Stage Society's second season was disappointing. Mr. W. Kingsley Tarpey, whose play Windmills was produced, might be forgiven a lack of experience in dramatic craft if he showed that he had any fresh ideas. But this he failed to show. Windmills is the kind of farce one sees constantly at the theatres, and it was not good of its kind. Surely the Stage Society should do better than this. However, the piece gave an actor a chance to show what he could do in the eccentric character line, and of this chance Mr. A. E. George fully availed himself. Windmills was preceded by Miss Laurence Alma-Tadema's curious little play, The Unseen Helmsman, which is not at all dramatic but which has an idea behind it. It is written rather prettily; the theme however demands power rather than prettiness, being, in brief, the eternal problem whether a woman can expect the whole of a man's love or ought to be content to share it.

* * * *

The late Sir Walter Besant always took a great interest in the stage, and was the part author of several plays which were produced with more or less success. Of these the best known was a dramatized version of the first novel he wrote in collaboration, "Ready Money Mortiboy." This was produced at the Court Theatre in March, 1874. A second play from his pen, dealing with "The Chaplain of the Fleet" was accepted by the same management, but was never staged. In December, 1880, a dramatized version of a short story by Sir Walter was produced at the Olympic Theatre, under the title of Such a Good Man. His last play, The Balladmonger, has been included for some time past in Mr. Beerbohm Tree's repertoire, and is still frequently played.

* * * *

With the summer assembly which the National Home-Reading Union is holding at Winchester from to-day until the 29th inst. the celebrations of King Alfred's millenary may be said to have begun, though the more notable commemoration is to be held next month. In London a special exhibition is being arranged at the British Museum to illustrate the history of England in Anglo-Saxon times. There are several more volumes on Alfred to come, notably the little book by the late Sir Walter Besant, which, as stated in last week's Literature, is to be completed by his friend Dr. Sprigge, the editor of the Lancet. Mr. Elliot Stock is issuing the facsimile of the famous Alfred Jewel, of which we have already said something. Several "Alfred" plays are also promised, Mr. Wilson Barrett has already copyrighted one—The Christian King.

* * * *

The "Official History" of the Boer War is to be published by Messrs. Hurst and Blackett, and at least one volume will probably appear during the autumn. Colonel G. F. R. Henderson, who is preparing the work, is to be assisted by Major G. Lo M. Gretton, who has recently been a member of the Intelligence Staff in South Africa.

A case just brought before the Paris Police-court has made much stir among literary circles in Paris. In 1853 a society was founded for the publication of the works of Lamartine. Among its members to-day are MM. Emile Ollivier, Normand, Coppée, and Jules Lemaitre. A well-known Paris Notary, M. de Barre, the executor of the will of the poet's niece, wants to dissolve the society for the following very piquant reasons. The works of Lamartine no longer sell as they did, and the expenses are very nearly double the receipts. M. de Barre, who possesses 348 out of the 600 shares of the society, does not wish to await the utter extinction of his income from the shares. M. Emile Ollivier, however, has protested in a violent letter against the dissolution of the society, and the question before the Court is whether he has or has not been libellous. His indignation is pious and explicable, for he was an intimate friend of Lamartine; and his counsel may naturally plead that the dissolution of the society would be a crime against the poet's memory, its members not being eager for dividends, but united solely in their pious cult of Lamartine. The judges of the Police-court, however, have before them a simple case of libel, and M. Ollivier's letter has not been yet published.

How to get an opinion that shall always be "ex-cathedra" on an artistic journal is the question which the authorities of the Architectural Review have determined to solve by a new departure in their July number. The editorial control is to be put in the hands of a committee of representative architects. Fourteen members of the profession—among them Mr. R. Norman Shaw, Mr. Reginald Blomfield, and Mr. Gerald C. Horsley—have agreed to form this "Advisory Editorial Committee." Meanwhile Mr. MacColl will act as literary editor. Another change will be a reduction of the price to sixpence.

We publish below the poem which has recently gained the Hemans Memorial Medal for 1901 at Liverpool University.

NATURE'S MUSIC.

The air is full of music: mortal mind
Discerns not half the tuneful harmonies
Of subtle sound in Nature's depths enshrined.

The air thrills through with music: tiny cries
And pulsing throbs of daisy-waking morn
Touch the responsive heart to glad surprise.

Upfloating, murmuring music: ripening corn
Scatters quaint chimes of sighing melody,
Of breeze-stirred, bowing ears and leaf-blades born.

The air resounds with music: the strong sea
Is one vast instrument of wondrous range,
Which pours abroad its music ceaselessly.

Everywhere music: endless interchange
Of storm and calm; each season's varying round
Accompanied by cadence new and strange.

Ever vibrating music: the low sound
Of rippling streamlet sheds a sweet refrain;
And quivering pine-trees lead a fugue profound.

Strange, yearning, mystic music: rustling rain
Sobs sad slow symphonies; to every call
The hidden mimic Echo calls again.

In deepest, tenderest music softly fall
And rise the notes of nesting birds, for love
Sweetest musician ever is to all.

With tremulous music insects humming rove;
Buds burst in music; snapping seeds ring shrill;
The whispering wind sings changefully above.

Sacred earth-music, played with heavenly skill
Eternally by Nature; these—and more
Melodious sounds and silence untold still.

Literature Portraits.—VII.

AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.

When the accomplished scholar and critic, who was the first editor of this journal, cast about for an essayist to open the series of literary Causeries he designed to publish in it, his choice fell upon Mr. Birrell. The choice was a natural and right one, for in this graceful accomplishment Mr. Birrell, it is not too much to say, has scarcely a rival. The word is French, the thing is often said to be French; and certainly, though the art of literary causerie is now, among ourselves, "upon the town," the Frenchmen still do it more naturally as well as more artfully. Yet the countrymen of Lamb and Hazlitt should have no need to go abroad to learn how to talk well about books, and in Mr. Birrell quite manifestly the art is native and natural. Mr. Traill in his introduction to the republished series of causeries from Literature felt called upon to defend the term causerie as well as the title "Among my Books." Pleading that it hurt his patriotism to have recourse to a French word, he confessed he could find no English word that conveyed precisely the same meaning; and he insisted that the element of bookishness, the atmosphere of the library, was of the essence of the art. Mr. Birrell, then, was the very man for him. He has the rare art of talking naturally on paper, and his every word and tone rings with the love of literature and affectionate familiarity with books.

"Obiter Dicta," published in 1885, in a small way marked an epoch. It marked the distance travelled from the time when "Judex damnatur cum nocens absolvitur" was selected and exhibited as the motto and maxim of criticism. Mr. Birrell grew up under Matthew Arnold's milder reign. Arnold has a passage relating how politicians in his day would deplore the less strenuous spirit of their sons—"At their age what reformers we were," cried the sires. Well, in criticism as in politics, a generation's experience of heroic measures had somewhat abated the "cocksureness." The critics had learnt some doubt of themselves and more tolerance towards others. So, in place of the judicial condemnations which the old reviewers were prepared to mete out to all and sundry—to Coleridge and Keats no less than to "Satan" Montgomery; nay, in place of Arnold's own endeavours in the grand style to see the object as it really was, Mr. Birrell came offering the world his obiter dicta, "gratuitous opinions, individual impertinences, which, wise or foolish, right or wrong, bind none, not even the lips that utter them." Mr. Birrell, by the way, has criticised the motto of the "Blue and Buff," reminding us that a Judge is not self-elected. Is his own title, modest and characteristic as it is, quite so accurate as it should be on the legal lips of one of His Majesty's Counsel? However, it sufficiently indicated to the world the temper of his deliverances, and the world was very ready to welcome them.

The time was ripe for criticism in this less pretentious vein, and Mr. Birrell's little book had an immense success. It is not often that The Times bends all its weight to urge the merit of a slender sheaf of anonymous literary essays. Still less often does "what is facetiously called the reading public" (the ungrateful phrase is Mr. Birrell's own) answer to the invitation. Literary essays, as a rule, have no excitements for the trade. Not here are the palpitating paragraphs that record the race of new editions. Yet "Obiter Dicta" ran into new editions almost as if it were a popular novel or a bit of scandal. I do not happen to know the number of the present edition, but my copy of "Men, Women, and Books" advertises the fourteenth, and that was seven years ago. His brother craftsmen appreciate even more keenly than the public how great a triumph this was, and how well it was deserved. The half-dozen essays treated topics none of them new, several of them trite—trampled to death, you might have thought; Carlyle and Browning, for instance—the theme of every amateur essay-society. Yet on these trite topics we all of us found ourselves listening delightedly to the fresh voice. The secret was just that. The voice was fresh, the words witty, and the judgment sound.

In discussing, last week, the various aspects of Sir Walter Besant's life and work, we did not say much about the riddle of his long collaboration with James Rice. Some Collaboration. helps towards the answer to that riddle—if not precisely the answer itself—were contained in Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's communication to The Times last Monday:—"Besant was the skilled writing partner—he did the description, dialogues, characters; but Rice thought out the plot and construction." Rice, in fact, brought suggestions in armfuls. Besant sorted them, picked out what he wanted, and worked them into shape. This is stated as a fact ascertained by inquiry, and it is very much the conclusion that one would have arrived at by comparing the Besant and Rice books, first with the one Rice book, and then with the many Besant books. For Rice, when he wrote alone, was one of the feeblest of the feeble, and Besant, when he was alone, excelled more in execution than in invention. If ever collaboration in the production of works of art was justified by results duly tested by experiment, it was so in this case. And yet, even with the case before them, most literary artists will probably find it as difficult as ever to understand how such collaboration can be anything but an unnatural process. In the case of plays it may be feasible and even useful. But for that there are sound and obvious reasons. In the first place, plays—such plays, at any rate, as are written in collaboration—do not, it must be confessed, aim primarily at artistic success; they aim mainly, if not exclusively, at commercial success. In the second place, the writing of plays requires technical knowledge which no man can possibly acquire by practice or by taking thought, but which can only be got by attending rehearsals and seeing how the stage manager cuts a play about, and why. Not otherwise can it be discovered what concessions the art of the playwright must make to the vanity of the player; what the stage carpenter can or cannot do; what realism is pleasing and what realism is ridiculous; whether such and such an epigram is or is not likely to "carry over the footlights." In the face of these and other thorny problems two heads may often be better than one; and a play by Sims and Pettitt seems a natural product, not merely because we are used to the combination, but because we see what there is to be gained by the joining of forces. In the case of fiction the conditions are different. In the first place, the technique of fiction is not such that any man whose ideas are worth putting into novels need find any difficulty, with practice, in acquiring it. In the second place, ideas for stories are, as a rule, absolutely valueless until they have been transmuted in the brain of the creative worker. In the third place, a novel is in intention, if not always in fact, a work of art rather than a piece of goods; and the artistic temperament, being imperious and dictatorial, resents criticism and wants to monopolize praise. That collaboration has sometimes been found possible in spite of these apparently insuperable obstacles is an undoubted, if a surprising, fact. But of the novels written in collaboration one of three things can generally be predicated. Either

(1) The name of one of the collaborators only appears on the title-page as a compliment or a token of affection, as in the case of the novel attributed to "Mr. and Mrs." R. L. Stevenson; or

(2) One of the collaborators was merely an amanuensis or a "ghost," as in the case of the collaborators of the elder Dumas; or

(3) The novel is a machine-made piece of goods, not of the highest artistic quality, as in the case of the Erckmann-Chatrian series.

The case of Besant and Rice is the best exception to this rule that can be found; and even that case will be found to be provided for by clause three if we apply the very highest standards of artistic merit. The very greatest artists never collaborate in fiction, or even in writing for the stage. One does not readily picture Mr. George Meredith collaborating, or Mr. Thomas Hardy; or Maeterlinck, or Ibsen. For they are writers who write not because they want to say something, but because there is something that they want to say—because their aim is to be artists, not popular entertainers.

Mr. Birrell's success was no doubt directly due to the lightness of his manner. Most legitimately so, for he is commendably free from the besetting sins of the conversationalist and impressionist—pose and display and eccentricity. Moreover lightness of manner is an exemplary virtue when serious subjects are handled lightly and not dishonoured. Talker and wit though he be, Mr. Birrell's interests are notably serious. His manner is light, not because he does not feel deeply, but because his judgment is mellow and his temper tolerant. A careful and loving student of Carlyle and Newman, of Burke and Johnson, an attentive reader of Matthew Arnold and Sir James Stephen, his intelligence was nurtured on grave subjects, and his heart is in the deeper human causes. It is the humanity even more than the art in books and writers that attracts him, and in nine cases out of ten supplies his text.

Mr. Birrell writes brilliantly, yet his essays are at the opposite pole from the prize exercise in style. He gives you the impression of writing because he is fond and full of his subject. And, indeed, there is plenty of internal evidence to prove that his subjects are matters of familiar reflection with him. Throughout the first series of "Obiter Dicta" are scattered the germs of later essays. In the essay on Carlyle are indications of the coming discourses on Gibbon and Emerson and Matthew Arnold and the Muse of History; in the essay on "Truth-Hunting" of those on Lamb and Johnson and Newman. So in the second series, in the essays on Lamb and on the Office of Literature will be found pages on Hazlitt and Borrow as delightful as anything in the later essays treating specifically of those authors in "Res Judicatæ." Only occasionally does the later essay materially modify the opinion indicated in the earlier reference. In the case of Emerson, it is true, Mr. Birrell seems to have felt that he had revealed too incautiously his secret opinion that those who went for real sustenance to the philosopher of Concord were like to fill their bellies with the East wind.

Mr. Birrell's range is not wide. He has not the polyglot erudition nor the cosmopolitan curiosity of some of our other able critics and causeurs. He has, for example, I think, handled only two or three foreign subjects:—Benvenuto Cellini and Marie Bashkirtseff, for their human interest; and Sainte-Beuve, no doubt because he was commissioned by a publisher as an appropriate person to introduce to English readers a selection of translations of the most famous "Causeries" in literature. But in these restless encyclopædic days this limitation has its comforts and is not without its refreshing and reassuring side. After all, there is plenty of width to turn in the spaces that separate Newman from George Borrow, or Browning from Pope, or Cowper from Carlyle, or Milton from Matthew Arnold. Nor will he be found dealing in "appreciations" of contemporary writers. In a dozen passages he has emphasized his opinion that the business of the wise critic (who has not the misfortune to be a reviewer) is with the work that time has sifted. He is, I dare swear, an appreciative reader of Mr. Barrie, but in public he would sooner tell you how good a book was Galt's "Entail." Nor will he be found dealing wholesale condemnations. He has a soft place in his heart for "Satan" Montgomery, and is confident that Montgomery's readers did not begin to enjoy Milton or to read the "Paradise Lost" just because they were frightened out of their natural likings by the stormy ridicule of a mighty rhetorician. If Mr. Birrell attacks, his attack is generally in defence of a reputation attacked by others. He can be angry with Coleridge, when his virtues have been pitted against the vices of Charles Lamb; and hostile to Fielding, when his manliness has been too pointedly contrasted with the tea-party moralities of Richardson. His range of work, in fact, is sufficiently indicated by his "Obiter Dicta," of which "Res Judicatæ" and "Men, Women, and Books" were but successors in the direct line. Even the excellent book on Charlotte Brontë is but a longer essay in the same agreeable manner on facts and opinions to be found in Mrs. Gaskell, Mr. Swinburne, and Sir Wemyss Reid. Some of these Obiter Dicta were first delivered as lectures and addresses. For so signal was the success of his essays that Mr. Birrell soon found himself in great request as lecturer—and that, I believe, even before he was a member of Parliament. Now, to be in demand as a lecturer in England on the sheer literary merits is no mean triumph. The triumph was amply justified by the result, for I know no literary lectures—I judge only by the printed versions—at once more conversational in tone and more literary in style and substance than these.

His services were also naturally sought as editor and "introducer" of the classics; and no reader of "Obiter Dicta" will have been surprised to find him consenting to edit Boswell. His latest "introduction"—and a capital bit of work it is—is at this moment before the public, before whom it ushers the bashful and autobiographical Mr. Broadhurst. The Life of his friend Sir Frank Lockwood was another piece of congenial biographical work that Mr. Birrell found to do.

Only one other literary triumph remains, I think, to be recorded. Mr. Birrell has been chosen by the Council of Legal Education to deliver courses of lectures to law students; and he contrived, without, as I understand, any sacrifice of legal orthodoxy, to make even a law lecture lively. So potent is the magic of manner.

W. P. JAMES.

The first series of "Obiter Dicta" was published anonymously by Mr. Elliot Stock in 1884, and was an immediate success. In ten years it went through fourteen editions; to-day it is in its twenty-first; and it still is Mr. Birrell's most popular book. The last essay in the volume—that on "Falstaff"—was by George Radford, and Mr. Birrell, in mentioning the fact in the preface to his second series, regretted that he was not able to persuade the same writer to contribute again. For authors to enjoy the pleasure of reading their own books over again, he remarked, it was essential that they should be written either wholly, or in part, by somebody else. And he apologized for the appearance of another book "by one who has never been inside the Reading Room of the British Museum," adding, however, that he would be satisfied with its existence "if only it prove a little interesting to men and women who, called upon to pursue, somewhat too rigorously for their liking, their daily duties, are glad, every now and then, when their feet are on the fender and they are surrounded with such small luxuries as their theories of life will allow them to enjoy, to be reminded of things they once knew more familiarly than now, of books they once had by heart, and of authors they must ever love." Mr. Birrell did not have long to wait for satisfaction on this score, for the second series (published by Elliot Stock in 1887) soon justified its existence by going to a second edition, and has since gone to a ninth edition. The large paper edition of the two series, published in two volumes in 1895, is now virtually out of print. Mr. Birrell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë" among the "Great Writers," published by Mr. Walter Scott, appeared in the same year as the second series of "Obiter Dicta," and contained some new matter relating to a little-known period in the life of the Rev. Patrick Brontë—the period which elapsed between his leaving Cambridge in 1806 and coming to Yorkshire in 1811. Mr. Birrell's one other biographical volume, the life of Sir Frank Lockwood, was published by Messrs. Smith, Elder in 1898, and is now in its fourth edition. His volumes of essays are all published by Mr. Elliot Stock, who issued "Res Judicatæ" in 1892 and "Essays about Men, Women, and Books" in 1894, both of which have gone through several editions. All the essays, or something very like them, previously appeared in the Spectator, the New Review, and other periodicals, or had been delivered as lectures. A library edition of the "Collected Essays," in two volumes, was published by Mr. Elliot Stock in 1899.

Mr. Birrell dedicated his "Essays about Men, Women, and Books" to Frederick Locker-Lampson—"sublest of critics, kindest of relatives, most generous of book-hunters"—and last year he wrote a preface to the appendix to the Rowfant Library, "A Catalogue of the Printed Books, Manuscripts, Autograph Letters, &c., collected since the printing of the first catalogue in 1886 by the late Frederick Locker-Lampson," dedicatory odes being at the same time contributed by Mr. Andrew Lang, Lord Crewe, and Mr. Wilfrid Blunt. Mr. Birrell also edited Frederick Locker-Lampson's "Confidences," published by Smith, Elder, and now in a second edition. In 1888 he edited the "Essays of Elia" for the Temple Library, and Messrs. Dent now publish this edition of Lamb's work in two volumes, illustrated by C. E. Brock, as well as in a cheaper form with an etching by Herbert Railton. Mr. Birrell's busiest year as an editor seems to have been in 1896, when, besides his work on the complete edition of Robert Browning, which he edited with Mr. F. G. Kenyon for Messrs. Smith, Elder, he wrote introductions to the "Lavengro" published by Messrs. Macmillan, and "The School for Saints and the Rivals," which the same publishers issued with illustrations by J. E. Sullivan. In the same year he also edited Boswell's "Life of Johnson." In 1896, too, he published his six lectures on "The Duties and Liabilities of Trustees" (Macmillan), his "Four Lectures on the Law of Employers' Liability at Home and Abroad" coming from the same firm in the following year. His last legal volume contained the more popular of the eighteen lectures which he delivered as Quain Professor of Law at University College, London, in 1898, on the subject of "The Law and History of Copyright in Books" (Cassell, 1899). Special mention is made of the Copyright Bill which Sir Walter Besant had so much at heart. In other departments of letters Mr. Birrell's latest contribution was his delightful preface—mentioned in our Notes Column on May 25—to Mr. Broadhurst's autobiography (Hutchinson).

ZOLA'S "WORK." A "Personal View"

BY MISS HANNAH LYNCH.

M. Zola is the prince of actuality. At a moment when France is preoccupied with the grave question of strikes, he comes forward with another of his ponderous tomes on the subject. He has devoted 666 pages to the amelioration of the human race in such a manner as to take all seriousness from his proposed reforms. The flightiest of observers must admit that reform in the world of labour is urgent when unrest and dissatisfaction front us on all sides. M. Zola seems to believe that science can accomplish the wildest wonders, and, with the assistance of science, he introduces us to a revised humanity we are very far from recognizing. Labour is done away with. Girls and boys in the pauses of love-making—which is their only real occupation—can carry through all the workings of a factory and find it less laborious than play. Copious repasts are served in the open by magic, for nobody seems to cook them or to stoop to the labour of laying a cloth. Everybody, of course, is a teetotaler in this beatific age, and since everybody is implacably doomed to evening love-making, and all the couples are chased by their creator into the woods the moment the stars are out, with their arms round one another's waist, it follows that there is never any rain or hail or snow. It is eternal spring, the poet's May, and at sixteen or thereabouts all the boys and girls become engaged (there are hundreds of them, all named and all apparently recognized and remembered by the author of their multiple existence) and are allowed not a moment's privacy. Their duty is to make love in the open, under the benevolent eyes of their elders, with an astounding indifference to the spectators around them. And when they sit down to public meals (everything in M. Zola's regenerated land is done in public), all the artisans' wives wear diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, precious stones having ceased to have any value, thanks to electricity; their heads are ashimmer with jewels in the implacable sunlight, and they are robed in soft light silken raiment. They eat off silver plates, and the children about them spring up like mushrooms.

M. Zola seizes nothing of the shades, the variability, the incessant modifications of humanity. Like the men who made the Revolution a hundred years ago, he expects in a different way to bring about violent and immediate reform. We feel on the brink of great changes, but we know that they will come more insensibly than M. Zola imagines. Real progress is too clement not to be slow. And such an amelioration of existence as he prophesies would deprive us of considerably more than it would bestow upon us. Life which has become methodical and evenly fortunate would mean life without that blest of all gifts, illusion, life without that bitterest of tonics, deception, life without the April smiles and tears of wild rash youth, life without the slow and sure lessons of experience. A humanity that did not suffer is a humanity that could inspire no lasting interest. It is not well to cause suffering needlessly. It is through suffering that man becomes lovable. The diaphanous hand of pain fashions the soul in an infinitely nobler mould than joy. Life exempt from sorrow would be a life exempt from the better part of our common heritage. Is not the pity we feel for a brother broken by some passionate grief of deeper and more vibrant sensation than any we might feel towards him in an hour of triumph? M. Zola would suppress effort—and thereby assuredly mutilate humanity, since the best in us is brought out and developed by effort—because he is indignant at the excessive toil of the working classes. And instead of the diversities of temperament, character, and fate, he offers us the commonplace prospect of flawless publicity. No quarrels, no tears, no broken hearts, no reconciliations, no jealousies or discontents. The wheels of existence move with implacable perfection, kept in order by electricity, in the guiding hand of science. And with the suppression of suffering, he suppresses passion and delight, he suppresses all surprise and illusion, and reduces human beings to the dead dull level of machinery. The idealism of M. Zola sends us back into the arms of reality with recovered vigour of allegiance. We contemplate its harshness in admiration of the results. We perceive so clearly the superiority of labouring, suffering, deceived, and deceiving mankind to this Utopian dream of the races; and whatever changes may be in store for us, we ask of progress not to deprive us of the tears which strengthen and ennoble.

M. Vizetelly, in his preface to his translation of "Travail," writes:—"It is an exposition of M. Zola's gospel of work, as the duty of every man born into the world and the sovereign cure for many ills; it deals with the present-day conditions of society so far as those conditions are affected by capital and labour; and, thirdly and particularly, it embraces a scheme of social reorganization and regeneration in which the ideas of Charles Fourier, the eminent philosopher, are taken as a basis and broadened and adapted to the needs of a new century." I entirely agree with Mr. Vizetelly when he says that science will do more than the "innate spirit of brotherliness between men to bring about comparative happiness for the human race." The pity is that M. Zola, in dreaming of his progressive changes, had not the modesty to content himself with the happiness of mankind in the comparative sense. Things might very well be a great deal better than they are without offering us the spectacle of artisans' wives bedecked in broad daylight with precious stones, robed in silk attire, and eating off silver meals that have apparently been prepared by electricity and invisible hands. How much pleasanter and cheerfuller the sight of a buxom woman of the people arrayed in cotton, with spotless cap, among her shining pots and pans, preparing with her own rough and hardened hands the midday meal which her husband and children will eat with all the better appetite because she has cooked it!

M. Zola has a large and generous heart, but he is not sufficiently armoured against sentimentalism. His hatred of alien suffering stumbles him into the ridiculous, where he poses and prosos sublimely. Hence his violence and exaggeration, and hence his dull and nonsensical dream of reform. The first three hundred pages of "Travail" are realistic and sad, with here and there a poignant note. We are interested in Luc, the idealist and dreamer, and we honour him for his gentleness and pitying love of Josine, the ill-treated abandoned child of the people, cast into the street by her infamous lover. The author handles this figure with great delicacy and sympathy, and manages, with little description and hardly any dialogue, to convey an impression of sweetness and charm. This impression fades when Josine is rescued and becomes the happy wife of Luc, which is only another proof that the heart is won and held by suffering rather than by joy, and that many, who in adversity command our esteem and admiration, dwindle into the commonplace in prosperity. Luc himself interests so long as he remains an unpractical dreamer and is on the point of disastrous failure in his scheme. But Luc successful, surrounded by adoring women, the president of a Utopian republic, where there is no division of classes, where bourgeois and artisan intermarry, where every one laughs, dances, makes love the live-long day, and the very babies are born without peril or pain, repels us as a fatuous and impossible creation. We are thankful for the diversities and divergency of real life, and note that poverty and hard labour are not all incessant gloom and groans. They go with much mirth and blitheness of mood, and they have their radiant hours, too, lending colour and kindness to our earth. There are iniquities one would gladly see abolished, and it were well the greed of gold played less part in the development of humanity, that women and children of the people were less ruthlessly trampled upon, but it will be a dull and dreary world indeed when we reach M. Zola's wild ultimate of progress.

"LUCAS MALET" ON THE FUTURE OF FICTION.

At the women writers' dinner, held last Monday at the Criterion Restaurant, 156 ladies assembled. Man, as the first speaker observed, was regarded "exclusively from the point of view of a brother, and that not a long lost one, though one for the moment absent." The two after-dinner speeches were by Mrs. Harrison ("Lucas Malet") and Madame Sarah Grand. The former did not deliver her speech herself, but handed it to Miss Sydney Phelps, who stood beside a statue of Shakespeare and declaimed it. "Lucas Malet," after showing that the list of women writers of the nineteenth century compared well with writers of the other sex, made some interesting observations on the future of fiction, some of which, as they have been so far rather scantily reported, we give in full:—

"As writers," said Mrs. Harrison, "we have a certain responsibility in regard to the future of our art. It is cowardly to shirk that responsibility, and it is surely a trifle mean, since we are in this matter proven his equal, to try to shuffle it—as, surprising to relate, we so often still, I observe, strive to shuffle our little difficulties—on to the broader shoulders of our brother man. We must come up to time, ladies, and be prepared to pay the price which equality exacts. For it is an unpleasant truth that things, excellent in themselves, frequently produce indirect results wholly the reverse of excellent. The spread of education, a thing in itself very excellent, has produced a new and enormous reading public very far from excellent, since it possesses no standard of taste, of style, of culture, I may almost say, of truth and of untruth. And this, through no fault of its own, since it has not, and obviously cannot have, the hereditary instincts which come of generations of breeding and of scholarship. But it is voracious, and the strength of its digestion is absolutely appalling. That of the ostrich, which comfortably assimilates rocks, ginger-beer bottles, and tenpenny nails, simply isn't in it! All it asks is to be filled. And the worst of it is, this public will pay for that filling, sums individually small, but very large in the aggregate. And here, as you must recognize, ladies, a very serious danger presents itself. This public asks to be amused as cheaply, not to say vulgarly, as possible. For the most part it is born tired, it hates exertion. It asks to be made to feel clever with as little expenditure of brain power as possible. It asks to be made to feel virtuous and secure of heaven with as little moral and spiritual effort as possible. It asks to be made familiar with, and consequently comfortably contemptuous of all classes not its own, all countries it has never visited, all religious systems with which it is unacquainted, all forms of knowledge beyond its intellectual range, all forms of art which transcend its very utilitarian conception of beauty. . . .

"I regret to say that this demand on the part of half-educated readers for a literature lacking in distinction, lacking in sincerity, lacking in research, lacking in accurate science, lacking in serious observation of human nature, lacking in beauty and in ideas, has been pandered to and catered for by persons of great business capacity, whose attitude towards Letters and Art is neither more nor less reverential than that of the draper towards his ribbons and laces or that of the general dealer towards his monkey-brand soap or Eiffel-tower lemonade. Goods by the yard or by the dozen, goods by the thousand words or by the page, the underlying object is precisely the same—namely, profit and hard cash. I have no quarrel, ladies, with trade or with commerce. These are not only necessary, but honourable, in their right place. At their best they have a certain massive and trampling kind of poetry. They have their romance. In any case, they are to the body politic that which the viscera are to the individual human body. But we distinguish, ladies, between the dignity of the different parts of the human economy. And to apply the rules of commerce, the rules of trade, to matters of Literature and of Art is to cease to exercise such power of discrimination. It is to place the flesh above the spirit, it is to confuse the price-list with the lyric, it is to cease to discriminate between our dinners and our prayers. For the ultimate purpose of commerce can be, after all, nothing higher than the increase of material prosperity, while that of Literature and of Art is the elevation of humanity by the worship of beauty and the expansion of the knowledge of Truth.

"Just now the spirit of commerce rules. It will not always be so. The wheel turns, ladies; for ever the wheel turns. Revolt must of necessity come. Then that very majority, to supply whose ignorant demands—either real or imagined—we have been called upon to degrade our Literature and our Art, will turn also and rend us. And, therefore, I venture to think it becomes not only the duty but the wisdom of all those writers of Fiction who honour their calling, and all those critics who realize their power in forming the taste and elevating the standard of the rising generation, to go before and promote this revolt by every legitimate means. Let the authors do their best work, refusing dictation, refusing to amplify or to curtail it to order. Let them refuse to write what they are told is wanted rather than that which they have it in them to write. . . . There is a ghastly legend—I sincerely hope it is not authentic—that a young man of unquestioned genius submitted, some few years ago, in obedience to commercial considerations, to end his novel in two different ways—one to suit his English, the other his American, public. Now, a story well conceived, a story which is an organic whole, ladies, can no more have two endings than your or my life can have two endings. The first page of a story, if the story is worth anything, of necessity contains the last.

"All my arguments and my appeals will, I know, be met, by many writers, with the simple remark—'Well, but after all we had to live.' . . . With younger persons who make this remark I would humbly reply that, though it may be very necessary for them to live, it is quite unnecessary that they should live by the production of cheap fiction or the production of equally cheap criticism. For the older members of the profession, they may be called upon to suffer somewhat for their faith. Immediately to make less money. Eventually I believe, to make quite as much. For though the book that dies with the year may bring in a considerable sum during the first six months of that year, the finer order of book—more mature, more imaginative, more deeply felt—though bringing in little at first, will continue to produce a secure, though perhaps modest, income through ten, fifteen, twenty, or even more years to come. For, be it remembered, the great public, even the uneducated majority of it, though too often wrong in its first judgment, is almost always right in its last. Meanwhile a good conscience goes for something; the sense of work done just as well as one knows how to do it can surely be set against certain deprivations in the way of smart clothes, of society, and of all those thousand and one things—notoriety and gratified vanity among them—which are by no means necessities of life."

THE SURVEY OF LONDON.

It is still too early to say exactly when the new "Survey of London," upon which the late Sir Walter Besant was at work as editor, director, and principal writer during the past seven years, will begin to appear. Messrs. A. and C. Black's last list announces that the first of the eight Royal quarto volumes will be ready this year, "to be followed at short, regular intervals." It is understood, too, that Sir Walter had completed most of the necessary arrangements for the work and that his own contributions were nearly all finished. The following particulars from the prospectus give the general outline of Sir Walter's scheme:—

The last edition of Stowe and Strype's famous work was issued in 1754; Maitland's Survey appeared in 1756; Entick's Survey in 1766; Lambert's Survey in 1806: all these were based upon Stowe. Since that time, though there have been many books written on London, on parts of London, on churches of London, and on institutions of London, there has been no actual Survey of London. In this long interval London has extended very far beyond the modest limits of its walls and suburbs of 1806. At the present moment the jurisdiction of the London County Council covers an area, including the old city, which roughly may be estimated at seventeen miles long by twelve miles broad. The whole of this area is to be included in the new survey. The work will not be like those of Maitland and Entick, merely a reproduction, brought up to date, of Stowe, but an entirely new work on a different plan. It will contain a history of London newly written and illustrated by the records and documents which have been brought to light during the last fifty years. These papers enable the historian to reconstruct and to present the city and its people as they were from age to age; not only the achievement of its liberties will be recorded, but also the development of its trade, the growth of its political power, the changes in its religious ideas, the manners and customs of the people. There will be a perambulation of the whole "County" as well as of the City proper, in the course of which every ancient building, every historical association, every Institution—Church, School, Hospital, Almshouse, Museum, Town Hall, Theatre—every great house of business will be noted and described. It is, in short, the desire of the Publishers and the Editor to erect a monument worthy of this great and venerable city. The work will be abundantly illustrated with maps and drawings of buildings past and present.

The eight volumes are said to have been arranged, roughly speaking, as follows:—Volume I.—From Prehistoric to Mediæval Times; Volume II.—Mediæval London; Volume III.—The Court and City in Tudor Times and under the Stuart Sovereigns; Volume IV.—London in the Eighteenth Century; Volumes V. and VI.—The Perambulation; Volume VII.—London in the Last Century; Volume VIII.—Appendices, Indices, &c.

In some respects one can scarcely expect, indeed, that this important work will not suffer by the loss of its enthusiastic editor. More truly of Sir Walter Besant than of any man since Samuel Weller could one say that his acquaintance with London was "extensive and peculiar." It was shown in many novels, where the curious knowledge of the antiquary elbowed the insight of the psychologist. It found still freer expression in the various histories of parts of London which he found time to publish as specimen skimmings of the larger work. "The History of London," as he conceived it, "is a long and dramatic panorama, full of tableaux, animated scenes, dramatic episodes, tragedies, and victories." In the projected Survey all these scenes were to be called up in the course of the "perambulation" of the area, referred to in the prospectus, that the modern county covers. One is glad to believe that the work is well advanced.

In spite of all that has been written about our Metropolis—if the shade of Freeman will allow us to use that word—from John Stow to Grant Allen, there is still room for a new and encyclopædic treatise on the subject. Stow, whose memory was often invoked by Sir Walter Besant in his appeals for access to records, still holds the first place in point of merit as well as of time: we say it with the estimable volumes of Mr. Wheatley and the laborious Peter Cunningham in full view. The lack of style and order which disfigure that worthy merchant-tailor's other contributions to history do not interfere with any reader's pleasure in the "Survey of London and Westminster" which he published just over three hundred years ago, in which order was provided—as in "Treasure Island"—by the map, and style came of its own accord to sit on the pen of an historian whose primary consideration was accuracy. Stow professed, unlike most authors, to be rather afraid of writing well. He gave a quaint rhyming reason for his scruples:—

Of smooth and flattering speech

Remember to take heed,

For truth in plain words may be told,

But craft a lie doth need.

The school of history which Freeman founded in this country seems to have borne the same motto before its eyes, in its terror of the example set by writers like the charming but inaccurate Froude. In spite of his refusal to sacrifice to the Graces of literature, Stow's language has a curious and agreeable old-world flavour, which seems to have had some influence on Sir Walter Besant's own historical style. Fuller, it is true, abused him for his love of picturesque but needless detail—reminding us of the controversy between pot and kettle. Stow, said the unconquerably quaint Fuller, was "such a smell-feast that he cannot pass by Guildhall but his pen must taste of the good cheer therein." It is just this affection for detail that makes Stow still readable, while later historians of London are merely used for reference. We should all remember how his literary executor summed up Stow's aims:—"He always protested never to have written anything either for malice, fear, or favour, nor to seek his own particular gain or vainglory; and that his only pains and care was to write the truth. . . . He was very careless of scoffers, backbiters, and detractors." The founder of the Society of Authors—who was not quite so philosophical—more than once took a text for his favourite sermon from Stow's being left a beggar at eighty. "Having left his former means of living" to compile the Survey, and being too old to return to the stitching of ruffles and the slashing of doublets, he had no better shift than to petition the King for a licence to beg, the economical substitute of his time for a Civil List Pension. His permission "to collect among our loving subjects their voluntary contributions and kind gratuities" was not a great success: he has recorded that a single parish only returned 7s. 6d. in twelve months. Every one will trust that the new editor of the Survey will be more fortunate.

Dr. Johnson, who spoke so scornfully of the high-road from Edinburgh to London, would have been mollified by the thought that it is a migrant firm of Scottish publishers—Messrs. A. and

C. Black—who have undertaken this great scheme for the glorification of his beloved city. It is a thousand pities that no Cave or Dodsley ever thought of persuading the Lexicographer to carry on the work of Stow. Most readers would have been sorry, indeed, to part with the "Lives of the Poets" in exchange for such a book, but it would certainly have been more in demand at the present day than the "Rambler." Johnson's love for London was remarkable even in an age when a far wider gulf divided town and country than is the case in these days of Pullman cars and "week-enders." "Is not this fine?" he said to Boswell, indeed, when they walked in Greenwich Park, but it was only "an angling question," to see if the little Scotch gentleman had already grasped the true faith that Fleet Street was far better. It is one of the mysteries of literature how Johnson, even with the licence of the poet, could say anything so uncomplimentary of London as to call it "the needy villain's general home." He was more in his true vein when he explained that, "when a man is tired of London, he is tired of life, for there is in London all that life can afford." That was, of course, before the Edinburgh Review had shown us the real provincialism of London, or Grant Allen had proved it to be only a squalid village. Perhaps the learning of Great Britain—to which some add, but others do not, Ireland—is no longer so crowded into the four-mile radius as Johnson thought that it was in his day. On the other hand, the true marvel of London has increased. "Sir," said Johnson to Boswell, "if you wish to have a just notion of the magnitude of this city you must not be satisfied with seeing its great streets and squares, but must survey its innumerable little lanes and courts. It is not in the showy evolutions of buildings, but in the multiplicity of human habitations which are crowded together, that the wonderful immensity of London consists." Johnson, in fact, anticipated the art of "slumming" and the discovery of the interest that lies in "mean streets."

It is curious to compare his eulogy of London with the denunciations of other famous men. Cobbett's phrase of "the wen" is familiar to us all. Edward FitzGerald had a perfect horror of the "huge, hideous" town. "I hate this beastly London more and more," he used to write to his friends. "It stinks all through of churchyards and fish-shops. . . . I think the dulness of country people is better than the impudence of Londoners, and the fresh cold and wet of our clay fields better than a fog that stinks per se." There are some convinced Londoners who—to quote Dr. Brand Firmin—like "the fumum and strepitum" as well as "the opes of our Rome." The late William Allingham said that, on his first visit to town, he leant out of the train window and exclaimed "There's the smoke of London!" "On which, I remember," he goes on, "a fellow-passenger opposite, whom my conduct had perhaps amused, remarked quietly, but not without a certain emphasis and feeling, 'Ha! there's no smoke like it!'" This is perhaps a desirable frame of mind for the citizen, but it is to be discouraged in the authorities, who are always being incited to grapple with the smoke nuisance. Perhaps by the time this Survey of London is completed they will have risen to their task, and future generations who read the work set on foot by Sir Walter Besant may have succeeded in fulfilling Morris' adjuration to "forget six counties overhung with smoke." It is such evanescent details as seem hardly worth mentioning to a contemporary that often give posterity the chief interest in records of the kind inaugurated in London by Stow. Let us hope that smoke and fog will prove a case in point!

Search in the library of University College, London, has recently brought to light two rare volumes. The Coverdale Bible of 1535 is found there in a damaged condition, the title page being lost, with the exception of a fragment, as well as all the text after Corinthians. Besides this, there is a thin volume, "Poetical Sketches" by W[illiam] B[lake], of 1783, the earliest edition of his poems published by his friends' subscription. Only about twelve copies are extant, none of these being in the British Museum.

FOREIGN LETTER.

SOME NEW GERMAN BOOKS.

We had intended in this letter to confine ourselves to recent productions in lighter literature, but it again happens that (except, perhaps, in drama) the most noteworthy books are the serious ones. Among novels there is little that calls for remark. Adolf Wilbrandt has published two volumes—one a long novel, rather dull, entitled "Franz," in which the hero and his friends are occupied in the search for a new religion. This is not, as a rule, a stirring theme for fiction, and "Franz," which has a very loosely constructed plot, cannot be said to be a good novel. "Das Lebende Bild und andere Geschichten," a collection of short stories, is more attractive and more on a level with Wilbrandt's best work. Indeed, the second tale, "Der Mörder," seems to us one of the most powerful short stories we remember. A man who has committed a murder and has successfully concealed the crime for years is induced by his mistress to confide his secret to her. She makes use of the knowledge to demand an immediate marriage, and he, recognizing his folly in having made her his confidant, puts an end to his life. Baldly stated, the motive may not seem particularly original or striking, but it is worked out with the utmost skill. "Die Geschichte der jungen Renate Fuchs," by Jacob Wassermann, made a great sensation in Berlin and Vienna. It has been compared by some enthusiastic critics to Gottfried Keller's "Der Grüne Heinrich"—we wonder they did not suggest Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister" at once; yet the adventures of Renate, a woman with an "asbestos soul," dead until the last few pages of the book to all ordinary human feeling, arouse interest despite the poor construction of the story. Into the characters of certain types of modern women Wassermann has great insight—the woman, for instance, who, like his heroine, is quite careless of the future. "I do not want," she says, "to know every room that I am to occupy for the rest of my life." But so hard does she strive to get out of every room she occupies that she sees nothing of the value of the furniture it contains. Incidentally the author has much that is sensible to say about the modern woman. His conclusion is depressing. Women, he thinks, can never gain liberty—not because they are unworthy of it, but because their use of it leads to a life much less free than that which they lived in the atmosphere of restraint. The book would be vastly improved by compression; yet it has what is rare in German works—a distinction of style, and this makes one hope that the author may use his remarkable gifts to greater purpose in the future.

If there are very few good novels there are many excellent plays, both among those intended for the stage and those called by the Germans "book-dramas." Die Zwillingschwester is more than a pleasant trifle, written in the easy-flowing, melodious verse which we associate with the name of Ludwig Fulda. It is an admirably constructed play, in which in some bygone period a lady of Padua believes her husband to be untrue to her and tests him by personating her own twin sister. In Max Dreyer's Der Sieger we have a conflict between liberty and compulsion in art, and also a conflict between an artist husband and his artist wife, of whose superior talent he is jealous. This last motive is true stuff for drama; but unfortunately Dreyer lets the former motive predominate, and so spoils his play. In Haus Rosenhagen Max Halbe returns to the motive of his Mutter-Erde. The peasant-hero is the last representative of his race, and has to choose between his affection for a woman who wishes to wean him from his native soil and his love for the home of his birth. The motive of Hirschfeld's Der junge Goldner is the struggle for freedom of idea, and its hero is a young playwright who, because his first play is not produced at the moment he desires, shakes the dust of his native town from his feet and goes forth to find another world where art is free. The subject of "Susanna im Bade" was a very favourite one with German sixteenth-century dramatists. On this theme Hugo Salus has published a one-act play in admirable verse. He gives it an original turn by making Daniel persuade one of the elders to confess. These do not, of course, exhaust the new plays, but space forbids us to do more than record the names of Otto Ernst's Flachsmann als Erzieher, indubitably inspired by Dreyer's Probekandidat; E. von Keyserling's Der dumme Hans, a fairy tragedy in five acts; Arthur Schnitzler's Der Schleier von Beatrice; and Ernst Rosmer's (Frau Bernstein) Mutter Maria, an elegy in five scenes.

Classical scholars derived great satisfaction from the perusal of the late Professor Erwin Rohde's "Psyche," which has already become a classic. We give a cordial welcome to two volumes of his minor pieces that have just appeared. They deal, of course, with classical antiquities, a subject he made his own, and contain contributions to the chronology, sources, and history of Greek literature, and to the place of ancient classical legends and fairy tales in the history of the romance and novel. A supplementary volume, with a biography (by O. Crusius, Rohde's successor at Heidelberg and Tübingen) and a selection from Rohde's aphorisms, is promised. For antiquarians, too, a very excellent work is being done by the National Museum of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in Sarajevo. We have before us Vol. VII. of its Proceedings, an admirably printed and illustrated book, written in German and published at Vienna. Among the best papers are those on the national dwellings and the marriage customs of Bosnia and Herzegovina, on the popular superstitions of, and the popular cures practised among, the Mahomedans of the province, and on the folk-lore of Dalmatia.

We alluded the other day to the correspondence of Kant which is being published. It is part of the new edition of the philosopher's complete works now appearing at Berlin under the auspices of the Prussian Academy of Sciences. There are to be four divisions:—(1) Works; (2) Correspondence; (3) Manuscripts hitherto unprinted; (4) Lectures; and when finished the whole will extend to about twenty-five volumes, of which two or three will probably be issued each year. The only volumes yet available are the tenth and eleventh, which contain the beginning of the Correspondence, and cover the years 1747-94. They include letters from Kant to such persons as King Frederick II., Herder, Lichtenberg, Schiller, Wieland, and Lavater, and from men like Moses Mendelssohn, Solomon Maimon, and Fichte. Other philosophical works are Descartes' "Meditationes de prima philosophia," carefully edited with an historical introduction and notes by Dr. C. Güttler, of Munich. This is the first adequate German edition of what Kuno Fischer calls "an incomparable philosophical work of art." Of Heilborn's new edition of "Novalis" we hope to say something another time.

At the moment Englishmen are more concerned with action than philosophy, and they will turn with interest to a new biography of Moltke. The special subject of its author, W. Bigge, is to give a military portrait of his hero, to paint his individuality as soldier and field-marshal. This aspect of Moltke—the development of his military personality—has hardly yet been adequately dealt with, perhaps because the necessary material was not available. But the book is not intended solely for a military audience, and will attract all who are interested in the career of the great German soldier whose distinctive military virtue was that he thought his battles out in advance.

A mountaineering book of importance is Merzbacher's "Aus den Hochregionen der Kaukasus: Wanderungen, Erlebnisse, Beobachtungen." It is the first German work of the kind, and compares well with Mr. Freshfield's "Travels in the Central Caucasus." Merzbacher gives an excellent account of the region, dealing exhaustively with its orography, ethnography, hydrography, and glacier system, and describing in detail the different mountain passes and ascents, including that of Elburz. He draws an interesting parallel between the Alps and the Caucasus, emphasizing the greater difficulties of climbing in the latter, and the advisability of taking European guides and porters.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

MARGARET OF NAVARRE.

The two most fascinating figures of the brilliant period of the French Renaissance are Margaret of Angoulême, titular Queen of Navarre, and Rabelais, who was scarcely more than titular curé of Meudon, for he seems to have had almost as little to do with his parish as she with the kingdom she never possessed. In WOMEN AND MEN OF THE FRENCH RENAISSANCE (Constable, 16s.) Miss Edith Sichel gives interesting and sympathetic sketches of both the curé and the Queen.

Margaret of Navarre was one of the most remarkable and lovable women of that or any age, so many-sided was she, so broad-minded, so warm-hearted, and so full of contradictions. Best remembered by the gay tales of the "Heptameron," written in her later middle-age to amuse her brother during a convalescence, she was all her life much given to piety of a somewhat mystical and even evangelical kind. She expresses it in an earlier work "Le Miroir de l'Ame Pécheresse," a very long and soulful poem which gained her as much notoriety in her day as the other book has done since. The Sorbonne found in it evidences of heresy. She had made no mention of the saints nor yet of purgatory. She was cited to appear before its court. But nothing came of this citation, since Margaret refused to obey. She was passionately fond of her only child Jeanne, yet when Jeanne at the age of eleven refused to marry the Duke of Cleves because he was old, and a foreigner, and she could not love him, Margaret gave orders to the State Governess to thrash Jeanne daily until she consented. And Jeanne was actually thrashed into submission. Yet Margaret herself at the very same age had refused to marry Henry VII. of England for the very same reasons.

This extraordinary harshness on the part of a woman like Margaret can only be explained by her servile adoration of her brother Francis I. who desired the match. Margaret's attitude towards Francis touches on the absurd and indeed on the blasphemous. In order to have the privilege of being with him she declares herself ready to become "the serving maid of his washerwoman." When he sends her the present of a crucifix, she writes that on beholding an object so divine she can do nothing but embrace it "for the honour and reverence that I bear my two Christs." And in another of her letters she tells him:—"I was yours before you were born and you are more to me than father, mother, and husband. Compared to you, husband and children count for nothing." His letters to her she wears as relics which cure all her wretchednesses, even her colds and indigestions. She kisses them at least once a day, makes her unfortunate husband kiss them too—one can imagine the wry face with which he must have done this—and is ready to have her child beaten to death to further his wishes. It is absurd certainly, it is monstrous, yet it is hard sometimes not to admire it, it is so thorough-going. As she said herself, very finely, "To love God one must first love a human creature perfectly," and to the woman who loves much, with the consequent disillusionment which it brings, much can be forgiven.

She gave with both hands to the poor, and was always in money difficulties, but she bought with both hands likewise all sorts of unnecessary and costly luxuries and objets d'art. She ate off gold plate, kept Cellini, Clouet, and Limousin employed for her, dressed magnificently if soberly, and would have all her Court equally finely dressed at her own expense. With all her genuine piety there were moments when in the exuberance of her spirits she made an elaborate jest of religion and sacred things. Such was the "Messe a sept Points" which she allowed to be celebrated in her Château of Nérac. She could have conversed on the subject of Women's Rights with the best of the sisterhood of to-day, yet she remembered the advice given by St. Paul, and was silent before her husband. And he, except in the matter of the King's letters, appears to have asserted his own rights without flinching, going so far as to box Margaret's ears soundly when he on one occasion suspected her of having coquetted with Lutheran doctrines and with a certain gentleman who had been expounding them to her. When Margaret received this gentle rebuke she was over forty. Every man of talent found in the Queen a warm friend and protector, and the diverse characters of those she gathered about her show the catholicity of her tastes. Calvin, Erasmus, Benvenuto Cellini, Clement Marot and Dolet are numbered among her correspondents and intimates.

Oddly enough she seems never to have met Rabelais, but there must have been a mutual admiration between these two souls who were so much akin. He dedicated to her the third book of "Gargantua et Pantagruel," and, we can feel sure, his dictum that love is the one solution of human ills would appeal direct to her heart. Some people still think of Rabelais as a synonym for coarse wit. The natural religion which he taught is one of the most beautiful and elevating to be found. If men would but help one another, he preaches, "there would be peace among mortals, love, and delight, good faith, repose, and feasting. There would be no lawsuit, no war, no disputing." And without this large charity, even intellect, which nevertheless meant so much to him, is useless. "Wisdom," he says, "cannot enter an unkind spirit, and knowledge without conscience is the ruin of the soul." Such teaching is no less needed now than it was three centuries ago, and possibly Miss Sichel's book may lead some readers back to a discriminating study and appreciation of Rabelaisian lore.

We read these chapters with the most enjoyment, as they show real insight and sympathy, but we wish we could give the book as a whole unreserved praise. While the matter is always entrancing, the author's methods are not always so. She shows a most lofty disregard for accuracy, spelling, grammar, and dates. The mere mechanical business of proof-correction scarcely seems to have engaged her attention at all. It is true she inserts a note in the beginning of the volume to correct the misattribution of Corneille de Lyon's portrait of Margaret to Clouet which she had made in the text; but how could she pass over the heading of her "Historical Summary" which gives for Louis XIII. the dates 1498 to 1515? She refers, of course, to Louis XII. On page 319, she speaks of "Benvenuto's Tour de Nesle." This is mere slovenly proof-reading, since elsewhere she writes the name correctly enough, but the same cannot be said of the word "parlement" which she uses, without italics and as though it were an English word, throughout the book. On page 194 the foot-note is attached to an entirely wrong paragraph, but the confusion of dates in Chapter 21, "The Last Days of Margaret of Navarre" could scarcely have arisen without some corresponding confusion of mind. Thus on p. 354 Miss Sichel states correctly that Francis I. died in March, 1547, and refers to the two visions Margaret had of him at the time of his death. The Queen fell into a state of despondency, and later, we are told on p. 364, "a comet had appeared in December, 1544, supposed to be the presage of Paul III.'s end. Margaret took it also as an augur of her own. She was anxious to see it, and in the contemplation of it she caught the chill that was fatal to her." Would Miss Sichel have us believe that Margaret died before her brother? Or that in 1544 she caught a chill which only proved fatal to her five years later, since the real date of her death is 1549? But confusion is worse confounded a few pages further on, where she speaks of Margaret writing the "Heptameron" between the years 1544 and 1548, and adds six lines lower down that it was not published until "1558, nineteen years after her death." How does she get at the nineteen, since even on her own erroneous theory that Margaret died in 1544, only fourteen years could have elapsed?

Occasionally Miss Sichel translates the French poems she quotes, but more often she does not. Her principle appears to be that where the quoted passage is short and will give little trouble, she puts it into English, but where it is longer and more difficult, the reader must shift for himself. For the help of the reader who does not know French, she should surely have turned her method the other way about.

EDUCATIONAL.

SOME NEW SCHOOL HISTORIES.

Greece.

Mr. E. S. Shuckburgh, the author of A SHORT HISTORY OF THE GREEKS from the earliest times to B.C. 146 (Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges; Cambridge University Press), is a pleasant writer, and knows his subject well in the main lines, although there is little evidence of first-hand study or of originality of thought. This history may be relied on as safe and sensible. It has also the merit that the wider aspects of history are brought into prominence, and less important events treated cursorily. A good point is made in distinguishing Homer from Hesiod—the one writes for the chieftain's hall, the other for the peasant's cottage, and this goes a long way towards explaining the different tone of each. It does not explain, however, why Homer consistently ignores the grosser elements of savagery in Greek mythology. The book contains maps and a number of good illustrations. But we wonder when schoolbooks will adopt the latest improvements in maps, which show so clearly the physical structure of the land. More might have been made of the geography with advantage.

LITTLE ARTHUR'S HISTORY OF GREECE, by Rev. A. S. Walpole (Murray, 2s. 6d.), is an ideal book for a young child to begin with. It is written in simple language, and dwells on great deeds and great men rather than on the minutiae of history. It is full of pictures, some of which are quite new to us.

Rome.

A HISTORY OF ROME UP TO 500 A.D., arranged "for use in the higher forms of schools, at the Universities, and for the Civil Service Examinations," by E. H. Miles (Grant Richards, 8s. 6d.), is introduced, in a preface, with a flourish of trumpets which prepared us for something startlingly new in the way of method; but it is not so very new after all. The newness lies chiefly in treating history twice over, briefly and then more fully, and in gathering up its hundred threads in a series of what Mr. Miles calls "essays." We should call them notes rather, not very well arranged, nor in good proportion. There is a great deal of triviality and commonplace, such as this:—"Contrasts are quite as valuable as comparisons and analogies. Nothing helps so much towards a realization of what a holiday means than hard work; a calm cannot be thoroughly appreciated except after a storm." He speaks of the loss of ancient authors, "for which schoolboys should be duly thankful"; and this gives us the right phrase to describe the book. It is the history of a clever schoolboy, not sufficiently trained to see that examinations are not the be-all and end-all of life. The numerous memory-rhymes show the same spirit. How can a pupil be imbued with respect for the great dead, or with a sense of the magnitude of historical issues, when he associates them with such lines as these:—

Now reigned Augustus, backed by army, equites, and crowd,
And faithful friends; a great desire for safety most men cowed.
IT CRAMPS ALL gives the initials of Augustus' veiled rule.
The S is most important, for the senate was his tool, and so forth through the other initials; or more terrible still, if he remembers the map of the Roman Empire by an outline of the Mediterranean distorted into a semblance of the words 'E WINS YE. Mr. Miles' literary standards may be gauged from the astounding sentences: "Again, let us look at literature. Let us consider its cheapness and the cheapness of the education it confers. What Athenian or Roman would have dreamed of the possibility of a Tit-Bits or Answers?" Thus the tone of the book, vulgar and trivial, condemns it as far as concerns the young; but we must not fail to add that it contains a great deal which is likely to be useful to teachers, both in the subjects suggested for particular study and in many of the ideas which Mr. Miles puts forth. It will probably help those whose aim is to pass examinations, as it bears evidence of having been compiled for them and tested by experience of cramming.

The British Empire.

A SCHOOL HISTORY OF ENGLAND, with maps, plans, and bibliographies (Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.), has been compiled by "several teachers of experience," modest enough to have been inhabitants of Gray's country churchyard. It is unpretending, but appears to be well adapted to practical ends. The paragraphs have headings; the bibliographies are good. It is awkward, however, to use deep black now for high mountain-land and now for the sea, in the maps.

We have already offered our tribute to Mr. W. H. Woodward's "Expansion of the British Empire," and are prepared to do the like for the present abridgment, AN OUTLINE HISTORY OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE, 1500-1870 (Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges, 1s. 6d. n.). It is a pity to abridge it, and that is our only criticism.

One of the schemes recently issued by the Board of Education suggests lessons on great Englishmen as a suitable historical course for the middle division of a school. In response to that suggestion appears FAMOUS ENGLISHMEN (Black, 1s. 4d.), a new school-reader by John Finnemore. It tells, in simple language, the stories of such illustrious personages as Alfred the Great, Dunstan, Becket, Simon de Montfort, Chaucer, Wycliffe, Caxton, Drake, and Shakespeare.

No doubt the flame of Welsh patriotism, much fanned of late years, is responsible for Professor Ernest Rhys' READINGS IN WELSH HISTORY (Longmans, 1s. 6d.), but even the poor Saxon may well be grateful for it. The story is told so prettily, and with such a light touch, that it is a pleasure to read, and we are glad to have our ignorance enlightened as to Llewellyn the Great and Owain Gwynedd. Of course the book touches on English history in many places. A number of excellent pictures help the imagination. Many are by Mr. Lancelot Speed, and give an idealized picture of that wild life. There is some posing in them, however, as before a photographer. Why do half of Boadicea's people turn their backs to her as she speaks, and the other half stand behind her?

The purpose of Mr. J. A. Nicklin's anthology, POEMS OF ENGLISH HISTORY (Black, 1s. 6d.), is to give life and colour to historical teaching; and each poem printed has its definite bearing on some definite historical event. We are glad to see not only such old favourites as Cowper's "Boadicea" and Burns' "Bannockburn," but also excerpts from such contemporary poets as Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. W. E. Henley, Mr. Newbolt, and Sir Rennell Rodd. Whether it was quite wise to include Chaucer is an open question. Chaucer, it seems to us, is a little too difficult for the boys into whose hands the anthology is likely to come; and the same objection might apply, on this side of the Tweed at all events, to Jane Elliot's "The Flowers of the Forest." Only the most simple and intelligible poetry is likely to be popular in "lower and middle forms in secondary schools," and if the selection is not popular its usefulness disappears. Most of the pieces, however, are at once simple and stirring. We are particularly glad to see Sir Rennell Rodd so well represented. His work has never received the attention which it deserves.

THE HISTORY OF SOUTH AFRICA, by the Hon. A. Wilmot (Kegan Paul, 5s.), is intended both for general use and as a school-reader. It might serve either purpose, being written in an entertaining style, though a certain lack of precision and a rather loose arrangement of the material would militate against its usefulness as an actual lesson-book.

LATIN.Oxford Texts.

ARISTOPHANIS COMOEDIAE II.: Lysistrata, Thesmophoriazusae, Ranae, Ecclesiazusae, Plutus, Fragmenta, Index Nominum. F. W. HALL, W. M. GELDART.

PLATONIS OPERA II.: Parmenides, Philebus, Symposium, Phaedrus, Alcibiades I. and II., Hipparchus, Amatores. I. BURNET.

XENOPHONTIS II.: Commentarii, Oeconomicus, Convivium, Apologia. E. C. MARCHANT.

M. TULLI CICERONIS EPISTULAE. I. Epistulae and Familiares. L. C. PURSER.

We have no need further to dwell on the principles underlying the Oxford texts, which we have explained in dealing with the earlier volumes. The editors of the second volume of Aristophanes have had a harder task than usual, especially in the dialect portions, and have been forced to admit a number of conjectures into the text, which, even so, still contains many passages which are clearly corrupt. The labours of Bentley, Elmsley, Brunck, and others have left their mark on the less-read plays. Where the editors have been conservative, we can generally approve, and their choice for filling gaps is judicious (e.g., Thesm. 477); it should be a rule, however, to obelize all conjectures adopted in a text of this sort. Some of those mentioned in the notes (as Meinecke's rās kūvas, Lys. 340) deserve to be forgotten. In τοῦνομα, Lys. 853, a letter has fallen out. In Lys. 1,052 perhaps a transposition, ὡς ἔσω πολλά 'στιν, would lead to a better emendation than Burges'. καὶ μὲν, in Thesm. 819, is highly suspicious. To the fragments, a new one of twenty lines is added from the Oxyrhynchus Papyri. The Index contains a good deal besides names, the chief allusions being added in a subject-index under the chief names.

Prof. Burnet in this section of his work shows the same good judgment, in our opinion, as before, and does not, we think, deserve the censure which Diels passed upon him of neglecting unduly the testimony of ancient citations. The weakness of these as evidence he points out in his preface; all important variations are noted, nevertheless. It is to his credit that no startling novelties are to be found in his text; and the conjectures, especially those of Badham and Bury, which he records in the notes, are of value. Mr. Bury's αἰσῖς for λύσις in Philebus, 31 D, is brilliant. For criticism of the Parmenides and Philebus he has the advantage of following Mr. Waddell, although Schanz has not done these dialogues. Although we cannot be expected to agree in all points with the editor, we have only noted one where we feel pretty sure he is wrong. The Greek idiom requires οἷς δαῖ τε καὶ μὴ in Phaedr. 275 E (so Thompson, after Hirschig) for δαῖ γε.

Mr. Marchant, warned perhaps by the fate of Rutherford's "adscripts" when tested by the papyri, has not followed those who would excise what they do not like from the Memorabilia of Xenophon. His text follows as closely as possible the tradition of A and B, criticized with the aid of Stobaeus and sometimes of the inferior MSS. He adds the text of a papyrus fragment lately discovered, which partly confirms, partly changes, the received text; neither of Cobet's corrections on the passage is found in it. For the Oeconomicus also papyrus fragments are now available, but, unfortunately, in a rather corrupt state. A number of fresh MSS. have been used for this, and in particular that in the British Museum. We think Mr. Marchant is right in keeping the MS. reading, οἱ πλείστοι in 3.11 and ἐπηλύτου in 11.5, against seductive suggestions, although he obelizes both. The vexed phrase in 4.7 might be mended by a simple transposition (τῶν ἀρχόντων ἢ τῶν φρουράρχων καταμελοῦντας). We have no further comment, save that we are glad Mr. Marchant votes for the genuineness of the Apologia.

It is very appropriate that Mr. Purser should edit the Cicero, and his task is worthily done. The text is based on the Medicean, with the addition of Harl. 2773 and Pa. 17812 for the first eight books; and for the rest Harl. 2682, the Erfurt Codex F, and Pal. 508, which all three derive from one source, and supplement the Medicean. The MSS. derived from these are left out of account. Besides MS. variants, a number of conjectures are recorded in the notes. Our only criticism would be that Mr. Purser has been a little too generous in mentioning conjectures. But this does not apply to such brilliant corrections as his own in viii., 8, 3, transegisse et rem for transegisset. Date and place of writing are prefixed to each letter, and an Index Nominum is added to the book.

Blackie's Illustrated Latin Series.

In Blackie's "Illustrated Latin" Series Mr. John Brown, Professor of Latin in Wellington, N.Z., edits LIVY, Book I. (2s. 6d.), and CÆSAR'S GALLIC WAR, Book V. (2s.). In both books the introductions are good and well written, but the notes leave something to be desired. It is amusing to find the Celtic fallacy cropping up in a schoolbook; it is suggested that the Celtic element in North Italy may have had a share in the genius of Catullus, Virgil, and Livy. Can no one be a genius, then, without consent of the Celt? There is not a shadow of evidence for it here. Mr. Brown begs a vexed question when he speaks of the Iliad and Odyssey being "written" (Livy, p. xiii.). The appreciation of Livy's merits and the account of his style are interesting. Accessory matters, such as the sources of early Roman history, the Roman army and camp, are sufficiently explained. The fault we have mentioned in the notes is a certain shallowness. It is misleading to say that ausim is "for ausus sim" (Livy, pref. § 1), or postridie "for postero die" (Cæsar, ch. x.); a boy is sure to imagine these are contractions, and there is opportunity to suggest the historical development of Latin in the optative assist ausim, and the locative case in postri-die. There is no note on the mood and tense of sim and consoler in Livy, pref. 3, and on the much discussed condendam all Mr. Brown has to say is "the gerund being equivalent to a pres. part-passive." So, too, the relic of the old gen. plural in um is not explained (Livy, I. 2), and Mr. Brown does not realise that Livy does use ab with the instrumental (I. 4). The note on animi (Cæsar, xi.) is wrong; animi causa is a common Latin colloquialism meaning "for a whim," "to please oneself." The notes have, however, the merit of brevity. The illustrations, which are antique, are not sufficiently explained. Some useful exercises in retranslation complete each book.

In the same series Prof. P. Sandford edits Virgil's ÆNEID II. (1s. 6d.) in a more scholarly way. Authorities and quotations are given with Virgil's "Life," which is more original and more gracefully expressed than is usual in schoolbooks. The critical remarks, too, are happy. The introduction, as a whole, appeals to a cultivated taste, and might be thought too good for school-boys by those who make the common mistake of supposing that it is necessary to write down to the pupil's level or below it. The pictures in this volume, largely taken from Greek vases, are really illustrative; but, as before, fuller references and descriptions should be given. The notes, on the whole, are adequate, the versions tasteful. We cannot accept, however, the interpretation of impulerat (55)—that the indicative is meant "to emphasize the fact that the action did not take place." To say it did take place would be a strange way of emphasizing the fact that it did not. In such phrases the hypothesis is stated as a fact for vividness. Fors et (139) needs a little more explanation. There is no ellipse in sed enim (164), which means literally "but indeed."

We have already spoken of Mr. Winbolt's valuable study of the Virgilian hexameter, in reviewing his "Georgics, Book I." This reappears, with the rest of his preface in his GEORGICS II., a volume of the same series. The notes are just what the school-boy wants; they contain many parallels from English poetry, and every effort is made, by explanation and illustration, to make clear the processes of husbandry. But we should like to have heard more about Evelyn's "Silva."

In the same series, Mr. H. B. Cotterill edits ÆNEID VI. (2s.) with the usual "Life" and general introduction. The description and photograph of Virgil's tomb, and the allusion to Virgil as a magician, are novelties in a schoolbook. The comparisons of Virgil with Dante are good, and so are many of the notes in other respects. But they have their limitations. Professor Postgate's convincing explanation of the conception of Cerberus, as a monster with three dogs' heads and a hundred (or fifty) snakes for hair, is not mentioned. Athena's triple crest, amongst others, is omitted when it would have been in point. Mr. Cotterill shies at the dative of motion, and his note on 129 is misleading:—"Notice how in Latin one does not say 'this (neut.) is the labour,' but 'this labour is (the labour).'" But to the Roman, labor certainly was the predicate, no other being understood, and hic attracted. There are several excellent appendices on the philosophy of the book.

Livy.

It is not often that the reviewer meets with a school edition which contains so much original work as Professor R. S. Conway's LIVY, Book II. (Pitt Press Series, 2s. 6d.) Professor Conway has a first-hand knowledge of the textual criticism of Livy, which he is editing for the Oxford "Bibliotheca." If we do not feel confident that he has always chosen the best reading (as, in ii. 3, he adopts offenderet for offenderit of the MSS., which Dr. Reid defends), yet he does not change rashly, and the discussions of textual points are instructive. The notes are thorough, and show independent research; linguistic points are especially well handled, as we should expect from Professor Conway's antecedents. The editor takes a sensible and not too contemptuous view of tradition; and he has given a clear analysis of the story of Coriolanus. But the most valuable part of the book, which makes it worth the while of any teacher to get it, lies in an appendix "On the Variation of Sequence in Oratio Obliqua," where Livy's usage, generally regarded as loose, is shown to be orderly and based on principle.

An edition of LIVY XXII., by Messrs. J. Thompson and F. G. Plaistowe (Clive, 2s. 6d.), is, within its limits, distinctly good. The edition aims at giving just what is necessary, and no more, to introduce and explain the author; and it succeeds. The notes are more thorough and scholarly than most others of this series which we have examined, and the only omission we have noted is that the c of necubi is not explained (2 § 3).

CICERO, PHILIPPIC I., by A. H. Allcroft, M.A. University Tutorial Series (Clive, 3s. 6d.), is a serviceable edition, strongest perhaps on the historical side. The note explaining Cæsar's adroitness in escaping impeachment after his governorship of Gaul (p. 77) is particularly good, and so is that on the political status of Italian towns (p. 93). The introduction is good as a whole, though it touches on childishness in parts, as where the question is suggested whether Cæsar were a "good or bad" man. There is the usual omission of general principles. It should be stated, for example, why words like poteram could be used in the indicative, with subjunctive in the protasis (p. 69). And what is a predicative genitive (p. 68)?

THE AGRICOLA OF TACITUS, edited by Mr. J. W. E. Pearce (Bell, 2s.), is well done, and is especially interesting to English readers from the number of illustrations of Roman remains found in Britain, the views of Silchester and the Roman Wall, &c. We doubt, however, whether bipennis could mean a half-axe; the image may, perhaps, have been the bronze or stone axe of oval shape with hole in the middle, which was also called bipennis. A FIRST LATIN READER, by R. A. A. Beresford (Blackie, 1s. 6d., illustrated) is adapted for very young children, the first part having a picture to each sentence. It is good on the whole; but quisque miles is not the Latin for "each soldier," and tali modo should be hoc modo. The pictures are capital.

Of Bell's Illustrated Classics there is much to commend in Mr. F. C. Smith's ELEGIAC SELECTIONS FROM OVID. The selections are more complete than is usual in such books, a distinct advantage; and the notes are simple and sensible. There is no vocabulary, but a list of proper names. LIVY, Book XXI., by F. E. A. Trayer, is excellent from every point of view, not least for the appendix in which Hannibal's route over the Alps is once more discussed. Mr. Trayer gives a clear summary of the current views, and finally votes for Mont Genève. Every point of importance is dealt with, and the whole book is illustrated abundantly with maps, plans, cuts, and photographs.

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID, Book I. (with Vocabulary), by M. T. Tatham (Arnold, 1s. 6d.), is meant for beginners. The chief point to note is a useful analysis of Virgil's style, illustrated by examples from the first book, and compared or contrasted with classical prose. The notes are clear and good, with many happy quotations, which are quite original for the most part. The text is Hirzel's.

Grammars and Readers.

MACMILLAN'S LATIN COURSE, PART III.: EASY EXERCISES IN CONTINUOUS PROSE, by W. E. P. Pantin, M.A. (3s. 6d.), is a capital little book and well arranged. It contains a few pages of hints and explanations and a number of sentences for practice, besides the continuous prose. For exercises alone, indeed, we have never seen anything better than Champneys and Rundle's little book; but if exercises and explanations are to be in one book this will, we think, be found satisfactory by teachers.

We have no space here to argue the question, whether Latin should be begun by learning the tables of grammar, or by bits of grammar and exercises combined; but if the latter plan be adopted, BELL'S LATIN COURSE, Part II., by Messrs. Marchant and Spencer, is superior to other attempts we have seen because (1) the sentences are coherent, (2) some little use is made of dialogue, (3) the vocabulary is small. At the same time the sentences are too few, and will have to be supplemented by scores of others done viva voce or a reading book. Personally, we prefer grammar and reading book and plenty of viva voce practice. The coloured pictures are very coarse; and what has become of Hercules' second snake (p. 17)?

DISCERNENDA LATINA, by J. S. Howell (Blackie, 6d.), contains a useful list of words alike yet different, in quantity or construction, and a few idioms and proverbs. Some carelessness is to be seen on p. 22, where manere aliquid is translated "I await some one." Why are not all the verbs given in the same form? On p. 23 committo "entrust" is given with dative and accusative without a hint of the difference.

An Anthology.

Professor R. Y. Tyrrell's ANTHOLOGY OF LATIN POETRY (Macmillan, 6s.) ought to have been called "Specimens"; for it is not a choice of the best, but of characteristic, pieces from the earliest traditional songs to Boethius. That they are nearly all interesting in themselves is beside the mark. As a book of specimens it has high merit; and it will be found more useful by the University man or the average teacher than Wordsworth's, not only because it is more compact, but because great advances have been made since Wordsworth's day in the study of Latin. We regret, however, that Professor Tyrrell should lend his authority to an accentuation of the Saturnian verse which implies quantitative structure. We cannot believe in such a pronunciation as cumé or ensór, and Plautus is conclusive for the accentual scansion, not to mention the evidence of popular verse at all dates and of the course taken by Latin verse when left to itself. The notes on the less known poets are generally admirable, though in parts obscure by compression; and in the familiar pieces little is said.

GREEK.

Theocritus.

THE IDYLLS OF THEOCRITUS, edited with introduction and notes by R. J. Cholmeley, M.A. (Bell, 7s. 6d.). A new edition of Theocritus was certainly needed, but editors have been deterred by the magnitude of the task. There are scores of MSS. which have never been properly collated and classified; and we are only just coming to a position in which we can duly criticize the dialect. The desired edition, then, would be conceived on a larger scale than this, and such a one should properly have preceded an edition for schools such as this appears to be. But we must be thankful for small mercies, and as a school edition (with certain reservations which we shall point out) this is distinctly in advance of any earlier one. Indeed, it is in many respects an improvement on Ahrens and Fritzsche, whose work with all its merits is marred by insufficient knowledge in some parts and by arbitrary changes in many. If Mr. Cholmeley does not appear to have done much more than use the materials which others have provided, he has at least the advantage of the studies of Legrand and of a host of articles in learned periodicals which have been published in late years, as well as Mr. Paton's "Inscriptions of Cos"; and he has used his materials with conspicuous good judgment. We have read his introduction with great interest, and acknowledge that it throws light on many obscure places. In particular, the poet's life is made clear in outline, and good reason shown for believing him to have studied in Cos under Philetas between 290 and 285, where he wrote i., iii., vi., vii., xi., and xiii., published together as a book of bucolic verse. This theory explains both the tone and the allusions in many places which have hitherto proved a puzzle, and enables us to keep the MSS. reading, e.g., in ix., 26. He identifies Aratus, not with the astronomical poet, but with another who is mentioned in a Coan inscription. Mr. Cholmeley's critical remarks are also in excellent taste; we would instance those on Simaetha, on Homeric phraseology, and the comparison of Theocritus with Herondas. The MS. evidence, so far as known, is clearly set forth, the authenticity of the poems discussed, the metre explained fully, and the dialect very briefly. The notes are strong on the literary side, and in the new illustrations drawn from Alexandrian poets; but, from the schoolboy's point of view, they omit difficulties which need comment (such as αὐτὰ in ii., 89). Further illustration should in any case be given of πλέον, i., 20 (cp. πλέον ἔχειν); θεῶν δαίδαλμα, i., 32 (cp. regis opus); ἐπὶ ξηροῖσι, 51 (ἐπὶ τῷ φάργος ἡδιστ' ἄν, &c., of the feast's accompaniment or sauce); ὄρεχθεῖν, xi., 43; "Phyllida flouts me," should have been compared with Idyll xi. But these are only a few points; and there is new matter on nearly every page. Quotations from modern Greek songs are given, and are excellent illustrations. Mr. Cholmeley may be interested to learn that the Doric πόκα (iii., 21) is still used by old-fashioned people in Cos. The greeting in xiv., 1, may also be paralleled in the modern καλῶς τόν. We hope the editor will in due time give us a more complete Theocritus, and with it a good account of the poet's dialect (a weak point here) and a comparison with the Coan remains.

THE PROMETHEUS OF ÆSCHYLUS, edited by Mr. C. E. Lawrence (Bell, 1s. 6d.), shows signs of haste or incomplete study. What will the boy think when he is told that the orchestra was circular and then sees it to be semi-circular in the picture? If it is not certain that the classical Greeks used a stage, it is more than likely. Is the language of Euripides so simple as Mr. Lawrence makes out? There is certainly much affectation in it. Mr. Lawrence knows of Shelley, but he might have mentioned Bridges' "Prometheus the Fire-bringer." What is meant by explaining δραπε as an "intrans-perfect with present sense" (p. 60)? We welcome the metrical versions of the odes.

TRANSLATIONS.

We predict a wide sale for Messrs. Isbister's pocket edition of Dean Plumptre's ÆSCHYLUS, bound in soft red leather (2 vols., each 2s. 6d. n.). A reprint of the book was wanted, and this is really charming. There is no need to enlarge on the merits of the translation, which has won a place for itself. We do not always like Dean Plumptre's choice of rhythms, but his blank verse is good enough to outweigh many faults, and the whole work is scholarly, except the spelling of names. Why Aeschylus, one would ask; why Cronos, Skythia, and other hybrids? There is a portrait of Aeschylus and a view of Athens, and the translator's notes accompany the text.

We have been much pleased on the whole with THE IDYLLS OF THEOCRITUS, translated into English verse by J. H. Hallard (Rivingtons, 5s.), which now appears in a second edition. Not that we think Mr. Hallard has produced an ideal translation, but he has made a number of new experiments which are interesting. He uses a dozen different metres, suiting the metre to the subject and style as far as he can; and amongst them are hexameters and elegiacs which produce a novel effect on the ear, because they combine accentual rhythm with some regard for position. The result is, we think, to improve on the usual type of English hexameter; the lines do not hurry so much, and yet they are lighter on the lips. The elegiacs in VI. (Polyphemus and Galatea) are a distinct success. There is a possibility of still further success on these lines, one would think, with a more delicate ear; for Mr. Hallard's ear fails him at times in the hexameters, and in another measure there are a good many lines which appear to have no rhythm at all (e.g. p. 39). What would our readers make of this:—

Fair will Ageanax' voyage to Mytilene be.

Mr. Hallard's blank verse is simple and dignified. "The Fishers" is good in rhythm and style; and there are some happy touches in "Gorgo and Praxinoë," but why is the expressive μᾶ omitted? Mr. Hallard is a little apt to slur characteristic phrases; τὸν παρίσαν δμῆλγῃ becomes "Hold what thou hast" (xi.). The seven-line stanza, a variety of terza rima, hendecasyllables, and several other measures are attempted. Mr. Hallard has not Calverley's charm of phrase or his mastery of rhythm, but this Theocritus deserves a place in the scholar's library.

The Rev. S. Hemphill translates PERSIUS into English prose (Hodges, Figgis, and Co., Dublin: Bell, London) with some success. An intelligent introduction is prefixed, in which Dr. Hemphill suggests that much of his author's obscurity may be due to allusions and catchwords which are now forgotten. (See especially p. xiv.). He maintains that Sat. i. may be a sarcastic "review" of Callirhoe, "which may have been Nero's last production." No evidence is given for this suggestion, but if it be true the last line gains a new point. Dr. Hemphill discards the current interpretation of nonaria (i. 133), which (following Mr. F. D. Morice) he translates "nones-girl, a servant-maid out for a holiday on the Nones of July." This is certainly better than to suppose any connexion with the "ninth hour." Conington's version is more idiomatic than Dr. Hemphill's, but this is a useful companion and commentary for Conington.

Mr. F. E. Robinson publishes a translation of PLATO'S APOLOGY, by D. F. Nevill (1s. 6d., n.), with Introduction, Analysis, and a few notes. The version is correct, but not very good in point of style. It savours too much of the "crib."

THE SONGS OF ALCAEUS are given us by Mr. J. Easby-Smith, Greek text with verse and prose translations and notes (Washington: Lowdermilk, $2). Mr. Easby-Smith has already done Sappho in the same style. The work is intended for the general reader who has, perhaps, forgotten some of his Greek; for whose behoof scattered fragments are made to give the hint for whole songs which the translator rewrites. The verse is fair, and the translation generally accurate (but Lat. plectrum is not a harp as on p. 30). The most original part of the book is the Life of Alcaeus, which (with some repetition) sets forth some new ideas. The notes cite poetical translations by other authors.

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Mr. T. R. Lounsbury, Professor of English in Yale, has written an admirable HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE (Bell, 5s.); the revised edition of an earlier work we have not met with. He deals in the first part with the elements which make up the language, and in the second with Inflections. The history and relations of the dialects are clearly stated. We have not seen any book on the subject which is at once so interesting and so sound; and it is to be commended that larger issues are kept ever in view. Thus Mr. Lounsbury points out that the future of English depends not upon the language, but on the character of those who speak it.

Mr. H. S. Pancoast, of Philadelphia, writes an INTRODUCTION TO ENGLISH LITERATURE (Bell, 5s.), which is in its department equally good. His aim is, not to record the greatest number of facts, nor to give cut-and-dried criticisms to be learnt by heart; but "to bring him into direct and sympathetic contact with the books he should learn to read and appreciate." In the earlier sections, when he deals with authors not easily accessible, he gives characteristic extracts; and, in dealing with important writers, he suggests books for further study. Portraits and a map of Shakespeare's London are added; full tables and indices complete the work. The spirit of admiration and keen delight is communicated by this book.

JULIUS CÆSAR, in the "Picture Shakespeare" (Blackie, 1s.), is not so well illustrated as As You Like It. The frontispiece is a horror of crude colour; and the cuts are rough and indistinct, not to speak of a Brutus defying tradition with a beard. The notes are simple enough.

THE STORY OF THE ABBOT (6d. n.) is added to Black's Sir Walter Scott Readers for Young People. At the same price and in the same format appears Black's Literature Series. The volumes sent to us are POEMS OF KEATS AND COLERIDGE, POEMS OF LORD BYRON, POEMS OF LORD TENNYSON, and POEMS OF R. AND E. B. BROWNING, all compiled and arranged by Miss C.

Linklater Thomson. They contain no notes except a short glossary at the end of each poem, and one may hope that this omission, which it will, of course, be the business of the teacher to supply, will increase their popularity, and help to cultivate a real taste for literature among the children who use them. The type is good and clear, and the selections are good enough if not the best that could have been made.

MISCELLANEOUS.

We cordially recommend Dent's TEMPLE MOLIERE, of which LES PRÉCIEUSES RIDICULES is edited by Mr. F. Spencer (1s. 6d. n.). Every difficulty is explained in the vocabulary and the brief notes, which also fully illustrate the peculiar affectation which Molière laughs at. We cannot conceive what more is necessary for a school edition or for the book-lover than editing of this sort. We note, however, that Mr. Spencer does not seem to have heard of Theophrastus.

FRENCH LANGUAGE DRILL: a supplement to Dent's First French Book, U. A. Dutoit, Part I., Elementary (Dent, 1s. 6d.), is a series of tables, exercises, and rules, arranged as a help to the revision of grammar. It is all written in French, according to the latest practice, but translations of the rules are given at the end. It is a useful and practical little book.

Mr. C. E. R. Hewitt edits for Arnold's FRENCH READING BOOKS three simple and entertaining little pieces: "Un Anniversaire à Londres," "Les Quatre Cri-Cris de la Boulangère," and "Il faut Penser à Tout" (9d.). The notes are judicious, and there are good remarks on some points of idiom difficult to the beginner.

The latest Pitt Press French Readers are two of the Erekman-Chatrian novels, LE BLOCUS and WATERLOO (3s. each). They are edited by Mr. Arthur R. Ropes—the Dr. Jekyll of whom Adrian Ross, of comic opera fame, is the Mr. Hyde. It is a good choice, for Mr. Ropes is not only a good French scholar but also a good French historian, and has a particular acquaintance with the campaign of 1815. We observe several references in his notes to the recent grammatical edict of M. Leygues. The French of Erekman-Chatrian is fairly easy, and their stories are of the sort that boys like. There are lucid maps to illustrate the military operations. It seems a pity that a note on "Landwehr" should omit to distinguish "Landwehr" from "Landsturm," but on the whole the notes are very good.

The third book of GERMAN WITHOUT TEARS (Arnold, 1s. 3d.), of which we have already reviewed the earlier books, is for students sufficiently advanced to read brief German anecdotes.

GERMAN UNSEENS, for Middle and Upper Forms, selected by W. G. Etheridge, M.A. (Blackie's Modern Language Series, 2s.), is rather difficult, but the selection is well done. The authors are very modern, and the range of subject and vocabulary is wide.

We can recommend Dr. T. C. Fry's edition of the BOOK OF GENESIS (Rivington's Books of the Bible, 1s. 6d.) as neither insincere nor pedantic. Dr. Fry is courageous enough to recognize the facts established by criticism, and analyses the book into its elements. The footnotes to each page explain difficult words or allusions.

JOSHUA, edited by Rev. F. W. Spurling (Rivington's Books of the Bible, 1s. 6d.), is good on the whole, especially in the geographical part when the editor has the advantage of following Professor G. A. Smith. His remarks, however, are sometimes less sensible than pious, as when he discusses whether Rahab had any idea of the "perfect holiness" of Jehovah. He is hardly quite frank on the subject of miracles (App. A.), for he ought to recognize that the ancients spoke of God as causing natural phenomena by direct agency, as when Xenophon said "the god shook the earth."

SOUTH AMERICA (Black, 1s. n.) is added to the series of geographical manuals edited by Mr. Lionel W. Lyde, of which we have on a previous occasion explained the distinguishing characteristics. The same publishers also issue AN ELEMENTARY GEOGRAPHY OF ENGLAND AND WALES (1s. 4d.), by the same author. It is a reader rather than an ordinary lesson-book, and has pictures.

GRÆCIA is now published in "Murray's Handy Classical Maps" (1s. 6d. n., cloth 3s.), ably edited by Mr. G. B. Grundy, and printed in colours with admirable clearness to show the heights above sea-level. The North Greece may have to be revised when a proper survey has been made, but Mr. Grundy has first-hand knowledge of a good deal of it.

Candidates for the higher appointments in the Civil Service will appreciate the usefulness of Mr. A. W. Ready's PRÉCIS AND PRÉCIS WRITING (Bell, 3s. 6d.). The manual is in three parts. Part I. explains the art of Précis writing. Part II. gives eight specimens of Précis set in Public Examinations. Part III. is a key—in which the specimens are worked out. An admirable little handbook for its purpose.

AN EDUCATIONAL REVOLUTIONARY.

According to an anecdote, which is instructive whether it be true or not, Archbishop Temple was once asked to sanction a "quiet day" at a certain village church. He replied that the real necessity of the parish in question was not a "quiet day," but an earthquake. Mr. Harold E. Gorst, in THE CURSE OF EDUCATION (Grant Richards, 2s. 6d.), is evidently of the opinion that what English educationists need is an earthquake. He talks of the absurdities of "the conventional mode of teaching and bringing up children, and of educating youth in this and other civilized countries." He asserts that "the foundations of all existing educational systems are absolutely false in principle, and that teaching itself, as opposed to natural development and self-culture, is the greatest obstacle to human progress that social evolution has ever had to encounter." This reminds one a little of the farmers "who don't 'old with no book larnin' whatever," and it is to be regretted that the whole of Mr. Gorst's book is marred by over-statement. But it calls attention to many defects in the theory and practice of English school-mastership, and may startle a large number of readers into asking themselves for a definition of "education." The essential point of Mr. Gorst's book is the complaint that between "the stupidity of the parent and the inflexibility of the school system children have little chance of developing their natural propensities; . . . all that the school professes to do is to stuff the pupil with a certain quantity of facts according to a fixed curriculum." Is this not more a question of chronology than Mr. Gorst supposes? At all events, the present attitude of men of culture towards the new-born science of teaching can hardly be fairly judged until the young men of to-day furnish the parents and the headmasters of twenty years hence. Mr. Gorst's book is all the more readable in that it provokes criticism. The more discussion, the more illustration, the better. Mr. Gorst says:—

The average schoolboy, who does his work mechanically and without enthusiasm, probably furnishes the greatest number of examples of the misplaced individual. His application to his studies is not natural; it is enforced by what is called school discipline. That is to say, the authorities devise every conceivable form of punishment to make a constant grind at obligatory subjects less disagreeable than the consequences of idleness.

This passage is marred by the inaccuracy of "every conceivable form of punishment," but it contains truth. Mr. Gorst must not suppose, however, that any of the younger Oxford and Cambridge honours-men who are concerned with educational theory do not intend "to change all that" when they get the chance. Of the willingness of the average British father to submit his sons to the process he describes Mr. Gorst has many hard things to say. The typical British parent can often not understand why sons whose "education" has cost thousands are too often unable to preach their own sermons, to act as stewards of their own land, or even to appreciate a novel written by Hardy or by Gissing. As Mr. Gorst says:—

The whole trend of evolution is to differentiate; and if natural laws were not completely disregarded by education systems, the absurdity of filling the world with two or three human species (? types) instead of a hundred thousand would never have been perpetrated. As long as this arbitrary interference with Nature is continued, educated men will not cease to be a drug in the market. Its immediate effect is not to endow the individual with special qualities, but to handicap him heavily for the real business of life.

Certainly the "uneducated" clever man, who has developed along the line of least resistance, can often utilize the "well-educated" nonentity, who, without such a master, is helpless in any environment other than that in which he grew up. Boys' brains, after all, are not grown trees needing to be trimmed and bent into shape, but rather saplings for which space, air, and light are the first and the greatest necessities. The book should be read, if only because it gives utterance (perhaps without Mr. Gorst's knowledge) to much that foreign critics of English education are thinking.

THE CHILD.

Not the least of the many merits of THE CHILD: HIS NATURE AND NURTURE (Temple Primers, Dent, 1s. n.) is its freedom from vague psychological theories, and from over-insistence on hereditary peculiarities. One of Dr. W. B. Drummond's chief objects seems to be to dwell upon

The facts that it is possible for man so to alter the environment of the infant as to favour the preservation of good qualities, and to hinder or prevent the development of evil tendencies, and that the infant has a marvellous capacity for individual adaptation to such changes.

Beginning his book with excellent chapters upon the general subjects of "Nature and Nurture" and "Child Study," the author passes on to write specifically about "The Surroundings of the Child." We disagree with Dr. Drummond's verdict that the nursery should be usually kept at a temperature of 60deg., partly for reasons which he will soon discover by experimenting with the ordinary thermometer of commerce. A temperature of 62deg.-64deg. is much more easily assured, and suits the average type of British child much better. The author admirably discriminates between a supply of fresh air and the curse of winter draughts. He is also right to refer to the fact that a cold night-nursery means heavy bedclothes, often followed by "chills" to the child, who throws off clothing in disturbed sleep. As for the need of cubic space in class rooms, Dr. Drummond emphasizes the fact that

No greater mistake can be made than to suppose that the size of the children as compared with adults can be taken as a guide. Even healthy children, according to Sir John Simon, "in proportion to their respective bodily weights, are about twice as powerful as adults in deteriorating the air in which they breathe."

Dr. Drummond sees clearly that the hope of the future for poor town children lies not so much in improved sanitation and better inspection of the milk and food supply, as in

The establishment of cheap means of locomotion whereby a large proportion of the working classes will be able to move out to new districts, where it will be more easy to avoid the worst of the old evils, and where especially ample open spaces can be preserved for playgrounds, gardens, and parks. Even now it would be possible for far more people to live out of [? outside] the large towns where they work did they realize the advantages that would accrue to the children by their doing so.

The details contained in the chapter on "The Care of the Infant" are practical and well-arranged; indeed, they exceed the limits of their title. Eleven hours' sleep for children between six and ten years old is a point important to insist upon, but we do not notice any reference to the fact that between four and ten years of age occasional afternoon naps are invaluable to excitable children. The use of good sweetmeats as an addition to children's meals is clearly explained, but there should have been a warning against eating sweets at other times, and against all sweets not emanating from a reputable maker. The chapter upon "The Senses" of children makes good reading; it is to be hoped that purchasers of this little book (and their name should be legion) will ponder the importance of Dr. Drummond's remarks upon improving the sight and hand-dexterity of ordinary children, remembering that "a child who may look but who mustn't touch will often look without seeing." As our author says in a later chapter upon "The Muscles," a little child playing is really learning lessons—he might add, out of the oldest and best of primers. In a carefully-arranged chapter upon "The Emotions," one of the best sections deals with the æsthetic emotions, but here Dr. Drummond seems afraid (or unable) to speak positively about the difference between the romantic child of British fiction and the stolid infant of British middle-class fact. On the other hand, he has an excellent passage about the social instinct in children, and how its need for harmony with parents or friends may be controlled to make for righteousness. The chapter upon "Intellect" is clear upon two most important matters, first, the need of phlegmatic children to have their attention constantly called to objects of interest, and their sociability persistently directed towards livelier children, and, secondly, the desirability of preventing excitable, impressionable children from forming a habit of toying with all things by turn, and nothing long, instead of learning to do something consecutively both in play and work. In a chapter upon the will, Dr. Drummond has many true things to say about "temper" and obstinacy, so often the signs of real force of character which may be trained for good. It is not the bold, "rampagious" child who is to be feared, but the incipient liar, time-server, or tell-tale.

There is, perhaps, no child whom education can do more to make or mar than one in whom a generous disposition and a passionate temperament go together. Crush all outbursts of emotion, carrying the day if need be "at the point of the sword," and the flame will smoulder, inwardly nourishing the roots of all forms of selfish anger. Guide them into the service of the will, and they lay the foundation of a hatred of wrong and a generous scorn of evil.

Dr. Drummond's monograph is so complete in itself (save for the lack of an index) that it even ends with a chapter upon "Froebel and the Kindergarten." We advise parsons and schoolmasters to call the attention of parents to a book which it would be a great pity to let any thoughtful mother, lacking larger works upon the subject, pass by unread. It is quite a mistake to think that because a woman is not bookish she cannot be persuaded to read and inwardly digest a sensible volume about children.

OTHER NEW BOOKS.

The War.

Our natural curiosity about the war has now been so thoroughly well satisfied by so many capable writers that we cannot do more than mention the works of the writers who do little more than gossip round the subject. This remark applies to THE STAFF WORK OF THE ANGLO-BOER WAR, by Lady Briggs (Grant Richards, 10s. 6d.), but not to A CIVILIAN WAR HOSPITAL (Murray, 12s. n.). This latter book, to which all the members of the professional staff of the Portland Hospital, Bloemfontein, contribute, is a record of experiences that should be permanently valuable. It deals not only with hospital organization and equipment, but with the problems in medicine and surgery with which the writers were brought in contact. Interesting cases, more particularly interesting bullet-wounds, are photographed; and there is a careful discussion of the enteric epidemic at Bloemfontein. The disease, it is suggested, came to Bloemfontein from Modder River Camp, whence it had floated down stream from Jacobsdal. We are apt to forget that there ever was an epidemic at Modder River, but we read here that, "on 6th February the total had reached 156 and twenty-seven deaths." To the general reader the most interesting cases may be those of neurasthenia and mental derangement. There have been several remarkable instances, from that of the private of the Gordons who, having had his helmet shot off, was so frightened that he had to be invalided home, to those of officers "complaining of a tendency to emotional outbursts which have sometimes taken the form of irresistible fits of weeping on the smallest excitement." The condition, of course, is due to over-strain and, particularly, to want of sleep. "Fed up" is the soldier's slang for it. Sometimes it takes the form of malingering; but the authors tell us that very little of that came under their notice. The book is not easy to quote from owing to its very technical phraseology, but it is one to be warmly recommended to those whom it concerns.

In MR. A. M. S. METHUEN, the author of PEACE OR WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA (Methuen, 1s.), we have an opponent of the war who can write with cultivated restraint and moderation. To call him, in the current phrase, a "pro-Boer," is rather to misrepresent him. He does not idealize the Boers, or appear to be greatly concerned about them. His contention is that, the Boers being what they were, the proper way to bring them to reason was not the way adopted by Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Milner. We recommend the pamphlet to those who want to know what the case against those statesmen, as urged by their opponents, really is. It is well written, and not in the least hysterical. The historical parallel between the situation in Africa in 1899 and the situation in America in 1775 is very carefully drawn.

HINTS FOR A BUSH CAMPAIGN, by Lieutenant-Colonel A. F. Montanaro, R.A. (Sands, 1s.), is a handy little manual written for the edification of officers and non-commissioned officers who go soldiering in West Africa. It puts into shape the lessons learnt from the late Ashanti Expedition.

Artistic Cookery.

Despite the careful and scholarly researches of Mr. Abraham Hayward, few Englishmen or Englishwomen allow to Cookery as high a position among the fine arts as it deserves. Mrs. W. G. Waters, to whom we owe an entertaining and instructive volume called THE COOK'S DECAMERON (Heinemann, 2s. 6d.), gives the art its due. It is true, indeed, that "all cooks who can turn out distinguished work will be found to be endowed with imagination," but the scientific connoisseurs whose acquaintance we make in "The Cook's Decameron" go further and find in the construction of a culinary masterpiece "a breath of the same affatus which gave us the Florentine Campanile, and the Medici Tombs and the Portrait of Monna Lisa." The book, as its title indicates, recalls us to Italy, the home of art; and its object is to prove that France has not exhausted the possibilities of food, that few English people know the virtue and resources of Italian cookery, or have penetrated where it can really be enjoyed. In despair of the shortcomings, both artistic and moral, of their cooks, a little party of persons seriously interested in the subject meet at a country house, there to devote themselves to the study under the personal supervision of the Marchesa di Sant Andrea, whose delightful and recondite recipes (to the number of some two hundred and thirty) are given in full. The history of their visit is recounted with much humour and geniality, each day of the ten affording a new theme for discussion and entertainment, the individuality of the different members of the party adding a pleasing touch of human interest to the Marchesa's practical exposition of her art. That English housewives will, to any great extent, find the recipes, as Mrs. Waters anticipates, simple and inexpensive, we hesitate to affirm. But there are many capital macaroni and vegetable dishes of a kind too often neglected in English households. And wives who have a little more time and money to spare will find in these recipes, which are all excellent, a new field for the ingenuity of their cooks and for the delectation of their husbands. Englishmen have two main characteristics—the spirit of adventure and the love of a good dinner; and both of them will be satisfied to the full by the use of "The Cook's Decameron."

WHERE IS YOUR HUSBAND? by George Frost (Burleigh, 2s. 6d.), is a collection of rather clever essays on some of the trials and troubles of domestic life. A single sentence may suffice to show the tone of the book:—

The perpetual caller is a social plague; no purity of motive atones for her persistent and pestilential presence on the doorstep; yet many otherwise respectable women live to "call," exercising no control whatever over an abnormal appetite for ceremonial visiting.

Comparatively few people nowadays read essays of this sort; but those who do will thank us for calling their attention to this quietly humorous and eminently sensible little book.

CORDINGLEY'S GUIDE TO THE STOCK EXCHANGE (Edinburgh Wilson, 2s. n.), an explanation of the various modes of speculating in stocks and shares, has reached a second edition.

FICTION.

Vanished Hands.

We have always been inclined to the opinion that nothing but good should be said of the dead as well as the living. But to a criticism of a work of art which is absolutely impersonal the rule need hardly apply. And yet to find fault with the work of those who have gone before is unprofitable and unpleasant. Fortunately the two books before us THE SECOND YOUTH OF THEODORA DESANGES (Hutchinson, 6s.), by the late Mrs. Lynn Linton, and THE SEAL OF SILENCE (Smith, Elder, 6s.), by the late Mr. Arthur R. Conder, are admirable examples respectively of the work of a ripe, accustomed hand, and of a beginner, full of promise, in the art of fiction. Mr. George Somes Layard introduces us to "Theodora Desanges," and tells us that Mrs. Linton's last book is presented very nearly in the condition in which it was left. He appears to think that some people will have expected him to make "an exhaustive revision of her manuscript," but he has judged it best to forbear. For our part, we consider Mrs. Linton's work likely to be very little improved by "unauthorized collaboration" of any kind, and congratulate Mr. Layard on his discretion. He also bids us beware of confusing "Theodora Desanges" with Mrs. Lynn Linton as few, we apprehend, are likely to do, and adds that to him "her last message is unutterably sad—that gloomy gospel of humanity—good news, if one will, for the race, but disaster for the individual." To us, on the other hand, "The Second Youth of Theodora Desanges" is a remarkably interesting example of the work of an artist of many years' standing. That Mrs. Linton at the very end of her life could write so powerful and arresting a book is an excellent monument to her mental powers, courage, and insight. The motif of the story is in the fact that somewhere in the sixties of the last century a woman of seventy years who has had her victories and lived "at all four corners of her being," goes through an illness and gradually renews her youth. The process is mainly physical at first; bright, brown curls are found pushing up through the long grey hair; new teeth take the place of the hitherto useful artificial set; a reflux of vitality takes place, and a new and more beautiful Theodora appears before her doubting friends. Having convincingly explained this change in her heroine Mrs. Linton proceeds to develop the idea with her well-known ingenuity. Perhaps, as her editor says, the message is one of hopelessness, but before one hears the full meaning of it an extremely interesting and often entertaining novel has been read.

As we have said, Mr. Conder's book belongs to life's beginning. He, too, is edited or rather prefaced. "A. F.," who knew and admired the author of "The Seal of Silence," helped him to find a publisher for this first book. From the short memoir here given it is evident that the character of Arthur Conder was both generous and fine. He was cut off after a few University victories and after writing one extremely promising book. "The Seal of Silence" contains enough of plot to supply a dozen novels, and reminds one of James Payn's saying that the young writer squanders in this way what the old hand would give a great deal to possess. Indeed, "The Seal of Silence" reminds us in its vivid style, buoyancy of manner, and general elasticity of spirit of Mr. James Payn's early work, those stories which made his fortune being little if any better than this one by Mr. Conder. The plot is so complicated and involved that, although we have followed it with scarcely unabated interest from start to finish, it is impossible to describe it within the limits of a review. As "A. F." says, the book displays powers of observation and description, a great sense of character, and delicate unforced humour. It is a book to enjoy; youth and hope and love and above all, humour, are there, and where these things are is contentment for the "general reader."

In the West of England.

Village sketches by Mrs. Francis Blundell (M. E. Francis) are always sympathetic, humorous, and delightful. PASTORALS

OF DORSET (Longmans, 6s.) includes a few stories a little below their author's usual standard, but most of them are charming. "Up at the 'Lotments'" is one of the best. Joseph Frisby, an old rascal of a villager who has lived riotously while he still had a penny to enable him to do so, finds himself in his old age without even a few potatoes to plant. His neighbours are planting all round him, and he makes a pathetic appeal to them. But all are piteously poor and know him all too well, and he meets with refusal. That night he goes secretly to the allotments and removes set after set of the newly-planted potatoes, smoothing down the earth as he goes. "It chanced that Jim Cross, waking with the dawn, fancied he heard the sound of a spade in the next garden. On his way to work, a little later on, he observed that a goodly portion of Joseph's patch of ground was, indeed, freshly dug up. . . . 'I've put my trust in Providence,' said Joseph, peering at him cautiously out of the corner of his eye, 'and to show as I've a put my trust in Providence, I'm a gettin' ready my bit o' ground. When the Lard sends me them taters, neighbour, He'll find I ready.'" Jim was "much impressed" and no wonder! The result was that the whole body of villagers rewarded the old ruffian's supposed faith by presenting him with some more of their scanty "taters," little dreaming how many they had involuntarily contributed. "There were many gaps among the ranks at the allotments, and it was noticeable that Jan Domeny in particular (an enemy of Joe's) had suffered severely. No one was more loud in commiserating this misfortune than Joseph Frisby. 'The ways of Providence be wonderful, as the Scriptures say, Jan Domeny,' he remarked one day, 'Aye, 'tis what I often d'say to myself; a man may plant and a man may water, but 'tis the Lard as gives the increase.' 'Weel,' returned Jan, a little grudgingly 'I d'l'ow that He've a-gi'ed it to you, Mr. Frisby.' 'He have Jan; He have!' agreed Joseph heartily." There are many other entertaining things in the book, which certainly ought to be read.

In Mr. Eden Phillpotts one has long since recognised a literary workman who needs not to be ashamed. He has set up for himself a very high standard, having never bowed down to false gods the worship of which might have brought him a wider popularity. His truthful and discriminating studies of character in the West of England deserve the highest praise that can be accorded to conscientious work undertaken in the right artistic spirit. While other authors slay their ten thousands Mr. Phillpotts is content with his thousands. Yet he must enjoy his great reward in the quietude of his artistic conscience. It matters little in what genre so painstaking a craftsman works. In THE GOOD RED EARTH (Arrowsmith, 3s. 6s.), as in some other stories by him, the scene happens to be laid in the "west cuntry." Here, as anywhere else in a novelist's wide world, love and hate, humour, hypocrisy, pride, drunkenness, the whole repertory of the primal sins and virtues find their home, so that the seeing writer finds and presents a microcosm of the great world. "The Good Red Earth," with its Devonshire background, contains several characters which cannot fail to stamp themselves upon the memory. Foremost amongst them is Alpheus Newte, the pedlar-preacher, whose combination of humour and oleaginous piety, poured forth in much the same way as the unco' guid were used to "discuss the doctrine of election through their noses," is presented in the most convincing manner. Sibella, too, and dame Hatherley, with her hidden hoard, are excellent examples of the commonplace revealed and redeemed. We would not willingly have missed Sir Archer Baskerville, either, with his wounded patrician pride. Over all is spread the garment of an intense love of nature and her moods. Mr. Phillpotts possesses a literary vehicle that enables him adequately to express this love. As a rule the dialect is correct, but here and there occur unaccountable lapses into literary English that are inappropriate enough in the mouths from which they proceed. A Devonshire maid would never (we would stake a full bowl of cream upon it) say, "I've got an appointment," as Sibella does on p. 66, any more than her grandmother would protest "That's not to the point," as she does on p. 25. Girls are not "gals" in the West, either, they are "maids" or "maidens." But it would be ungrateful to magnify a small fault in a book possessing virtues so many and so great.

Miss Wilkins' "Understudies."

In these captious days the owner of rich literary argosies who sets sail for the ports of the critics with a lighter freight than usual is likely to be called to account over the quantity and quality of his merchandise. It may even be hinted that his stock-in-trade must be failing him. Let us hope that Miss Mary E. Wilkins will escape many such strictures when, with her recent collection of short tales suggested by animals and by flowers, she is found to be riding under easy sail, as it were, with an unusually slight consignment. We are content, ourselves, to berth UNDERSTUDIES (Harper 6s.) alongside of "A New England Nun," "Jerome," "Silence," and the rest, without too regretful a reminiscence of past treasures or any anxiety as to our enjoyment when future cargoes are unloaded. To drop the metaphor, it is unreasonable to expect a writer to be for ever at the stretch, and if Miss Wilkins chooses to write a series of tales about animals or to draw a few dainty and fanciful analogies between flowers and people it seems a little impertinent to grumble. If the book represents less strenuous effort there is no need for disappointment. In the animal stories one scarcely expects to find quite the same sympathy and insight, quite the same exquisitely natural touch, that appeals so directly to readers of the tales of men and women. Miss Wilkins is the most human of writers, and when she writes of her kind the fountains of her knowledge and kindness are deep and ever fresh. How often at the close of one of her tales, when we think that all has been said that can be said, does she overflow with some delightful sentence or reflection washing the whole thing bright and clear, as it were, with the dew of its wise and tender thought. But here we are concerned with animals and the human interest is, very properly, not allowed to predominate. In the one case to the contrary, indeed, the story of the parrot, the effect is comparatively unsatisfactory. Some account of the deceiving of the parrot's mistress by the minister was of course necessary, for the final episode hinges upon that rampagious bird's uncanny acquaintance with what was going on, but Miss Wilkins should have said either much less or much more about the philandering parson, who as he stands disappoints us in one way nearly as badly as he disappointed poor Martha in another. But the parrot himself is a gorgeous and consoling character, and the other animals are all excellent in their various ways. The study of the cat who, left in a mountain-hut during a bitter winter, entertains and keeps alive a starving tramp till the spring comes round is perhaps the best thing in this section of the book. The description of the cat out rabbit-stalking in a snowstorm at night is a veritable primitive epic in little.

In the last half of the book we return to human types set variously against backgrounds of flowers which they seem to resemble. Of these "Arethusa" is delicate and poetic, "Mountain-Laurel" is pathetic, and there is a quaint humour about the first downfall of the youth whose early promise was as brilliant as that of the "Morning Glory"—a flower which closes its petals in the afternoon. The youth, too, went to sleep, and his fiancée suddenly decided that it was necessary to jilt him. She was a daughter of the people:—

"Now you look at here, Alexander Bemis," said she. "I've promised to marry you and I'm most ready, clothes all bought an' everything. I don't know what you will say, an' I don't know what folks will say, an' I can't help it, and I don't care. I'm goin' to back out. I've got to look out for myself, and my father's money, that he's worked so hard to get, without a dollar to start with. I'm goin' to back out. I've liked you an' I like you now, an' it ain't none too easy for me, an' I've laid awake some nights thinkin' of it, but it's better for both of us. I ain't goin' to marry you. You're good and steady and handsome, and you're awful smart, but you ain't done anything but talk smart and look smart, an' be smart; you ain't ever acted smart, an' I don't believe you ever will. You haven't done anythin'. You've just laid right back on your reputation, an' that's what you're goin' to do right along. I'd rather have a man with less smartness than you that can use what little he's got. There's no use. I'm goin' to back out."

Isn't that delightful?—for every one except Alexander. We do not think there is much fear of Miss Wilkins' "laying right back on her reputation."

Diplomacy and Marriage.

In THE ADVENTURE OF PRINCESS SYLVIA (Methuen, 3s. 6d.), Mrs. C. N. Williamson breaks new ground and introduces us to some very exalted personages. The Princess, daughter of a Grand Duchess and kinswoman of our own Royal house, finds herself chosen for political reasons as the future bride of the Emperor of Rhaetia. But she would rather be wooed and won on her merits, and so she makes a strictly incognito incursion into the Emperor's domains, which gives us a series of amusing episodes ending very properly in the triumph of love over the exigencies of la haute politique. It is all highly improbable, but it is fresh and vivacious. Nevertheless, we prefer the simpler manner and matter of Mrs. Williamson's earlier work.

We are introduced to very high circles indeed in QUEEN'S MATE, by Morice Gerard (Hodder, 6s.). The Duke of Longlands and the British Ambassador at Dursdorf would pass for central figures with most novelists; here they are but pawns in the game. The Queen of Amphalia is of marriageable age, and Ferdinand II., Emperor of Gramand, has a suitor ready for her hand—a suitor of noble blood and handsome appearance who has sown a plentiful crop of wild oats. The great personages are but thinly disguised—the masterful and omniscient ruler of Gramand, a congeries of petty states, and the fair young Queen of Amphalia—and, perhaps, this rather obvious method of producing a realistic effect may reap its reward. In itself the story is not particularly interesting. It is ingenious, but thin, and the characters do not live. This is commonly the penalty of dealing with such illustrious people as ambassadors, queens, and emperors. Judith Lowenfels, the daughter of the Jewish financier, is better than the others, but even she is unnatural. It may be worth while adding that a modern Mauser pistol is not "kept fully primed." Priming was an operation that went out of fashion with the introduction of breech-loaders.

The North-West Frontier.

Miss Mabel North was a young lady with "a celebrated smile." It was commonly understood, writes the author of this book, that her guardian, General North, had found his life a burden to him owing to the multitude of her suitors; and strangers (of the male sex), thanked with a smile for some slight service, were impelled not infrequently to propose to her on the spot. It can easily be imagined that so charming a girl—of whom other women were never tired of saying that she had no claim to real beauty—should enjoy a lively time of it in a garrison town of an Indian frontier province. And the incidents in Sydney Grier's last novel, THE WARDEN OF THE MARCHES (Blackwood, 6s.), are very lively indeed. It is a good book—well done in every way, and the ladies especially are drawn with a number of those delicate and feminine touches that are seldom absent from this writer's work. Nor can the men be accused of any lack of life. They are not the usual soldiers that so many lady writers are apt to give us—the wooden automata to whom we have been accustomed. They have character, and they are differentiated. Major North, the great man Burgrave, who reminds us of one of Mr. Kipling's figures, and the group of young officers and civilians who are concerned in the ruling of Khernistan, are all adequately drawn. The story deals with one of those little frontier wars which to people at home are merely a name and a paragraph in the papers, but which are none the less serious to people on the spot. The behaviour of the different men and women in time of stress when besieged in their crazy fort and waiting for relief is brought out with power. The motive is reminiscent of many Indian stories, and no doubt the author has borrowed a hint or two from predecessors in a fruitful field. But the handling is her own, and it could not well be better. "The Warden of the Marches" has nearly every mark of a good novel—character, incident, a touch of pathos here and there, and a pleasing style.

Mr. Frank Stockton.

Mr. Frank Stockton's A BICYCLE OF CATHAY (Harpers, 6s.), like everything else by its author, is full of humour and flows pleasantly along. Cathay is a holiday land into which Mr. Stockton's very attractive young schoolmaster rides, more or less heart-whole, and out of which he comes with the impression that, however delectable a country it may be, it has too many young women in it. From the first day to the last, chance throws him with maidens in distress or maidens who are anxious to help him in his hours of need. He is impressionable to a degree; and must have felt relieved when he finally found himself engaged to the doctor's daughter who started him on his travels with the thoughtful present of a box of quinine lozenges. It is all very amusing in a quiet way—not so irresistibly funny as some of Mr. Stockton's books, but as full of human interest as the best of them.

Mr. Stockton is, however, perhaps better at short stories than at long. For his long stories now are too frequently merely short ones unduly expanded. Few men have the art of saying so little in so many words, and of leaving the reader not unmused at the end. He has the leisurely air; he expounds his whimsical fancies at their fullest length, and reports the conversations of his extraordinary characters—and most of them are singular enough—in extenso, but he is seldom really dull. Sometimes, it is true, he seems to be making strenuous efforts in that direction, and in AFIELD AND AFLOAT (Cassell, 6s.) he arrives more nearly at the goal perhaps than usual. The collection of stories to which he has given this name is some way beneath Mr. Stockton's average. One or two are ingenious examples of a fanciful invention; two (not the worst of the collection) are inspired by the late Spanish-American war; several are specimens of that blend of the ghost-and-love-story which used to be practised long ago. But there is not one of outstanding merit—not one that recalls "The Lady or the Tiger" or "The Wreck of the John T. Hyke," although the last tale in this volume is conceived somewhat on the model of that excellent piece of foolery. It is rather a disappointing book.

The Oxford Undergraduate.

Mr. Inglis Allen's book has an engaging cover, and deals with the adventures of an engaging young man. Some of these adventures we have seen before, when they appeared in the pages of some magazine, and they impressed us agreeably with their deftness and lightness of touch. A VARSITY MAN (Pearson, 6s.) is a true and intimate picture of a certain class of Oxford undergraduate—the class that used some few years back to be known as the "blood," and is probably now adorned with some equally expressive cognomen. There is no harm in him, but he is solicitous of his dress, and apt to fancy himself in love, and has an exaggerated contempt for the "townee" and all his works, and is altogether very young. But Mr. Allen's youth (we rather wish he would not always refer to him as "The Youth" and to his friend as "The Cynic") has a saving taste for athletics, and will probably develop into a decent fellow in time. He is very naturally drawn—perhaps the most natural undergraduate we have seen of late years—and, despite rather an overdose of slang, Mr. Inglis Allen may be congratulated on his little book. We like it better than Mr. Benson's effort at presenting his Cambridge "Babe B.A." And some of the other characters—the ladies of the piece, and the egregious family of the Twists, and Bromley, the shy giant of St. Luke's—are people whose acquaintance we are glad to make, for a spare hour or two.

A Fair Burglar.

Mr. Hume Nisbet's CHILDREN OF HERMES (Hurst and Blackett, 3s. 6d.) fairly holds the record for strange happenings and remarkable adventures. First we have the escape of M. Emile Larron, the most expert of Parisian pickpockets, from Noumea to the Australian coast, where he plays the part of another M. de Rougemont among the natives. Then his voyage to England on a passenger ship, passing as the Marquis de Montresen, and his acquaintance with a band of pretty young ladies who turn out to be artists in crime. We have omitted to mention the murder of Harvey, captain of the Norse King, a picture of which adorns the cover; but incident follows incident so quickly in this book that it had escaped us for the moment. When all the characters arrive in England, the Chinaman Wung Ti among them, the fair Althea Lennox commits the cardinal error of falling in love with a manly young doctor. This is a mistake, as she has several important burglaries in hand that must be attended to at once, to say nothing of an old mother and invalid father in very straitened circumstances, who believe her to be the widow of a wealthy colonial. She doubles the part of criminal and guardian angel for some time with effect, and so softens Mr. Hume Nisbet's heart in the end that he lets her off something too easily for the stern moralist. The book is a curious medley, original enough, and it has the merit of containing plenty of excitement. The Clapham establishment, run by Mr. and Mrs. Tony Bagster, is not a bad idea. Mr. Nisbet has a fertile invention, but his book does not make for respectability.

"The Eternal Choice."

The question whether an author should study to please his readers or himself is suggested by Mr. E. H. Cooper's THE ETERNAL CHOICE (Pearson, 6s.). It is mainly about Beatrice, the plain, seventeen-year-old daughter of an atheistical Professor of Chemistry, and Reginald Fanshawe, the heir and nephew of Philip Vernon, an orthodox and religious man of wealth. Here is the "eternal choice." Beatrice follows her father; Reginald, at some distance, his pious uncle; yet he exchanges his interest in £90,000 for the Professor's daughter, thinking that he will make her a Christian. Ah, the vanity of lovers! But he is mistaken. Beatrice holds to the belief in which she has been reared; there is no conflict, and one asks: Has an author the right to create so poignant a situation, and then fritter it away? However, the mind of Beatrice—"half baby's and half philosopher's," an interesting description truly—is changed by simpler and more natural means than her husband's reasoning. Mr. Cooper does not seem to us to make good use of his opportunities; he puts into a country house, with a host who has nightly prayers in his private chapel, a German Assyriologist, an English atheistical professor and his daughter, two women of the world, an archaeological baronet, a serious youth—Reginald—and an empty-headed one who has a village liaison. What humour and interest could have been drawn from this company! Yet the humour is thin and the interest far from engrossing, excepting where the latter concerns Reginald and Beatrice. The characters taken singly are often well drawn, and are worth the drawing.

Forty years of literary work has sharpened rather than dulled the point of Miss Sarah Tytler's pen. Her RIVAL CLAIMANTS (Digby, Long, and Co., 6s.) would attract more than ordinary attention by its quality were it her first work instead of her fiftieth or thereabouts. One of the chief of Miss Tytler's charms is her style. Every line reveals a strong individuality, and conveys an impression of clearness and vivacity. In this case a charming style is the vehicle for conveying an ingenious and interesting story of rival lovers and a disputed inheritance which ends in happiness and reconciliation. A delightful tale—not least in its pictures of early days in North Carolina.

There are several points of novelty about the detective story which its author has named THE BLACK TORTOISE (Heinemann, 3s. 6d.). The scene of it is laid in Norway—its author (who gives Frederick Viller as his pen name) being a Norwegian—and the local colour is sufficient without being oppressive. But not content with one theft and recovery of a missing diamond (for that is what the black tortoise is), Mr. Viller lets it vanish in the same way a second time. The mystery is well kept up until close to the end. If, as we suspect, the work is translated Mr. Viller may congratulate himself on his translator.

ART EXHIBITIONS.

"Gardens at Home and Abroad" is the title of an interesting little collection of water-colour drawings which Mr. and Mrs. Albert Stevens are now showing at the Modern Gallery. Colour problems have attracted the painters to much purpose, and even if these are offered more often than they are solved the effort is seldom without considerable interest. The medium is handled with more freedom by Mrs. Stevens than by her husband, and generally speaking the palm remains with her. There is a notable drawing entitled "Holland House," which shows the painter in her most ambitious mood and is not without a certain dexterity. Viewed as a whole, however, the collection contains many contradictions and leaves with us the impression that it is by no means confined to recent work, since some of the drawings are very antiquated in their method and occasionally fall to a low level of execution. It seems to suggest that the long-forgotten resources of a large studio had been freely drawn upon. The best of the pictures, however, are very good.

In another of the rooms in the Modern Gallery is a small collection of cabinet oil paintings of "Picturesque Ireland," by Alexander Williams, R.H.A. Luscious colour of land and sea crowds from his brush with almost overpowering opulence. It is the colour of Ireland in her richest, and occasionally her rankest, seasons, and is a very faithful representation of her short and glorious summer. The collection comes as a seasonable antidote to the grey landscapes too often affected; but there is no reticence, no subtlety, and too little atmosphere. Given some insight into the hidden mysteries of nature Mr. Williams would be a more acceptable exponent of nature than he is, but taking him from his own standpoint his work does very well indeed. It is not given to every one to see nature with the romantic eyes of a Rousseau.

The eighty or so drawings of birds and animals in motion which Mr. John Guille Millais has sent to the Fine Art Society will delight the sportsman and the ornithologist. The mere artist will be troubled by a certain monotony of colour and a stereotyped method of composition which detracts from the æsthetic value of the work. It has every appearance of being extremely accurate, but is seldom true to nature in the best sense. The very accuracy of detail and close attention to "points," without which the naturalist is never content, destroys the pictorial qualities of the work and renders much of it of only the remotest interest for the artist. The close attention to detail mars the chance of a satisfactory picture, for the student of birds and animals is not content that the painter shall record what the eye sees, but demands that he shall present what the brain knows to be there. It thus happens that only upon the rarest occasions, upon the appearance of a genius, the two requirements can be fulfilled in one and the same painter. Mr. Swan is always happiest, artistically speaking, in his rapid sketches, for in these the artist rises superior to the scientist. Mr. Millais is not as yet sufficiently free with his art to be able to suggest complete accuracy of form without somewhat laboriously presenting it.

The Fine Art Society are also showing some water-colours by Mr. Arthur Severn, which are composed and painted much in his usual skilful and dexterous manner. Very few of the drawings fall below a very respectable standard of achievement, and fewer still succeed in arousing any great artistic enthusiasm. The subjects are well chosen and suitably painted.

No student of art should fail to see the collection of drawings by the old masters now being shown at the British Museum. A contemporary is much concerned to find that the editors of London papers permit many columns to be occupied with notices of the Royal Academy Exhibition and that but little space is given to accounts—for criticism is hardly called for—of the British Museum show. It is a pretty question and involves the consideration of the moral obligation of editors towards their public. As a matter of journalism the editors are right and the critic wrong. All the world goes to Burlington House and very few people, more is the pity, find their way to Bloomsbury. The successful editor gives his readers what they want before he stops to consider what they ought to have. Teaching is a poorly paid profession, and not at all popular—with the taught. Besides it is a sound editorial maxim that a live ass is better than a dead lion. Thus it happens that the public is told much about the pictures at the Royal Academy and very little about the old masters at the British Museum.

More profit and advantage may be obtained by a visit to the Museum, however, than by dallying with such a collection as now occupies the Egyptian Hall. The days of the Dudley are past, for the amateur is now either a successful exhibitor elsewhere or deserves to remain more or less unrecognized. It is by no means a bad exhibition, but the work is neither sufficiently bad to provoke hostile criticism nor sufficiently good to demand serious attention. The work exhibited reaches an amiable plane of moderate ability and will probably please the friends of the exhibitors. And this, we imagine, is what it is intended to do.

An extremely interesting collection of drawings by American caricaturists has been hung in a part of the Doré Gallery, which has of late taken a new lease of artistic life. The best of the caricatures are by Mr. Chrichton and Mr. Davenport, and appear to have been drawn to illustrate Great Britain day by day, generally in the most friendly spirit of bantering criticism which often contains more than a spice of good common sense. If one does not mind one's own follies being laughed at, the collection will be found to be most interesting and certainly instructive. In an annexe of the Doré Gallery Mrs. Bacon is showing a wonderful piece of stone, about the size of a hazelnut, found by her in the neighbourhood of Oberammergau. Viewed in a certain light the similarity to the traditional likeness of the Saviour is almost startling. A remarkable array of experts has been secured to testify to the fact that the small piece of stone is absolutely untouched by tool or gravure, and the phenomenon is very remarkable.

We have received from Messrs. Cassell their annual volume of "Royal Academy Pictures," with its large, excellently-reproduced photographs of nearly three hundred of the best pictures, a preface by Mr. M. H. Spielmann, and some notes; and from Messrs. Chatto and Windus the smaller, well-known "Academy Notes," originated by the late Mr. Henry Blackburn, as well as their very interesting "Illustrated Catalogue of the Paris Salon," a publication now in its twenty-third year.

LIBRARY NOTES.

The new Radcliffe Library, in the grounds of the University Museum at Oxford, was opened on Tuesday. The building, which is the gift of the Drapers' Company, has cost over £21,000. The Vice-Chancellor remarked that it was the first contribution of the kind that had been made by a City Company to the educational resources of the older Universities. The modern benefactor—unlike the Drapers' Company—usually bestowed his gifts on new institutions. On the same day the degree of D.C.L. honoris causa was conferred on Mr. Cornelius N. Dalton, C.B., Master of the Drapers' Company.

Battersea is essentially a progressive borough. Its libraries march not only with the times, but occasionally even a little ahead. The library committee recently proposed to other London authorities a general amalgamation whereby tickets would be interchangeable and borrowers free to rove as they chose. The prospect of chaos in a dozen different systems appears to be fatal to the realization of such a scheme. Within its own borders, however, the committee is supreme. It has just decided to provide in the libraries free notepaper and envelopes to all applicants with the object—laudable in itself—of giving facilities for answering advertisements. But that pest of public institutions, the begging letter writer, is probably making large use of the privilege, while the ratepayers may be wondering whether the stamps are also to come out of their pockets.

The Lambeth Borough Council has been obliged to set aside over £1,000 for the repair of one of its libraries, the foundations of which have become insecure. A week or two ago we referred to a similar difficulty at Northwich of meeting expenses caused by subsidences. A clause touching this point has been inserted in the Public Libraries Bill now before Parliament. It provides that the cost of any repairs to a public library, necessary through the subsidence of ground, shall be payable, not out of the limited library rate, but out of the general funds of a borough or urban district council.

Reading tables in the parks are desired at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. We have previously referred to the carrying out of this idea in America. To be effective books and papers must be supplied for out-door reading, and here comes the difficulty. Readers are not usually over careful, even in their own homes, of the books they borrow. We hardly like to think of the disasters attendant upon a few sharp showers or a summer's gale. In this climate kiosks would be needed, and the expense negatives the general adoption of a scheme which (on paper) appears delightful.

The Selkirk Subscription Library is no more, and another link with the past thus disappears. It was founded in 1772, with the grandfather of Mr. Andrew Lang among the originators. Sir Walter Scott himself presented many of his works, but these, though first editions, were too well read to command any price in the recent sale, or even apparently to bear too much handling. First editions of Byron and Thackeray were in an equal state. The best comment is supplied by the price paid for a library which originally cost nearly £3,000. Now the whole stock goes for £60; 126 bound volumes of the Edinburgh Review selling for 3s. 6d., with unbound copies thrown in.

A correspondent has drawn attention in the Daily Telegraph to several ludicrous blunders in a library catalogue issued from East Ham. It is now pointed out by Mr. Bridle, librarian of the East Ham Public Library, that he is not responsible for the catalogue, which is that of a small lending library in the neighbourhood. Neither the misdemeanour of "Paul Clipper," nor the perverted genius visible in "Poetical Works of John Burns," should, therefore, be attributed to him.

THE BARROIS-ASHBURNHAM MSS.

On Friday of last week Messrs. Sotheby concluded the dispersal of the Barrois-Ashburnham MSS., the final section destined to come under the hammer of the historic library brought together by Bertram, fourth Earl of Ashburnham. Save for a small 4to. volume of 39 ll., containing memoranda, anecdotes, &c., written by Voltaire while he was in England about the year 1727, which was bought by Mr. Quaritch for £61, works whose interest was primarily of a literary kind sold for relatively small sums. Competition was keenest for volumes painted and illuminated by old-time artists, whose very names are unknown. We give, in money-value order, details of the thirteen outstanding lots sold on Thursday and Friday. Nos. 1 and 2 on this list were bought for a private collector—or collectors—whose name did not transpire. The American agent, Mr. B. F. Stevens, the under-bidder for the Giottesque Latin Psalter, procured one only of the high-priced lots, No. 6 on the table; and other prominent buyers included Belin of Paris, Baer and Co. of Frankfurt, and J. Rosenthal of Munich.

Chief prices of last two days:—

1. "Le Roman de Lancelot du Lac," by Gautier Map. 3 folio vols. Sæc. XIV., MS. on vellum, 383ff., Gothic letters and *lettres bâtarde*s. 39 painted and richly illuminated miniatures of fresco shape, 8½in. by 3in., 129 large painted and illuminated historiated initials, about 2in. square. Formerly belonged to the Maréchal de Boussac, who defended Orleans against English, 1428-29, afterwards escorted Joan of Arc from Blois to Orleans, and there assisted in onslaught against besiegers. (537) ... 1,800
2. Latin Psalter. Small 4to. Sæc. XIV., MS. on vellum, 106ff., semi-Roman letters by an Italian scribe. Every page ornamented with rich Italian border, initials finely illuminated. 180 historiated initials, 1½in. by 1½in., and six larger miniatures divided into small compartments. Paintings in style of Giotto, possibly executed by him at Avignon while there with Pope Clement V. Great amount of burnished gold. Old French calf gilt. (495) ... 1,530
3. "La Légende Dorée." Two large folio vols. Sæc. XV., MS. on vellum, 564ff., bold *lettres bâtarde*s. 143 illuminated miniatures, mostly 5in. by 6in., many in camaieu gris heightened with gold, and 148 large ornamental initials, innumerable smaller ones. (616) 1,500
4. "Passion de N. S. Jésus-Christ," in verse, by Jacques le Lièvre. Folio. Sæc. XVI., MS. on vellum, 25ff., *lettres bâtarde*s. 43 illuminated miniatures, mostly 13in. by 9in., almost every leaf richly painted on both - sides. Probably unique and executed for Francis I., whose arms are on the first page. Old French red morocco, ascribed to Le Gascon. (458) ... £ 770

 5. "Le Roman du Saint Graal et de Merlin," by Robert de Borron. Two large folio vols. Sæc. XV., MS. on vellum, 359ff., bold *lettres bâtarde*s. 32 finely painted and partly illuminated miniatures, 172 illuminated ornamental initials, 1½in. by 1½in., with marginal decorations of scroll flower work. From the La Vallière, Roxburghe, and Heber collections, in latter of which it made £126. (536) ... 560
 6. "L'Étiquette des Temps," by Alexandre Sauvage. Folio Sæc. XV., MS. on vellum, 121ff., neat *lettres bâtarde*s by an Italian scribe. 127 large initials, with historiated miniatures in pen and ink, seven circular drawings of Old Testament subjects, one with emblazoned arms of Rochechouart. (540) ... 500
 7. "Merveilles du Monde." Small folio. Sæc. XV., MS. on vellum, 179ff., cursivo *lettres bâtarde*s, rubricated in blue and red. 57 large miniatures in gouache, many illuminated ornamental initials. Old French red morocco. (397) ... 415
 8. "Le Miroir Historial de France." Small folio. Sæc. XV., MS. on vellum, 134ff., semi-Roman letters, rubricated. Five miniatures, 5½in. by 5in., one representing a King of France anointed by a prelate. 36 historiated miniature initials, 2½in. square. Arms of House of Burgundy. (405) ... 410
 9. "Speculum Humanæ Salvationis." Small folio. Sæc. XIV., MS. on vellum, 71ff., small *lettres bâtarde*s. 191 outline drawings in pen and ink, in manner of early Block Books of Low Countries. (552) ... 395
 10. Six illuminations, in colours on gold ground, from a MS. of the Thirteenth Century. 6½in. diam. (404) ... 390
 11. "Les Ordonnances de Charles le Hardi." Small folio. Sæc. XV., MS. on vellum, 41ff., notarial copy duly attested, *lettres bâtarde*s. 60 illuminated ornamental initials, first leaf richly decorated, showing Charles amid an assembly of his nobles. (434) ... 355
 12. "Le Roman de la Rose," &c. Quarto. Sæc. XIV., MS. on vellum, 170ff., *lettres bâtarde*s. 76 painted and illuminated historiated miniatures, mostly 1½in. by 2½in., many hundred ornamental initials. (518) ... 345
 13. "Le Roman de Perceval le Galois" (incomplete) and "La Vie de Sainte Marie Egyptienne." Folio. Sæc. XIII., MS. on vellum, 279ff., Gothic letters, capitals in blue and red. Very ancient carving in ivory, 7½in. by 3½in., representing death of Emperor Septimius Severus, inserted in cover. (463) ... 340
- £9,310

If this total be added to that of £13,185, paid for the twenty-one principal works sold during the first three days, as detailed in last week's Literature, we get an aggregate of £22,495 for thirty-four lots. The entire Barrois assemblage of 628 lots realized £33,217 6s. 6d.

It is impossible to estimate exactly the gross amount realized by private treaty and at auction for the various sections of the Ashburnham Library. The following table, incomplete as it is, covers the principal sections. Were realizations from every source to be included, probably the total would be more than £220,000. As to the last item definite particulars are not forthcoming—the 1,923 lots of the Libri MSS. cost the late Earl £8,000 in 1847:—

Printed Books (at auction) ...	£62,712
MSS. known as "Appendix" (at auction) ...	8,495
Barrois MSS. (at auction) ...	33,217
Stowe MSS., acquired by British Museum, 1882 ...	45,000
"Evangelia Quatuor," precious stones in binding, sold privately by Messrs. Sotheby and Co., 1901 ...	10,000
166 Libri and Barrois MSS. bought by Mr. Trübner, all save the Manesse Liederbuch resold to France	24,000
Remaining Libri MSS., say ...	30,000
	£213,424

A library of similar worth is not likely to come into the market for many years.

Correspondence.

SQUEERS AND DOTHEBOYS HALL.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The reprint in The Times of a Yorkshire schoolmaster's advertisement, which appeared in that journal a hundred years ago, revives the evergreen question, "Who was the prototype of Squeers?" Quite a mass of literature has grown around this subject, apparently without producing satisfactory evidence as to the identity of the Yorkshire pedagogue whom it is conjectured Dickens had in his mind when portraying the horrors of Dotheboys Hall. Of course, every one knows that in his Preface to "Nicholas Nickleby" the Novelist is careful to point out that "Mr. Squeers is the representative of a class, and not of an individual," and every one believes that it was his firm intention so to generalize. Such evidence, however, as is available to us certainly indicates that Dickens principally had his eye upon a particular schoolmaster, and that this man was by no means the worst of his tribe.

Dickens's description of Squeers (in the fourth chapter), emphasized by "Phiz's" portrait of him in the illustration accompanying it—"Phiz" (H. K. Browne) accompanied Dickens to Yorkshire when investigating the subject of Yorkshire schools in 1838—and the address of Dotheboys Hall, enabled those who knew the locality of Greta Bridge to point out the person to whom the description especially applied. So general was this recognition that the school over which that individual presided was the first to suffer. Who, then, was that individual? Many Yorkshire schoolmasters have been suggested as the probable prototype of Squeers. That their name was legion is amply proved by reference to the advertisement columns in contemporary newspapers of the earlier part of last century. In turning to The Times and the identical journals mentioned by Squeers himself—"Morning Post," [Morning] Chronicle, [Morning] Herald, [Morning] Advertiser—all of which flourished when "Nickleby" was written—we find scores of advertisements similar to that of Squeers. For example, in the issue of The Times of January 2, 1838, there are no less than seventeen (a few of which, however, relate to seminaries "for young ladies"), including that of Mr. Ralph Simpson's "Academy" (reprinted by The Times of January 1, 1901), whose London headquarters was (like Squeers's) at the Saracen's Head, Snow Hill, and whose annual fee for each boarder (again like Squeers's) was twenty guineas. But The Times of January 2, 1838 (et seq.), also contains the advertisement of one Shaw, which is much more pertinent:—

EDUCATION.—By MR. SHAW, at Bowes Academy, Greta Bridge, Yorkshire, YOUTH are carefully INSTRUCTED in the English, Latin, and Greek languages, writing, common and decimal arithmetic, book-keeping, mensuration, surveying, geometry, geography, and navigation, with the most useful branches of the mathematics, and provided with board, clothes, and every necessary, at 20 guineas per annum each. No extra charges. No vacations. Further particulars may be known on application to Mr. J. Metcalfe, agent, 38, Great Marylebone-street. Mr. Shaw attends at the George and Blue Boar, Holborn, from 12 to 2 daily.

Observe "no extra charges—no vacations" (absent in Simpson's advertisement), and note that in the curriculum Squeers substituted "fortification" for "navigation." Curiously enough, one of Shaw's "business" cards (reproduced in facsimile in my "Charles Dickens by Pen and Pencil") bears upon it, in the handwriting probably of Shaw himself, an intimation that he "leaves the Saracen's Head, Snow Hill [the London headquarters of Squeers], half-past seven o'clock, Thursday morning, 25th July."

I do not lay too much stress upon the importance of the similarity of these announcements—Shaw's and Squeers's—as, without doubt, Dickens generalized here. There is, however, good evidence, beyond that already adduced, that Shaw stood for Squeers. A writer in The Athenæum, February 3, 1894, states with some show of authority that "Dickens called at several local schools (there were at least three in the village of Bowes alone) and asked to look through them. Such institutions would hardly welcome the inquiries of a stranger, and in only one case was he admitted. This was the school which he afterwards made famous as 'Dotheboys Hall.' . . . The description of the buildings in 'Nicholas Nickleby' pointed too plainly to this particular school, and the appearance of the proprietor was painfully suggested in the personality of Mr. Squeers. . . ." Dr. Charles Rogers, editor of "The Modern Scottish Minstrel," records that, during a visit to Barnard Castle in 1864, he met a local clockmaker, Humphreys (whose name and occupation are said to have suggested to Dickens the title for one of his works). Humphreys said that it was he who called the Novelist's attention to, and described to him, the school which was rendered infamous as Dotheboys Hall. We may also assume that it was Humphreys who reminded him of the fact that some years previously certain actions-at-law had been brought against William Shaw, of Bowes Academy, Greta Bridge, by parents of children who had been ill-used at his school. On learning this, the diary, or note-book, which Dickens carried with him to Yorkshire was at once brought into requisition, and the information jotted down. I have seen the note-book, which is now preserved at South Kensington, and, with Miss Hogarth's permission, have copied the following entry, under date February 2, 1838:—

Shaw, the Schoolmaster we saw to-day, is the man in whose school several boys went blind some time since, from gross neglect. The case was tried, and the verdict went against him. It must have been between 1823 and 1826. Look this out in the newspapers.

The exact dates of the trials were October 30 and 31, 1823, and the cases (Jones v. Shaw and Ockerly v. Shaw) were tried at the Court of Common Pleas, before Mr. Justice Park and a special jury, and the fullest reports of them appeared in The Durham Chronicle of November 8 following. These cases, in which the defendant was cast in heavy damages (viz., £300 in each instance), were doubtless in Dickens's mind when he wrote the thirty-fourth chapter, where Squeers informs Ralph Nickleby that what brought him to London was "some bothering law business connected with an action, for what they call neglect of a boy." In order to still further identify Squeers with Shaw, it is imperative that we should know something regarding the latter's personal appearance. This information is supplied by Mr. Lloyd, the well-known Glasgow comedian, who knew Shaw intimately, and vouches for the accuracy of the outward presentment of him as delineated by Dickens and his illustrator—allowing, of course, for some exaggeration. "I can see him now," wrote Mr. Lloyd, "as plainly as I did then . . . a sharp, thin, upright, little man [Squeers was 'a trifle below the middle size'], with a slight scale covering the pupil of his eyes [Squeers 'had but one eye'] . . . Wellington boots and short black trousers, not originally cut too short, but from a habit he had of sitting with one knee over the other, and the trousers being tight they would get 'rucked' half-way up the boots [Squeers's trousers were 'a great deal too short']. Then the clean, white vest, swallow-tailed black coat, white necktie [Squeers wore 'a white neckerchief with long ends'], silver-mounted spectacles, close-cut, iron-grey hair [Squeers's hair was 'very flat and shiny' and 'brushed stiffly up from a low protruding forehead'], high-crowned hat worn slightly at the back of his head—and there you have the man."

Now comes the strange part of the story. Admitting that the evidence is in favour of the belief that Squeers was Shaw, and that Dotheboys Hall was Bowes Academy (a belief which has been, and still remains, current in Bowes itself), we are confronted with the frequently-corroborated statement that Shaw was really a man of a kind and humane disposition, much respected by his neighbours, who, after his death in 1850, placed a stained-glass window in the village church to his memory! An old scholar of his, in a letter to The Newcastle

Weekly Chronicle, May, 1889, declares that the charges levelled at the school "were simply so many artistic untruths."

How, then, are we to consider those actions-at-law to which I have referred, when charges were made against Shaw accusing him of dreadful acts of cruelty? In a letter signed "Jacmar," published in The Athenaeum, February 17th, 1894, the writer informs us that the charges of starving the boys broke down, the verdicts going against the schoolmaster on the charges of carelessness and neglect. Although the school left much to be desired, it is declared to have been far above the class of schools which Dickens did so much to abolish. "Jacmar" asserts that the trials showed on the part of the proprietor great ignorance of sanitary matters and culpable carelessness, but no trace of the villainy so graphically painted by the Novelist. He says, further, that the reports of those trials are very much condensed, as they only give the plaintiff's case, nearly the whole of the evidence being omitted; that no mention is made of the fact that the schoolmaster nearly lost his own sight when ophthalmia broke out in the school; that he had spent four hundred guineas in medical attendance; that, as a result of the actions, his school was temporarily ruined; that, through his counsel, he expressed the deepest regret and sorrow that such affliction should fall upon his pupils; that most probably the disease was caused by one of the boys entering the school when recovering from a severe attack of smallpox; and, lastly, that many of the smaller charges were explained away at the time.

Must we, then, conclude that William Shaw was unfairly made a scapegoat for others' sins? The facts seem to point that way, and the most devout worshippers at the shrine of Dickens (of whom I claim to be one) must admit the truth of the allegation that in portraying Squeers and Dotheboys Hall the Novelist had principally in his mind the Academy at Bowes and the pedagogue whom he interviewed there. Unfortunately, he located at Bowes Academy stories which were true of other schools in the neighbourhood; and, instead of generalizing, he so carefully described the proprietor thereof that the man was immediately identified, and suffered accordingly, while the more detestable members of the tribe went, for a time, scot free.

Mr. Henry Fielding Dickens, K.C., has averred that his father "never took individuals, but types." I would respectfully remind him of Mr. Fang, Mrs. Nickleby, and Miss Mowcher (to name but a few), who were avowedly drawn from individuals.

Yours faithfully,

F. G. KITTON.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

The summer months will not be altogether devoid of interest in the book-world, with Hall Caine's "Eternal City" coming from Mr. Heinemann, John Oliver Hobbes' "A Serious Wooing" from Messrs. Methuen, and Sir Walter Besant's historical romance "A Lady of Lynn" from Messrs. Chatto and Windus—now announced for publication on July 4th. Messrs. Ward, Lock, and Co. also announce one or two books for the slack season, including "My Lady's Diamonds" by Adeline Sergeant and "The Coward" by Robert L. Jefferson, the author of "The Ride to Khiva" and other books of travel. Next week, too, Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish Mr. Crockett's new story "Cinderella" and a translation of Paul Bourget's novel "The Disciple," while "The Bourgeois," by H. de Vere Stacpoole, will follow a little later in the "Green Cloth" Library. August is expected to bring M. Zola to London, and he will be preceded by his new volume of stories under the title of "The Honour of the Army," edited, with an introduction, by Mr. Ernest Vizetelly (Chatto and Windus), and announced for publication on July 14. Most of the books lately announced, however, are intended for the autumn. Early in the season Messrs. Chatto will probably publish "Despair's Last Journey," by Mr. David Christie Murray. Two other novels announced for the autumn are Mr. Gilbert Parker's "The Right of Way" (Heinemann) and Mr. J. M. Barrie's new book (Hodder and Stoughton), while Messrs. Methuen will make a feature of a new story by Lucas Cleve, entitled "The History of Sir Richard Calmady," which enjoys the distinction of being the longest novel the publishers have ever sent to press—it runs to over 700 pages.

Mr. Heinemann will publish shortly a novel entitled "The Inheritors," by Mr. Joseph Conrad and Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer. It deals with literary and political circles of England and Paris.

Major G. S. Thomson, of the Indian Medical Service, has written "A Treatise on Plague," which Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein will publish immediately.

The Harrow School Register has been re-edited and brought up to date by Mr. M. G. Daughish and will be issued this month by Messrs. Longmans. Its aim is to give the name and details of the career of every Harrow boy during the Nineteenth Century.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Duncan Prime.—Your solutions of Nos. 182, 186 to 189, 171 to 173 came duly to hand and are, of course, most useful and acceptable. All will be formally acknowledged as usual.

A. S. Holding and others.—The keys only of two-move problems and chief variations of others. Authors' names always greatly assist us.

Beginner.—At first, as in your present attempts, you will be tempted to try obvious keys and commonplace moves. After a little experience you will, if well advised, abandon once and for all such, looking for something subtle and more really attractive.

M. J. H.—Stanton's "Handbook," in spite of many advances and changes, is still worthy of commendation. Mason's "Principles of Chess" is a useful modern work.

NOTES AND NEWS.—Mr. Forsyth, late of Edinburgh, who now resides at Dunedin, entered the annual tournament of the New Zealand Chess Association, and by winning first prize becomes New Zealand champion. Mr. R. J. Barnes should have won a game against Forsyth which would have given him the coveted honour, but he had the mortification of giving an unexpected stalemate just when victory seemed assured.—Mr. G. Reichelm, one of the Philadelphia experts, has compared Lasker's present appearance with his recollections of seven years ago when the champion first visited the Quaker City. There were many changes, more than the mere years would warrant, and the lines betokened much midnight oil burned over difficult mathematical propositions. With Lasker, the entire field of chess is his study.

NOTES OF THE DAY.

The "LITERATURE" PORTRAIT for next week will be that of Mr. THOMAS HARDY,
an appreciation of whose work will be contributed by Mr.
Stephen Gwynn.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Charles Kensington Salaman left some record of his career. He was almost the last personal link with the musical world of three-quarters of a century ago, and it is sixty-five years since his best-known song—his setting of Shelley's "I arise from dreams of thee"—was published. His one serious literary work was his study of the position of the Hebrew community entitled "The Jews as they Are," which was published by Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall in 1882, and appealed specially to the Shakespearian student on account of an interesting chapter on "Shylock from a Jewish point of view."
The book went to a second edition in 1885.

Literature will not play a very conspicuous part in Mr.
Clement Shorter's new society and dramatic weekly, the Tatler, the first number of which is to appear next Wednesday. Literature, in the view which Mr. Shorter has expressed to us, is looked upon in an illustrated paper more or less as the "pill," and the illustrations as the jam. There will be some literary pills in the shape of articles and poems by well-known writers. In other respects literature will only be treated from the personality of the author, not from the contents of his or her books—in other words the Tatler, instead of reviewing books, will say something about the authors of them. To those who object to the revival of an old and honoured title for the new journal Mr. Shorter replies:—"If the Spectator can do it, why not the Tatler?" "Like Mr. Steele," he writes in his foreword to the coming first number, "we shall, 'we trust, prove that a true relish for manly entertainments and national pleasures is not wholly lost'; we shall not, indeed, like Mr. Steele, try to 'expose' any 'false arts of life,' if any exist to-day; nor shall we lead any crusade for 'a general simplicity.'" Briefly, the Tatler is to be "an up-to-date paper of society and stage, richly illustrated week by week."
Vol. VIII. No. 26.

Another instance of a name snatched from an elder day is, of course, the Guardian. But this week we have an ambitious revival, in something more than name, of a classic periodical.
Mr. Herbert Vivian steps into the shoes of Dr. Johnson and brings out No. 209 of the Rambler. With the addition of a
at dinner, the journal is the same as of yore. Contributors are requested, among other things, "to favour every Noun with a capital initial Letter." "The revival of Toryism, which has now nearly passed into a Memory; a free criticism, even of the Idols of the Hour; an Exposition of Foreign Politics, hitherto so gravely misunderstood; a Return to those literary Graces which Johnson displayed in the Rambler and Disraeli on the Hustings"—these are the chief objects of the new Rambler.

The familiar warning "The editor cannot undertake to return unused MSS." becomes, in Johnsonian style, "The Rambler acknowledges no Responsibility for the Custody of what he may not have solicited." But there is surely no eighteenth century precedent for the Rambler's announcement that "Separate Numbers will not be sold." "I decline," he says,
"to submit my cause to those who will not indulge me with three months' hearing." Criticism of the "Idols of the Hour" runs some risk of growing stale after three months. Mr. W. H.
Helm contributes a letter purporting to come from Dr. Johnson himself—on hearing of Mr. Vivian's venture. But he out-Johnsons Johnson, who was scarcely so ponderous as to call his death "the Operation of corporeal Dissolution."

The special exhibition at the British Museum, apropos of the approaching Alfred millenary, of objects connected with the King and Anglo-Saxon times is now ready for inspection. The collection is not large—the whole of it is contained in two cases.
Probably the most popular objects will be the copy of the famous Alfred Jewel—made at Oxford, where the original is preserved in the Ashmolean Museum—and a splendid series of Anglo-Saxon finger rings. These include the massive gold rings of King Ethelwulf, Alfred's father—found at Laverstock, and presented to the Museum by the Earl of Radnor—and of Alfred's sister Ethelswith, Queen of Mercia—found in Yorkshire, forming part of the Franks Bequest. Most of the gold rings, as well as the Alfred Jewel, were described and illustrated in Professor Earle's recently published book. A silver spoon and fork are among the more homely examples of Anglo-Saxon craftsmanship. A bronze seal of Ethilwald, Bishop of Dunwich in 850—found near the site of the monastery at Eye, in Suffolk, and subsequently damaged by fire—bears a central device which occurs on a silver penny of Edward the Elder, son of Alfred the Great. The collection of coins is specially valuable, comprising the coins of Alfred himself and their Danish imitations, and of Ethelwulf, Ethelred, and the Danish Conquest of Northumbria. Almost more interesting than the coins is a leaden trial-piece with a cast on the reverse side for a silver penny of King Alfred from a die by the moneyer Ealdulf. This was found in St. Paul's Churchyard and purchased in 1856. The design was apparently rejected, but a similar die of the same moneyer was on another occasion authorized by the King. The literature of Anglo-Saxon times, and more particularly the scholarship of King Alfred, are illustrated by a fine collection of MSS.

The sixpenny reprints of which we spoke a week or two ago may be taken, we suppose, as an index of the success of the original. We are not surprised at two which are at the moment coming from Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton—"Isabel Carnaby" which brought Miss Ellen Thornycroft Fowler to the height of her popularity and on which we doubt whether she has since improved; and "My Lady Nicotine." The latter had a big sale. It caught that "common object" of the town, the pipe-smoking quasi-Bohemian bachelor. But it was hardly an epoch-making work, and we much fear that the rising generation will know it only as a testimonial to a particular brand of tobacco.

* * * *

What it does suggest is that the literary travel book of which we speak elsewhere is just the thing for Mr. Barrie. He went once, it will be remembered, on a tour to the Shakespeare Country. Stratford affected him so much that he parted with Gilray (who wanted to hurry on) and "passed day after day smoking reverently at the hotel door." This, to the encomiast of "My Lady Nicotine," only led up to the story of a tobacco pouch. But it makes one wish that Mr. Barrie would take to touring in a less frivolous, but not too serious, mood—in the spirit, say, of Stevenson. No one would be better fitted to write "a sentimental journey."

The Ordinance for the foundation of the "Sir William Fraser Chair of Ancient History and Palæography" in the University of Edinburgh has now been approved by an Order in Council, and the University Court is about to appoint a professor. The professor will have to deliver annually an ordinary course of 100 lectures and, if required, an Honours course of fifty, and the salary is to be about £700 a year. The University Court meets on July 19, and will probably make the appointment then. Applications have to be lodged by July 15. Aberdeen University Court has resolved to obtain an Ordinance for the foundation of a Chair of History. Mrs. Fletcher has agreed to extend for another year her offer of £5,000 for its endowment on receiving an assurance from the Court that it would secure the institution of the Chair before the termination of the present lectureship. The amount required to complete the endowment is about £3,500.

Apropos of the mistake in Browning's "Transcendentalism," noted in Literature recently, a correspondent writes:—"There is an odd blunder in 'Muckle-Mouth Meg' where the mouth of that lady is described as large enough to swallow 'a bubbly-jock's egg.'" Everybody north of the Tweed and some others know that the bubblyjock is the male turkey.

While on the subject of mistakes may I point out that Mr. Alfred Austin misquotes Keats's "Ode to the Nightingale" in his "Garden that I love?" Keats did not write

Long verdurous glooms and mossy winding ways, but "Through verdurous glooms, &c."

A BIRD SANG, OUT IN THE SUNSET.

A bird sang, out in the sunset; and hearing him where I lay
At anchor amid the crested seas at the close of a windswept day,
My thoughts flew over a thousand leagues to you in an English bay.

For of all sweet names it was your dear name he praised with passionate note,
Ringing such changes upon it that the rapture rose in my throat,
And across that wild bird's silvery cry my answering music smote.

I thundered him song for splendid song, he carolled me lilt for lilt,
Till the winds blew into the swaying heavens the lyrics we blithely spilt,
And the clouds swung on like a knightly press in some wide heavenly tilt.

So sang we both in the sunset the songs we could not hold,
O! he sang on of a spirit of fire, and I of a heart of gold,
And the sunset flamed and the great sun sank ere ever our love was told.

And little I cared what bird he was who sang so blithe and fine,
But into the cool of the night we sang, of woman, and love,
and wine,
And deep in the heart of every song was the name of the maid that's mine.

W. J. LANCASTER.

The following letter from the Council of the British Economic Association appeared in The Times of Tuesday:—

Sir,—We desire to call public attention to the fact that a great collection of national interest and importance is in imminent danger of leaving this country. The well-known library of Professor Foxwell, consisting of some 30,000 valuable volumes, pamphlets, and manuscripts, illustrative of the social, industrial, and financial history of the kingdom, is about to be sold; and unless a sum of £10,000 can be found within a few days it is to be feared that this unique storehouse of material of scientific and historical economics will be removed to America, whence it will never return.

No such library of economic literature has ever been formed before, and it is doubtful whether any future collector, however learned, leisured, and wealthy, will be able to rival it. When Professor Foxwell started the enthusiastic pursuit of his hobby in 1875, he was almost the only collector. Owing to agricultural depression and other well-known causes an exceptional number of old and famous libraries have since that time been brought to the hammer, and he has thus been able to put under contribution the libraries of a great number of distinguished statesmen and economists, and to make the richest possible collection, especially for the period down to 1850. Many of the volumes are interesting as having belonged to Adam Smith, Ricardo, Arthur Young, Pitt, F. Baring, Huskisson, Peel, Cobbe, and many are in sumptuous English and French morocco bindings of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, of which a selection was chosen for exhibition by the Fine Arts Club a few years ago. Every volume is of importance, and the catalogue is the most complete bibliography of political economy yet made. It would be humiliating if these records, in some cases unique, of the condition of the English people for more than four centuries were allowed to leave the country. Such subjects as taxation, currency, banking, the National Debt, the growth of the colonies and colonial trade, the slave trade, the anti-Corn Law movement, the rise of the large towns, and the growth of industries, industrial legislation, guilds, trade unions, co-operation, Socialism, Owenism, chartism, Poor Law, charity organization, population and the census, emigration, Ireland and Irish questions, East Indian and American trade from the earliest times, commercial law and practice, railways and canals, to mention only a few of the topics each of which has a library to itself, must surely be of sufficient interest and importance to the country to justify some effort to arouse public interest in the matter. The owner is making no profit by the sale, and the sum mentioned is no larger than the price which has been paid for a great racehorse. In Germany and America there is sufficient public interest to arouse great eagerness for the acquisition of such a library. The council of the British Economic Association would appeal to some public-spirited person or persons to seize this opportunity of performing an act of enlightened patriotism by purchasing this library for the country. It might, perhaps, find a fitting home in the new London University; but it is proposed to leave to the subscribers a decision upon this question.

Subscriptions or offers of help may be addressed to the secretary of the British Economic Association at 9, Adelphi-terrace, Strand, W.C.

Lord Acton has been chosen to fill the vacancy on the committee of the London Library caused by the death of the late Bishop of London.

M. Catulle Mendes has completed a drama in verse upon the life of St. Theresa. Mme. Sarah Bernhardt will produce the play at her own theatre next autumn, creating herself the part of St. Theresa.

Mrs. Craigie has been elected a member of the Council of the Society of Authors in the place of the late Miss Yonge.

The recent death of Mrs. Anna Longfellow Pierce, a sister of Longfellow, removed the last immediate member of the poet's family.

The newly constituted African Society, founded in memory of Mary Kingsley, held its inaugural meeting at the United Service Institution, Whitehall, on June 27, under the presidency of the Marquis of Ripon.

Mr. Foster Fraser, who rode on a bicycle round the world a few years ago, proposes to spend the autumn going through Siberia, along the track of the Trans-Siberian Railway.

At the Essex Assizes, a few days ago, Mr. Aylmer Maude, the friend of Count Tolstoy and translator of his works, objected to serving on a jury, on conscientious grounds. Mr. Maude was excused.

The arrangements for the memorial to Archibald Forbes, which is to take the form of a tablet with a medallion portrait in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, have been almost completed.

Building developments on the "Lalla Rookh" Estate, Muswell-hill, will shortly sweep away Tom Moore's cottage.

Fun, which has been for some time the property of Sir George Newnes, has been sold by him to Mr. C. Shurey.

Though Dr. Ibsen is now slightly better, little hope is entertained of his permanent recovery.

Dr. Pinedi, who was Robert Louis Stevenson's doctor at Davos, has died at Arosa.

The offer of Victor Hugo's house to the Paris Municipal Council has been accepted. His two grandchildren will place in it 500 of his drawings and water-colours, also his wood carvings, writing table, and bed. They will also give 50,000*fr.* for arranging the house as a Hugo Museum.

The conference which has been held in Berlin to consider the best means of securing uniformity in the spelling of German words has concluded its labours. The report recommended that the superfluous "h" should be dropped in words like thur.

The Moniteur, it is announced, will cease to be published at the end of this month. The paper was founded as the official organ of the French Government in 1790.

In honour of the tercentenary of Hamlet in 1902, a statue of Shakespeare, subscribed for by Danes and sculptured by Professor Lorenz, will be erected at Cronberg, near Helsingfors.

A recent writer in the Monthly Review lamented an alleged decline in the quality of the literature of travel. It is at least true that a great many travellers write bad The Literature books when there is not the least occasion for of Travel. them to write any books at all. For there really are only two reasons which justify what our forefathers of the eighteenth century used to call the "relation of a journey." A traveller may have made discoveries worth communicating to the world, or he may have the artist's gift of rendering moods and impressions. On either of these alternatives we are glad to hear from him. We have no use for the average globe-trotter's record of trivial happenings on the beaten track. The appearance of such records is not, of course, an absolutely new phenomenon. Even in the golden age of our literature a certain type of man was a little apt to write a book about a well-known place merely in order to prove that he had been there. If there is more of that sort of thing nowadays than there used to be, the reason is that there are more travellers, more people who can write, more people who can read. And no great harm is done. All that happens is that a certain number of readers and writers waste their time in one way instead of wasting it in another. In spite of the great flow of unnecessary books, literature stands where it did; and the only really interesting and important question is—Have the major books of travel lost that literary charm which we find in those books of travel of an earlier period which have survived the cankerous touch of time? We are inclined to think that they have to some extent lost it for reasons for which the travellers cannot be held responsible. Travel itself was richer in romantic possibilities even a hundred years ago than it is to-day, or than it can ever be again. There were no guide-books and there were only inadequate maps. There were no geographical societies to say, "We already know this and we want you to find out that." There were terre incognita within a very few hundred miles of Pall-mall; and many a journey over which you can now be personally conducted, with a lecturer in attendance, was then a "Great Perhaps." This general state of ignorance about the byways of the world must have been a great help in the production of fascinating books of travel. It gave the writers confidence, even if it shielded them in inaccuracy. They let themselves go, much as one does in telling fairy tales to children. They drew pictures as well as tabulating facts. What we call "high falutin'" in a modern traveller seems in their case only the natural outburst of sentimental, unsophisticated men. The idyllic pages in de Luc's "Lettres Physiques et Morales sur les Montagnes" and the ecstatic pages of Ramond de Carbonnière's "Observations faites dans les Pyrénées" are typical of the charming literature of travel that was only possible when the world was ignorant and unsophisticated. Both writers were men of science. One of them invented the hygrometer and had a passion for ascertaining at what temperature water would boil at any given altitude; the other was so much addicted to the use of the barometer that, when he was Prefect at Puy de Dome, he was said to employ it for measuring the heights of conscripts. But they both rendered the poetry of the mountains in a manner never attained and seldom aimed at in an age of those Climbers' Guides which direct you to the top of Mount Blanc much as a policeman would direct you from the Mansion-house to Piccadilly-circus. Now and again, of course, a traveller with the right temperament, happening upon the right place, may partially triumph over the literary difficulties with which the advance of geographical knowledge and the scientific spirit has confronted him. Stevenson did so, in a measure, in "An Inland Voyage" and in "Travels with a Donkey in the Cevennes." Mr. Gissing has done so in a book we review on another page. Mr. Morley Roberts did so, in a measure, in "The Western Avernus"; and so did Mr. Stadling in the recent book in which he reproduced so eloquently the impression made upon him by the vast silences of the Siberian forests. But these exceptions to the rule are few and rare. The rule is that the modern book of travel must be read for information and not for literary charm.

Literature Portraits.—VIII.

ARTHUR SYMONS.

No one who glances, however cursorily, through the volumes—some twenty or so—that bear the name of Mr. Arthur Symons, either as writer, translator, or editor, can fail to recognize that he has certain qualities which he is able to employ with effect in many branches of art. He displays always style, critical acumen, connoisseurship, wide literary sympathies, and a catholic sensitivity. His "Studies in Two Literatures" and his later "Symbolist Movement in Literature" place him high among the literary essayists; his volumes of verse, "London Nights," "Amoris Victima," "Silhouettes," "Days and Nights," "Images of Good and Evil," prove him to be a devoted poet of great accomplishment and moderate inspiration. But it is from his critical faculty, his power of recognizing the new and true and of presenting his discoveries to other people who may not have been able immediately to value them, that the world will receive most benefit.

This is, in his own words, the delightful business of the critic, and it is the one in which he has engaged both with skill and fortune. His original writings in prose and verse, although undertaken, as I think he says in one of his neat and effective dedications, because they interest him, have really all aimed—unintentionally—at providing us with a more finely-accounted critic. Although we are prepared to grant him title of poet and essayist—novelist or historian, too, should he care to claim these names later—it is as the critical journalist that he is most effective.

As the exponent of the Continental symbolists Mr. Symons, ignoring their less admirable side, undoubtedly achieved a useful work. Symbolism, broadly speaking, has been taken to stand, at any rate in France, for individualism in literature, artistic freedom and abandonment of old formulas. In England, where the irregular is often surer of welcome than the academic, the necessity for such a movement was not so apparent. In an article in Literature some eight months ago Mr. W. M. Fullerton gave an admirable picture of the days when the younger generation, artistically speaking, were knocking at the gates. They were told that their symbolism was merely an experiment in affectation. The havoc they played with the Alexandrin was a crime. Englishmen hardly realized that, after all, symbolism was only an effort of emancipation. Mr. Symons was one of the very few critics who studied and appreciated the symbolist movement before it was at all understood in England. The results of his study appeared in the book already mentioned, and in his translations of "symbolist" verse. In the first number of the Savoy, in which Mr. Symons undertook to publish no verse that had not some close relationship with poetry, there appeared, in 1896, his sympathetic rendering of "Mandoline" from the Pêches Galantes of Verlaine. This is still an admirable example of his work as translator, poet, and critic—for one who translates verse must be all three—and I transcribe it here. It was accompanied by a beautiful drawing by Mr. Conder which somehow suggested—in black and white—the "rose and grey ecstasy of the moon."

The singers of serenades
Whisper their faded vows
Unto fair listening maids
Under the singing boughs.

Tircis, Aminte are there;
Clitandre is over long,
And Damis for many a fair
Tyrant makes many a song.

Their short vests, silken and bright,
Their long, pale, silken trains,
Their elegance of delight,
Twine soft, blue, shadowy chains.

And the mandolines and they,
Faintlier breathing, swoon
Into the rose and grey
Ecstasy of the moon.

Although the inspiration of these verses belongs to Verlaine, they are very characteristic of Mr. Symons, at least in one mood.

But the poet's point of view changes as quickly as the shadows in an English summer sky, so that it is almost impossible to pin Mr. Symons, as it were, to one particular and typical song. Since "Silhouettes" was published, or the epilogic "Credo," the close of "London Nights," was penned, many influences have been at work with Mr. Symons. Since those days when he could write—in all sincerity, no doubt, although his feeling for the mot juste sometimes hints a trifle of affectation—

Lagging, and loud, and riotous:
My life is like a music-hall —to the present time, when he has told us that Mysticism, with an initial capital, and Symbolism claim his deepest interest, many are the changes of spirit which he has passed through. But here, again, there is nothing but advantage for the reading public. The literary moods, the psychic changes of the poet make him a more intimately valuable critic. This brings us by an easy route to Mr. Symons' achievement as a translator. Until quite lately the English version of modern Continental work has been, with a few exceptions, absolutely unworthy. Mr. Symons has done a good deal to alter this bad state of affairs. In 1894 he published his translation of "L'Assommoir," and since then has either edited or translated many valuable, but for the general public esoteric, books. "Les Aubes" of Emile Verhaeren is a good example of a clever translation from French verse into English prose and verse. To Gabriele D'Annunzio's "Il Piacere" he wrote an informing introduction and supplied some translations in verse, but his best work in this direction is "The Dead City," evidently a labour of love, as one gathers both from its style and from the dedication, which speaks of it as "begun at Arles and finished at Toledo, the two dead cities which I love most in Europe." This is the secret of Mr. Symons' magnetism as a critic; he either only touches the work he likes, or, we rather incline to think, he has that fine journalistic gift, the power of believing, for just the space of time necessary to convince us, that he is heart and soul in the work of which he writes.

Mr. Symons' general attitude towards art is very clear; his simple belief, in his own words, is "that a work of art has but one reason for existence—that it should be a work of art, a moment of the eternity of beauty," and he adds:—"One forgets sometimes that it has entered the brains of men to doubt anything so obvious. Yet, here they undoubtedly are, critics to whom art means a theory, a belief, a science; the Ibsenites, the Realists, the Romanticists; people who, when you offer them a rose, say, 'Yes, but it is not a violet.' Frankly, I do not understand this limiting of oneself to a school, a doctrine, a costume." With so broad a view of art one is not surprised to find Mr. Symons a student in many schools. But if one must attempt to trace the particular bent of his talents to modern forces one might say that he is to some extent the heritor of Walter Pater and John Addington Symonds, of both of whom he writes in his "Studies" with considerable feeling. He is not without the fineness and subtlety of emotion which he ascribes to Pater and the "retentive receptivity" which Symonds modestly claimed for himself is certainly his also. One may give an idea of his diverse energies by recalling the fact that the subjects he has treated as critic or as editor range from the Elizabethan Dramatists to Mathilde Blind, from St. Augustine to Aubrey Beardsley.

Poet, essayist, translator, critic, editor, journalist; to be the first one must be everything, but to be the last one must be something of all the others. Mr. Symons, a representative of the best type of literary journalist, is a great deal of each and all of these things.

EGAN MEW.

Mr. Arthur Symons dedicated his first volume of verse ("Days and Nights," Macmillan and Co., 1889), to Walter Pater, and ten years later wrote an introduction to the French translation of Pater's "Imaginary Portraits." His bibliography begins, however, with 1886, when he not only published his "Introduction to the Study of Browning," (Cassell and Co.), but wrote the introductions to four numbers of the "Shakspeare Quarto Facsimiles"—"King Henry V.—the first quarto, 1600"; "King Henry V.—the third quarto, 1608"; "Titus Andronicus—the first quarto, 1600"; and "Venus and Adonis—the first quarto, 1593." His edition of "Essays by Leigh Hunt" in the Camelot Classics belongs to the same period, as well as his editions of plays by Massinger and John Day in the Mermaid Series of Old Dramatists. His volume of "Silhouettes" was originally published by Mathews and Lane in 1892, but was issued in a second edition, revised and enlarged, by Mr. Smithers in 1896. In 1892 Mr. Symons also edited "A Selection from the Poems of Mathilde Blind" for Mr. Fisher Unwin, and supplemented it last year by editing the complete edition of Mathilde Blind's poetical works, issued by the same publisher. In 1894 he translated Zola's "L'Assommoir," and in the following year came another volume of verse, "London Nights," for Mr. Smithers. In the second edition of this book, which appeared in 1897, he replied to the critics who attacked his verse on the ground of morality. "I have rendered, well or ill, many moods, and without disguise or preference. If it be objected to me that some of them were moods I had better never have felt, I am ready to answer, Possibly; but I must add, What of that? They have existed, and whatever has existed has achieved the right of artistic existence."

His "Amoris Victima," and "Studies in Two Literatures" were both published by Smithers in 1897, and in the following year his memoir of Aubrey Beardsley appeared from the Unicorn Press, as No. 3 of the Unicorn Quartos. Mr. Symons first met Aubrey Beardsley in the summer of 1895, not long after Beardsley left the Yellow Book. Symons had just been asked to form and edit a rival to the Yellow Book, and, as he tells us in the introduction to this memoir, Beardsley was ready to fall in with the suggestion that he should illustrate the new quarterly, though he was supposed to be dying at the time. It was Beardsley who gave the name of the Savoy to the venture. A little later they met again at Dieppe, where they stayed for a month or so. "It was at Dieppe," continues Mr. Symons, "that the Savoy was really planned, and it was in a café, which Mr. Sickert has so often painted, that I wrote the slightly pettish and defiant Editorial Note which made so many enemies for the first number." In 1898—to return to chronological order—Mr. Symons' translation of D'Annunzio's "The Child of Pleasure" was published by Mr. Heinemann; and his edition of "The Confessions of St. Augustine" appeared in the Scott Library in the same year. In 1899 came his volume on "The Symbolist Movement in Literature" and his introduction to the limited edition of the translation of Guy de Maupassant's "Boule de Suif"—both from Mr. Heinemann. Last year came another volume of verse, "Images of Good and Evil," through Mr. Heinemann, who also has his latest translation from D'Annunzio in the press—Gioconda as produced by Signora Duse. Most of his books published by Smithers are, we believe, out of print.

TRAVELLERS' TRUTH. A "Personal View."

Travellers ne'er did lie,
Though fools at home condemn them.—Tempest.

The tendency of travellers to supply from a fertile imagination what the defects of memory leave incomplete is far too threadbare a topic to court revival at the present day. Nevertheless, the world could ill spare the wealth of tales and romances, from Homer downwards, which has been bequeathed to it from this source. Even where flagrant attempts at deception are obvious, their effrontery may be redeemed by a vivacious style, and much may be forgiven to those whose flow of language seems to render the raising of doubts an impertinence. But in these days, when so little of the earth's surface remains unexplored, and all assistance from the supernatural is proscribed, the wings of fancy are clipped, and the area into which she can stray is greatly restricted. True, it is no long time since Louis de Rougemont succeeded in imposing upon so august a body as the British Association, but his early discomfiture will probably serve as a warning to modern Munchausens for a long period.

There remains the question, however, whether the human mind can be relied on to furnish a correct account of what took place in times of great peril or fatigue, or when long privation has dulled the faculties below their ordinary standard. An impression is certainly prevalent that at such times the chain of events is so burnt into the memory that no link of it can be lost. But is this really the case? When different witnesses are examined about some occurrence which took place before their very eyes, or in which they themselves participated, their accounts are liable to differ enormously, especially as regards the smaller details. How, then, can we accept in every particular the narrative of a single observer, expanded after the event from half-indecipherable notes, and "touched up" before being handed to the compositors?

I cast no aspersions on the good faith of the writers whom I quote, nor upon the value of their work from a geographical or scientific standpoint. My contention merely applies to the minor touches, such as lend picturesqueness to a narrative. By way of preface I quote from Mr. E. A. Fitzgerald's "Highest Andes," where Mr. Stuart Vines (p. 106) laments that he had forgotten to take his camera to the summit of Aconcagua, though it had lain all night at his feet in the tent where he slept. He writes, "Alas! one's memory is not keen at these high altitudes." What, then, shall be said of Mr. Fitzgerald himself, whose plight is described as follows (p. 77):—

About noon I crawled back into the camp, waiting there in a helpless and hopeless state, half unconscious. I had not even the energy to light a fire and cook a meal for myself. About 2 o'clock . . . the wind changed and blew upon me with full force. So feeble was I, both in brain and body [the italics are mine], that I had not the wit or energy to move twenty yards away, though I could have escaped from the wind, and received what little warmth the sunlight afforded.

How many statements made under such physical disabilities as these could survive cross-examination in a court of law? Yet the narrative is continuous, and, apparently, without a flaw.

Let me turn now to an even more fascinating book, "Through Asia," written by a traveller of great and well-earned renown, Dr. Sven Hedin. On April 10th, 1895, he set out, with three companions, and what was meant to be a full load of supplies, to cross the Great Desert of Asia. In about a fortnight their situation began to be perilous in the extreme—far worse, indeed, than was realized at the time. Their course lay across gigantic sand-dunes, blown into strange crescentic forms by the wind; their water supply gave out, and the hot sun dried up every vestige of moisture in their belongings. With parched throats and eyes, and limbs aching with the friction of walking, which seemed as if it would set them on fire—to quote the doctor's own words—they struggled on, until finally seven of the eight camels had lain down to die, and two of the men were left behind, expecting no better fate.

By a lucky chance, on May 5th, the leader, who had left his solitary companion, Kasim, in order to make a last effort, came upon a pool of clear water, of which he drank immoderately, and from that moment the worst was over. The next consideration was obviously to relieve his follower, and for that purpose the doctor filled his top-boots with water, carried them some distance, and reared them up against a tree-stump for the night. The next morning they had not lost a drop, and in the course of some hours we find Kasim emptying first one and then the other, just in time to call back the little life that was in him. I am well aware of the challenge—

Who dares this pair of boots displace,
Must meet Bombastes face to face, and having no liking for the fray, I make no comment upon the story. But what about the picture which accompanies it, where Dr. Hedin, in the act of emptying one of the boots down Kasim's throat, is shown with clean-shaven cheek and chin, and a moustache apparently newly trimmed? The correctness of all the pictures, it should be observed, is guaranteed in the preface, so that they are fair subjects for criticism.

Any lapse of memory may, of course, be readily forgiven to a man who had just escaped a horrible death by such a narrow margin, but when the examples I have quoted can be paralleled in several other books of travel recently published, the only possible conclusion is that absolute accuracy cannot and should not be claimed for descriptions of scenery, or the sequence of events, when the narrator is avowedly not in a condition to take proper heed of what is going on.

THE DRAMA.

RÉJANE.—SADA YACCO.

Dipping into a volume of the "Journal des Goues" the other day I came upon this entry, under "Jeudi, 6 Février, 1890":—"Ce matin, dans ma toilette du matin, tombe Réjane toute tourbillonnante dans une pelisse rose. Quelle vitalité! quelle alacrité, il y a chez cette femme. . . . C'est une parole blagueuse, coupée de rires gamins, et de remuements qui ne peuvent tenir en place sur sa chaise. . . . Elle me parle ensuite de l'Angleterre, où elle me dit qu'elle a un public à elle." This is an excellent thumb-nail sketch of the actress. She is, indeed, of vitality, alacrity, restlessness, "chaff," and child-like laughter all compact. And she was right when she said she had a public of her own in England. For the last fortnight she has filled the Coronet Theatre to overflowing. The truth is, she is irresistible. That can be stated confidently; it is a fact which any one can test by actual experience. The difficulty is to say precisely wherein the secret of her fascination lies. To try and describe the thing in words is a sorry business. You cannot describe a smile, a voice, an intonation. I have seen much ratiocination in print about the peculiar fascination of Réjane. It leaves me unconvinced, for it misses, as all reasoning must, the insaisissable element, which is just the element that makes all the difference. The secret of her fascination is—herself.

It is all very well to talk of her method. That, no doubt, is, as they say, a realistic method, while Sarah Bernhardt's is a romantic method and Duse's, I suppose, would have to be called a classic method. Réjane does give a strict imitation of life; but that is not the key to her secret. Put another realistic actress in her place—there are plenty of them in Paris—and the peculiar pleasure which Réjane gives you at once disappears. No, it is the temperament behind Réjane's art which accounts for her fascination. So it is in many another case, as I tried to make out here the other week in speaking of Mrs. Patrick Campbell. The mere mimetic faculty has its value, of course, immense value in its way. That is to say, it has precisely the value of perfect command over technical means in any other art—as mastery of the brush in painting, of the keyboard in piano playing. But the real secret of the painter or the pianist is in the character, the brain, the soul, which his mastery of technique enables him to reveal. So it is with acting. To be able to give a perfect imitation of something or other is the A B C of the player's business; but it is only a means to an end, the end of revealing the player's own self—of course, as conditioned by the assumed character. Players are apt to mistake the means for the end, to revel in mere imitation—a hollow, soulless thing, mere trickery. This abomination of desolation is quaintly misnamed "character-acting." The real "virtue" of the player for us begins where the mere imitation leaves off; it consists, that is, in the quality of the player's temperament.

Réjane's is a nervous temperament, and it addresses itself to the nerves. There is something subtly perverse and "degenerate" in it. After an evening of Réjane's playing I feel as though I had been sipping absinthe. Her talent is exciting, disquieting, a little demoralizing. When Pope asserted that every woman is at heart a rake he was too sweeping; he forgot the Saint Teresas and the Dinah Morrisses, not to mention the British Matron and the American School Marm. When I am watching Réjane I forget them, too. And what Michelet said comes into my mind: toute femme est une malade. This seems like an ill compliment to Mme. Réjane. It is, in fact, only part of the truth. Her temperament is saved from being morbid by its enormous energy. Its virida vis—in Lucretian phrase—is, perhaps, its dominant quality. Réjane flings herself headlong into her part, does not scruple to make herself ugly when required, never spares herself. Has the heroine of Sapho to be franchement canaille? Very well, then Réjane will be as frankly canaille as it is possible to be. See the quarrel at the close of Act III. If she has to be hysterical, a physical wreck, then she abandons herself to that, too, without sparing a gurgle or a convulsion. See the parting at the close of Act IV. It is the fashion to praise these violent exploits as Réjane's most telling effects. Telling effects they are, but they are far from being Réjane's best things. Her best things, if I am not greatly mistaken, are her nuances; a gesture suddenly checked, a fleeting expression of face in a moment of silence, the instantaneous translation of a word or a thought into some little physical act, or an impatient interjection which "speaks volumes." Watch her as she dismisses her lover in a scene of La Parisienne. The point of the play is that the lover has insensibly acquired all the prosaic qualities of a husband and that the woman so regards him—"un second mari, autant dire." It is the business of the author, of course, to work out this idea in his dialogue. But note a detail in which Réjane helps him out. In addressing her final words to the lover she flicks the dust from his coat mechanically and puts his tie straight, an essentially conjugal action—and there is the author's idea in a nutshell! Add that Réjane's acting is an intellectual stimulant. Her mental alertness braces you up. You feel you are in presence of a quick-witted woman and that you must keep all your own wits about you to cope with her. Add, too, that she exercises, into the bargain, all the seduction of an elegant, luxuriously-gowned woman, and that woman a Frenchwoman. Odor di femmina and the frou-frou of petticoats will always have their effect. They complete the fascination of Réjane, which, I repeat, is irresistible.

Compared with Réjane, and all the types of Western civilization which unite to make a Réjane, Sada Yacco, the Japanese actress at the Criterion, seems a doll, a baby, or a porcelain idol. Yet you soon find that she, too, is a woman, and very much a woman. In The Wife's Sacrifice she is a tender, submissive, plaintive little woman. In The Geisha and the Knight she is "all air and fire," and at last a fury. I do not profess to appreciate all the fine shades of Japanese acting. How can one, when not a single word has any meaning for one, so that the drama is reduced to pantomime eked out by gibberish? But we can all appreciate dancing, and Sada Yacco is quite the most graceful dancer I have ever seen. Call it not dancing, but rather the capricious hovering, advance, settling, and retreat of a butterfly. I feel as if I wanted to catch her in a net, to see how her wings would glisten under a glass case. Her fairy grace is strangely contrasted with the grim performance of Mr. Otojiro Kawakami, who gives a horrible representation of self-slaughter. This combination of exquisite beauty with the bloodthirsty and the macabre may or may not be characteristically Japanese, but it is certainly very curious, very "primitive." It gives the jaded Western a "new thrill."

TRAVEL.

THE HIGH ANDES.

CLIMBING AND EXPLORATION IN THE BOLIVIAN ANDES. By Sir MARTIN CONWAY. (Harpers. 20s. 6d.)

The Bolivian Andes were the scene of almost the earliest mountaineering expeditions ever undertaken in any country. Leaving out of account such isolated excursions as that of the soldiers of Cortez to the top of Popocatepetl in quest of sulphur for their gunpowder, no explorations above the snow line are recorded at an earlier date than those of De La Condamine and the other French Academicians who were in Peru and Bolivia from 1735 to 1741, measuring an arc of the meridian, and exploring the country generally. The report of their adventures in the neighbourhood of Pichincha gave an impetus to climbing in other countries but not in Bolivia itself. Though Humboldt went to the Andes, it was not to the Bolivian Andes, but to those of Ecuador—to Chimborazo and Cotopaxi. Those Andes have been fairly well climbed, both before and after Mr. Whymper's expedition, and there has also been some successful climbing in the range of which Aconcagua is the culminating point. But the Bolivian Andes have been neglected. Mr. Whymper could not visit them because, when he set out, Bolivia was at war with Chile; and the two expeditions of Mr. J. B. Pentland and M. Wiener, being inadequately equipped, accomplished very little.

Sir Martin Conway, therefore, broke comparatively fresh ground in going there; and he achieved enough to make his book as important as it is interesting. He did not, indeed, attempt Ampato—22,800 feet, according to the railway surveyors, and believed to be the highest mountain in America—but he did climb Illimani, and he nearly climbed Aconcagua, the principal peak of the great Sorata group. The story of the turning back from Aconcagua is a graphic piece of writing, not unworthy of the golden age of Alpine literature. The clean-cut sentences draw the picture much as Mr. Whymper drew pictures in the old days of "Scrambles in the Alps." One sees the party of three toiling up the final snow slope:—

The darkness, the uncertain flicker of our fire-fly candle, the utter silence, the angry clouds, the starry heaven, and the vaguely felt, rather than seen, expanse of snow and surrounding peaks in the bonds of a frost like the grip of a demon's hand combined to produce on all of us an immense impression. None but necessary words were spoken. The silence was too awful to be lightly disrupted. . . . Our breathing was hard and loud; our hearts beat audibly; we were working up to the verge of our possible strength.

The snow was waist-deep and the incline was steep. It could not be traversed in zigzags, for that would have been to cut the snowfield with a furrow and so provoke an avalanche. It was necessary to go straight up in the middle. The feet of the guides were frost-bitten, but they beat them with their ice-axes and toiled on to within 600 feet of the summit. Then a huge crevasse, fifty feet across, barred their path. They could have got over it, cutting a way down one wall and up the other; but that would only have been the beginning of their difficulties. The slope beyond the crevasse was fraught with peril:—

It was a little steeper than the slope we had come up, and it was covered with the same powdery snow; but, whereas thus far we had been able to climb straight up, it would now be necessary to take a diagonal course, for the summit was above, on our left hand. If we had fallen from any point on the hither side of the great crevasse, we should have come to rest somewhere on the level snowfield below. Even if involved in an avalanche we might have extricated ourselves safely, as I have more than once done in similar circumstances. But in the traverse above, on the far side of the crevasse, we should have had it below us to tumble into, for the first part of the way, and further on an ice cliff of one hundred feet to fall over. Moreover, the probabilities were that we should start an avalanche, and if we did, it was certain we should all be killed. To have accepted the risk would have been the act of a fool.

So they turned back sorrowfully, believing that they had missed a chance of surmounting the highest peak ever trodden by the foot of man. But that turned out to be a mistake. The Bolivian survey gave the altitude as 24,812 feet, Sir Martin Conway's aneroid brought it out at 24,500 feet, and Pentland had actually computed it as 25,250 feet; but subsequent triangulations, continued for a fortnight, reduced the measure to 21,700 feet, or some 1,700 feet less than Aconcagua, which had been climbed.

Though the book is to be classed with climbing books, climbing was by no means the only subject that interested the author, and is by no means the only subject on which he writes well. One thrilling chapter describes a revolution at Panama. Sir Martin Conway's train ran right into the area of disturbance, and he had to lie under the seat while the insurgents riddled the car with bullets. Another chapter describes how the Indians chased and stoned him while he was engaged upon his trigonometrical survey. He had to complete the process under the protection of the police. There is also a good deal about the rubber industry—a subject which Sir Martin treats as thoroughly as if he were preparing a Consular report—and there are some interesting facts bearing on the vexed question of mountain sickness.

Sir Martin Conway had time to study that complaint in detail during his residence at La Paz—a considerable town, 11,945 feet above the sea level. He took to his bed, attributing his ailments to excessive indulgence in good fare; but his doctor undeceived him, saying that new comers always suffered in that way, and that some of them made quick recoveries, while others continued more or less ill during the whole of their sojourn. He noted, too, that even the residents "when they come to walk uphill demonstrate by the rapidity of their breathing and the slowness of their gait that they, too, are affected by the diminished atmospheric pressure"; and, as was easy in a country so much given over to horse-racing, he observed that horses are even greater victims of the disorder than human beings. Every thousand feet above sea level, he was told, tells markedly upon a horse:—

Thus, taking Valparaiso and Santiago in Chile as instances, the racecourse of the latter being some 2,000 feet above that of the former, a horse trained at Valparaiso is found to be unable to win a race at Santiago against an equally good horse trained there. On the other hand, a horse trained at Santiago and brought down to Valparaiso is in perfect condition for racing there. Again, the lengths of races which a horse can run have to be reduced as the altitude increases. At La Paz, the greatest length that a horse can gallop is about five hundred metres, and that is a severe strain upon any animal that has not lived at La Paz for months before the race.

But will mountain-sickness prevent the climbing of the very highest mountains? That is a question which Sir Martin Conway does not answer confidently; but he shows that, in spite of the fact that a man may more or less get over it, the obstacle is very serious. It weakens the strongest, even though the acute symptoms pass, and, consequently the stages of ascent have to be continually abbreviated as higher altitudes are reached. The guarded conclusion is:—

This diminution of daily range will prove to be one of the most serious impediments, perhaps the most serious, to the attainment of the highest altitudes on the surface of the earth. Unfortunately for adventurous mountain explorers, the higher they rise the greater are many other factors of difficulty with which they have to contend. The cold at night increases very rapidly above 20,000 feet, and at anything like 24,000 feet it becomes a very serious matter indeed. Almost equally wearing to the system is the power of the sun by day, which, shining through the thin air, scorches the life out of a man in an appalling fashion. The difficulty of transport is another increasing impediment, for the higher you climb the less easy it is to find porters who can go with you, and the smaller are the loads they are able to bear. Lastly, the danger arising from bad weather is multiplied in almost geometrical progression the higher you go.

Possibly these difficulties may be overcome even to the point of climbing Mount Everest; but hardly for many years to come. Kanchanjanga is lower (27,280 feet), and approachable, and does not look appallingly difficult, but none of the mountaineers who have attempted it have ever got near the top.

BRUGES.

The latest addition to the Mediaeval Towns Series (J. M. Dent and Co., 4s. 6d.) is the STORY OF BRUGES, by Ernest Gilliat-Smith, with drawings of great artistic merit by Edith Calvert and Herbert Railton. The volume may be praised without reserve, both as a history and as a guide-book; and if we say that the drawings, numerous as they are, are not sufficiently numerous, we are not finding fault, but paying a compliment. The author himself is aware that the subject of Bruges cannot be exhausted within the prescribed limits of his book. It is a town of considerable size, with ramparts nearly five miles in circumference. We are not surprised that after living there for many years Mr. Gilliat-Smith finds that even now he does not know all its beauties. Bruges was not built in a day, and cannot be seen in a day. We note, however, for the benefit of the casual tourist, that the book contains a useful map, and that the last chapter suggests the best method of seeing as much as possible in the course of a few hours.

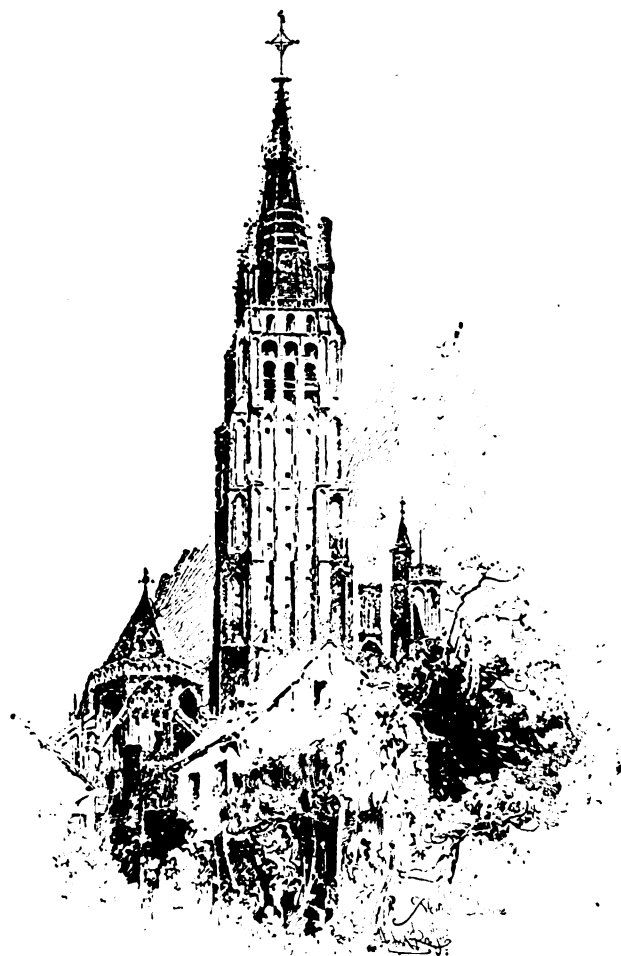

Except for these few practical hints, the work is devoted either to history or to architecture and painting. Mr. Gilliat-Smith traces the history of the town from the first beginnings of its civilization, through a good many scenes of primitive outrage and violence, to the end of the fifteenth century, when its decadence set in, and Antwerp superseded it as a centre of commerce. Its later history is only summarized. The earlier centuries, which saw the rise and prosperity of Bruges as a great trading community, are full of interest, for they include, besides much else that is romantic, the tragedy of the Erembalds, and the legend of Baldwin, Count of Flanders and

Emperor of Constantinople. It is not an easy history to follow, but it is told in a spirited manner, and as clearly as is practicable in a short compass. At the same time, it is rather a serious blot on our author's credit as an historian that he relates the whole story of Baldwin's reappearance as a hermit twenty years after his death without intimating that this surprising tale is not believed by serious writers. He describes it as "strange," but does not inform the reader that Baldwin redivivus is generally regarded as an impostor. In fact, Mr. Gilliat-Smith does not seem aware that the soi-disant Baldwin was ever charged with imposture, or was hanged as an impostor. Still, this lapse from historical virtue does not greatly affect the value of the book. One visits Bruges not for the sake of Count Baldwin, but for the architecture of one of the most picturesque towns in Europe. There is no doubt that had Bruges continued to prosper she would have lost her mediæval charm. Her merchant princes long ago became too poor to live in their palaces; had they remained, their houses would have been rebuilt in process of time, and many delightful examples of domestic architecture would have disappeared. Modern improvements, falsely so called, have done some mischief, but Bruges on the whole values itself on its antiquity, and does not move fast. "It took her twenty years," says the author, "to restore the Hôtel Gruthuise. Twenty-five years ago she decided to restore the western façade of Notre Dame. Between that time and this, the architect who was commissioned to undertake the work has submitted no fewer than twenty-five different plans. When the façade has actually fallen, and it is said that it cannot last much longer, perhaps those who are responsible for the delay will select one of them. We may take it, then, that mediæval Bruges will at all events last our day." Of the famous belfry, and of the great spire of the Cathedral, seven feet higher than that of Salisbury, much has been written. Mr.

Gilliat-Smith is at his best, perhaps, when he speaks of domestic architecture, of the Hôtel de Gruthuise, the Hôtel Bladelin, De Zeven Toren, the Ghistelhof, the Hôtel d'Adornes, and the Princenhof. And in the fifteenth century not only did the great burghers build splendid palaces for themselves, sumptuous within and beautiful without, but Even working men, humble members of the great guilds of smiths, or masons, or carpenters, were making their homes beautiful with the fruit of their handiwork; constructing canopied niches at street corners, or over the doorways of the hovels in which they lived, and placing in them graven images of Our Lady or of some favourite saint; hammering out exquisite lanterns, which it was their delight to hang before them, from brackets of no less dainty fashion; fabricating of wrought iron those quaintly beautiful trade signs by which it was their wont to call attention to their avocations; making door, and lintel, and chimney, and rafter comely with fruit and foliage, fascinating with heraldic devices, and grotesque and leering heads, and the images of devils and of saints.

Such was mediæval Bruges, thanks to the happy co-operation of wealth and art, and such, to some extent, it is at the present day. The pictorial art of Bruges has a chapter to itself, with carefully written accounts of ancient frescoes, early miniaturists, and the great fifteenth-century artists, Hubert Van Eyck, John Van Eyck, Gerard David, Roger Van Der Weyden, Dierick Boudts, and Hans Memline. In short, the book deserves more consideration than the author's modest preface claims for it.

BY THE IONIAN SEA.

A perusal of Mr. George Gissing's volume BY THE IONIAN SEA (Chapman and Hall, 16s.) naturally suggests a comparison thereof with the chapters of "Sensations d'Italie," which deal with Magna Græcia. Bourget's wanderings were considerably more widely extended and led him over more unfrequented and inaccessible ways than those attempted by Mr. Gissing, whose travels, indeed, amounted to nothing more ambitious than a steamboat voyage from Naples to Paola, a rough drive to Cosenza, a pilgrimage to the legendary tomb of Alaric, a railway journey along the coast as far as Taranto and then back to Reggio, at the "toe of the boot." But, in spite of the more ambitious scale of M. Bourget's work—of the extraordinary interest clinging to places like Oria and Lucera (unvisited by Mr. Gissing) with their memories of the splendid State maintained by Frederic II. and of his Saracen hordes, of the opportunity thus given for copious and apposite literary illustration—it certainly does not surpass in charm the volume before us. We doubt, indeed, whether M. Bourget equals Mr. Gissing in just appreciation of the episodes of travel, in comprehensive insight as to their attractions and in sympathetic delineation. Mr. Gissing possesses that happily constituted nature which is stirred by impetuous desire to visit in the flesh those famous spots whose names are linked with romantic and momentous events in the world's history. Perhaps the wisest are those who carefully plan their voyage to this and that renowned city, and wait and wait till Anno Domini tells them their day for such expeditions is past. Whether the more adventurous spirits who put their wishes into action choose the better part is a question which each one must answer according to his own temperament. In the final sentence of his book Mr. Gissing sighs for a life in which he might "wander endlessly amid the silence of the ancient world, to-day and all its sounds forgotten." These words were written when his Calabrian wanderings were over, when he was once more in comparative comfort and civilization at Reggio, and they are almost certainly infected with the spirit of forgiveness of past discomforts which possesses us when we are happy in the consciousness that we have done with them for good and all, and shall behold their ugly faces no more. This, however, is a matter which concerns Mr. Gissing himself; it was certainly a stroke of good luck for his readers that he did not listen to the gloomy vaticinations of his friends in Naples when he spoke of his journey to Calabria, or allow himself to be dissuaded therefrom. Every appreciative reader knows how to suffer with his author, to weep sympathetic tears over the troubles which beset travellers in the few by-ways now left in the world; and we, as we acknowledge Mr. Gissing's vicarious sacrifice on behalf of arm-chair explorers, can assure him that the result achieved by him has not been purchased too dearly, even though the price paid included the horrors of the inn at Squillace and the attack of fever at Cotrone.

Mr. Gissing has been known as a novel writer and a critic. We are not sure that he has not equal claims to distinction as a classical scholar. Certainly we doubt whether he has ever been so completely successful as in the issue of "By the Ionian Sea." He possesses to perfection the gift of being able to bring before the reader graphic and living pictures of the scenes he views and the people he meets, and to tint these pictures with exactly the due amount of subjective emotion, so that we find ourselves affected by the spell of stony wilderness, of gloomy forest, of mouldering walls, or of glittering sea, just as he himself was affected. Over Mr. Gissing's pages the reader can never forget that he is in the presence of a writer of subtle perception and exquisite literary gift. The book is full of masterpieces of prose writing—the dream which haunted his fevered brain at Cotrone, the discourse of the young men at the caffè at Catanzaro, and the miraculous story of the friar bound for Loreto, though, perhaps, the choicest of all is the apologia of his volume in the opening chapter:—

Every man has his intellectual desire; mine is to escape life as I know it and dream myself into that old world which was the imaginative delight of my boyhood. The names of Greece and Italy draw me as no others; they make me young again, and restore the keen impressions of that time when every new page of Greek or Latin was a new perception of things beautiful. The world of the Greeks and Romans is my land of Romance; a quotation in either language thrills me strangely, and there are passages of Greek and Latin verse which I cannot read without a dimming of the eyes, which I cannot repeat aloud because my voice fails me. In Magna Græcia the waters of two fountains mingle and flow together; how exquisite will be the draught!

It is a legitimate cause of congratulation that Mr. Gissing has demonstrated the ability of Englishmen to hold their own with the best of other lands in this particular field of literature; all the more because of the facile assent given by some of us to the claims of certain talented foreign writers to a foremost place. We hope that those who have been so generously appreciative of Bourget and Loti will condescend to read Mr. Gissing. We have said enough of the book itself; it is simply a delight, and with its beautiful illustrations and its excellent print and paper it is as well set as such a gem deserves.

ITALIAN CITIES.

ITALIAN CITIES. By EDWIN HOWLAND BLASHFIELD and EVANGELINE WILBOUR BLASHFIELD. 2 vols. (Bullen. 12s.)

NAPLES, PAST AND PRESENT. By ARTHUR A. NORWAY. With 40 Illustrations by Arthur G. Feraud. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE CITIES OF NORTHERN ITALY. By G. C. WILLIAMSON, Litt.D. (Grant Richards. 3s. 6d. n.)

The traveller is no longer able to wander about in wide-eyed ignorance, confining his knowledge to the habits of porters and hotel-keepers; it is becoming almost impossible to avoid taking some amount of intelligent interest in the cities traversed, and this is due to the writers of books like those before us. If they continue, travelling will cease to be fashionable; for the great world does not like having to read and observe and, worst of all, to think. "Italian Cities" is a good example of the book that lures you into knowing things you never expected to know, making buildings delightful and even history interesting to the holiday-maker. The authors know their subject, and they write in a quiet, vivid way, using that restrained, sympathetic style which throws over one the glamour of the past and focusses the mind upon beautiful things. The two volumes consist of a collection of short essays that seem to have been written to the length of magazine articles and then strung together to form chapters of a book; such a form is easy to read and convenient to travel with. They deal mostly with the less frequented but not least interesting of Italian towns, with Siena and Ravenna, Parma, Perugia and Spoleto, Mantua and Assisi, and the heart of the reviewer grows bitter within him for envy. Florence and Rome also have several essays, but these are in the way of side-lights, such as "Raphael in Rome" and "In Florence with Romola." Here is a fragment, taken at random, for an illustration of their style:—

For, with all its beauty, her little church stands as a monument to three invasions, and to the beginning of such slaughter, misery, and depopulation as the world has not seen before or since. The little church is under the invocation of Saints Nazarius and Celsus, is only forty-six feet long by forty broad, and upon the outside might be taken for some house in which the workmen were wont to lay away their tools at night. Inside it is as if one had crept into the heart of a sapphire. Blue, the blue that glistens jewel-like on the peacock's neck, is the prevailing colour, with great gold disks and drinking stags and dull red borderings.

Very different is Mr. Norway, much more of a journalist and rather less of an artist. History to him is rather the occasion of telling stories, and he tells them in great multitude; he is lively and chatty, profuse rather than discriminating in his descriptions, and popular in his methods and ideas; but he has worked with love and diligence at his subject, and the book deserves to be well read. The traveller to Naples will find a great deal of information in the book, which in its 360 pages finds room for chapters on many of the neighbouring places—Vesuvius and Pompeii, Castellammare, Capri, and the rest. The eruptions of Vesuvius and the blue grotto at Capri are vividly described, nor are such antiquities as the ruins at Pæstum forgotten. There are a good many illustrations, carefully done in wash, but Mr. Ferard is not Mr. Pennell.

Dr. Williamson's "The Cities of Northern Italy" belongs to the series of historical handbooks originally planned by the late Mr. Grant Allen. He only lived to write the first four volumes of the series. Dr. Williamson, who takes up the task, carries out his friend's idea of "button-holing the tourist, and directing his attention at once to what he should certainly see in a town, and to what concerns the history of that town." Dr. Williamson, as our readers know, is a writer of experience, and as editor of Messrs. Bell's series on Great Artists has been brought into contact with many leading critics on Italian art. He is familiar with the writings and opinions of Morelli, of Mr. Berenson, and other well-known authorities, and has devoted much careful labour to the present work, which cannot fail to be of use to the intelligent traveller in North Italy. In his account of Milan we are glad to see that he devotes especial attention to the Castello of the Sforzas, that magnificent pile which has been so admirably restored during the last few years by the municipality of Milan, assisted by the self-sacrificing exertions of generous and patriotic citizens, and which is certainly one of the finest Renaissance palaces still in existence. Dr. Williamson's account of the tombs and churches of Verona, of the wonderful mosaics and basilicas of Ravenna, and his descriptions of Giotto's frescoes in the Arena Chapel at Padua and of Francia's altar-pieces at Bologna are especially to be commended. We venture, however, to point out a few mistakes and omissions, which ought to be rectified in future editions. In our author's notes on the galleries of Milan, for instance, we find no mention of Piero della Francesca's noble Madonna with Duke Federico of Urbino kneeling at her feet, or of that lovely profile-portrait in the Ambrosiana which, after being long ascribed to Leonardo, is now generally recognized as the masterpiece of Ambrogio de Predis. Again, in his chapter on Padua, Dr. Williamson dismisses Mantegna's great frescoes in the church of the Eremitani in a few lines, without even giving us an account of the subjects represented in these immortal works. And, still more strangely, there is absolutely no allusion in his pages to the famous Scuola del Santo at Padua, with its beautiful paintings by Titian and his comrades, surely some of the finest specimens of Venetian art of the period. As a rule Dr. Williamson's historical facts and dates are careful and accurate. We may, however, remark that Beatrice d'Este, the short-lived wife of Lodovico Sforza, was not buried in the Certosa of Pavia, as we read at p. 121, but in the Moro's favourite sanctuary of Santa Maria delle Grazie, where Solario's splendid monument to her memory was raised soon after her death and only removed to the Certosa in the following century. In conclusion, we would direct our reader's attention to the excellent practical hints contained in the author's preface. To treat Italians of all ranks with courtesy and civility, to be reverent in churches and pilgrimage shrines, above all to follow without a murmur the universal custom of bestowing small tips on custodi and facchini, will add materially to the traveller's comfort and enjoyment.

GUIDE-BOOKS.

ABOUT GREAT BRITAIN.

Surrey.

The latest addition to Dent's County Guides, which are being published under the general editorship of Prof. George Dewar, is SURREY, by Walter Jerrold (Dent, 4s. 6d. n.). Besides the seven pleasant and comprehensive itineraries by Mr. Jerrold, the guide-book contains special articles on the Bird Life, by John A. Bucknill; on Our Surrey Flowers, by Edward Step; on Entomology, by the Rev. E. J. Vernon; on the Geology, by Prof. Edward Hull; on Cycling in Surrey, with a list of twenty-five routes, by Duncan Tovey; and a useful, if not very exhaustive, Gazetteer. Illustrations by J. A. Symington and a map of the county at a scale of some three miles to the inch complete as handy and trustworthy a guide as could be desired. It has the merit of being readable without being loosely gossipy; the ground has been carefully "perambulated" quite recently, and the author writes with genuine enthusiasm. He is, apparently, neither a cyclist nor a horticulturist, but he treats both wheelmen and gardeners at least with toleration. He has an eye as much for the recent literary associations of the county as for its better-known history, and advances opinions with a most commendable modesty. He speaks of the Osmunda regalis as a flowering fern, as if all ferns did not flower, and has probably borrowed the epithet "flower" from those who really mean the spore-clusters; and he is commendably out of sympathy with the Ripley-road cyclist who cares nothing for byways. There is an occasional looseness of description, however, as, for example, when the author speaks of the heath at Weybridge as "the common." There are a heath, a common, and a green in this favoured village. The author also says there is "nothing particularly attractive" in the short walk from Weybridge to Addlestone, but to a literary man there is Queen Anne's farm, a good specimen of English farmhouse architecture, and the scene in which the opening chapters of Mr. George Meredith's "Rhoda Fleming" are laid. The tradition that Wycliffe once preached under the "crouch oak" at Addlestone is also among exploded local traditions. Ottershaw might also be accorded the honour of possessing one of the finest views in the neighbourhood and one of the best of modern village churches. It might also be recorded that both Addlestone (in which the authors of "Dod's Peerage" lived for many years and where "Shirt-collar" Hall collected a remarkable amount of artistic booty) and Chertsey are full of Dickens associations, and that the house in Guildford-street, Chertsey, opposite Cowley-house, was that in which "Our Mutual Friend" was written. We can hardly accept the author's statement that the planting of yew trees along the Pilgrims' Way served to supply material for the weapons of those who were conveying tin from the mines in Cornwall to the Isle of Thanet for shipment to the Continent. But for the romantic story of the Pilgrims' Way we already have Mrs. Ady's book (noticed on another page) and are waiting for Mr. Hueffer's promised book. We cannot expect complete accuracy in a guide, and, careful as Mr. Jerrold has been, he is not always unassailable; but on the whole the information is both concise and well presented. He at least puts the local cabdriver in Hindhead right, and properly locates the Devil's Punch Bowl. He writes with enthusiasm and he writes well. He appears, however, to have failed to remark the chief characteristic of a Surrey landscape—that almost every fine view is dominated by a modern red-brick villa.

Black's New Guide-books.

Having regard to the provision made for us by enterprising publishers of books telling us where to travel and how to travel, it is difficult to realize how our grandfathers and grandmothers managed to perambulate Europe, as it is certain they did in large numbers after the opening up of the Continent as the result of the Waterloo Peace. Paterson's "Roads," which went through many editions during the first thirty years of the last century, served, not altogether badly, the purposes of the English tourist, who of course travelled entirely by road. But for him who would see the beauties of Switzerland and the Rhine and the old and interesting cities of Flanders and Germany there was little or no organized provision until the "Murrays" came into the field in the early years of Queen Victoria's reign. So far as English-speaking travellers on the Continent are concerned, Murray's "Hand-books" were the only available publications until the Baedeker books made serious encroachments on the Albemarle-street preserve, as also did, later, the volumes issued from Edinburgh by A. and C. Black, some new volumes as well as some new editions of which have reached us.

Among new editions received are SCOTLAND (cheap edition), THE TROSSACHS, CORNWALL, SURREY, and the CHANNEL ISLANDS. They do not call for any particular mention, being, indeed, all of them well known; but the special feature of the new editions now before us is the large increase in the number and great improvement in the quality of the maps. Most of these are by Bartholomew, a guarantee of excellence, but it is easy to detect which are not by Bartholomew, and we would suggest that these should be gradually weeded out as opportunity offers. Nothing is more distracting to a traveller, after having got up one map and become familiar with its marks and symbols and scale, than to find, when he gets to his next town, that he has to use a map with different symbols, in which streets and buildings, and so on, are differently shaded and coloured, or not coloured at all. A comparison of the map of the Tintagel district with the Tamar district which follows only eighteen pages further on in the "Cornwall" book will indicate what we mean. The only other remark we would make about the new editions applies to the "Channel Islands"; we think it a mistake to mix up the Channel Islands with West Normandy. The Channel Islands form a tourist district by themselves. Many people go thither with no wish or intention to find themselves afterwards in France. Similarly West Normandy fits in much more naturally with East Normandy. In other words, Normandy is a single province which does not lend itself to separation into two parts, whilst it is much more accessible from England via Dieppe and Caen than via Jersey, &c.

Turn we now to the new "Blacks." These are exclusively British, and are designated THE SCOTT COUNTRY, BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, TWENTY MILES AROUND LONDON SOUTH, and WEST KENT. The first of these is not in the technical sense of the word a guide-book at all, but is rather a gossiping account of Sir Walter Scott as an individual, with a large number of pictures of places and people associated with him or his books. The author, Mr. W. S. Crockett, without intending exactly to write a formal life of Scott, yet practically has done so, weaving in also geographical and historical matter. The reader is not avowedly invited to get up either the poet's life or the geography and history of the Borderland, yet when he has reached the last page of Mr. Crockett's very instructive book he will find himself well up in all three subjects. In Black's "Buckinghamshire," by Mr. G. E. Milton, we have a volume which, to use a threadbare phrase, "meets an acknowledged want," for the county, one of the most interesting in England, has been strangely neglected. It is quite true, as the author says, that, considering its proximity to London, Buckinghamshire is very little known to the tourist or cyclist except as regards a strip of country along the southern border which abuts on the Thames. He rightly points out that the ordinary tourist who simply crosses Buckinghamshire in order to get, say, from London to Oxford, altogether misses the many picturesque villages and rural views which respectively characterize the Vale of Aylesbury and the Chiltern Hills, and which he justly remarks "may easily challenge comparison with the far more celebrated beauties of Surrey." He describes the numerous historical associations of the county both in Saxon times and during the Civil War of the seventeenth century, and the variety and interesting features of much of the church architecture of the county. The plan of the book is based upon roads and not districts; and it is assumed that travellers wishing to "get up" Buckinghamshire will do so first of all by working along the main roads from London, and, secondly, by following the roads radiating from the three principal towns of Aylesbury, Buckingham, and Newport Pagnell. Each part has a chapter devoted to it, divided, where necessary, into two sections. The first section refers to some main road and the second to the excursions to be made from any town on the road. We are not quite sure that this method of dividing up a country is altogether the best. It presupposes satisfactory inns at the sleeping centres, and it is not certain that the tourist will find them just where he wants them in Buckinghamshire. Nevertheless, the author has worked out his scheme very carefully. The maps are very good. The only other criticism we have to make is that the author has, we think, not given sufficient prominence to the railway connexions of Buckinghamshire, and has catered too much for the irrepressible cyclist. In the metropolitan area "West Kent" and "Twenty Miles around London South" deal very sufficiently with the localities named, from a cyclist's point of view; but here again we must point out that, in spite of the popularity of the wheel, there are other people who travel besides cyclists. We note this because the following sentence in Mr. Moncrieff's "West Kent" sounds discouraging :—" With the railway routes we have been much less concerned, their travellers sitting in not so much need of guidance." This last phrase is not only cminous but curious. The limits of the book are Rochester and beyond to Faversham ; Maidstone and beyond to Ashford ; and Tunbridge Wells to Crowborough and Ashdown Forest, and therefore the author makes the words " West Kent " cover a good deal more than most geographers do.

" Twenty Miles around London South " is also by Mr. Moncrieff and follows the same lines as the volume we have just mentioned. London South, indeed, overlaps " West Kent " because it extends as far as Gravesend. We doubt whether the inhabitants of Bickley, many of whom pay rents of over £300 a year, will feel flattered by being told that Bickley is " a place of cottages of gentility." The railway information is again defective both as regards clearness of statement and details of distances. To take one case out of many ; on p. 67 there is the sentence :—" There are several ways to Richmond and countless trains." This oracular statement, even with the five lines which follow it, is wholly insufficient to help the stranger from the North coming to London for the first time and wishing to find himself at Richmond. Mr. Moncrieff's railway information, such as it is, is a sort of " Memoria Technica " to remind people of things they already know. A good guide-book should explain unknown things to people who know nothing. The maps, as in the case of all these new " Blacks," are admirable in every sense.

The nineteenth revised and amplified edition of Black's guide to GLASGOW (1s.) is, of course, an Exhibition Edition. The Exhibition is dealt with in some ten pages of text ; there is a coloured plan of the grounds, and there are various views of the buildings. The ground covered includes not only the city and suburbs, but also Paisley, the Burns Country, Arran, Bute, Loch Fyne, &c.

Kebleland.

Hursley and its neighbourhood cannot be understood by the hasty bicyclist who rides over for an afternoon, leaves his machine at the village publichouse, and strolls round to look at the church and parsonage. It would be almost sacrilege to treat the home of John Keble in this way. Over the spired church with its three eastern windows rising out of the broad green spaces of God's acre, over which creep the long shadows of the trees resting gently now on one tombstone now on another, as

The sunbeams weave a parting crown
For some sweet woodland nest, there hangs a gentle atmosphere of hallowed religious tradition. It will not reveal itself to the passing sightseer. A Sunday should be spent there. The chime of the village bell, the holy calm of the day, the long, quiet afternoon of which the poet of Hursley wrote—

Deep is the silence as of summer noon
When a soft shower
Will trickle soon ;
A gracious rain, freshening the weary bower.
O, sweetly then far off is heard
The clear note of some lonely bird

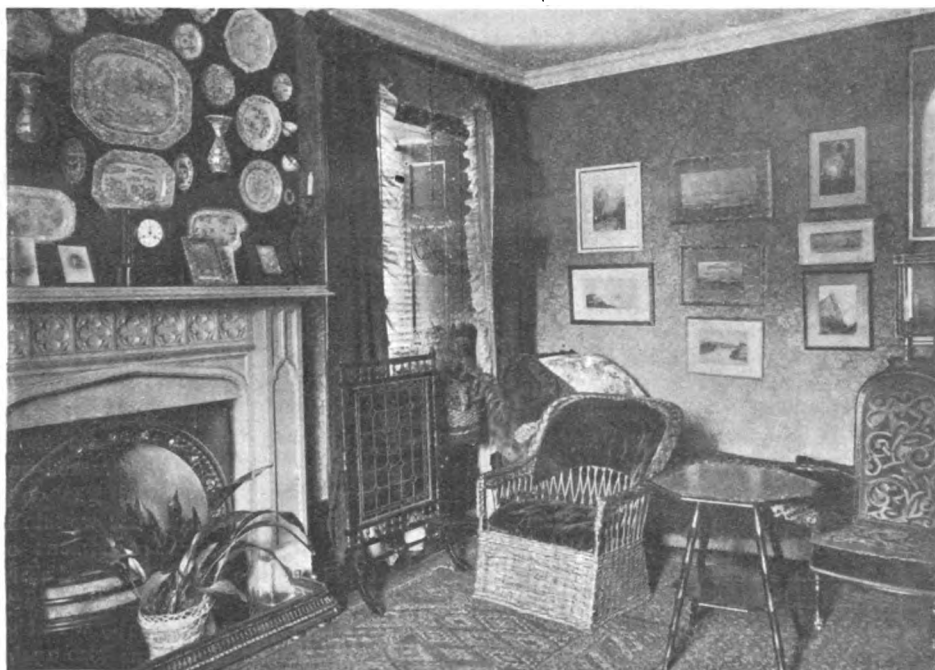

--all this is needed for him who would learn the secret of the home of Keble. It will bring back old memories, as it did to Pendennis, to whom as a child his mother used to " whisper with awe the verses of the ' Christian Year.' "

Faint, very faint, and seldom in after life Pendennis heard that solemn church music ; but he always loved the remembrance of it, and of the times when it struck on his heart and he walked over the fields, full of hope and void of doubt, as the church bells rang on Sunday morning.

IN KEBLELAND (Winchester : Warren and Son), edited by Mr. W. T. Warren, the visitor to Hursley and its neighbourhood will find such information as he wants, with many views and a map of the district ; and the compiler has wisely devoted some five or six pages to well-chosen examples of Keble's nature poetry. They show on the one hand the remoteness from the life of his day which marked the poet of the Anglican revival, and on the other his tender and intimate appreciation of nature. The evening carol of the robin in the quiet churchyard will remind the visitor of the lines which sum up the spirit of Keble—

Sweet messenger of " calm decay,"
Saluting sorrow as you may,
As one still bent to find or make the best :
In thee, and in this quiet mead,
The lesson of sweet peace I read,
Rather in all to be resigned than blest.

Strange that in this very churchyard, sacred to the memory of so musical and cultured a religious poet, should lie the remains of Sternhold, who helped to turn the Psalms of David into prose—metrical prose, indeed, but prose nevertheless. It was characteristic of the gentle judgment of Keble that, as Mr. Warren says, " Sternhold's adherence to the original was respected by Keble." More in harmony with the spirit of Hursley is the memory of Charlotte Yonge at the neighbouring village of Otterbourne, which was also under the charge of Keble. To her father William Crawley Yonge, to Sir William Heathcote of Hursley, and to Keble himself, was due the restoration of the churches of Hursley and of Otterbourne. There are many other links with the past at Hursley. At the end of a long grass walk in Hursley Park stands a dial which bears upon it the coat of arms of the Cromwells. The first Sir William Heathcote purchased the estate from the daughters of Richard Cromwell, who had retired to live at Hursley, glad to be relieved of the cares of his brief period of sovereignty. When the old house of Hursley Park was taken down, a lump of metal was found in a crevice of the wall, which proved to be the die of the seal of the Commonwealth. There is much else to be investigated by the visitor to this quiet and beautiful country, and he will do well to provide himself with Mr. Warren's pleasant book.

Ward, Lock's Shilling Guides.

Messrs. Ward, Lock contribute to our collection new editions of several of their Shilling Pictorial Guides. We have before us LONDON, THE DONEGAL HIGHLANDS, THE ISLE OF WIGHT, LOWESTOFT, OBAN, FORT WILLIAM AND THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS, THE ENGLISH LAKES, and LLANDUDNO AND THE NORTHERN SECTION OF NORTH WALES. The maps are moderately good, and the photographs are very good. Excellence in both departments was hardly to be expected for the price. Whether you prefer Black to Ward, Lock or Ward, Lock to Black depends upon whether maps or photographs are of more importance to you. The merits of the latter vary from one guide to another. On the whole the smaller the area dealt with the greater the merit shown. For this reason the guides to London and to Belgium and Holland are the least satisfactory. On the other hand, for certain of the centres of interest in the British Isles the Ward, Lock guides are excellent, pleasant to read as well as agreeable to look at; and they have a special claim to our regard in the attention which they pay to literary associations. In the case of the Lake District, of course, these are obvious enough; but they are generally dug out for us in cases in which they are not so obvious. In the case of the Isle of Wight, for instance, we read all about the Dairy Man's Daughter, though the writer reasonably doubts whether many of the visitors to Arreton "have the faintest idea of the life story of this excellent young woman," and about "Little Jane," and about their biographer, the Rev. Legh Richmond, sometime curate of Brading. In the case of Lowestoft, again, we are asked to "leave for a while the pleasures of the beach to wander among the haunts of George Borrow at Oulton, and on to the quaint and peaceful Blundeston, with its little church where the juvenile David Copperfield used to make unwilling attendance, and at whose sundial he would look when the sun shone, and think within himself, 'Is the sundial glad, I wonder, that it can tell the time again!'" while the Oban guide refers us to Scott, and Christopher North, and Macaulay, and Mr. Andrew Lang, and the Llandudno guide has memories of Mrs. Hemans, and "Monk" Lewis, and Charles Kingsley. There are worse occupations for a rainy afternoon than turning over a parcel of these guides.

Malvern.

No section of England deserves a good guide-book better than do the Malvern Hills. They make a better show for their size than any other hills anywhere, and they abound in remains geological and otherwise, the long-haired rhinoceros having left his bones upon their slopes and Caractacus a camp upon their summit. Moreover, they are the headquarters of the water-cure, invented by the father of Mr. Speaker Gully, who figures as "Dr. Gulson" in "It is Never too Late to Mend," and they are the centre whence excursionists radiate to Worcester, Hereford, and Tewkesbury. All these matters, together with kindred matters, are set forth in THE MALVERN COUNTRY (Methuen, 3s.), by Mr. Bertram C. A. Windle. The book is of handy size, so that it can easily be slipped into the pocket. It has excellent drawings, mostly of architecture, by Mr. Edmund H. New. It abounds with information about the things to be seen, and with apposite quotations from old authors. Particularly entertaining is the glimpse of the old Malvern, when the water-cure was in its prime, taken from "Three Weeks in Wet Sheets: Being the Diary and Doings of a Moist Visitor to Malvern," who describes the female pilgrims to the source of health:—

Bound over and immediately in front of their bonnets were those blue calashes or shades which are known in the place, and perhaps elsewhere, by the popular name of "uglies." In one hand they carried a flat Graffenberg tumbler for the purpose of drinking water at every road or mountain rill they came to, while in the other they stoutly clutched a tall ash staff, some six feet long, with a sharp iron spike at the end.

A delightful addition to the "Little Guides."

Pearson's Gossipy Guides.

Of shilling guides for various localities in England there seems an unending supply. The newest candidates for public favour are the ILLUSTRATED GOSSIPY GUIDE-BOOKS adventured by Messrs. Pearson. Three are before us dealing with GLASGOW, BOURNEMOUTH, and IFRACOMBE respectively. The illustrations and maps are excellent, and the information is given in a crisp and condensed form, but the editor of "Glasgow" exhibits a lofty superiority to such matters as miles and the convenient sequence of places as they would turn up from hour to hour. A prudent and calculating traveller who likes to look before he leaps will probably feel that too much is left to chance and his imagination in the matter of distances. There is, moreover, in all these books a prodigal use of black-faced type which rather defeats its own end. There seems no sense, from a tourist's point of view, in underlining such phrases as "34 acres" (p. 23), or "piscatorial sport" (p. 51), or "hunted deer" (p. 92), the latter being one of the things which Mary Queen of Scots did. On p. 120 we notice a curious statement which applies to an arrangement probably unique. At one time adjoining a chapel in Buteshire there were two churchyards, one for men and the other for women. The tradition is that this was to punish the female sex for one of its representatives who refused to carry some consecrated earth from Rome to Scotland. The Ifracombe and Bournemouth volumes seem put together on somewhat different principles and are distinctly better than the Glasgow book. All are copiously illustrated and mapped.

Cathedrals.

We have reviewed a good many books in Bell's Cathedral Series. So far as we remember they have all merited praise. Now we have a volume in the same format (1s. 6d. n.) intended as a collective guide to all the Cathedrals—AN ITINERARY OF THE ENGLISH CATHEDRALS, compiled by Dr. James G. Gilchrist of Iowa, and edited, with an introduction on Cathedral Architecture, by the Rev. T. Perkins. Conditions of space have prevented the compiler from doing full justice to his subject. Truro Cathedral, for example, is dismissed in fifteen lines, and even Canterbury only gets about a page and a half. At least, however, the book gives explicit directions for getting from one Cathedral to the next—no small consideration for the sightseer in a hurry—and the architectural essay is just the sort of thing that the beginner wants.

London.

PHILIP'S PRACTICAL "INDEX" GUIDE TO LONDON, by W. O. Aves (Philip, 1s.), is an array of names, figures, and hieroglyphics. It looks something like a Civil Service Stores price list, but all is fully explained in the preface:—

Let us assume the Visitor wishes to go to Thornton Avenue. The Index and Map number is 256, and in Section D, page 87, it will be seen as a turning from Sternhold Avenue, which is closely adjacent to the Streatham Hill R.S. (Railway Station). Eight half-miles show its distance to be rather over four miles from Westminster Bridge Road. The Cyclist may see that there is a gradual ascent from 12', 15', 31', 53', 91' to 179 feet. The intending Resident may judge of its healthful position. Having seen its locality and distance, we now inform the Visitor how to get there. The Double Lines indicate that a service of Trams passes Sternhold Avenue, and upon the next page, 88, by the number 256 (already ascertained), will be seen the Rail, Tram, and Bus Routes affording the most direct facilities. The Rail Route, 25 (page 110), shows a service of Trains either from London Bridge, Addison Road, or Victoria. The Tram Routes (page 113) show services from Blackfriars Road, Westminster Bridge Road, or Old Kent Road. The Bus Routes (page 114) would be less direct for the full journey. If a Cab be preferred, say from the beginning of Kennington Road to Robsart Street (255), the fare would be 1/- for two miles; to 52, Brixton Hill (256), a distance of three miles, the fare would be 1/6.

This is very careful and very useful, save for those impatient and haphazard people who would prefer to "ask a policeman."

For the Cyclist.

The office of Messrs. G. Philip and Son in Fleet-street is a storehouse of treasures for the cycling Londoner. They have an admirable new map of the ENVIRONS OF LONDON—an area for which the old maps soon become inadequate—on the scale of an inch to the mile, and extending from Epping on the north to Cobham on the south. Apart from its use to the cyclist, it gives with its extraordinary network of new streets in the suburbs a remarkable object-lesson on the growth of London. Another new Cycling Map (coloured) is THE DISTRICT NORTH-WEST OF LONDON—3·15 miles to the inch—which, so successfully has the cyclist annihilated space, extends as far as Birmingham. Messrs. Philips, however, do not, of course, confine themselves to London, and among their later publications we can recommend THE CYCLIST'S GUIDE TO THE LAKE DISTRICT—a district which it is a mistake to look upon as not suitable for cycling. It is, in a small compass, extremely practical and detailed, with a general map and a separate little map for each route, and careful instructions as to what the cyclist can or cannot, and should or should not, do. Another new coloured Map, 3·15 miles to the inch, is that of the SHEFFIELD DISTRICT.

Few books of topography deserved better of the public than Mrs. Ady's THE PILGRIMS' WAY, which appeared nine years ago, and we are delighted to see a new edition of it. Mrs. Ady is a careful student and a pleasant writer, and proves a delightful guide along that path of old Romance winding over the Surrey Hills and through the quiet Kentish meadows which the villagers still speak of as "the Pilgrims' Way." Mr. Quinton's illustrations, of which we reproduce one, are exceptionally good.

The Oxford tourist or extensionist must have a good head to remember all the interesting historical and architectural details that ALDEN'S SIXPENNY GUIDE TO OXFORD can tell him. The gift of the new Radcliffe Library, in the grounds of the University Museum, to which we referred last week, is the most important of a few new facts that are duly recorded in its twenty-seventh edition, and among the new illustrations the Camera from St. Mary's Entry is the most interesting.

Messrs. Upcott Gill send us the twenty-fourth issue of their well-known SEASIDE WATERING PLACES (2s. 6d.), a substantial and informing guide to holiday resorts on the coasts of England and Wales.

The Homeland Association, founded in 1897, has done good work in collecting and publishing useful information about the towns and country districts of Great Britain and Ireland. Its HOMELAND HANDBOOKS give a great deal of information, and are written by a well-qualified author. DULVERTON and ROCHESTER have just been issued, and a little book on EPSOM is soon coming, with an introduction by "A. R."—initials which "veil the identity of an eminent Englishman." Twenty books have been published, all dealing with England, and as funds will permit other books will be issued. All Ireland and Scotland is waiting to be treated. The address of the association is 24, Bride-lane, Fleet-street, London, E.C.

Mr. Charles Eyre Pascoe deserves much credit for his enterprise in issuing (from the office of London To-day) his series of HOLIDAY LEAFLETS—i.e., very attractive little pamphlets at a penny each, giving illustrated accounts of "trips" to different parts of England. They are not detailed guides, but provide just what you want to read in the train on a day's outing about the place you are going to. The first five of the "Great Northern Series" take us to the Dukeries, Cromer and the Broads, Lincolnshire, the Yorkshire Coast, and Some Northern Health Resorts; while a twopenny one tells the country cousin how to make a trip to London. These booklets are just the thing for societies, clubs, schools, and employers of labour when outings on a large scale are in contemplation.

Tourist Programmes.

The railway companies continue to increase their useful and often attractive tourist publications. HOLIDAYS IN EASTERN COUNTIES is another of Mr. Percy Lindley's delightful guide-books, published by the Great Eastern Railway Company. In shape it is like an album of pictures, and it is, in fact, full of pictures—real pictures as well as photographs—the ground covered including Burnham-on-Crouch, Dedham Vale, Mundesley, Ware, King's Lynn, Burnham Thorpe, as well as all the obvious places. The letterpress is subordinated to the illustrations, but what there is of it has that pleasant, informal, literary tone to which one is used in all Mr. Lindley's guide-books. He is the ideal gossip to pilot you through pleasant places, and he always mentions, as it were, by accident, the practical things you need to know. This company, too, is just issuing a special pamphlet on "East Anglian Golf Links"—a good idea; and their "Farmhouse and Country Lodgings" book is brought up to date. Another little pocket publication gives information as to fairs, racing, cricket, and fishing. The most artistic book of the Great Eastern Country is Mr. Payne Jennings' PHOTO PICTURES IN EAST ANGLIA (the Studio, Ashstead; and Messrs. Jarrold, 2s. 6d. and 1s. 6d.). Mr. Payne Jennings' photographs are known to most of us, and this book will be welcome either as a guide or a memento.

The Midland Railway Company, besides its usual programmes of arrangements, issues a pamphlet descriptive of its main route and recalling its name in the title, "Choose Aye the Middle Course!" (2d.). It contains a good collection of photographs.

The London and North-Western Railway invites the tourist to Ireland by a useful handbook with many good photographs written by Mr. F. W. Crossley, and called "Visit Ireland." It also issues an Illustrated Guide to its main route, and two booklets with capital photographs on "Dovedale" (apropos of the new Buxton and Ashbourne Railway) and "Greenore." A very well printed little pamphlet comes from the Caledonian Railway called "A Holiday in Scotland," with special reference to the Glasgow Exhibition. The Midland Railway's "Country and Seaside Holidays" is a very pretty book, with photographs and talk about the Midlands; and in the same style are the "Seaside and Country Lodgings" and the "East Coast Express Route to Scotland," issued by the Great Northern and North-Eastern, and the "Summer Tours in the Land of Burns," which comes from the Glasgow and South-Western Railway. A more extensive work, bound in cloth with abundance of maps, is the "Official Guide to the South-Eastern and Chatham Railway," which embraces the Continental routes. Dr. Lunn makes an interesting pictorial pamphlet out of his "Summer Holidays, 1901." There are capital photographs in "Weymouth" (procureable for 1s. post free from the town clerk of Weymouth), a publication of the Health Resorts Development Association.

ON THE CONTINENT.

Switzerland.

The new edition of Black's GUIDE TO SWITZERLAND (3s. 6d.) is announced as "really a new book." It is written by the Rev. W. A. B. Coolidge, and has a cycling supplement by Mr. C. L. Freeston, well-known as an authority upon the subject. Mr. Coolidge has made Switzerland in general and the High Alps in particular the study of a lifetime, and has also had a great deal of practice in writing guide-books. In the one before us he is handicapped by lack of space; but he has done wonderfully well considering the restrictions imposed upon him. He can describe nothing at length; but it is remarkable how much he manages to indicate, and how little he is obliged to leave out. He gives us the highways in big print and the byways in small; and we know of no better guide-book from which to get a synoptic view of tourist possibilities and select a route or a resting place. For use on the spot some larger guide would be preferable. This guide does not actually show you the way over such minor passes as the Gries, the Sannetsch, or the Pas de Cheville. It merely tells you that there is a way, and it does not tell you when you can dispense with the assistance of a guide—a too discreet avoidance of responsibility. Mr. Freeston, in his part of the book, is not so timid. He plumps for "coasting" down the passes—a pastime which, if we may judge from the thrilling narrative of Mrs. Pennell, who has done it, is not entirely devoid of peril. The limitations of his plan prevent Mr. Coolidge from displaying much of that erudition which is his strongest point; but he manages to give us an occasional glimpse of it. Messrs. Black also send us a new edition of their RIVIERA.

Every year seems to bring new editions of Mr. Whymper's Guides to CHAMONIX and ZERMATT (Murray, 3s. n. each). Our principal sentiment in contemplating them is one of astonishment that no one produces similar guides to those other great centres Grindelwald and Pontresina. For, as we have often said before, they are the very models of what a sectional Alpine guide, not exclusively addressed to climbers, should be. We trust it is true that Mr. Coolidge has taken Grindelwald in hand, and has got his work pretty forward, as we lately heard. But the case of Pontresina is not much less urgent. It is a happy thought on Mr. Whymper's part to draw attention, in his preface, to the additions and innovations made in the new issues.

Messrs. Cook's Guides to SWITZERLAND and to HOLLAND, BELGIUM, THE RHINE, AND THE BLACK FOREST (3s. 6d.) each are old friends. They are straightforward, businesslike, clearly printed, lucidly written, and fairly well mapped; but they are not much use to travellers who want to leave the beaten track, and the history is dubious in places. Farel, the Genevan reformer, is repeatedly spoken of as Favel; the Escalade is represented as an incident in a war, whereas it was an attempt to rush the City in time of peace; and the version given of the Pilatus legend is told with inaccuracy. The story is not, as the guide says, that Pilate, filled with remorse, fled there for refuge, but, as may be read in a work of Jacobus de Voragine quoted in Conrad Gesner's "Descriptio Montis Fraeti juxta Lucernam," that, after Pilate had committed suicide, his body was deposited in the little Pilatus lake, where "certain diabolic ebullitions and machinations are still seen." Whereupon the robust and sensible Gesner comments: "This belief, having no raison d'être in the laws of nature, commands no credence from me."

CYCLING IN THE ALPS, by C. L. Freeston (Grant Richards), is a book we reviewed last year, but in a Guide Book Number we may draw attention to it again. It pilots the wheelman over the Stelvio, the Bernina, the Fluela, the Albula, the Julier, the Maloja, the Schyn, the Oberalp, the Furka, the Grimsel, and some other passes. It is severely practical, and it has twenty-four full-page drawings by A. R. Quinton, many of them showing the most alarming zig-zags.

There is a new Baedeker (thirteenth edition) to BELGIUM AND HOLLAND (Dulau, 6s.). It would help the reviewer if the new editions had new prefaces, drawing attention to alterations and repairs. As it is we can only take Mr. Baedeker's word for it that we have before us a "revised and augmented" publication. It ought to be further revised and augmented by the inclusion of full particulars concerning the direct route from Blackwall to Rotterdam, and thence up the Rhine. This is really one of the cheapest passenger services in the world. Incredible as it sounds, you can go by it from London to Cologne for 14s. 6d. Yet the guide-books are almost unanimously silent on the subject. Messrs. Ward, Lock include BELGIUM AND HOLLAND in their Shilling Pictorial Guides.

We have to thank Messrs. Newnes for Vol. III. of THE TRAVELLER (10s. 6d. n.). It appears opportunely at the hour when we are all considering where to go, whether to make merry or merely to repair the wasted tissues. This handsome volume, with its unique collection of photographs, should assist our choice—if it does not perplex it. Its great usefulness consists in its various information about the many unspoiled beauty spots of the Continent. We do a little in the way of travelling ourselves (or this book would not have been intrusted to the reviewer who is rejoicing in it), but we have learnt a good deal from it that we did not know before—alike about the Tyrol, the Riviera, Norway, the Engadine, and the Pyrenees. The letter-press is good, without being too good for the multitude, and the practical indications, more particularly about the cheaper hotels and pensions, form a most serviceable supplement to the guide book. It is the sort of book that any traveller would welcome as a birthday present; while, if he pays the price demanded, he will probably recoup himself by the hints which he will pick up.

There is also a Black's guide to PARIS (1s.), excellent for the price, and adequate for the needs of the tourist whose stay in the city is short, and who does not desire recondite information.

It is impossible to learn French pronunciation without practical help; but those who know something of its principles will find Mr. H. Swan's TRAVELLERS' COLLOQUIAL FRENCH useful (Nutt, 1s., sixth edition, enlarged and revised). The formal analysis of pronunciation is very full, and a good point is made in showing how properly to divide the sentences into phrases, which is one of the chief difficulties of the beginner in any language. The tables of phrases are arranged under headings, "At the Hotel," "At the Post Office," and so forth; there is even a "Cyclist's Vocabulary." The pronunciation of each phrase is given with it, and very clearly too. Various practical directions are added for general conduct, including a new way to avoid sea-sickness. A capital tourist's handbook.

Messrs. Dent expect to follow "The Story of Bruges" in the Mediæval Towns, which we notice above, with the Rev. Robert Langton Douglas' book on Siena. The volume on Prague, by Count Lutzw, will be an early addition to the series. The book on Verona is being written by the Hon. Mrs. Alethea Wiel—not by Mr. Maurice Hewlett, as has been announced.

GARDENING.

Under Glass.

The desire for some kind of greenhouse, primarily for productive purposes, and often secondarily to add to the pleasure of an interior, is becoming more and more general, and we do not know of any book which treats clearly and concisely of the greenhouse, as distinct from its contents. Mr. B. C. Ravenscroft seems to us to supply this want admirably in his GREENHOUSE CONSTRUCTION AND HEATING (Upcott Gill, 3s. 6d.). It is a thoroughly practical explanation of all kinds of greenhouses, forcing houses, and heating apparatus, &c., explaining almost every point by excellent illustrations and diagrams. One main object of the book is to show the amateur, who combines a practical turn with a desire for economy, how to make a small greenhouse himself. It is a sensible and thoroughly practical little book.

Mr. William Williamson apparently hails from the North of Great Britain, and THE BRITISH GARDENER (Methuen, 10s. 6d.) by him differs from most other gardening manuals in one essential respect. The amateur gardener who does not possess "glass" will find much of the book of small interest to him. Thus in treating of landscape gardening for "the mansion" Mr. Williamson is at some pains to arrange for peach-houses and vineries, but says nothing of a "wilderness." Much as heat may be of service for the production of fruit and flowers out of season, no true lover of the garden would forget to allow for a part where flowers and shrubs may grow very much under natural conditions. The "wilderness" at Kew, for example, is much more instructive to the student of the great wealth of flowers which can be cultivated out of doors in Great Britain than the mammoth glasshouses. The same tendency to give the first place to artificially produced fruit and flowers shows itself in the author's calendar of gardening operations. In this section stove plants, orchids, the greenhouse, the vinery, the peach-house, pits and frames, cucumbers—which in the interests of dyspeptic humanity should be grown sparingly—and melons receive by far the most attention, and Mr. Williamson appears to be very partial to figs. He gives cultural directions for figs for seven months out of the twelve, and we are bound to confess that, for us, the British-grown fig is seldom worth an hour a year. Compared with strawberries—of which no mention is made in the calendar—they are as interesting as Dead Sea apples. In fact, the absence of strawberries from the calendar in favour of figs discloses the weakness of the calendar, which is so general as to be almost worthless. Although it is undeniably difficult to cover all the garden even in a book of 400 pages, Mr. Williamson is not always sure of his proportions, and we marvel to find Physalis Franchetti, a herb which seldom grows to more than two feet in height in the open in Great Britain, mentioned under Border Shrubs. We might be forgiven for looking for lilac under this heading, and we find syringa vulgaris merely mentioned. What has the syringa japonica or the s. persica done that no notice is taken of it? It would have been helpful, also, if the author had suggested a good strain of s. vulgaris, such as the large Charles X. or the very fine Madame Lemoine. In fact, Mr. Williamson's book is a little too exalted for the common (or garden) amateur. For those who are prepared to make an expensive hobby of horticulture, however, the work will be found to be of considerable use; and those who "show" will be grateful for the author's hints to exhibitors. The manual is practical, and those who cultivate largely under glass will find it more useful than most works of a popular nature. The index might be extended with advantage.

In the Suburbs.

For that large class of country lovers who are tied to the neighbourhood of towns THE SUBURBAN GARDEN, by F. M. Wells (Sampson Low, 3s. 6d. n.), is a true guide and counsellor. Mr. Wells shows how a small half-acre plot may become a joy. "We wanted," he says, "a garden that we could love, and not merely a piece of ground bepatterned with red geraniums and yellow calceolarias, such as satisfied half our neighbours," and this little book aims at "depicting our garden at that point when at last we felt we had found the plants that suited the soil, that we could grow with our limited knowledge, and that seemed best to fill the space appointed to them. This has been our aim throughout—we do not care how homely is the plant or how rare so long as it meets these requirements." The garden was happy in the possession of a natural slope with a mountain ash and silver birch trees. This at once lifted it from the commonplace. By judicious treatment a touch of mystery is given to all, for, as Mr. Wells says, "It is not good to have a garden surveyed at a glance." The plan pursued seems to have been to carry forward the eye by making the pathways long and narrow and to increase the effect of space by the use of horizontal spacing to the full width of the ground. He further advocates the use of "bold masses of one variety of plant rather than a single specimen dotted about," and broad effects generally. His roses fall into two groupings—one ranging from crimson through the pinks and pale flesh tints to creams and whites, and the other comprising the coppery hues, yellows, buffs, and creams; while this colour scheme is repeated in the perennial borders. Many useful hints are given as to the treatment of flowering shrubs and annuals, and a calendar of outdoor work gives such full directions as to the manner of setting to work that it really seems possible to go and do likewise and become in one's own turn the possessor of a garden to love and a bit of God's earth to keep the heart young.

Border Blossoms and their Legends.

— In STRAY LEAVES FROM A BORDER GARDEN, by Mary Pamela Milne-Home (Lane, 6s.), we have yet a further addition to the words still in use among the country people. The writer troubles us not with the practical cultivation of her plants, but dwells upon their interest and beauty. Her diction, which overflows with "so nice" and "so pretty," is sometimes a little irritating. Thus:—

How I should like to go to Holland in Hyacinth time; it must be quite too lovely, the field of bloom! But I am told that the smell is quite too oppressive (I can believe it) and that the expanse of flowers is cut up by hedges for wind protection and canals for transport.

The book is illustrated, and we reproduce one of the drawings, "Caldra Mains," a charming cluster of low roofs and scanty windows. By its description the interior appears to be equally quaint.

Within our house is a nest of tiny low rooms, with wooden beds, chintz curtains, a best bed room with an ancient four-poster which certainly never got in whole, treasures of old Spode china, corner cupboards, and mysterious "hidie holes" in the thickness of the old walls, bead embroidered screens and tables, carved whatnots, old weapons, and ancient prints of dead and gone worthies, friends of those gone from here.

It is much to be regretted that the old mansion house of the frontispiece is no more, having been destroyed by fire, "a victim to its own loyal illumination," on Jubilee Day, for in these days we can ill spare the real old houses of the land. Part II. is a series of character sketches of gardens and their owners refreshingly bright with the sympathy of a kindred spirit.

already long list of those calm and tranquil home books that have of late been enjoying such a pleasant popularity. This volume is, if anything, too full of information, but a concise and comprehensive Flower and Bird Glossary at the end of the first part helps the assimilation of the facts so liberally placed before us, and brings out clearly the interesting likeness of plant names in different languages. The Latin group naturally tends to similarity, but it is curious to find the same fancy in nomenclature pervading the German, Polish, Danish, and other northern names, and these lists are well worth investigation. The chapter on the vernacular of the Border shows many of the old Practical Guides for the Amateur.

OPEN-AIR GARDENING (Upcott Gill, 7s. 6d.), by Mr. W. D. Drury, is an abridgment from "The Book of Gardening," with which most gardeners are familiar, and makes a careful and well-illustrated volume full of information useful to the amateur, and containing especially what is so often lacking in gardening books, an adequate treatment of the subject of fruit and vegetables. Mr. Drury is also responsible for a shilling volume, fully illustrated, called HOME GARDENING, which comes from the same publishers, and is equally useful on a smaller scale.

"The Art and Craft of Garden Making."

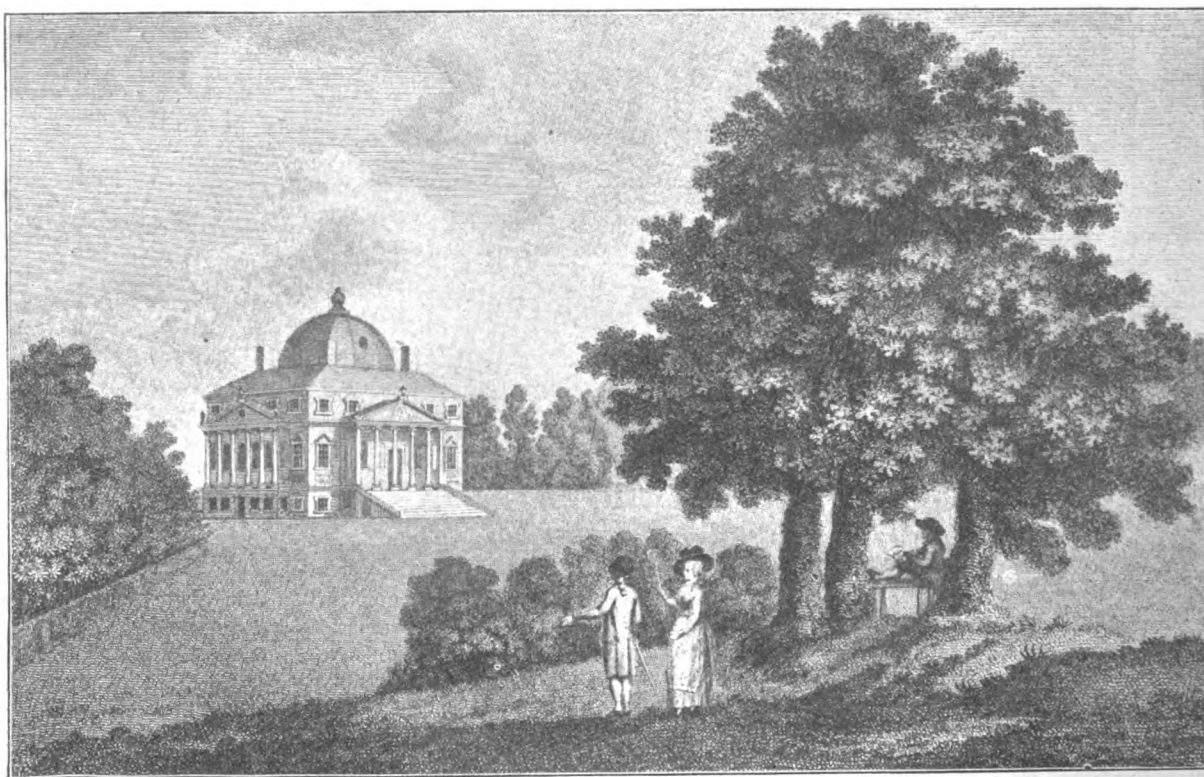

Mr. Batsford has not only increased the price but he has added several good new illustrations to the second edition of THE ART AND CRAFT OF GARDEN-MAKING (B. T. Batsford, 25s. n.),

[From "The Art and Craft of Garden Making."

and has induced the author, Mr. Thomas H. Mawson, to revise and enlarge it. That a second edition of the work should be called for within six months of publication is a gratifying testimony, not only to the serious interest that is nowadays taken in the art of garden-making, but also to the excellence of Mr. Mawson's work. The book remains, as was recognized at the outset, the best practical treatise in our language upon the fascinating subject of garden-making, and has the advantage of being written, and well written, by one whose experience as a garden architect is probably unequalled, and whose breadth of vision and catholicity of taste cannot be successfully challenged. Mr. Mawson recognizes the self-imposed limitations of the garden architect, and is equally sympathetic when he writes as an architect and as a landscapist—and the difference is as acute as that between the architectural draughtsman, as generally seen in competitive "designs for a workhouse," for example, and such a colourist as Mr. Harry Wilson. And whilst we write with so much appreciation of Mr. Mawson's work, we cannot but protest against the unnecessary sneer in which he indulges in his preface to the second edition, at the expense of "the popular poetic fraternity, conspicuous by the broad felt hat and velvet coat." "By their fruits ye shall know them," and we are inclined to believe that Mr. Mawson would, if unobserved, exchange the pot-hat of the architect for the velvet coat of the artist. His book suggests an easy metamorphosis. Garden-making, undoubtedly, is the only art in which, owing to accidental development and unlooked-for realizations, the result surpasses the original conception. We cannot coerce Nature beyond certain limits, and it is one of the joys of the garden architect to discover that, in the face of many minor and temporary failures, his effects in situ always transcend his paper impressions. Let us take a concrete example. Here is an illustration of Foot's Cray Place in 1787 and another of the same place in the present year of grace after the garden has been laid out by Mr. Mawson. In the one case the old house stands forlorn, in the other it is amplified and improved out of recognition. Terraces have taken the place of gentle natural slopes, and the house gains in dignity and homogeneity by the efforts of the architect. It was at one time the somewhat deserted home of careless and indifferent gentility; to-day, with the assistance of art, it is to be an attractive residence, pleasant to look upon from within and from without. It is a very illuminating example of what the garden architect can do, and Mr. S. J. Waring will be well-advised if he adds this to the beauties of the favoured district of Sideup. It is a rare opportunity, for we do not always have the artist working for an owner of conspicuous taste and gentle appreciation. It would help every garden landscapist if "the client" would leave him alone for at least three years, and then, had the patron a proper appreciation, the results obtained would exceed every expectation. If there is a weakness in Mr. Mawson's artistic character, it is that he believes that the character of the house or mansion should decide the style of the surrounding demesne. It may be advisable in many instances, but in some, at least, contrast is more than advisable. Because a house is severely pseudo-classic in style it does not follow that its surroundings should be equally artificial. We can leave the stucco porticos of the mansion and relish the well-kept wilderness of an herbaceous garden; we can enjoy the juxtaposition of a formal Dutch garden with the broken angles of a farm-house; a sundial and straight paths is not a necessary complement to a building by Nash; clipt yews, fantastic and artificial, are not good complements to sham classicism.

Mr. Mawson's book, however, is not always concerned with exchanging old lamps for new, and deals with the subject of garden-making in almost every aspect. He is historical; he will recommend and discuss adequately the requirements of a modern, middle-class English residence; he will talk, with a due recognition of their importance, of fences and gates, entrance gateways, carriage courts and drives, terraces, flower gardens, lawns and garden walks, summer houses, even of conservatories, greenhouses, fountains, lakes, and ponds. The breadth of outlook is only equalled by the richness of the information, and the book, taken for all in all, is written with practical knowledge by one who expresses himself with the enthusiasm of the lover. Could we but have a Mr. Mawson in every town in the country the people's lands would be a much greater delight to the people than they generally are. The illustrations are admirable, practical, and picturesque.

In an Indian Garden.

We shall soon be having too much of the country garden as the scene of leisured and luxurious meditation. The literary lady is exhausting it remorselessly. She sits in her garden seat, pen in hand, evolving all the pretty fancies she can think of. The gardener and other harmless persons on the estate are duly exploited to give a touch of human interest; a husband or male relative reluctantly agrees to be hailed in from time to time by some playful pseudonym. Mrs. Everard Cotes (Sara Jeannette Duncan) follows the programme in ON THE OTHER SIDE OF THE LATCH (Methuen, 6s.). She has her "Man of Wrath," and calls him "Tiglath Pileser—the picture is not complete, it would seem, without a suggestion of the unsanctified Paganism of masculine humanity. We must be forgiven a touch of irritation when a pose of this kind begins to lose its early freshness. These self-centred reveries of sheltered ease grow a little wearisome. Yet we must not do the authoress an injustice. Her book is of high literary quality, and if Anglo-Indians want an "Elizabeth" to themselves they will find her in Mrs. Everard Cotes. She is confined, for her health's sake, to a cane chair in a garden at Simla, and she conveys a pleasant picture of the scenery of the hills and of the Anglo-Indian life, the echoes of which reach her from outside. One feels that the garden, its doings and its suggestions, are being elaborated for the purposes of "copy"; but Mrs. Cotes has a pretty fancy and an agreeable style, and if the thing is to be done at all we do not know that it could be done with less avoidance of the purely futile than it is in "The Other Side of the Latch."

Gossip about Small Gardens.

SMALL GARDENS AND HOW TO MAKE THE MOST OF THEM (Pearson, 1s.) is the attractive title of a small contribution to the lighter type of gardening book. Miss Violet Purton Biddle, the authoress, has cultivated the literary style with which most of us are familiarized by an occasional dip into the ladies' papers. Ease is everything—easy words, easy explanations of Latin names, free and easy English. The book is full of amiability also—simple proverbs for the simple, and high-flown adjectives for the gushing young lady. It may be that Miss Biddle is a well-known contributor to ladies' magazines; we confess our ignorance of her title to write about gardening, and, in fact, to write at all. Her first sentence, "What to go in for," strikes the keynote of her literary style. She encouragingly remarks:—"Frequently, however, its [a small garden's] owners seem to think that to attempt to grow anything in such a little plot of ground is a veritable waste of time and money, as nothing ever comes of it." The small garden starts by having "owners," though "it" is such a little plot, and the final "it" may be either the garden, or the attempt, or the "veritable," waste of time and money. "Be original," says Miss Biddle, in large black letters, "is a motto that every amateur gardener should adopt," and, as a proof of your originality, let us add, make haste to persuade a confiding editor to let you write on gardening. The editor lives in a town and knows little of the subject, and his readers live in the suburbs and are not over particular as to literary style. Miss Biddle, however, is not always amiable and can be severe. She is sarcastic as to "gardeners of the red, white, and blue school," and mentions, with pride, walks with "not a shadow of a box-edging to restrain their (the flowers') mad flight." A poetic picture! But if not a shadow of a box-edging, what then? The reality, or something else? Is it blue Staffordshire tiles, inverted gingerbeer bottles, scallop shells, or merely the soil running wild over the path? In a book with so alluring a title, we expect to find practical hints on every page. The shades of the literary worthies who walked in that dell at St. Ann's-hill, Chertsey—which Miss Biddle unkindly imagines her readers do not know—should be invoked to aid our authoress. We read on, and are alarmed at the information that "a well-kept conservatory adds much to the charm of a drawing room." Has our authoress ever suffered from a conservatory which was added to "the charms of a drawing room" of a small house with a small garden? The heat from the hot-water pipes in winter and the earthy smell from newly-watered plants will be "added" to the charms of the drawing room so successfully as to render it uninhabitable. "Being a good deal more liable to visits from guests than an ordinary greenhouse," says Miss Biddle in her slipshod way, "the conservatory must be kept scrupulously clean and neat . . . and the glass kept beautifully bright." This is bad advice, both directly and by implication. We may observe that if the glass of a conservatory, which is meant to conserve plants against the scorching rays of a summer sun, is kept beautifully bright, we shall not keep our plants beautifully bright for very long! Even in the calendar of operations, with its condensed practical advice, our authoress is pleasantly vague. We are told to "fill vases and baskets" in May. What with? We could suggest many things, and if it is left to our choice, we might fill the large vases with ladies' magazines and the wastepaper baskets with amiable books on gardening.

What to Avoid.

POISONOUS PLANTS IN FIELD AND GARDEN, by Rev. Professor Henslow (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 2s. 6d.), is a useful handbook. Its object is to enumerate "all the wild and cultivated plants which are likely to prove harmful to children; and even adults," says the Professor sternly, "are apt to make the most stupid mistakes." It is only by the widespread inculcation of the poisonous properties of certain plants that painful results can be avoided. The poison may not always be fatal, but will often cause illness and discomfort. Professor Henslow begins with a valuable list of remedies. In most cases of poisoning the remedies suggested by Dr. Tanner and Mr. Blyth are recommended, such as emetics, castor oil and stimulants, especially coffee, with the application of warmth to the body and cold to the head. The bright hedgerow berries of the spindle tree, bryony, belladonna, and the common laurel form tempting morsels for little mouths, but there are many equally deleterious but less attractive sources of illness that Professor Henslow mentions. It is alarming to find that many of our garden favourites bear a bad character. The teaching of botany in schools should have a practical bearing on the properties of indigenous plants, many, of course, well known as drugs, in their concentrated form. As an instance of commonplace poisonous products, Professor Henslow, in speaking of prussic acid, tells us that

The kernels of several members of the genus Prunus, as bird-cherry, peach, nectarine, damson, and apricot, contain this poison. Thus a child, aged two, suffered severely in consequence of having eaten ten or twelve kernels of the apricot; and a child, aged five, died from eating a large quantity of the kernels of gean cherries (Prunus Avium).

The common sorrel, too, largely used on the Continent in salads, yields the highly-poisonous "salts of sorrel and essential salts of lemon, names which sound harmless enough; but the latter, at least, is very misleading, for it is really a dangerous poison and has been mistaken for bitartrate of potash or cream of tartar." Farmers need a wide knowledge of the destructive qualities of many of our field plants. One can only be comforted by the fact that experience and tradition do much to counteract the want of knowledge. Professor Henslow is especially emphatic about the danger of almond flavouring. The liquid called almond flavour, spirit of almond or essence of peach kernel, used in confectionery, according to Dr. Taylor is equivalent in strength to 250 grains of the pharmacopœial prussic acid, and yet, as the writer justly observes, "it is entrusted in private families in the hands of ignorant cooks to apportion the dose which may give the requisite flavour to food!" The Professor also puts a general ban on fungi, advising children to be forbidden "to touch any toadstool they may find growing in the garden or wild," and so avoid all possibility of disastrous mistake. The book is illustrated by accurate diagrams which will help to identify the suspect vegetables, and there is a detailed index.

The literature of the garden is one of the few departments of the book trade unaffected by the South African campaign. Indeed, it is more marked in the publishers' lists to-day than it was before the war began. The literary gardening book, we are told, has materially helped the sale of the more technical works on the subject. "Elizabeth" and her disciples have, it would seem, their practical uses; and to Miss Jekyll, Mrs. Earle, and others we certainly owe a revival of intelligent amateur gardening, and a taste for the pleasure of country life other than that derived from sport. Another thing that has developed an interest in gardening is the growth of the suburbs and the determination of the suburban resident to be rural still. The small suburban garden is essentially a field for the amateur, who is sure to buy a book on gardening. The books vary very much in merit, as will be seen from our reviews, but they are certainly coming in surprising numbers. Some of the best-selling books on the subject come to us from America. The comprehensive series by Professor L. H. Bailey, of Cornell University (published by Messrs. Macmillan), has an immense circulation here; and there is a good demand for many other American books both on agriculture and botany, as well as on gardening. Professor Bailey's "Cyclopædia of American Horticulture," of which Messrs. Macmillan have just issued the second part (the largest and most important work of the kind ever attempted in North America), has already obtained a firm foothold here, many of the plants and vegetables included being identical with those familiar in English gardens. Another American book which Messrs. Macmillan are about to publish, dealing with "Ferns and Flowers and their Haunts," is by Mabel Osgood Wright, who has issued "The Friendship of Nature," "Birdcraft," and other volumes on similar topics with the same publishers. A new edition is soon to come of Mr. Reginald Blomfield's "Formal Gardening."

Canon Ellacombe, who wrote the delightful book entitled "In a Gloucestershire Garden," has another volume—"My Vicarage Garden"—which Mr. Lane has in the press. It was Canon Ellacombe who edited the new edition of the late Dr. Forbes Watson's "Flowers and Gardens" lately published by Mr. Lane. The second volume of Mr. Lane's half-crown series of illustrated Handbooks of Practical Gardening (edited by Dr. Harry Roberts, author of "The Chronicle of a Cornish Garden") will be "The Book of the Greenhouse," by Mr. J. C. Tallack, F.R.H.S. It will be ready next month.

THE STANLEY LIBRARY.

On Tuesday Messrs. Sotheby concluded an eight days' sale of the larger portion of the library of Mr. Edward James Stanley, M.P. Many of the books were well, some even beautifully, bound; but from the standpoint of the bibliophile relatively few lots were of importance. Despite the amusing inference, made by a provincial paper, that because many volumes are described as uncut Mr. Stanley cannot have perused them, the assemblage in the main must have been brought together rather for purposes of reading than for the pleasure of possessing rarities and monuments from early presses. The following table gives details of the outstanding items; and, as an instance of the greatly enhanced value attaching to the signature of an Elizabethan dramatist, note should be taken of Spenser's "Faerie Queen," which realized exactly eighty-five times the amount paid for it in Wellington-street seventeen years ago. The first work particularized is one of the most famous books in the annals of Venetian printing, the authorship of which is revealed in the acrostic formed by the initial letters of the successive chapters; the woodcuts have been ascribed to many artists, including Giovanni Bellini; and the price now paid probably constitutes a "record."

- Cæsar. Leyden, Elzevir, 1635. In red morocco by Roger Payne. Copy mentioned by Dibdin in his Decameron. (524) £20

The collection included some interesting sale catalogues, notably those of the MacCarthy Reagh, the Thomas Gray, the Hanrott, and the Roxburghe libraries. In all 2,434 lots were sold, these bringing an aggregate of £6,358 11s.

Correspondence.

"L'AIGLON" AS AN ACTING PLAY.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—We Londoners have now had an opportunity of judging l'Aiglon as an acting play. We had read the work long ago, and had heard the somewhat depressing opinions of it of the judicious in Paris; but now, since the memorable evening of June 3, we have actually seen M. Rostand's latest production acted by the "divine Sarah," and by the drastically humorous Coquelin. We went desiring to admire and eager to enjoy; but the result was, if I may dare regretfully to say so, extreme and woful disappointment. Of all plays of high pretension, this piece, in the version acted, is surely one of the most tedious and dreary that an audience, full of good will, has been called upon to witness. The fact is, the piece is not a drama at all. It approaches most nearly to a descriptive novel written, not in letters—Richardson and Smollett had taught us to enjoy that form of art—but expressed in poetical dialogue. You see a narrative, but you do not see a play. There is no action, no situation, no story which admits of dramatic effect. You have the body only, not the soul of a drama. The vanity, weakness, puerile ambition—without virility or power—of the miserable boy is a subject for descriptive analysis, not for action, movement, progress. Although pathetic, the wretched young Duc is contemptible; and a study of his character and life and aims in young manhood cannot be depicted through drama. He belongs to the closet and not to the stage. Indeed, to see this play is somewhat equivalent to hearing read aloud Welschinger's admirable prose picture of le Roi de Rome. Of course, Welschinger does not aim at the poetry of Rostand, which is always skilful and sometimes very fine; but no poetry can make heroic the mental struggles and feeble indecision of the self-seeking, trivial lad whose best quality is that he doubted himself. Of action he was incapable, and is, therefore, unsuited to drama. Our own Shakespeare has to be "cut," so as to compress his dramas between a late dinner and a later supper, so that we must not complain of the shears which have operated upon the somewhat wordy M. Rostand; but the two leading characters are left at great length—though the charming Comtesse, among other characters, is pitilessly reduced to the shadow of a shade. The great speech in Act two, beginning is exquisitely declaimed by Madame Bernhardt. M. Rostand must have conceived a dramatic poem rather than an acting play. In the scene on the battlefield of Wagram he introduces horses as if he were writing for the Hippodrome; but these noble quadrupeds are not suited for the boards of the Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt; or for any other theatre in which the piece is likely to be played.

When we read it, we fancy that this Wagram scene would, in representation, be a gruesome, melodramatic sensation, but, as mutilated, it falls flat, and the essence of pity and of terror has escaped. The sad phantoms do not rise. Jean, Paul, Pierre, do not recite how they died for Napoleon or pour la gloire. No voices of anguish cry aloud in the agony of their wounds. At one moment of flickering excitement the vain Duc exclaims—

Ah, mon Dieu! que c'est beau d'avoir vingt ans et d'être fils de Napoléon premier!—

but so soon as decision is required, the heroic Comtesse finds, with scornful regret, that the uncertain aspirant is Faible, attendri, nerveux, flottant.

His only field of battle is a deathbed. As is natural, M. Coquelin lays most stress on the comic side of Flambeau; a part which might be played as a grim grey moustache of the old guard, as one of those impassioned idolaters of Napoleon who were so finely sung by Heine. The undramatic piece drags its slow length along until, at last, comes that death scene in which the solution of the enigma of such a nature is given, in which analysis is terminated by sad, early death. For want of space one can only here essay to indicate roughly those leading defects in the work which hinder it from having the power, the magic, the charm of drama. The weakness of l'Aiglon himself is the weakness and comparative failure of M. Rostand's new play.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Arts Club.

MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your account, last week, of Mr. Augustine Birrell's literary career it is said that "all the essays, or something very like them, previously appeared in the Spectator, the New Review, and other periodicals." May I remind your readers that one of those periodicals was the Reflector, that gallant but short-lived attempt at amateur journalism?

He was in good company, for not all J. K. S.'s contributors were amateurs, and some were already known to fame. One supposes that it was friendship for the brilliant and lamented editor that drew contributions from Mrs. Ritchie, Mr. Leslie Stephen, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Locker Lampson, and even George Meredith himself. But, in his quaint farewell to his subscribers, J. K. S. admitted that all his contributors were not so justly famous as these. "But for me," he urged, "you would never have known L. B. or Simeon Stylites or Hakim. There are poets, too, whose rhymes would not have jingled in your ears without my stage to jingle from." That was only so late as 1888, and what a rush of water has flowed under the bridge since then! An article on George Borrow, which helped to start the renewed interest in his works, begins with a reference to "Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson, in his recent volume, 'Memoirs and Portraits,'" and the political articles are mainly directed against the then overwhelming supremacy of Mr. Gladstone. Yet the Reflector's politics were studiously gay and good natured, or else we should not have found Mr. Birrell contributing essays to a journal which in its own words had

THE SMALLEST CIRCULATION OF ANY

UNIONIST

PAPER IN THE WORLD.

Mr. Birrell's own genial humour probably leads him to remember with kindly complacency the fact that he once wrote for a paper which was Conservative when Conservatism was as much in the cold shade of neglect as Radicalism is now. The Reflector can have done little to start the swing of the pendulum which has landed us in the Boer war. Its professed object was "to obtain that healthy difference of opinion which is not always to be found in a newspaper for the views of which a single person is responsible." In its youthful tolerance and versatility, it welcomed discussion even if it was paradoxical to the verge of eccentricity.

One would have liked James Stephen's journalistic venture to have blossomed into success, to have been adorned with real advertisements in place of the humorous announcements his ingenuity contrived. Never was editor more anxious to give his hospitality to untried pens, and that although he was able to command the friendly help of writers so practised and popular as Mr. Birrell and the others mentioned above. Doubtless he was too generous, and hence, no doubt, came the curiously amateur flavour of the Reflector as a whole. But even that gave it an individuality and charm.

My object in writing, however, is simply to connect the brilliant and successful writer who is the subject of last week's Portrait with the brilliant and unsuccessful editor of the Reflector. Possibly my interest in the matter is mainly personal, for among the causes of the failure of the Reflector was the fact that one of the contributors who owed a public hearing to the indulgence of J. K. S. was

"LUCAS MALET" ON FICTION.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—“The first page of a story, if the story is worth anything, of necessity contains the last.”

This is a most extraordinary statement to find in a carefully prepared speech, and one which Mrs. Harrison would find hard to defend as strictly accurate. The first page of a story, as a rule, can have no more influence on the last than the shape of a baby's feeding-bottle can govern the quality of timber used seventy years later to build his coffin. But perhaps so few novels are “worth anything.”

Even the more sober contention that “a story which is an organic whole can no more have two endings than your life or my life can have two endings” is very debatable. And surely there are innumerable ways in which the life of Mrs. Harrison, or of Madame Sarah Grand, or of any other of the distinguished women writers who formed her audience might be ended.

One instinctively shudders at the thought of a novel which is an “organic whole”—it suggests such an appalling obviousness of construction.

But why can a story have only one ending? Novel writing can never become one of the exact sciences. The forces with which the student of character must deal are unstable. Men and women are individual and never alike; incidents which may make or mar lives often arise from purely external and unforeseen causes. Temperament and emotion produce kaleidoscopic changes in different minds which none can foresee, and of love, the most complex of all emotions, who can tell the force or the trend?

How, then, can it be said that where all the agencies at work are uncertain, there can be only one result? In the commonplace novel, doubtless, there is always an obvious conclusion dictated by the plot, but this is because to the writers of such books life has no mysteries. The writer to whom is given ever so slightly the consciousness of mystery can never be utterly commonplace.

It would be reasonable to say that no man of genius could end a story equally well in two different ways. But this is more due to the limitations imposed on him by the cast of his mind or character than to any inevitableness of the plot. Have not the greatest novelists frequently been undecided between two endings to a novel, and is it safe to conclude that the alternative ending would have been a gross literary blunder?

Yours faithfully,

ALEYN LYELL READE.

"WOMEN AND MEN OF THE FRENCH RENAISSANCE."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—I trust that the writer who in your last week's issue reviewed my book—“Women and Men of the French Renaissance”—will pardon my objection to one or two of his criticisms and will not attribute it to a controversial spirit.

I must unfortunately admit the printer's slips that he mentions, but he has not been quite as just in all his strictures. For instance, in the matter of Margaret of Angoulême's death, the fact that 1544 appeared in the text as the time of its occurrence instead of the right date, 1549, was a misprint, and not, as he supposes, an “erroneous theory” that “could scarcely have arisen without some corresponding confusion of mind.” If he had looked at the dates at the head of the chapter—“The Last Days of Margaret of Angoulême,” he would have found them to be 1547 to 1549; and on page 359 he would have seen that I mention Margaret as busy about her daughter's second marriage in 1548—the date being specified. As I speak of her as alive then, I can hardly have believed her to be dead four years earlier, as he suggests.

As to the word “Parlement” being printed without italics

—a fact which the reviewer writes of as worse than a mere printer's slip, I can only reply that my abolition of italics was deliberate, as I have a dislike to their frequent appearance in a page. Since there is no English word by which I could translate the French one (our Parliament being quite different to the Parlement the nature of which I have explained on page 38), I thought I was justified in using the term as I have done.

It seemed to me worth while to make this answer to a reviewer whose injustice was, of course, involuntary, and who is manifestly so careful a student.

Yours faithfully,

EDITH SICHEL.

TENNYSON ON THE SIGNATURE IN CRITICISM.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In Literature of April 27th Mr. Tighe Hopkins discusses ably the question of the advisability of signing articles in periodical literature and gives the opinions of several great authors and critics. The opinion of our late Laureate, Lord Tennyson, on this subject would be interesting to know had he been asked and had he replied to Mr. Tighe Hopkins' requisition for his New Review articles of ten years ago. But this does not seem to have been done. However, in one of his letters published in Tennyson's “Memoir” by his son, the present Lord Tennyson, we are so fortunate as to be able to know his view on this point. In a letter to a friend who had “vindicated” “Maud” against the rather annoying criticisms which were passed against it in great numbers at the time of its first publication in 1855, the Poet writes as follows about the signing of articles.

Would it not be better that all literary criticisms should be signed with the name or at least the initials of the writer? To sign political articles would be perhaps unadvisable and inconvenient, but my opinion is that we shall never have a good school of criticism in England while the writer is anonymous and irresponsible (“Memoir of Tennyson,” by his Son, Vol. I., p. 406, ed. 1897).

Yours truly, R. P. KARKARIA.

"CRABS."

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—The writer of your “Notes of the Day” (Literature, June 8th), speaking of unsold books returned to German publishers, is evidently in some doubt as to the meaning of the word “Crabs,” for he calls it a dubious term. The term is, on the contrary, very expressive, and an explanation may perhaps interest him and any of your readers not acquainted with it. Crabs (German Krebse)—I do not know if we have the same freshwater-kind here in England—have the peculiarity of travelling backwards, like an engine reversed. They are Rückgänger—unsaleable books are ditto—hence the term. Den Krebsgang gehen is equivalent to the French aller à reculons or rétrograder.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS.

Booksellers agree that the guide-book season assumes greater importance every year. The general run of Englishmen take their holidays more intelligently now that they have books like Grant Allen's Historical Guides and the Mediæval Towns Series to encourage them, and are no longer satisfied with the merely useful information contained in the ordinary but still indispensable handbook. The success of “Our Neighbours” Series (Newnes) is the latest indication that the average English tourist is widening his interest, and anxious to know something of the different European countries before visiting them. The next volume in this series is to deal with "Dutch Life." Mr. Cyril Scudamore has an illustrated book on "Belgium and the Belgians" coming out shortly with Messrs. Blackwood, which answers a similar purpose, and is a companion volume to Mr. D. S. Meldrum's "Holland and the Hollanders." All Murray's handbooks—with the exception of the volumes relating to India and Japan, which are still to be published in Albemarle-street—have settled down under Mr. Stanford's protecting wing—a change, no doubt, partly due to the growing importance of maps in guide-books. We believe there is no immediate intention of dropping the familiar name by which the handbooks have been known since 1836, when the first of the series appeared. The work involved in taking over Mr. Murray's series has made it impossible to bring out many new editions of Stanford's Tourist Guides this year; but re-issues of "Northampton and Rutland" and "Berkshire" are in the printer's hands and will be ready in a few weeks. Another notable change has just been made in the guide-book world—Messrs. Macmillan having taken over the series of handbooks issued by Dr. Lunn. At present they are only four in number, dealing respectively with Italy, Eastern Mediterranean, Western Mediterranean, and Egypt and Palestine; but additions will no doubt be made when the existing books—now being revised—have made their appearance as Macmillan's Guides. "Italy" will be the first volume to come, but it may not be ready just yet. The next addition to Macmillan's "Highways and Byways" Series will be "The Lake District," by Mr. A. G. Bradley (who did the "Highways and Byways in North Wales") with illustrations, by Mr. Joseph Pennell.

Baedeker's Guides have, we believe, a larger sale to-day than ever. There has been a great run on the Switzerland volume lately and a nineteenth edition will be ready at the beginning of next month. Switzerland, Paris, and Belgium, are, perhaps, the best-selling books in the series, having exhausted between forty and fifty editions between them. A fifth edition of "Great Britain" will also be ready shortly. Besides the "Baedekers," Messrs. Dulau are the publishers of the "Thorough Guides" of Messrs. Baddeley and Ward, who have now almost completed their survey of tourist England south of the London and Bath road. "Bath and Bristol, and Forty Miles Round" is due next month, and the long-expected "Hampshire" is in course of preparation, but is scarcely likely to be ready this season.

A little holiday volume to come from Messrs. Dent is "Some Literary Landmarks for Pilgrims on Wheels," touching on the Home Counties, and is illustrated. Messrs. Ward, Lock and Messrs. Black have added largely to their well-known travel books, and we notice some in another column.

Mr. Horace Brooks Marshall's election as one of the sheriffs for the ensuing year suggests the possibility of a popular publisher and newsagent being in due course chosen as Lord Mayor of the City of London. Only a month or two ago Mr. Marshall was elected to the office of Grand Treasurer of the craft of Freemasons, an office once held by his father, who will long be remembered for his generous gifts to churches and charities. The new sheriff is an old Dulwich boy, and took his M.A. degree at Trinity College, Dublin. The publishing department of the firm of which Mr. Horace Marshall is head is responsible for nearly fifty newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals—a larger number, it is claimed, than is published by any other house in the country, and during the last two years they have published more than eighty new books.

Early next week Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode will publish, under the title of "Victoria the Wise," the collection of poems relating to the late Queen written by Mr. Alfred Austin during the last forty years.

A new Dickens is that of the Gresham Publishing Company. It is called the Imperial Edition, and will be completed in fifteen volumes, including a "Literary Character Study" of the novelist by Mr. George Gissing. Of course, only the out-of-copyright works can be included. An important feature will be the illustrations, by Claude A. Shepperson, H. M. Brock, W. Rainey, Fred. Pegram, John H. Bacon, Max Cowper, and others, who, while accepting the familiar types, show them in new situations. Mr. Gissing's "Critical Study" will contain representations of the places associated with Dickens, and Mr. F. G. Kitton is responsible for these. Every subscriber is promised, gratis, a large photogravure portrait of Dickens.

Some of the most interesting announcements for the autumn come from Mr. Fisher Unwin, who besides the autobiographies of Mr. Harry Furniss and Mr. Albert Chevalier promises a volume of seventy-six reproductions of the chief works of Giovanni Segantini, the well-known Alpine painter who died in the Engadine about a year-and-a-half ago. The volume will be prefaced by a biographical sketch by Mr. L. Villari. For the "Story of the Nations" Series there will be a volume on "Feudal England" by Miss Mary Bateson, who edited the "Records of the Borough of Leicester."

The Victoria County History of Norfolk is to fill six volumes. The first volume is just through the press and will shortly be issued. It deals with the natural history of the county, with early man, and Romano-British and Anglo-Saxon remains, and contains, in addition to numerous illustrations, geological, botanical, and historical maps.

Despite the extraordinary measure of popularity which has been accorded to "Ben Hur" in the United States, very little seems to be known about the book in this country. Now that the management of Drury Lane Theatre have announced their intention of presenting a dramatic version of it next Easter, it may not be amiss to recall the fact that it was written some twenty years ago. General Lew Wallace, its author, began the book while he was Governor of New Mexico, and finished it during his term of office as American Ambassador to Turkey.

The series of Irish books which Mr. Standish O'Grady, the Irish author and publisher, is issuing from his press in Kilkenny has just been augmented by a work of his own entitled "At the Gates of the North." This is practically a revised version of one of his earlier books on Ireland's Heroic Period, and tells the story of Cuchullin, in a kind of poetical prose. The two next books in the series (which is known as "The Library of the Nore") will be two plays by Mr. Edward Martyn, author of "The Heather Field," and a volume of poems by a young alumnus of Trinity College, Dublin, Mr. James Bentley Shea. One of Mr. Martyn's plays is the original upon which the play of Mr. George Moore called The Bending of the Bough, produced last year by the Irish Literary Theatre, is founded.

We have received the prospectus of the Authors and Booksellers Co-operative Equitable Publishing Alliance (Limited). The general idea seems to be that authors and booksellers shall combine to squeeze out the publishers and cut up their share of the profits. It might, no doubt, be done if all the booksellers and all the authors would fall into line and stay there; but it strikes us as exceedingly improbable that they will be willing to do anything of the kind. Though one or two authors have expressed a guarded approval of the principle of the scheme, it does not appear that any of them have promised to publish through the Alliance. The prospectus does not mention the names of the executive.

Messrs. Macmillan will shortly publish a volume by the Bishop of Durham entitled "Lessons from Work." It deals with the position of the Church and the Ministry: "Biblical Criticism," "Art," "War," "The Empire," "Social Problems," &c.

Mr. C. P. Lucas, C.B., of the Colonial Office, has added another volume to his "Historical Geography of the British Colonies," namely, the first part of a History of Canada, which the Oxford University Press will publish immediately. The Oxford Press also announce "An English Commentary on Dante's Divina Commedia," by the Rev. H. F. Tozer.

The Harleian Society has just issued the fifth volume of "Musgrave's Obituary" (Pe—Sta), edited by Sir George J. Armytage (the sixth and last volume is in the press), and also

Vol. II. of "The Registers of Bath Abbey," edited by Arthur J. Jewers, giving the burials from 1569 to 1800, with an index to them as well as to the baptisms and marriages for the same period in Vol. I.

The late Mr. Stanley Leighton had shortly before his death sent to the press a volume entitled "Shropshire Houses, Past and Present, illustrated from drawings by Stanley Leighton, M.P., F.S.A., with descriptive letterpress by the artist." It is being printed at the Chiswick Press, and will be published by Messrs. Bell.

Messrs. Jarrold and Sons are publishing shortly "Tales from Tolstoy," translated by Mr. R. Nisbet Bain, with a biography of Count Tolstoy.

In Mr. Murray's Text-Books of Secondary Education, edited by Mr. Laurie Magnus, the next volume will be "Commercial Knowledge," by Mr. Algernon Warren.

The July number of the Northern Counties Magazine contains stories by Mr. Seton Merriman and Mr. J. F. Fletcher, and an article on North Country Folk Lore, by Professor Jevons.

The Government of India has just published a handsome quarto volume with 112 plates, photographic and architectural, dealing with the Muhammadan architecture of Ahmadabad, the capital of Gujarāt, during the fifteenth century. The late Mr. James Fergusson and Sir T. C. Hope, some thirty-five years ago, were the first to illustrate the architecture of this once famous city. Dr. Burgess has now supplied us with a more detailed illustration of its beauties.

Doctor Tiele, of Leyden University, has just finished the second and last part of the second volume of his work, the "History of Religion in Antiquity," of which the first part was published a few years ago. A Parsee scholar, Mr. G. K. S. Nariman, of Bhaunagar-Para (India), is preparing an English translation of the whole volume, which presents a History of the Zarathustrian Religion before Alexander. The first volume contained the History of Religion in Egypt and Western Asia.

"Book Titles from Shakespeare" is the title of a little book compiled by Mr. Volney Streamer for private circulation. Mr. Streamer thinks the custom of taking titles from lines of Shakespeare has only just begun; though he points out that Mr. Howells has named numbers of his books from Shakespeare.

Messrs. Crosby Lockwood and Son are now established at their new buildings, 7 and 8, Stationers'-hall-court.
